However this be, the war then waged between the two parties was of no long continuance. They were quickly ſenſible, that the court aimed to revive their former animoſities, in order to weaken them both. The King to ſucceed in this deſign, made the hardſhips and perſecutions which the Non-conformiſts had ſuffered from the church of England, the topic of his diſcourſe in his common converſations. No greater pleaſure could be done him, than to entertain him with the particulars of thoſe oppreſſions. To give the church of England a ſtill more ſenſible mortification, he ordered the proceſſes in the eccleſiaſtical court againſt the Diſſenters to be revived. But the Preſbyterians, who where moſt concerned, were ſo wiſe as not to improve ſo favorable an occaſion to mortify their enemies. On the contrary, tho' ſome paſſionate men among the Diſſenters, publiſhed virulent invectives againſt the church, to retaliate their ill uſage, the Epiſcopalians unanimouſly reſolved not to anſwer them, for fear of widening the breach between the two parties at a time when their union was more than ever neceſſary. It cannot be denied, that herein their moderation and prudence were exemplary. In general, it may be affirmed, that if ſome of the Non-conformiſts, whether Preſbyterians or others, ſuffered themſelves to be tranſported by their paſſion into inſults on the church of England, they were men of no note. The moſt ſenſible, and thoſe who had moſt credit in their party, obſerved a great moderation. The Epiſcopalians on their ſide, did all that lay in their power to eſtabliſh union, which was alone, capable of ſupporting them both. Writings were publiſhed from time to time, in which the churchmen acknowleged their error in driving the Preſbyterians to extremities; that they were not ſufficiently aware of the artifices of the court, and promiſed to have for them great condeſcenſion, in caſe affairs were reſtored on a good foot. It is true, they are accuſed of having been no leſs forgetful of this promiſe, than of that made when the reſtoration of Charles II was tranſacting. But this concerns the following reigns.

If there were Non-conformiſts who thought themſelves obliged to expreſs their gratitude for the King's declaration, by flattering addreſſes, there were likewiſe biſhops who, with much leſs foundation, prevailed with their clergy to ſend addreſſes of thanks to the King, as for a ſignal favor to the church of England. Of this number were Crew biſhop of Durham, Barlow of Lincoln, Cartwright of Cheſter, Wood of Litchfield, Watſon of St. Davids. Parker biſhop of Oxford was not ſo ſucceſsful; for, in his whole dioceſe, he could find but one clergyman who would ſign ſuch an addreſs. It may eaſily be imagined, that, had the King's project ſucceeded, theſe biſhops would not have been the laſt to imbrace the Popiſh religion.

intereſt of the Popiſh religion, were not thought ſufficient by thoſe who aſpired to greater advantages. Hitherto the Papiſts had not been able to procure any preferments in either of the univerſities, and yet they were paſſionately deſirous to ſet up there, maſters and profeſſors of their own religion, in order to become in time heads of ſome of the colleges. It had been propoſed to the King to found a college in each univerſity. But, whether the expenſe diſcouraged him, or whatever was the reaſon, it was thought more proper to introduce Papiſts into the colleges already founded. The deſign was begun at cambridge, where the vice chancellor * received a letter from the King, commanding the univerſity to admit to the degree of maſter of arts, Alban Francis, a Benedictine monk, without adminiſtring any oath whatſoever, notwithſtanding any ſtatute or law to the contrary, which the King was pleaſed to diſpenſe with in favor of the ſaid Alban Francis. The vice chancellor having communicated this letter to the congregation of regents and non-regents, it was unanimouſly agreed by the members, not to admit the ſaid Francis, till the King had been petitioned to revoke the mandate. For this purpoſe, they applied to the duke of Albemarle †, their chancellor, praying his interceſſion with the King, to which he returned for anſwer, That he had tried, but to no effect. Upon this anſwer the univerſity ſent deputies to London, who were to apply to the earl of Sunderland; but he refuſed to hear them. Shortly after the King ſent a ſecond letter to the univerſity, the ſame in ſubſtance with the former, with this addition, "To "do it at their peril." As the univerſity continued ſtill to ſtand their ground, a ſummons was ſent from the new eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, commanding the vice chancellor to appear in perſon before them, and the congregation, by themſelves, or their deputies. In ſhort, by ſentenſe of the court, the vice chancellor was deprived of his office; but Francis was not admited. This was the firſt avowed attempt to introduce Papiſts into the univerſity. I ſay, 'avowed,' for ſome might have been received under the pretenſe of being Proteſtants. But ſoon after Magdalen College in Oxford, the richeſt in revenue (1), had a more terrible ſtorm to incounter.

The preſidentſhip of that college being vacant the thirty-firſt of March, by the death of dr. Clark, the vice preſident gave notice for a new election the thirteenth of April. But before that day, the members of the college were informed, that the King had granted a particular mandate in favor of mr. Anthony Farmer, a man of ill reputation, who had promiſed to declare himſelf a Papiſt. Whereupon they preſented a petition to the King, praying him, either to leave them to the choice of their preſident, according to their founder's ſtatutes, or to recommend a perſon who might be more ſerviceable to his Majeſty and the college. The anſwer received from the earl of Sunderland, was, "That the "King muſt be obeyed." Immediately after, the King's mandate was delivered to mr. Robert Charnock (2), a new convert and fellow of the college. This mandate being read in the preſenſe of all the fellows, it was reſolved to keep to the day appointed for the election (3), on which day dr. Hough was choſen by a great majority. The new preſident was preſented to the viſitor, the biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſwore and admited him to his office.

The King was extremely incenſed at this election, and, notwithſtanding the interpoſition of the duke of Ormond chancellor of the univerſity, the vice preſident and fellows were cited to appear before the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners at Whitehall. Accordingly, the ſixth of June, ſix fellows, deputed by the ſociety, appeared before the commiſſioners, and to the queſtion, "Why they refuſed to obey "the King's mandate?" They produced their ſtatutes, and the oath they had taken for the obſervation of them, by which ſtatutes Farmer could have no pretenſion. They were ordered to attend again the twenty-ſecond of the month, on which day they gave in ſo many allegations againſt Farmer (who beſide was unqualified by the ſtatutes) that the commiſſioners were aſhamed of him. But as it was the King's cauſe they were maintaining, they deprived dr. Hough of his preſidentſhip, and ſuſpended the vice preſident and one of the fellows (4). The King being informed of the allegations againſt Farmer, thought fit to drop his firſt mandate, and granted a ſecond in favor of dr. Parker, biſhop of Oxford.

The fellows of the college finding him no better qualified than Farmer, refuſed to obey the new mandate. This ſo inraged the King, that he went himſelf to Oxford, bent at all hazards to overcome their obſtinacy. He ordered them to attend him at Chriſt-church, and ſpoke to them in terms capable of intimidating men of leſs firmneſs and reſolution. He commanded them to be gone, and to admit the biſhop of Oxford their preſident, leting them know, that otherwiſe "they ſhould feel the "weight of his hand." However, inſtead of obeying, they offered a petition in vindication of their proceedings; but the King would not receive it. At length, after all his menaces, he was forced to leave Oxford, without gaining his point. Shortly after, the King appointed a commiſſion to viſit the college, viz. Cartwright, biſhop of Cheſter; ſir Robert Wright, chief juſtice of the King's-bench; and ſir Thomas Jenner, a baron of the exchequer. Theſe commiſſioners treated the fellows very uncivilly, abſtaining not even from ſcurrilous and abuſive language. In fine, ſeeing it was not poſſible to overcome them, they found an expedient to ſave in ſome meaſure the King's honor, by an ambigious declaration, to which the fellows were willing to ſubmit. But this ſatisfied not the King, who, the commiſſioners ſaid, expected ſome farther ſubmiſſion, which they adviſed them to make, "By acknowleging their contempt to his ſacred "Majeſty in perſon, and to his letters; that they "ſhould promiſe to behave themſelves loyally for "the future; that they ſhould own the proceed-"ings and legality of the court, implore his Ma-"jeſty's pardon, and lay themſelves at his feet; and "that they ſhould declare their intire ſubmiſſion to "the biſhop of Oxford as their preſident." Of twenty-ſeven fellows, only Charnock and another (5) offered to ſign this ſubmiſſion. At laſt, the commiſſioners, impowered by the King, deprived the twenty-five, who refuſed to ſubſcribe the declaration, of their fellowſhips, and expelled them from the college, for diſobedience to the King's commands. "They would use all just and legal ways of being "relieved." The sentense however was confirmed by the eccleſiastical commiſſioners, and aggravated, by declaring the preſident and fellows incapable of being admited to any eccleſiaſtical dignity or benefice. The preſident refuſed to put the biſhop of Oxford in poſſeſſion of his lodgings, which were therefore broke open. All the college was filled with Papiſts, and Charnock was made vice preſident. Tho' this affair held from the begining of June to the end of October, I was willing, in order to avoid repetition, to finiſh the narrative at once.

The King earneſt to make converts. Gives all places to Papiſts. Echard, Vol. III. p. 828.

The King diſcovered on all occaſions his extraordinary zeal for the advancement of his religion; but principally in the diſpoſal of all places and offices in his gift. For ſome time, he had ſcarce prefered any, but thoſe who were willing to purchaſe his favor by changing their religion, and often diſplaced thoſe who teſtified a zeal for the Proteſtant profeſſion, without regard to paſt ſervices or offenſes. Many of thoſe who had been moſt active for the bill of excluſion were careſſed and courted, provided they would imbrace the King's religion; of this the earl of Sunderland was an inſtance. But an adherence to the Proteſtant faith, was a ſufficient cauſe to remove thoſe who had done him the moſt important ſervices on the ſame occaſion, witneſs his brothers-in-law the earls of Clarendon and Rocheſter. The earl of Shrewſbury *, who ſome years before had turned Proteſtant, loſt his regiment of horſe, for refuſing to return to Popery. The lords lieutenants of counties were almoſt all Papiſts. As for the judges, ſome were Papiſts, and the reſt, tho' Proteſtants, were ready to obey all the King's commands. If any of them proved too ſcrupulous, they were immediately diſplaced, for others more compliant. Theſe mercenary judges, when they went their circuits, received orders from the chancellor, to uſe all their authority for confirming the right aſſumed by the King of diſpenſing with the laws, and to diſcourage, as much as poſſible, thoſe whom they ſhould not find diſpoſed to ſubmiſſion. Theſe orders were executed with extreme rigor and inſolence.

* Charles Talbot.

The judges are his tools. Kennet, p. 491.

The tendency of theſe proceedings plainly appeared to all, for the King was open and undiſguiſed. Nevertheleſs, there were even among the lawyers themſelves, ſome who affected to approve of all his actions, and by their addreſſes, incouraged him to proceed. To ſhew the exceſſive flattery of theſe men, I ſhall here inſert an addreſs preſented to the King the eleventh of June, by the ſociety of the Middle-Temple.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

The addreſs from the Middle-Temple. Gazette, No. 2250. Echard, Vol. III. p. 828.

"WE your Majeſty's dutiful ſubjects, to our "great joy, have received a happy occa- "ſion of making this declaration of our gratitude: "and as we know that your Majeſty's goodneſs is "the greateſt that ever was ſhewn by a Prince to "his ſubjects, ſo we wiſh the voice of men and "angels, to return ſufficient thanks for your Ma- "jeſty's condeſcenſion and clemency to all your "ſubjects, in your gracious declaration for a tole- "ration. And as for this compaſſion and good- "neſs, thanks ought to be paid your Majeſty by "all your ſubjects; ſo we eſpecially of the profeſ- "ſion of the law, have moſt reaſon to be thank- "ful for the honor you have done us, by aſſerting "your own Royal prerogatives, which is the very "life of the law, and our profeſſion. Which pre- "rogatives, as they were given by God himſelf, "ſo we declare, That no power upon earth can "diminiſh them, but they muſt always remain in- "tire and inſeparable to your Royal perſon. Which "prerogatives, as we have ſtudied to know them, "ſo we are reſolved to defend them, by aſſerting "with our lives and fortunes that divine maxim, "'A Deo Rex, A Rege Lex!' And now as a "teſtimony of our perfect ſatisfaction in this our "addreſs and acknowlegment, we have ſubſcribed "our names, that your Majeſty may know us to "be yours; and that the reſt of our profeſſion may "follow our example: and therefore we beg your "Majeſty will accept this addreſs from us, who in "concluſion make bold to offer our beſt wiſhes, "and hearty deſires, that your Majeſty's councils "may proſper in wiſdom, your kingdoms flouriſh "in peace, and your Royal perſon injoy a long, "happy, and glorious reign over us."

JAMES II. AN' 1687.

Notwithſtanding all this, the King was diſappointed in an affair which he earneſtly labored, which was the gaining the parliament to approve of the power pretended to by him of diſpenſing with the laws. The parliament ſhould have met the twenty-eighth of April, and it was expected accordingly. But the King, not finding things ſo ripe as he deſired, had prorogued it to the twenty-ſecond of November. Some days before this prorogation a pamphlet had been diſperſed in London, tending to give the parliament a diſadvantageous idea of the King, in the ſuppoſition that they were going ſo fit. Here is a ſhort extract of this pamphlet, which was aſcribed to dr. Burnet then in Holland.

The King farther prorogues the parliament. Kennet, p. 494. Echard, Vol. III. p. 829.

A libel againſt the King.

"Our King has given ſuch teſtimonies of his "zeal for his religion, that we ſee among all his "other Royal qualities, there is none for which he "deſires and deſerves to be ſo much admired, ſince "even the paſſion of glory, of making himſelf the "terror of all Europe, and arbiter of Chriſtendom "(which as it is natural to all Princes, ſo muſt it "be moſt particularly ſo to one of his martial and "noble temper) yields to his zeal for his church; "and that he, in whom we might have hoped to "ſee our Edward the third, our Henry the fifth "revived, chuſes rather to merit the heightening "his degree of glory in another world, than to "acquire all the conqueſts that this low and vile "world can give him: and that, inſtead of mak- "ing himſelf a terror to his neighbors, he is con- "tented with the humble glory of being a terror to "his own people; ſo that inſtead of the great figure "this reign might make in the world, all the "news of England, is now only concerning the "practiſes on ſome fearful mercenaries."

The King cloſets ſeveral members of parliament to gain them over to him; Welwood. Echard, Vol. III. p. 829. and at laſt diſſolves the parliament. Gazette, No. 2256.

In the interim, the King continued to take infinite pains to gain the members of parliament. He cloſeted, one by one, all that were in London, and repreſented to them what he thought capable to convince them of the neceſſity to aboliſh the penal laws, for the good of the kingdom, and inforced his arguments with menaces and promiſes. It is not improbable, but ſome might be gained, but he could never be aſſured of a majority of voices. This determined him at laſt to diſſolve the parliament, by proclamation the ſecond of July.

The members of the laſt parliament vindicated from an accuſation.

When the ſteadineſs of the members of this parliament, as ſoon as they believed the intereſts of religion were at ſtake, is compared with their extreme zeal for the King in the begining of their ſeſſion, it muſt be infered, that their compliance was owing purely to their miſtake in their good opinion of the King, and that their firmneſs proceeded from their being at length undeceived. They are therefore unjuſtly accuſed, of intending to ſacrifice to the King the intereſt of religion and their country. They demonſtrated the contrary, in reſiſting the temptations the King laid before them, even in his preſenſe, and face to face. This, in my opinion, is the higheſt degree to which firmneſs can be carried. They were all, or almoſt all, members of the church of England; nay, for the moſt part, High-churchmen. I have before given the reaſon of their exceſſive zeal and condeſcenſion for the King, and therefore need not repeat it. But when they diſcovered that the point was not to curb the Diſſenters, but that the King's deſigns concerned the Proteſtant religion, without any diſtinction of ſects, they evidently ſhowed, that they were as good Proteſtants, as thoſe who accuſed them of being Papiſts, or Popiſhly inclined. This truth will ſtill more evidently appear, in the firm and unſhaken courage of the church of England, on the moſt important occaſion that ever was.

Quo Warrantos iſſued out againſt diverſe corporations. Kennet, p. 495. Echard, Vol. III. p. 830.

After the parliament was diſſolved, the King's grand affair was to have a new one intirely at his devotion. But he would not call one, till he was aſſured of having ſuch members returned, as he ſhould think proper. For this purpoſe, Quo Warrantos were iſſued againſt ſeveral corporations, to the end, that when they were deprived of their charters, the King might grant ſuch new ones, as ſhould render him maſter of the elections. It may be imagined, that as the courts of juſtice were diſpoſed, the corporations could not but be deprived of their charters, and for obtaining new ones, were obliged to comply with his Majeſty's deſires. This was one of the methods uſed by the King, to diſpoſe the people to elect ſuch members, as would promote the deſign of taking off the penal laws and teſt. It would be too tedious and difficult to relate all the King's ſecret methods: the emiſſaries he ſent into the counties and corporations; the inſtructions he gave them to gain the people; the arguments, promiſes, and menaces they uſed. All that can be ſaid in general, is, that nothing was left undone which he thought would contribute to the procuring a favorable parliament. To this end, magiſtrates and lord lieutenants were diſplaced, but chiefly, particular men were cloſeted to ingage them in the King's meaſures. It was alſo with this view that he made a progreſs thro' ſeveral counties, and ſtoped at the cities and great towns, to careſs or intimidate the people. But he every where met with ſuch coldneſs, or rather averſion to his deſigns, that he durſt not venture to call a parliament. As the people were convinced, that the King's intention, with whatever pretenſe he diſguiſed it, was to deprive them of their liberty, and change the eſtabliſhed religion, they would not be the inſtruments of their own ruin. The affair of Magdalen college, which was in its greateſt heat, during the King's progreſs, contributed much to open the eyes of the moſt blind, and exaſperate the nation. The King would have a parliament, which ſhould conſent to the abrogation of the penal laws and teſt, or grant him a power of diſpenſing with them, at a time when his whole conduct diſcovered a ſetled deſign of planting the Popiſh upon the ruin of the Proteſtant religion. Beſide, it was manifeſt, he did not aſk this power as a favor, but inſiſted upon it as a right, which he had already aſſumed, without the concurrence of a parliament.

The publie entry of the Pope's nuncio at Windſor. Kennet, p. 494. Burnet, p. 716. Echard, Vol. III. p. 839. Welwood.

In fine, the King ſhewed ſo open a contempt of the law, that no perſon could miſtake him. After ſending, as we have ſeen, a ſolemn embaſſy to Rome, he would have a nuncio in ordinary reſiding at his own court. The Pope had, the laſt year, nominated for this imployment, Ferdinando Dadda, domeſtic prelate to his Holineſs, who had been about the King ever ſince his acceſſion to the crown, and was the Queen's great favorite. He had been received as nuncio, but privately, and without the people's knowlege. But now the King having intirely pulled off the maſk, was for honoring him with a public reception, tho' to aſſume the character of the Pope's nuncio was high treaſon. To give more luſtre to the nuncio, he was firſt conſecrated archbiſhop of Amaſia in the Royal chapel, after which, on the third of July, he made his public entry at Windſor, with great pomp and magnificence. It was a very ſurpriſing ſpectacle to Proteſtants, to ſee a nuncio from the Pope in his Pontificalibus, preceded by a croſs bearer, and a train of prieſts and monks, in the habits of their reſpective orders. Mean while, on this very occaſion the King received an unexpected mortification; for having ordered the duke of Somerſet * to attend the nuncio to his audience, he deſired his Majeſty to excuſe him from an office which the laws of the land made criminal. This ſo incenſed his Majeſty that he removed him from his places of gentleman of the bed-chamber, and colonel of the dragoons. The duke of Grafton †, leſs ſcrupulous, accepted the office refuſed by the duke of Somerſet. Some have believed, that Dadda was one of the King's principal counſellors in affairs of religion. But it is not probable, he would act ſo contrary to the ſentiments of the Pope, who by no means approved the King's conduct. The ſame thing cannot be ſaid of Father Petre, or Peters, the King's confeſſor, who was the firſt mover of all the engines to advance the progreſs of Popery. He was publicly received into the council the eleventh of November, contrary to the opinion of the moſt eminent Papiſts, who juſtly feared the King's affairs would thereby be very much prejudiced.

The King receives favorably the diſtreſſed Proteſtants from France. Kennet, p. 499. Echard, Vol. III. p. 840.

Tho' his Majeſty had given convincing proofs of his averſion to the Proteſtant religion, he favorably received the French Proteſtants, who took ſanctuary in England on account of the rigor exerciſed againſt them in France. He not only granted them his protection, but alſo large ſums, beſide his licenſe to incourage a public collection. Some aſcribe this to policy, in order to intimate to the Engliſh, how little ground they had to fear ſuch treatment in England, from the King, who was ſo charitably compaſſionate to the misfortunes of foreigners, perſecuted in their own country. But as the King himſelf did not diſcover the motives of this conduct, they can only be conjectured. Thus much is certain, the French miniſters thought themſelves under ſuch obligations to the King, that they were among the moſt forward to diſplay his virtues in their ſermons, whenever an occaſion offered. I myſelf remember to have heard a preacher in the church of the Savoy launch out into the moſt profuſe flattery (1).

The duke of Buckingham *, who made a contemptible figure, died this year in Yorkſhire, juſt as he had lived, i. e. without any ſenſe of religion. This ſame year death ſeized the famous ſir William Petty, phyſician, and fellow of the Royal ſociety, after having publiſhed ſeveral uſeful and valuable writings.

* George Villiers. Death of the duke of Buckingham. April 16.

I am now come to the year 1688, a critical year to England, the firſt half of which portended to the Engliſh the loſs of their religion and liberties. James II had promoted this great work in the three years he had been on the throne, with a ſurpriſing rapidity and ſucceſs. He had inveſted himſelf with a deſpotic power, that ſcarcely ſuffered any contradiction. The laws of the land were openly violated. The privy council was almoſt wholly Popiſh, and under a jeſuit's direction. The moſt conſiderable places in the court and kingdom were poſſeſſed by men of the ſame religion. The teſt and penal laws were insufficient fences to secure religion, for which they were intended. In short, the King was resolved to complete his work at all events, and an army of fifteen thousand men, incamped within a few miles of London, beside the assistance of France, seemed to promise him success. But what appeared more extraordinary, was, that Protestant corporations, when their religion was so violently attacked, sent their addresses of thanks to the King, as for a great favor, publicly promising to chuse such members for the insuing parliament, as should concur with his measures. All this gave just occasion to fear, that no remedy could possibly be found for the miseries of the nation, which daily increased. The only refuge which seemed to be left, was the Princess of Orange, presumptive heir of the crown, who, like another Elizabeth, would restore things to their former state, when she should ascend the throne. But beside, that the King, who was but in his fifty-fifth year, might yet live a great while, an astonishing proclamation, published the second of January, to notify the Queen's being with child, and to order public thanksgiving to God, intirely destroyed the hopes which had been entertained.

With this agreeable news the Papists were transported. Some even began to debate the question, whether a daughter, born since the King's advancement to the throne, ought not to take place before the Princess of Orange, born while he was duke of York? But this question was very needless. Every one was persuaded (the Papists thro' hope, and the Protestants thro' fear) that the Queen would be delivered of a Prince. Very certain it is, the Protestants from this time began to form suspicions about the Queen's pregnancy. This appeared in several pamphlets, dispersed thro' London, some of which were even droped in Whitehall. Hitherto, the sole foundation of the suspicion, that the Queen's pregnancy was a cheat, consisted in her having been so many years childless. But this foundation was too weak to prove the certainty of an imposture. It was not impossible for the Queen to be with child; but on the other hand, neither was it impossible that the Queen should be willing to suppose an heir. The extreme zeal of the King and Queen, and of most of their counsellors and confidents, for their religion, rendered such a suspicion plausible to the Protestants. Histories have recorded instances of the like impostures, as in Spain, and in England itself, where it is pretended, that Queen Mary, to deprive her sister Elizabeth of the succession, would have supposed an heir, had not her husband King Philip prevented it. For this reason, the story of Queen Mary's sham conception, as delivered by Fox, was reprinted and dispersed thro' the kingdom, with this title, "Idem "Iterum, or Queen Mary's Big-belly." Another cause which greatly contributed to corroborate this suspicion, was the indiscretion of some jesuits, who pubished, that she would certainly be delivered of a Prince. They pretended, that this conception was miraculous, and the effect of a solemn petition, which the late deceased duchess of Modena had put up in heaven to the blessed Virgin Mary, or of a vow the Queen had made to our lady of Loretto, with the present of a golden image, inriched with precious stones. As on pretense that the Queen had been several years childless, her pregnancy could not be deemed supernatural, there was no necessity to ascribe it to a miracle, of which there could be no certainty: so this needless precaution served only to confirm the suspicion.

JAMES I. AN' 1688.

The King congratulated by numerous addresses. Echard, Vol. III. p. 844. Gazette, No. 2311, &c.

The Queen's pregnancy produced many congratulatory addresses. Some of these carried their compliments and flattery to the highest pitch. This is no wonder. Most of the lords lieutenants, justices, and magistrates of the towns, being devoted to the King, it was not difficult for them to persuade the corporations, that these congratulations to the King were the just tribute of their duty. This being once inculcated, they themselves drew up the address, and procured such subscriptions as they thought proper, thereby causing the corporations to say what they pleased. Were addresses to be considered, as containing the real sentiments of the people, it might be said, that all the English nation was transported with joy, thro' the hopes of a Popish successor. But the nation soon discovered sentiments directly opposite. Beside, it appears, the King did not rely on this general concurence of his subjects, since he dared not to call a parliament, whose approbation and compliance were the great objects of his desires.

Books of controversy published. Echard, Vol. III. p. 845.

Beside the forementioned measures which the King used to advance the Popish religion, there was still another from which he promised himself great success. Some time since, the Romish priests and jesuits had printed and dispersed a great number of controversial writings, which had been answered by Tillotson, Tennison, Stillingfleet, Sherlock, and others, in a manner which, in all appearance, was not agreeable to the Papists. The King doubtless fearing that his doctors would not be a match for the champions of the church of England, published a proclamation, grounded upon a statute made the fourteenth of Charles II, "prohibiting the print- "ing and selling all unlicensed and treasonable "books and pamphlets, under the pains and pe- "nalties provided by the said act." Under this name were comprehended the controversial books published by the Protestants, on a pretense, that they incouraged and fomented animosities among his subjects (1).

Letters between Mess. Stewart and Fagel relating to the test. Burnet, p. 731. Welwood, p. 190. Kennet, p. 491. Echard, Vol. III. p. 845.

The King's grand design, as hath been seen, was to repeal the test and penal laws, and for that purpose he wished to have a parliament at his devotion. He had already abrogated these laws by his own authority; but he daily found, this did not suffice to lead his subjects to the degree of compliance he desired. He thought therefore, if the consent of the Prince and Princess of Orange could be obtained, it would be a great step towards obtaining the same thing of the parliament. To that end, he resolved on sounding the inclinations of the Prince of Orange, without his appearing in it. He imployed mr. James Stewart (2), pensionary Fagel's acquaintance, who wrote to that minister, indeavoring to persuade him, that it was the interest of England, and of the Prince and Princess of Orange, that the test should be abrogated, and the laws against the Catholics repealed. This letter coming only from a private man, the Prince would not allow mr. Fagel to return an answer. Mr. Stewart in vain renewed his instances for an answer, till at length he was obliged to acquaint mr. Fagel, that his first letter was writ by the King's direction, who desired to have the opinion of the Prince and Princeſs upon the affair. This, joined to the falſe report propagated in London, that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange had given their conſent to the abrogation of the teſt and penal laws, forced mr. Fagel at laſt to anſwer mr. Stewart, and let him know the ſentiments of the Prince and Prin eſs of Orange.

Theſe gentlemen's letters have made ſo much noiſe in the world, and are ſo univerſally known, that I do not think it neceſſary to inſert them, I ſhall content myſelf with briefly refreſhing the reader's memory with the ſubſtance of mr. Fagel's anſwer. He told mr. Stewart, "That it "was the opinion of the Prince and Princeſs, that "no Chriſtian ought to be puniſhed for his con"ſcience, or ill uſed becauſe he differed from the "eſtabliſhed religion, and therefore could conſent, "that the Roman Catholics ſhould injoy a full "liberty of conſcience. That as to the Non-con"formiſts, their Highneſſes did not only conſent, "but heartily approved of their having an intire "liberty of conſcience, for the exerciſe of their re"ligion, without any trouble, hinderance, or "moleſtation on that ſcore.——But their High"Mightineſſes could not by any means agree to "a repeal of the teſt, and thoſe other penal laws, "which tended to the ſecurity of the Proteſtant re"ligion, ſince the Roman Catholics received no "other prejudice from theſe, than their being ex"cluded from parliament and public imploy"ments; and that by them the Proteſtant religion "is ſheltered from all the deſigns of the Roman "Catholics againſt it, or againſt the public ſafety."

This anſwer was ſupported with reaſons ſo clear and ſolid, that mr. Stewart finding himſelf too weak for ſuch an adverſary, thought it more adviſeable to deny all correſpondence with mr. Fagel on this ſubject, in order to deſtroy the authority of mr. Fagel's anſwer, which had been printed and diſperſed thro' England and all Europe. The penſionary, incenſed at this proceeding, ſent a letter to the marquis of Albyville, the Engliſh embaſſador at the Hague, wherein he called him to witneſs, that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange had declared their thoughts to him concerning the penal laws, in the ſame manner as he had repreſented them; and that Albyville had acquainted the King with it long before he wrote his letter. He complained of the earl of Sunderland, for having aſſigned an allowance to print a pamphlet (1), which aſſerted, that the anſwer of mr. Fagel to mr. Stewart was ſuppoſititious, tho' he himſelf had ſeen the original, and knew alſo that the King had ſeen it. This laſt letter was likewiſe printed in French and Engliſh, and diſperſed. All this was extremely injurious to the King, and began to give the Engliſh hopes, that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange would not abandon them in their preſſing neceſſities. It muſt be obſerved, that mr. Fagel's letter to mr. Stewart was writ on the fourth of November the laſt year, before the Queen's pregnancy was divulged. But this affair became not public till the begining of the year 1688.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 847.

The refuſal of the Prince and Princeſs of Orange to conſent to the abrogation of the teſt and penal laws, ſerved only to inflame the King's zeal, and oblige him to uſe freſh indeavors to have a parliament at his devotion. He ſent therefore emiſſaries into the ſeveral counties, to indeavor to ſecure the elections, before he ventured to call a parliament. But the more ſollicitous he was to gain this point, the leſs inclination he found in the people, who, on ſo important an occaſion, were unwilling to truſt their intereſts with men devoted to the court, as the King deſired. Wherefore the King, foreſeeing all his artifices would prove unſucceſsful, and that he ſhould at laſt be obliged to uſe force, gave out commiſſions for raiſing new troops, for the increaſing of his ſtanding army; and likewiſe cauſed a larger fleet to be equiped. The new commiſſions were generally given to the Iriſh and Popiſh officers. Moreover, he wrote, the ſeventeenth of January, to the States-General, demanding the ſix Engliſh and Scotiſh regiments that were in their ſervice. The ſecond of March he iſſued out a proclamation, "Forbiding his natural born ſubjects to enter or "liſt themſelves in the ſervice of any foreign "Prince or State, either by ſea or land."

Their High-Mightineſſes did not think proper to ſend theſe regiments to the King in the preſent juncture. They returned a civil anſwer, and declared, That having examined their ingagements, they could find no agreement or capitulation that could oblige them to grant his Majeſty's demands, except when he was in war with ſome of his neighbors, or there was an inſurrection at home. That they had accordingly ſent the ſix regiments into England in the year 1685, at the time of the duke of Monmouth's rebellion: but that now the King being in peace with his neighbors, and free from diſturbances at home, they ſaw no reaſon that could oblige them to ſend back thoſe troops. The King not ſatisfied with this anſwer, renewed his inſtances: but the States, in ſhewing how theſe regiments were formed, and the treaties which had been made about them, inſiſted, that they were obliged to ſend them back only in the two caſes above-mentioned, and that the King was not at preſent in either. At length, after a third fruitleſs attempt, the King, by a proclamation, called home all his ſubjects which were in the ſervice of the States-General. Whereupon the Prince of Orange offered paſſes to all the officers of the ſix regiments that were wiiling to return home; which about forty of them accepted.

March 14. Gazette, No. 2330.

Tho' the King had publiſhed laſt year a declaration, for an intire liberty of conſcience to all his ſubjects, and, by virtue thereof, had filled almoſt all the offices with Catholics, he thought fit to publiſh a ſecond upon the ſame ſubject, the twenty-ſeventh of April this year. Perhaps he had a mind to ſhew, that tho' he was deſirous of having what he had done confirmed by act of parilament, he could, however, proceed without their concurrence, and act by abſolute power. Perhaps too, he intended to bring things to a criſis, being inceſſantly puſhed by his Popiſh counſellors, who were for improving the occaſion offered them by the King's zeal. The declaration was as follows:

An order to the biſhops to ſee it read in all churches and chapels. May 4. Gazette, No. 2344. Kennet, p. 509. Burnet, p. 736. Welwood.

The King was not ſatisfied with publiſhing this declaration in the uſual manner, but thinking doubtleſs, that, in ſo important an affair, extraordinary formalities were to be obſerved, he iſſued out an order of council, injoining the biſhops to cauſe it to be ſent and diſtributed throughout their ſeveral dioceſes, to be read at the uſual time of divine ſervice, in all churches and chapels, on certain days named in the order. Some believed, the King had two views in this order, firſt, to mortify the church of England, againſt which he had for ſome time ſhewed great reſentment: ſecondly, to lay the biſhops under a neceſſity, either of making themſelves in ſome meaſure the inſtruments of his deſigns againſt the Proteſtant religion, or of incuring the penalties of their diſobedience in caſe of a refuſal.

Several biſhops meet and debate about it. Kennet, p. 509.

Upon the receit of this order, ſeveral biſhops, who were in London, aſſembled at the archbiſhop's palace at Lambeth, to conſult how they were to behave upon ſo nice an occaſion. For they were neceſſarily, either in obeying the King, to approve, by their conduct, this violation of the laws, and betray the intereſts of the Proteſtant religion, or in refuſing to obey, to draw upon themſelves the penalties which, in all likelihood, would be inflicted for their diſobedience. Theſe difficulties were debated in this aſſembly with all the caution ſo important an affair required, after they had implored the divine aſſiſtance by extraordinary prayers. The reſult of their conference was, that it was better to obey God than man, and their caſe being ſuch, that they could not obey the King without betraying their own conſciences, they ought, without farther conſideration, to expoſe themſelves to the approaching ſtorm, rather than ſacrifice the intereſts of God and the church. This reſolution was grounded upon four conſiderations. 1. That many would juſtly judge the clergy either cowards or hypocritical time-ſervers, in publiſhing what they thought illegal, and illegally ſent to them. 2. That many who had votes for parliament men would take this for the conſent of the publiſhers, and be ſtrengthened in the chuſing ſuch men as ſhould be friends, not only to the indulgence, but to the foundation of it, the diſpenſing power. 3. That the world would have reaſon to take their publication for an approbation, becauſe there could be no other intention in ordering it to be publiſhed, than to make the clergy parties. 4. That after this they muſt expect farther things to be publiſhed by them, at which they muſt make a ſtand; and their making a ſtand when they had loſt their reputation would be of no force. Kennet, p. 510.

They petition the King to be excuſed from ſending it to their clergy. Kennet, p. 511. Echard, Vol. III. p. 859. Burnet, p. 738. Welwood.

Agreeably to this reſolution, the conſulting biſhops, being ſeven, drew up a petition before they parted, and ſubſcribing it the ſame day, the eighteenth of May, ſix of them (1) croſſed the water to Whitehall to preſent it to the King, without acquainting any perſon with their deſign. Their names were Sancroft archbiſhop of Canterbury; Lloyd biſhop of St. Aſaph; Kenn of Bath and Wells; Turner of Ely; Lake of Chicheſter; White of Peterborough; Trelawny of Briſtol. Their petition ran thus:

To the King's moſt excellent Majeſty.

The humble petition of William archbiſhop of Canterbury, and diverſe of the ſuffragan biſhops of that province, now preſent with him, in behalf of themſelves, and other of their abſent brethren, and of the inferior clergy of their reſpective dioceſes.

Humbly ſheweth,

" Majeſty's reign; and is a matter of ſo great " moment and conſequence to the whole nation, " both in church and ſtate, that your petitioners " cannot in prudence, honor, or conſcience, ſo far " make themſelves parties to it, as the diſtribution " of it all over the nation, and the ſolemn publi- " cation of it once and again, even in God's " houſe, and in the time of his divine ſervice, muſt " amount to, in common and reaſonable conſtruc- " tion. Your petitioners therefore moſt humbly " and earneſtly beſeech your Majeſty, that you " will be pleaſed not to inſiſt upon their diſtribu- " ting and reading your Majeſty's ſaid declaration; " and your petitioners, as in duty bound, ſhall ever " pray, &c."

The King's anſwer. Kennet, p. 511. Burnet, p. 739. Echard, Vol. III. p. 859.

The King, ſurpriſed and incenſed at this petition anſwered in a very angry tone: " I have heard of " this before, but did not believe it: I did not ex- " pect this from the church of England, eſpecially " from ſome of you. If I change my mind, you " ſhall hear from me; if not, I expect my com- " mand ſhall be obeyed." The biſhops replied, " We reſign ourſelves to the will of God;" and then immediately retired.

Id. p. 876. Kennet, p. 515. Burnet, p. 740.

The biſhops of Durham and Rocheſter, both eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, and two others (1), cauſed the declaration to be read in their dioceſes: but it generally happened, wherever it was read, that the congregation immediately left the church. One miniſter, before he began to read it, told his flock, " That he could not refuſe the order ſent " him to read the declaration, but that he knew no " order which obliged them to hear it." In London it was read but in four or five churches (2).

Ibid.

Mean while, the court was unreſolved what courſe to take with the biſhops. Not but that they were determined to come to extremities, rather than quit their deſigns. However they did not care to begin with the biſhops, becauſe of the people's reverence for them. Tho' the King's council perſuaded him to do all things with a high hand, they trembled, however, when they met with any oppoſition, ſeeing the great diſproportion between the number of Proteſtants and Papiſts. They conſidered, that while every one was ſubmiſſive, the lords lieutenants of counties, and the magiſtrates, all creatures of the King, had great credit and authority; but ſhould the people happen to grow weary of their obedience, and openly reſiſt, their authority would vaniſh; and it was not probable, the leſſer number ſhould ſubdue the greater. This had been the caſe in the reign of Richard II, and very lately in that of Charles I. It ſeems therefore, that prudence required the King carefully to avoid what might produce a ſudden revolution, and not to enter on violent meaſures, till he had taken greater precautions. For, upon ſuppoſition of a rebellion, which was not impoſſible if the biſhops were proceeded againſt with rigor, would it not be very abſurd, to rely on a Proteſtant army to introduce Popery, and force Proteſtants to ſubmiſſion? But, on the other hand, thoſe who directed the King in his counſels and undertakings, had not his intereſt chiefly in view, but that of the Catholic religion. They conſidered the King only as an inſtrument to be made uſe of, at all events, while he was alive, for fear they ſhould ſuddenly loſe him. God ſeems to have blinded this Prince, to prevent his ſeeing what every one elſe clearly perceived, in order to throw him on his ruin. He was therefore reſolved to proceed with the utmoſt rigor againſt the biſhops, and for that purpoſe they were ſummoned, the eighth of June, to appear before the council.

Their appearance and behavior. Kennet, p. 511. Burnet, p. 741. Echard, Vol. III. p. 860.

On their appearance they were aſked, " Whe- " ther they owned the petition?" The biſhops, ſurpriſed at this queſtion, ſince they themſelves had preſented the petition, feared ſome ſnare was laid for them, and therefore at firſt forbore to give a direct anſwer (3). At length, the archbiſhop confeſſed, that it was written with his own hand, and that the reſt had ſigned it; adding withal, they had done nothing but what they were ready to juſtify. The chancellor indeavored to make them ſenſible of the ill conſequences of their diſobedience, which tended to diminiſh the King's authority, and diſturb the peace of the kingdom. At laſt, he aſked them, whether they would give their recognizances to appear before the court of King's-Bench to anſwer this high miſdemeanor? This they all refuſed, inſiſting on the privilege of their peerage, which they were reſolved to maintain, as well as the rights of the church, being equally bound by their callings to oppoſe all innovations both in government and religion. The chancellor, ſurpriſed at their conſtancy, threatened to ſend them to the Tower, and to proſecute them to the utmoſt rigor of the law, unleſs they immediately recanted, and withdrew their petition. They unanimouſly anſwered, That they were ready to go wherever his Majeſty was pleaſed to ſend them; that they hoped the King of Kings would be their protector and their judge; that they feared nothing from men; and that having acted according to law and their own conſciences, no puniſhments ſhould ever be able to ſhake their reſolutions.

They are ſent to the Tower. Gazette, No. 2354. Kennet, p. 512. Echard, Vol. III. p. 861.

On this anſwer, eighteen privy counſellors, ſeveral of them Papiſts (4), were for ſending the biſhops to the Tower. A warrant was immediately drawn and ſigned for their commitment, the reaſon aſſigned being, " For contriving, making, " and publiſhing a ſeditious libel againſt his Ma- " jeſty and his government." It is difficult to conceive, on what foundation, they could be accuſed of publiſhing a petition which they had only delivered to the King himſelf. However, the attorney and ſollicitor general, were ordered to proſecute them for the ſame the next term. It was not thought proper to ſend them to the Tower thro' London, for fear it might occaſion a tumult. They were therefore conveyed by water in the moſt private manner. But people hearing of it, flocked in multitudes to the river ſide, and on their knees de-

(3) It ſeems, as the biſhops were going to the council, they were adviſed to remember, that no man was obliged by the law to accuſe himſelf. Accordingly, when the King in council, holding the petition in his hands, aſked them, " Whether " they had ſigned that paper?" They made a low bow and ſaid nothing. " What! ſays the King, do you deny your own " hands?" Upon which they ſilently bowed again. Then the King told them, " If they would own it to be their hands, " upon his Royal word not a hair of their head ſhould be touched." Whereupon the archbiſhop ſays, " Relying on " your Majeſty's word, I confeſs it to be my hand:" And ſo ſaid all the reſt. Then being ordered to withdraw, when they were called in again, they found the King vaniſhed, and Jefferies in the chair, who uſing them very roughly, ſent them to the Tower. fired their bleſſing, with loud acclamations extolling their conſtancy. The like ſight was ſeen at the Tower, where the ſoldiers of the gariſon fell on their knees imploring their bleſſing. This was a great mortification to the King, and might have convinced him, that he was yet very far from his aim. But as I ſaid, the deſign of his counſellors was to make haſte and finiſh the work begun, for fear ſome accident ſhould deprive them of their inſtrument.

The tenth of June, two days after the biſhops had been ſent to the Tower, the Queen was delivered of a Prince, who, during the life of his father was known by the name of the Prince of Wales, and afterwards was called by ſome the Pretender. His birth was an occaſion of triumph to the Papiſts, but of aſtoniſhment and terror to the Proteſtants, who imagined their misfortunes would end with the death of the King; but thoſe hopes were now defeated. It is univerſally known, that the birth of this Prince has been very much ſuſpected, and that many did then, and ſtill do, believe it ſuppoſititious. Multitudes of papers have been publiſhed for and againſt, ſome containing the grounds of the ſuſpicions, and others, arguments to remove them. The reader, doubtleſs, expects not from a foreigner, the deciſion of a fact which was never perfectly cleared, the impoſture whereof reſts only upon conjectures and probabilities, and the truth upon ſuppoſitions, which indeed are generally true, but of which it cannot be ſaid that it is impoſſible they may be falſe ſometimes. In general, it is very certain, the Queen, during the whole time of her pregnancy, was ſuſpected of a deſign to impoſe an heir upon the kingdom, and this ſuſpicion was very public. It is alſo certain, that tho' the King and Queen knew of this ſuſpicion, they took no care to remove it. On the contrary, their whole conduct, as well during the Queen's pregnancy, as her labor, gave ſtill greater ſtrength to the ſuſpicion. For a negligence, which ſignifies nothing when there is no ſuſpicion, muſt be remarked when an impoſtor is ſuſpected. On the other hand, it ſeems a ſtanding rule, that, when both parents expreſs not any doubt concerning the birth of their child, no perſon can be ſure they are deceived: but this rule is perhaps not ſo general and certain as many imagine. It holds good where there is no ſuſpicion of a cheat. But in caſe a preſumptive heir, diſinherited by the birth of a child, who comes to take his place, has good proofs that the child is ſuppoſititious, certainly the bare owning of this child by both parents, will not invalidate proofs, which I ſuppoſe to be clear. It is not impoſſible for a man and wife to ſuppoſe a child, thro' revenge or ſome other intereſt, in order to deprive a preſumptive heir of their inheritance. I ſay, it is not impoſſible, tho' it rarely happens. There are however inſtances to prove the poſſibility. Indeed, to decide by law, that a child is ſuppoſititious, very convincing proofs muſt be alleged, becauſe the judges, who are obliged to follow the rules of law, are not determined by appearances, however probable they may appear. But the caſe is not the ſame with the public, on whom very often conjectures grounded upon great probabilities, make as much impreſſion as the ſtrongeſt proofs. The affair in queſtion having never been legally decided, I can only preſent the reader with what has been moſt probably urged pro and con, in order to aſſiſt him either to be determined for or againſt the pretended ſuppoſition of the Prince of Wales; or to ſhow him, that he ought to ſuſpend his judgment, till the thing is more plainly diſcovered. This I propoſe to do with impartiality, in producing the arguments alleged on both ſides.

Suſpicions relating to it.

Reflections upon it.

There are three opinions concerning the real or pretended birth of the Prince of Wales.

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

Sundry opinions concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales. Echard, Vol. III. p. 863.

The firſt is, that the Queen was not with child, when ſhe pretended to be ſo, and that at the time of her pretended delivery, a ſon was ſuppoſed as being born of her. The ſecond is, that ſhe was really with child, but that having the misfortune of a miſcarriage, ſhe continued ſtill to feign herſelf big, and at laſt ſuppoſed, or cauſed to be ſuppoſed, a child as born of her body, and that this child dying ſhortly after, another was ſubſtituted in his room, and to this, dying ſeven weeks after, ſucceeded another child. The third opinion is, that the Queen was really with child, and delivered the tenth of June of a ſon, the ſame who is ſince called the Pretender, and is now at Rome. In confirmation of the firſt of theſe opinions it is alleged: 1. That the King, for certain reaſons, was become incapable of children. 2. That the Queen had been ſeven years without being with child. 3. That now ſhe had never a conſtant reckoning. 4. That her delivery was ſudden, and immediately after the removing of her lodgings. 5. That it was on a Sunday morning, when all the Proteſtant court ladies were at church. 6. That neither the Princeſs Anne of Denmark, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, nor the Dutch embaſſador were preſent at her labor, tho' they were the three perſons who ought principally to have been there. 7. That during the labor, her bed was not left ſo open as it ſhould have been. 8. That while ſhe went with child, ſhe never ſatisfied the Princeſs Anne, and many Proteſtant ladies about her, of her bigneſs, either by leting them feel her belly, or ſee her breaſt. 9. Neither did ſhe ſhow the Princeſs any of her milk after her lying in. 10. That during her labor, a warming pan was brought into the room, tho' the weather was extreme hot, and the room heated by a vaſt crowd of people. Laſtly, it was alleged, that tho' the King, Queen and courtiers, ſufficiently knew before the delivery, that the nation ſuſpected an impoſture, they did not uſe thoſe precautions as they might and ought to have done in ſuch a caſe; and, inſtead of puting it beyond all poſſibility of doubt, they left ſo many marks of ſuſpicion, as cauſed infinite doubts and diſputes: inſomuch that ſome Roman Catholics themſelves owned, "That ſo important an affair had been "managed with great ſupineneſs and imprudence." This is what mr. Echard ſays, one of the moſt moderate hiſtorians, who is not to be ſuſpected by the King's adherents.

Dr. Welwood is very ſhort in his account of this matter, and contents himſelf with giving the general opinion, without any thing of his own. Theſe are his words:

Extract from Welwood, p. 187.

"While the biſhops were in the Tower, the "Roman Catholics had their hopes crowned with "the birth of a pretended Prince of Wales. "The fears of a Proteſtant ſucceſſor, had been "the only allay that rendered their proſperity "leſs perfect. Now the happineſs of having an "heir to the crown, to be bred up in their own "religion, quaſhed all thoſe fears, and atoned "for the uncertainty of the King's life. It was "ſo much their intereſt to have one, and there "were ſo many circumſtances that ſeemed to "render his birth ſuſpicious, that the nation in "general were inclinable to believe, that this "was the laſt effort of the party, to accompliſh "our ruin."

But the moſt circumſtantial account of this affair, is that of dr. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, in the Hiſtory of his own Times, publiſhed ſince his death. As I am to make ſome remarks on his teſtimony, it will be neceſſary to inſert the following following paſſage, wherein he expreſly ſpeaks of the birth of the Prince of Wales.

" I muſt now look back to England, where " the Queen's delivery was the ſubject of all men's " diſcourſe. And ſince ſo much depends on this, " I will give as full and as diſtinct an account of " all that related to that matter, as I could gather " up, either at that time or afterwards. The " Queen had been for ſix or ſeven years in ſuch an " ill ſtate of health, that every winter brought " her very near death. Thoſe about her ſeemed " well aſſured, that ſhe, who had buried all her " children ſoon after they were born, and had " now for ſeveral years ceaſed bearing, would " have no more children. Her own prieſts appre- " hended it, and ſeemed to wiſh for her death. " She had great and frequent diſtempers, that " returned often, which put all people out of " their hopes or fears of her having any chil- " dren. Her ſpirits were now much upon the " fret. She was eager in the proſecution of all " the King's deſigns. It was believed that ſhe " had a main hand in driving him to them " all. And he, perhaps, to make her gentler " to him in his vagrant amours, was more eaſy " to her in every thing elſe. The lady Dorcheſter " was come back from Ireland; and the King " went often to her. But it was viſible, ſhe was " not like to gain that credit in affairs, to which " ſhe had aſpired: and therefore this was leſs con- " ſidered.

" She had another mortification, when Fitz- " James the King's ſon was made duke of Ber- " wick. He was a ſoft and harmleſs young man, " and was much beloved by the King: but the " Queen's diſlike kept him from making any " great figure. He made two campains in Hun- " gary, that were little to his honor: for, as his " governor diverted the allowance that was given " for keeping a table, and ſent him always to " eat at other tables, ſo, tho' in the ſiege of Buda " there were many occaſions given him to have " diſtinguiſhed himſelf, yet he had appeared in " none of them. There was more care taken " of his perſon, than became his age and con- " dition. Yet his governor's brother was a " jeſuit, and in the ſecret: ſo every thing was " ventured on by him, and all was forgiven him.

" In September, the former year, the Queen " went to the Bath, where the King came and " ſaw her, and ſtaid a few days with her. She " after that purſued a full courſe of bathing: and " having reſolved to return in the end of September, " an accident took her to which the ſex is ſub- " ject; and that made her ſtay there a week " longer. She came to Windſor on the ſixth of " October. It was ſaid, that at the very time of " her coming to the King, her mother, the ducheſs " of Modena, made a vow to the lady Loretto, " that her daughter might by her means have a " ſon. And it went current, that the Queen be- " lieved herſelf to be with child in that very " inſtant in which her mother made her vow: of " which ſome travellers have aſſured me, there was " a ſolemn record made at Loretto. A concep- " tion ſaid to be thus begun, looked ſuſpicious. " It was now fixed to the ſixth of October: ſo " the nine months were to run to the ſixth of July. " She was, in the progreſs of her big belly, let " blood ſeveral times: and the moſt aſtringent " things that could be propoſed were uſed.

" It was ſoon obſerved, that all things about her " perſon were managed with a myſterious ſecreſy, " into which none were admited but a few Pa- " piſts. She was not dreſſed nor undreſſed with " the uſual ceremony. Prince George told me, " that the Princeſs went as far in deſiring to be " ſatisfied, by feeling the motion, after ſhe ſaid " ſhe was quick, as ſhe could go without break- " ing with her: and ſhe had ſometimes ſtaid by " her even indecently long in mornings to ſee her " riſe, and to give her her ſhift: but ſhe never " did either. She never offered any ſatisfaction " in that matter by letter to the Princeſs of " Orange, nor to any of the ladies of quality, in " whoſe word the world would have acquieſced. " The thing upon this began to be ſuſpected: and " ſome libels were writ treating the whole as an " impoſture. The uſe the Queen made of this, " was to ſay, that ſince ſhe ſaw ſome were ſuſ- " ſpecting her capable of ſo black a contrivance, " ſhe ſcorned to ſatisfy thoſe who could entertain " ſuch thoughts of her. How juſt ſoever this " might be, with relation to the libellers, yet " certainly if ſhe was truly with child, ſhe owed " it to the King and herſelf, to the King's daugh- " ters, but moſt of all to the infant ſhe carried in " her belly, to give ſuch reaſonable ſatisfaction, " as might put an end to jealouſy. This was in her " power to do every day: and her not doing it, " gave juſt grounds of ſuſpicion.

James II. An' 1688.

" Things went thus on till Monday in Eaſter " week. On that day the King went to Rocheſter, " to ſee ſome of the naval preparations; but was " ſoon ſent for by the Queen, who apprehended ſhe " was in danger of miſcarrying. Dr. Scarborough " was come to Knightſbridge to ſee biſhop Ward, " my predeceſſor, who had been his ancient friend, " and was then his patient: but the Queen's coach " was ſent to call him in all haſte, ſince ſhe was " near miſcarrying. Dr. Windebank, who knew " nothing of this matter, ſtaid long that morning " upon an appointment for dr. Walgrave, another " of the Queen's phyſicians, who, the next time " he ſaw him, excuſed himſelf; for the Queen, he " ſaid, was then under the moſt apparent ſigns of " miſcarrying. Of this the doctor made oath; and " it is yet extant.

" On the ſame day, the counteſs of Clarendon, " being to go out of town for a few days, came " to ſee the Queen before ſhe went, knowing no- " thing of what had happened to her. And ſhe " being a lady of the bed chamber to the Queen " Dowager, did, according to the rule of the court, " go into the Queen's bed chamber without aſk- " ing admitance. She ſaw the Queen a bed, be- " moaning herſelf in a moſt doleful manner, ſay- " ing often, 'Undone, undone:' and one that " belonged to her carried ſomewhat out of the " bed, which ſhe believed was linnen taken from " the Queen. She was upon this in ſome confu- " ſion: and the counteſs of Powis coming in, " went to her, and ſaid with ſome ſharpneſs, What " do you do here; And carried her to the door. " Before ſhe had got out of the court, one of the " bed chamber women followed her, and charged " her not to ſpeak of any thing ſhe had ſeen that " day. This matter, whatever was in it, was " huſhed up: and the Queen held on her courſe.

" The Princeſs had miſcarried in the ſpring. " So, as ſoon as ſhe had recovered her ſtrength, " the King preſſed her to go to the Bath, ſince " that had ſo good an effect on the Queen. Some " of her phyſicians, and all her other friends, were " againſt her going. Lower, one of her phyſi- " cians, told me, he was againſt it: he thought, " ſhe was not ſtrong enough for the Bath, tho' " the King preſſed it with an unuſual vehemence. " Millington, another phyſician, told the earl of " Shrewſbury, from whom I had it, that he was " preſſed to go to the Princeſs, and adviſe her " to go to the Bath. The perſon that ſpoke to

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

" him told him, the King was much ſet on it; " and that he expected it of him, that he would " perſuade her to it. Miilington anſwered, He " would not adviſe a patient according to direc- " tion, but according to his own reaſon; ſo he " would not go. Scarborough and Witherby took " it upon them to adviſe it: ſo ſhe went thither in " the end of May.

" As ſoon as ſhe was gone, thoſe about the " Queen did all of the ſudden change her reckon- " ing, and began it from the King's being with " her at Bath. This came on ſo quick, that tho' " the Queen had ſet the fourteenth of June for " her going to Windſor, where ſhe intended to " lye in, and all the preparations for the birth " and for the children were ordered to be made " ready by the end of June, yet now a reſo- " lution was taken for the Queen's lying in at " St. James's, and directions were given to have " all things quickly ready. The Bath water either " did not agree with the Princeſs: or the advices " of her friends were ſo preſſing, who thought " her abſenſe from the court at that time of " ſuch conſequence, that in compliance with them " ſhe gave it out it did not, and that therefore " ſhe would return in a few days.

" The day after the court had this notice, the " Queen ſaid ſhe would go to St. James's, and " look for the good hour. She was often told, " that it was impoſſible upon ſo ſhort a warning " to have things ready. But ſhe was ſo poſi- " tive, that ſhe ſaid, ſhe would lye there that " night tho' ſhe ſhould lie upon the boards. And " at night, tho' the ſhorter and quicker way was to " go from Whitehall to St. James's thro' the " park, and ſhe always went that way, yet now by " a ſort of affectation, ſhe would be carried thither " by Charing-croſs thro' the Pall Mall. And it " was given out by all her train, that ſhe was " going to be delivered. Some ſaid it would be " next morning: and the prieſts ſaid very con- " fidently, that it would be a boy.

" The next morning about nine o'clock, ſhe " ſent word to the King, that ſhe was in labor. " The Queen Dowager was next ſent to. But " no ladies were ſent for: ſo that no women " were in the room but two dreſſers, and one " under dreſſer, and the midwife. The earl of " Arran ſent notice to the counteſs of Sunderland; " ſo ſhe came. The lady Bellaſis came alſo in " time. The Proteſtant ladies that belonged to " the court were all gone to church, before the " news was let go abroad: for it happened on " Trinity Sunday, it being that year on the tenth " of June. The King brought over with him " from Whitehall a great many peers and privy " counſellors. And of theſe, eighteen were let " into the bed chamber; but they ſtood at the " fartheſt end of the room. The ladies ſtood " within the alcove. The curtains of the bed " were drawn cloſe, and none came within them " but the midwife and an under dreſſer. The " Queen lay all the while a bed: and in order " to the warming one ſide of it, a warming pan " was brought, but it was not opened, that it " might be ſeen that there was fire and nothing " elſe in it. So here was matter for ſuſpicion, " with which all people were filled.

" A little before ten the Queen cried out as in " a ſtrong pain, and immediately after the mid- " wife ſaid aloud, ſhe was happily brought to bed. " When the lords all cried out, of what? the " midwife anſwered, the Queen muſt not be ſur- " priſed; only ſhe gave a ſign to the counteſs of " Sunderland, who upon that touched her fore- " head, by which, it being the ſign before agreed " on, the King ſaid he knew it was a boy. No " cries were heard from the child; nor was it " ſhewed to thoſe in the room. It was pretended " more air was neceſſary. The under dreſſer went " out of the room with the child; or ſomewhat " elſe in her arms to a dreſſing room, to which " there was a door near the Queen's bed; but " there was another entry to it from other apart- " ments. The King continued with the lords in " the bed chamber for ſome minutes, which was " either a ſign of much phlegm upon ſuch an oc- " caſion; for it was not known whether the child " was alive or dead: or it looked like giving time " for ſome management. After a little while they " went all into the dreſſing room, and then the " news was publiſhed. In the mean while, no body " was called to lay their hands on the Queen's " belly, in order to a full ſatisfaction. When the " Princeſs came to town, three days after, ſhe had " as little ſatisfaction given her. Chamberlain the " man midwife, who was always ordered to at- " tend her labor before, and who brought the " plaiſters for puting back the milk, wondered " that he had not been ſent to. He went accord- " ing to cuſtom with the plaiſters: but he was told " they had no occaſion for him. He fancied that " ſome other perſon was put in his place; but he " could not find that any had it. All that con- " cerned the milk, or the Queen's purgations, was " managed ſtill in the dark. This made all people " inclined more and more to believe, there was a " baſe impoſture now put on the nation. That " ſtill increaſed. That night one Hemings, a very " worthy man, an apothecary by his trade, who " lived in St. Martin's-Lane, the very next door " to a family of an eminent Papiſt (Brown, bro- " ther to the viſcount Montacute, lived there) the " wall between his parlor and theirs being ſo thin, " that he could eaſily hear any thing that was ſaid " with a louder voice; he (Hemings) was reading " in his parlor late at night, when he heard one " coming into the neighboring parlor, and ſay, with " a doleful voice, 'The Prince of Wales is dead:' " upon which a great many that lived in the houſe " came down ſtairs very quick: upon this confu- " ſion he could not hear any thing more; but it " was plain, they were in a great conſternation. " He went with the news next morning to the " biſhops in the Tower. The counteſs of Claren- " don came thither ſoon after, and told them, " ſhe had been at the young Prince's door, but was " denied acceſs: ſhe was amazed at it; and aſked " if they knew her? they ſaid they did, but that " the Queen had ordered, that no perſon what- " ſoever ſhould be ſuffered to come in to him. " This gave credit to Hemings's ſtory, and looked " as if all was ordered to be kept ſhut up cloſe, " till another child was found. One, that ſaw the " child two days after, ſaid to me, that he looked " ſtrong, and not like a child ſo newly born. " Windebank met Walgrave the day after this " birth, and remembered him of what he had told " him eight weeks before. He acknowleged " what he had ſaid, but added, that God wrought " miracles: to which no reply could or durſt be " made by the other: it needed none. So healthy " a child being ſo little like any of thoſe the Queen " had born, it was given out, that he had fits, " and could not live. But thoſe who ſaw him " every day, obſerved no ſuch thing. On the " contrary, the child was in a very proſperous " ſtate. None of thoſe fits ever happened, when " the Princeſs was at court; for ſhe could not be " denied admitance, tho' all others were. So this " was believed to be given out to make the matter " more credible. It is true, ſome weeks after " that, the court being gone to Windſor, and the " child ſent to Richmond, he fell into ſuch fits,

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

" that four physicians were sent for. They all " looked on him as a dying child. The King " and Queen were sent for. The physicians went " to a dinner prepared for them; and were often " wondering that they were not called for. They " took it for granted, that the child was dead. " But, when they went in after dinner to look on " him, they saw a sound healthy child, that seemed " to have had no sort of illness on him. It was " said, that the child was strangely revived of a " sudden. Some of the physicians told Lloyd, " bishop of St. Asaph, 'that it was not possible " for them to think it was the same child. They " looked on one another, but durst not speak " what they thought.

" Thus I have related such particulars as I could " gather of this birth: to which some more shall " be added, when I give an account of the proof " that the King brought afterwards to put this " matter out of doubt; but by which it became " indeed more doubtful than ever. I took most " of these from the informations that were sent " over to the Prince and Princess of Orange, as " I had many from the vouchers themselves. I " do not mix with these, the various reports that " were, both then and afterwards, spread of this " matter, of which bishop Lloyd has a great col- " lection, most of them well attested. What " truth soever may be in these, this is certain, that " the method in which this matter was conducted " from first to last was very unaccountable. If an " imposture had been intended, it could not have " been otherwise managed. The pretended excuse " that the Queen made, that she owed no satis- " faction to those who could suspect her capable of " such base forgery, was the only excuse that she " could have made, if it had been really what it " was commonly said to be. She seemed to be " soon recovered, and was so little altered by " her labor, either in her looks or voice, that this " helped not a little to increase jealousies. The " rejoycings over England upon this birth were " very cold and forced. Bonfires were made in " some places, and a set of congratulatory addres- " ses went round the nation. None durst oppose " them. But all was formal, and only to make " a shew."

After having related what has been said by mr. Echard, and the bishop of Salisbury, on the birth of the Prince of Wales, I shall make some remarks on this subject.

The author's reflections upon this matter.

1. If the accounts of these two famous writers be carefully examined, it will doubtless be surprising, to find a sort of contradiction between them. For the suspicions mentioned by the first, are, that the Queen, tho' she pretended to be, yet was not with child. Nay, the bishop of Salisbury seems at first to support this suspicion, by speaking of her " great " and frequent distempers;" of her having " for " several years ceased bearing;" of her " having " buried all her children soon after they were " born;" of her " refusing to give satisfaction to " the Princess of Denmark, and the Protestant la- " dies of the court." Nevertheless, he says positively afterwards, that she was really with child the sixth of October (1), and that in Easter week she had a miscarriage, that is, six months after conception. If this be true, it very plainly follows, that all the suspicions entertained of the Queen from the begining of January (the time of her declared pregnancy) to Easter week, ought to vanish, tho' she had been less careful of giving satisfaction to the public, than she was. Assuredly this negligence is not capable to invalidate the reality of her pregnancy, if she had a miscarriage in the begining of her seventh month. What the Prince of Denmark told dr. Burnet of his Princess's fruitless indeavors to see the Queen rise, cannot serve to confirm the suspicion of an imposture, unless it appear, that this was from the Monday before Easter, to the tenth of June (2): but the bishop fixes no time. It might even be infered from the order observed by the bishop in his story, that what he says concerning the Princess of Denmark, passed between January and Easter week. But, supposing the reality of the pregnancy, it is clear, that the Queen might have given satisfaction to the Princess, and the Protestant court ladies. And it cannot be denied, that she commited a great error in refusing to do it. But it is certain, this refusal proves nothing, if it be true that she was with child, at least till Easter week. The times are therefore carefully to be distinguished. Her obstinacy to give no satisfaction, from January, when she declared herself with child, to Easter week, can be ascribed only to an unseasonable and prepostrous haughtiness. But it may be suspected, that from Easter week, to the tenth of June, she still pretended to be with child, when she was no longer so, and that she produced another at the time of her pretended delivery. Thus all the suspicions concerning the reality of her pregnancy, are to be included within the space of two months. For in the year 1688, Easter-day was the fifteenth of April; the Queen had a miscarriage the Monday before Easter, on the ninth of April; and she was delivered the tenth of June. But no time is fixed for this refusal of satisfaction to the public, tho' the Queen being six months gone when she miscarried, she might, for some time, have caused the motion of the child to be perceived.

James II. An' 1688.

2. In the bishop of Salisbury's account, are four several children. The first, which really belonged to the Queen, was an untimely birth of six months. The second was supposed at the time of her pretended delivery, and died the same day. The third was brought in the room of the dead child, and died also some weeks after at Richmond. The fourth substituted in the room of the third, must be the present Pretender. It is surprising, that mr. Echard, who probably writ the history of this reign, but twenty or twenty-five years after the time I am speaking of, should have heard nothing of these two last impostures, but confines himself to one, in what he relates concerning the public suspicions.

3. Fuller, who pretended to give an exact account of the cheats, agrees not with the bishop of Salisbury. But I shall not insist on his testimony, because his pretended discovery has been little regarded.

4. It remains therefore to examine what the bishop of Salisbury says, to make us suspect the supposition of the three last children. For, the first, which was but a miscarriage, according to this author, was really the Queen's. To this end, we are to distinguish three different times, viz. before, at, and after her delivery. I shall make some observations upon the most remarkable circumstances of each of these times.

1. The King's pressing the Princess to go to the Bath, agrees very well with the design of supposing an heir. For the presense of the Princess at the Queen's pretended delivery, must have been perplexing, on account of her interest to detect the imposture. Had the King contented himself with

(1) He only says, " It went current, that the Queen believed herself to be with child on October 6." p. 749.

(2) It is here proper to take notice of this passage in bishop Burnet. " That the Princess went as far in desiring to be satis- " fied by feeling the motion, after the Queen said as she was quick, as she could go without breaking with her," Ibid.

barely adviſing her to go to the Bath, nothing could have been infered from it, but that he thought the Bath good for health. But his preſſing it with an unuſual vehemence, and cauſing a phyſician to be told, that he expected it of him that he would perſuade her to it, ſeems to diſcover ſome ſecret deſign, eſpecially, when it is conſidered, that an impoſture was already ſuſpected. This ſuſpicion is farther confirmed by the change of the Queen's reckoning, and by her delivery two days after it was known, that the Princeſs was on the point of returning from the Bath. But there muſt not be given to this cauſe of ſuſpicion, more ſtrength than it will really bear. For as it is very poſſible for the King to have believed, that the Bath would be of ſervice to the Princeſs his daughter, the ſuſpicion of his acting from another motive, is founded only upon the ſuppoſition of an impoſture. If this was well proved, the King's proceeding would become a ſort of a new proof. But as it is not, it ſeems that the ſuſpicion ought not to be ſupported by the ſuppoſition of the fact in queſtion.

2. If it be true, that the Queen did not believe herſelf with child till the ſixth of October, and that ſhe afterwards ſuddenly changed her reckoning, there is reaſon to ſuſpect ſome myſtery in it. And indeed, by this new reckoning ſhe was to be delivered during the abſenſe of the Princeſs of Denmark, whereas by the firſt ſhe could not be brought to bed till after her return. To this may be added, that if it is true, that about the end of September, ſhe was ſtoped at the Bath, one week longer than ſhe intended, by an accident to which the ſex is ſubject, ſhe could not be with child from the tenth of September, nor conſequently brought to bed the tenth of June. To this it is anſwered, that theſe miſreckonings are common to the whole ſex. But this reaſon cannot take place here, becauſe it did not appear that the Queen thought herſelf miſtaken.

3. It cannot be denied, that there is ſomething extraordinary in the Queen's ſudden reſolution, of going to-lye in at St. James's when things were not ready. Hitherto no probable reaſon has been given of this ſudden alteration to ſhow that ſhe could lye-in more commodiouſly at St. James's than at Whitehall; nor why ſhe at firſt choſe Windſor for the place, and fixed the time to the begining of July.

4. I own I ſee nothing in the Queen's affectation of being carried to St. James's by Charing-Croſs, thro' the Pall-Mall, to confirm the ſuſpicion of an impoſture.

5. I never heard, that the preſenſe of the archbiſhop of Canterbury is abſolutely neceſſary at the delivery of the Queens of England, eſpecially at that of a Popiſh Queen, who could have no great need of his aſſiſtance.

As for the time of the Queen's delivery, there are many things to be examined.

1. The Queen, after having declared her intention to lye-in at St. James's, without any apparent neceſſity, was bent to go thither on the Saturday, tho' nothing was ready. This is a ſign, ſhe thought it would be too late if ſhe defered going until the next day. It is therefore clear, that ſhe expected the moment of her delivery every hour, and yet when ſhe began to find herſelf ill, "No women "were in the room but two dreſſers, one under-"dreſſer, and the midwife." Not one foreign lady was in the palace. It cannot be denied, that this was very extraordinary for a Queen, ſince it was ſo eaſy to have other ladies at hand to aſſiſt her, and the more, as ſhe hourly expected the moment of her delivery. It is no leſs extraordinary, that none of the court ladies were called beſide the counteſs of Sunderland, by the particular care of the earl of Arran; and the Queen-Dowager, who lodged in Somerſet-houſe, a great way from St. James's. All this ſeems to diſcover, it was not deſired that many ladies ſhould be preſent at the labor. To this it is anſwered, that the Queen was ſurprized, as women frequently are, and that the Proteſtant ladies were at church. But ſome take occaſion from hence to confirm their ſuſpicion. They ſuppoſe, the Queen would not have gone with ſo much precipitation on Saturday night to St. James's, if ſhe had not known ſhe ſhould be delivered the next morning, while the Proteſtant ladies were imployed at their devotions. But after all, this is only a ſuſpicion. For, who can be ſure, that the Queen acted by the motive aſcribed to her? All that can be ſaid, is, that the point in queſtion being a child who, if a boy, was to take place of a Princeſs, preſumptive heir of the King her father, the King and Queen ought to have put his birth out of all doubt. Inſtead of this, they confirmed, by a myſterious conduct, ſuſpicions which were already but too far ſpread, and of which they could not be ignorant. The Empreſs Conſtantia, wife of Henry VI, proving with child at the age of fifty-two years, choſe a place the moſt public for her labor, and thereby removed all ſuſpicion of the birth of her child. On the contrary, the Queen of King James II, for having neglected all precautions, has left upon her ſon, real or pretended, a blot which has not yet been effaced.

2. The King's being at the farther end of the room with eighteen peers and privy counſellors is a circumſtance which proves nothing at all. It is well known, that on theſe occaſions men approach not the bed, to be eye witneſſes of what paſſes there. All they can do, is to be attentive to the cries of the mother, or the infant. Beſide the King himſelf was not leſs ſuſpected than the Queen.

3. As to the warming-pan brought into the Queen's chamber, and which is ſuppoſed to have in it a new-born child, this is only a conjecture founded upon the ſeeming uſeleſſneſs of a warming-pan the tenth of June, which proved an exceſſive hot day. To this it is anſwered, that a labor is often attended with a quaking and trembling like an ague, which begins with a cold fit. This is what I know nothing of. It is alſo pretended, that it was impoſſible to put a new-born child, in the narrow compaſs of a warming-pan, without ſtifling it.

Idem.

4. It is very extraordinary, that the Queen was not a full hour in labor; for the King was ſent for at nine o'clock, and before ten the Queen was delivered. She cried out but once, in the moment of her delivery. When the mind is filled with ſuſpicions, ſuch circumſtances help to confirm them. Thoſe who are not in the ſame diſpoſition, find nothing extraordinary in this; becauſe the Queen had ever had eaſy and quick labors.

5. It is commonly true, that children, the moment they are born and expoſed to the air, are heard to cry. But I know not whether this can be conſidered as infallible. However, the Queen having neglected to give undoubted proofs of her pregnancy, every little uncommon circumſtance was capable to confirm the ſuſpicion of an impoſture.

6. As to the ſtreſs that is laid upon the curtains of the bed being cloſe drawn, this cannot ſeem ſtrange, ſince there were eighteen lords in the room.

7. The circumſtance of the child's being not ſhewn, can cauſe no ſuſpicion, but on ſuppoſition of the ſuſpicion itſelf, which ought to have been removed, by ſhowing the child as it came from the womb. For, otherwiſe, it is not uſually done, till the midwife has taken due care of the child. But if this is urged to prove, that a child was not taken out out of the Queen's bed, the ſuſpicion of the warming-pan muſt neceſſarily be ſuppreſſed, for had a child been put in the pan, it could alſo be taken out of it.

8. What is ſaid of the "King's continuing with "the lords ſome minutes in the bed chamber," and that "it looked like giving time for ſome ma-"nagement," is a gloſs which deſerves little or no notice.

9. Thoſe who believe the child in queſtion not born of the Queen, would have had her take all the precautions which they themſelves imagine, to deſtroy all ſort of doubt, and the omiſſion of one of theſe precautions is, with them, ſufficient to confirm their ſuſpicions.

10. If no ſatisfaction was given to the Princeſs of Denmark after her return from the Bath, it may be alleged, that ſhe diſcovered no jealouſy concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales, and as ſhe appeared convinced of the truth, there was no neceſſity of giving her proofs.

11. The refuſal of Chamberlain's plaiſters would be very apt to cauſe a ſuſpicion, if it was impoſſible for the Queen's breaſts not to want them. But how many labors are there, which have no need of remedies for puting back the milk? However, the biſhop of Saliſbury obviates this anſwer, by ſaying, that in her former labors, the Queen had always great plenty of milk.

12. What is ſaid of the Queen's recovering ſo ſoon after her delivery, proves nothing. Some mothers have ſuch eaſy labors, that in few days there can ſcarcely be perceived any alteration in them. Beſide, it is too general an expreſſion to ſay, "the "Queen ſeemed to be ſoon recovered." The preciſe time ſhould have been marked, that it might be judged, whether there was any thing extraordinary in it.

Nevertheleſs, all theſe reaſons of ſuſpicion laid together, make an impreſſion on many men, which each in particular would not be able to do. We muſt always recur to this point, that the King and Queen, knowing that they were ſuſpected of an impoſture, ought to have taken juſt meaſures to remove the ſuſpicion, and not having done it, it is not very ſtrange, it ſhould continue to this day.

As to what paſſed after the delivery, I mean the ſuppoſition of two children, when the firſt was dead, the biſhop of Saliſbury's account reſts only upon the credit of ſome perſons whom he has given for vouchers, and of others not named by him. There are beſide ſeveral particulars, in proof of which he produces no teſtimony.

He ſuppoſes, that the child of which it was pretended the Queen was delivered, died the ſame day. This ſuppoſition is grounded on what Hemings heard thro' the wall of his parlor, and on the denial of acceſs at the young Prince's door to the counteſs of Clarendon. All this may be of ſome weight, when a bare ſuſpicion only is meaned to be eſtabliſhed. But if it is produced as a proof, the inſufficiency of it is readily perceived.

The death of the ſecond child at Richmond ſtands only upon the report of four phyſicians, who were ſent for to viſit him. The biſhop does not make the phyſicians poſitively ſay that the child died, but only that, "They all looked on him as a "dying child." and as they were not called for after dinner, "They took it for granted that the "child was dead." But this conſequence is not abſolutely neceſſary; for poſſibly they were not called, becauſe the child grew better. But, ſays the biſhop, "When they went in after dinner to look on the "child, they ſaw a ſound healthy child, that ſeemed "to have had no illneſs on him." They infered from this, that he was not the ſame child, and the biſhop concludes that the firſt was dead, and another put in his room. The particular in this fact, is, that theſe four phyſicians doubted, this was the ſame child, only becauſe the firſt had been ſick, and this was found healthy; as if all children at ſuch an age were ſo like one another, that no feature could diſtinguiſh them. And yet, theſe phyſicians thought, it was not the ſame child, only by the difference between a ſtate of health and ſickneſs. This is very ſurprizing, ſince naturally the faces of the two children muſt have been ſo different, as not to need other marks (1).

James II. An' 1688.

In fine, the biſhop of Saliſbury's whole account of theſe three impoſtures, reſts either upon hearſay, or what he read in the informations ſent to the Prince and Princeſs of Orange; for he was then at the Hague. The ſenders of theſe informations were, probably, no friends of King James. It is therefore very poſſible, not to ſay likely, that they have aggravated their reports, and collected every circumſtance, true or falſe, which was apt to perſuade the Prince and Princeſs, that the Prince of Wales was ſuppoſititious. As for the biſhop of Saliſbury, I am perſuaded, he has related nothing but what he either heard, read, or believed to be true. But who can ſay, he was not deceived by prejudiced perſons, who looked on their ſuſpicions as ſo many convincing proofs? I am aware, that all the Engliſh have not the ſame opinion of dr. Burnet as I have. Volumes of remarks upon his hiſtory, in which he is violently abuſed, demonſtrate, that the Jacobites conſider him as the ſworn enemy of James II, and as deſerving no credit. But as, for very good reaſons, they have not thought proper to make remarks on what he ſays of three ſuppoſititious children, it is not my buſineſs to gueſs what they could have ſaid. I preſume therefore he has invented nothing, without pretending, however, to warrant what he ſays on the teſtimony of others.

I have inlarged on the birth of the Prince of Wales, becauſe there ſeemed to me to be great confuſion, as well in the books, as in the diſcourſes on this ſubject. My intent was to aſſiſt the reader in determining, for or againſt, or to ſuſpend his judgment till the thing is more fully cleared. As the principal deſign of hiſtory is to eſtabliſh facts that are certain, to deſtroy thoſe that are falſe, and to inform the readers of the grounds of doubting with regard to ſuch as are dubious, I imagined, that in an affair ſo important as this, which has made ſo much noiſe, and will doubtleſs, yet long be talked of, the reader would be glad to know what to rely on. Thus much is certain, that moſt Proteſtants believed the Prince of Wales ſuppoſititious, chiefly becauſe it would have been very diſadvantageous to them, that James II ſhould have had a Popiſh ſucceſſor. The Papiſts, on the other hand, queſtioned not this Prince's birth, becauſe nothing could be more ſerviceable to their religion. I am perſuaded, there were few, either Papiſts or Proteſtants, but what were determined on this point, by their prejudices. But things having taken an unexpected turn, the truth or falſity of this Prince's birth have hitherto produced none of the effects which were hoped or feared (1).

(1) Colonel Sands, who died in 1728, being in 1688 gentleman-waiter to the Princeſs Anne, was ſent by her from Tunbridge (where ſhe then was) to court, to inquire after her brother's health. Going up immediately to the King without ceremony or interruption, as is uſual in ſuch caſes, he came into the room where the Prince lay. He ſaw there a pale long viſaged child, with red ſpots in his face, and other marks of weakneſs. This ſtruck him ſo, that he took very particular notice of it: but preſently after the ladies in the room came and turned him out, ſaying, the Prince was aſleep. At his going out he met the King, who aſked him with a diſturbed countenance, whether he had ſeen the Prince? Sands fearing he had done ſomething amiſs, denied it; upon which the King's countenance cleared up. Some time after he was called to look at the Prince; but ſaw a child of very different looks and complexion from that which he found before. All theſe particulars he commited to writing, and carried them to the Princeſs. Cont. of Baker's Chron. Edit. 1730. p. 752.

Cloſeting renewed. Echard, Vol. III. p. 864. Welwood. p. 188.

The aſſurance of a Popiſh ſucceſſor, made the King hope he ſhould more eaſily accompliſh his deſigns: but he wiſhed, above all things, for the concurrence of a parliament. It was with this view, that cloſetings were once more put in practiſe. He cloſeted ſuch as he intended to gain. Promiſes and menaces were made uſe of; and thoſe who refuſed to ſerve the King IN HIS OWN WAY, as the term was, might aſſure themſelves of his heavieſt diſpleaſure.

The King ſends for forces out of Ireland. Ibid. Burnet.

However, he neglected not more effectual means to force his ſubjects to compliance. He ordered ſome initre regiments out of Ireland, and filled many vacancies in his Engliſh regiments, with Iriſh and Popiſh officers. This gave ſo great a diſguſt to the whole army, that lampoons and ballads were vented upon the Iriſh, who were mortally hated by the Engliſh, eſpecially ſince the maſſacre in 1641.

The Carliſle addreſs. Gazette, No. 2348. Echard, Vol. III. p. 865.

Mean time, that the King's deſign in augmenting his forces might not be doubted, an addreſs, ſuppoſed to be drawn by a Jeſuit, was procured from the city of Carliſle, particularly, "To "thank his Majeſty for his Royal army, which "really was both the honor and ſafety of the na"tion; let the Teckelites think and ſay what "they would." And on this occaſion the addreſſers aſſured his Majeſty, "That when, in his "great wiſdom, he ſhould think fit to call a par"liament, they would chuſe ſuch members as "would certainly concur with his Majeſty, in ta"king off the penal laws and teſts, and not ha"zard the election of any perſon, who had any "ways declared in favor of thoſe cannibal laws. "Surely, ſaid they, theſe men that oppoſe your "Majeſty in ſo gracious and glorious a work, do "not conſider what a ſovereign Prince, by his Royal "power, may do. A work which heaven ſmiles "upon, and will reward with no leſs a bleſſing, we "hope, than a Prince of Wales.

Trial of the ſeven biſhops. State-Trials. Vol. IV. p. 300. Burnet. Kennet.

During the public rejoicings for the birth of the Prince of Wales, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the other ſix biſhops, priſoners in the Tower, were brought to their trials, the fifteenth of June, at the King's-bench bar. But on their motion for a delay, the trial was put off to the twenty-ninth of the ſame month, and in the mean time they were ſet at liberty on their own recognizance. The twenty-ninth of June, Weſtminſter-hall was crowded with great numbers of lords, gentlemen, and others, to be ſpectators of this famous trial. The King's counſel pleaded, That the petition preſented by the biſhops was a real and ſeditious libel, tending to diminiſh the King's prerogative, and excite ſedition among the people. The counſel for the biſhops, retorted the arguments of their adverſaries with great force and freedom, proving, that the King having no power to diſpenſe with penal laws, a petition humbly preſented to remonſtrate to him that he had no ſuch power, ought not to be eſteemed a libel: That it was injurious to the biſhops; JAMES II. AN' 1688. to accuſe them of having publiſhed a petition, which they had reſpectfully preſented to the King in private, and alone: That the occaſion of preſenting it was not ſought by them, but preſſed upon them: Nor could it be called a libel, becauſe the intent was innocent, and they kept within the bounds ſet by act of parliament. After long pleadings on both ſides, the judges, in giving directions to the jury, were not unanimous. There were four, of whom Wright the chief-juſtice, and Holloway, were the King's creatures. Powell was reckoned a man of perfect integrity, and Allybone was a Papiſt. Wright gave his opinion, that the petition preſented by the biſhops was a libel. Holloway ſaid, that if the jury were ſatisfied that the petition was preſented with no ill intention, but only to ſhew the reaſons of the petitioners diſobedience to the King's command, he could not think it to be a libel. Powell maintained, That the petition could not be a libel, becauſe it was founded upon the King's incapacity to diſpenſe with laws, which was very true. Allybone aſſerted, That the crime of the biſhops, was next door to treaſon (2).

The jury withdrawing ſate up all night, whether they could not agree, or by this intended to render their verdict more ſolemn. Next morning the court being aſſembled, and the hall filled with infinite crowds of people, the jury pronounced the biſhops, Not Guilty. Immediately ſhouts of joy were heard thro' the crowd, and the loudeſt acclamations reſounded thro' the cities of London and Weſtminſter. For ſeveral hours, nothing was heard but repeated ſhouts of both cities, tranſported with the news of the biſhops acquital. Nor was this all. For the King being gone that morning to the army on Hounſlow-heath, and dining in the earl of Feverſham's tent, the news flew to the camp, where the whole army ſhouted ſo loud, that it ſtartled the King, and his whole company. The earl of Feverſham being ſent out to know what was the matter, immediately returned, and told the King, "it was nothing but the ſhouts "of the ſoldiers upon the news of the biſhops being "acquited. Do you call that nothing? (ſaid the "King) but ſo much the worſe for them." Notwithſtanding the reſentment expreſſed by the King, and his ſevere prohibitions againſt all riotous aſſemblies, the whole city was that night illuminated, and numberleſs bonfires proclaimed the general joy. This was followed by almoſt all the great towns in the kingdom, and at Norwich particularly the rejoicings were exceſſive. This was to the King a ſenſible mortification. He at firſt threatened to deliver the biſhops to the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, and to ſhow his indignation, he diſmiſſed ſir Richard Holloway and ſir John Powell, and filled their places with others (3).

Great rejoicing in the city. Kennet, p. 515. Echard, Vol. III. p. 874.

The King perceiving the people's diſpoſition was not favorable to him, reſolved at laſt to come to open force. But as he could only prevail by his army, he was willing firſt to try how far he might depend on their obedience. To this end, he thought fit to communicate his deſign to every regiment ſingly, not doubting, that if two or three ſubmited, the reſt would follow their example. Accordingly, the major of the lord Lichfield's regiment was ordered to tell the officers and ſoldiers, that thoſe who were unwilling to contribute to the repeal of the teſt and penal laws, ſhould lay down their arms. But it was with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment that he ſaw the whole regiment, two captains and a few Popiſh ſoldiers excepted, inſtantly diſarm themſelves. He remained for ſome time ſpeechleſs, but at length recovering his ſurpriſe, he commanded the ſoldiers "to take up their arms again," and ſullenly told them, "That for the future he would "not do them the honor to aſk their advice."

His Majeſty now plainly foreſaw, that with a Proteſtant army he ſhould never be able to introduce Popery. Wherefore he reſolved to caſhier many Proteſtant officers and ſoldiers, and to put Papiſts in their room. Accordingly he began with ſome regiments; but it gave a diſguſt to the whole army. Not long after, reſolving to put thirty Iriſh ſoldiers into the duke of Berwick's regiment, lieutenant colonel Beaumont, and other officers, remonſtrated to the duke, "That neither thoſe gentlemen nor himſelf, "thought it conſiſtent with their honors, to have "foreigners impoſed upon them,——and there"fore humbly petitioned, that they might have "leave to fill up their companies with ſuch men "of their own nation, as they ſhould judge moſt "ſuitable to the King's ſervice; or otherwiſe, that "they might be permited, with all imaginable "duty and reſpect, to lay down their commiſſions." An account of this being tranſmited to the King, he immediately ordered the lieutenant colonel and five captains to be taken into cuſtody, and tried by a court martial as mutineers. It was at firſt believed, that his intention was to cauſe them to be condemned to die, but ſome news from abroad altered the ſentenſe, and they were only caſhiered.

Sept. 10. The fleet in the ſame temper with the army. Ibid. Burnet, p. 755.

The fleet was no better diſpoſed than the army to aſſiſt the King in his deſigns. This appeared, in that vice-admiral Strickland ordering maſs to be ſaid on board his ſhip, there aroſe ſuch a mutiny and diſorder among the ſailors, that the officers could not, without difficulty, ſave the prieſt from being thrown over board.

The King's ſituation was ſuch, that it ſeemed he could neither advance nor recede. His zeal for his religion; his principles of government, his temper naturally obſtinate; his condeſcenſion to the Queen, prieſts, and Jeſuits, who inceſſantly ſurrounded him, allowed him not to leave his work unfiniſhed. Beſide, he muſt have changed his whole ſyſtem, as well as his whole council, and nothing is more rare than to ſee a Prince proceed in that manner, before he is forced to it. But, on the other hand, he could eaſily perceive, how far he ſtill was from obtaining his ends, by the diſpoſition of his ſubjects, his fleet, and his army. He hoped however to ſurmount all obſtacles, becauſe, tho' one part of his people ſhewed a reluctance to to ſubmit to his will, another part ſeemed diſpoſed to receive the yoke with ſubmiſſion. There were biſhops who had cauſed the declaration for liberty of conſcience to be read in their dioceſes, as the biſhops of Durham, Cheſter, and Rocheſter. Nay, the firſt had ſuſpended thirty of his clergy, for refuſing to read it (1). In Cheſhire, ſome curates, rectors, and others, not contented to read the declaration, preſented alſo an addreſs, wherein they tell his Majeſty,——"That if the matter of the "declaration were not according to their wiſhes, "yet the publiſhing of it was according to their "duty, ſince it iſſued out from the expreſs prero"gative of his ſupremacy over them; ſo that they "could not but with trouble of mind hear of the "proceedings of the ſeven biſhops, who, tho' they "tenderly promiſed the Diſſenters ſomething, yet re"fuſed to do their part about the declaration, leſt "they ſhould be parties to it, which reaſon the ad"dreſſers eſteem inſufficient. They therefore, in all "ſubmiſſion, become earneſt, tho' too mean, inter"ceſſors to his Majeſty, in behalf of the church of "England, that the faults of theſe and others may "not be laid to her charge, in whoſe communion "there were many, and they hoped there would be "more, who concured in promoting the purpoſes of "his mild government: and ſo conclude with beg"ing leave to make their congratulations for the "happy birth of the young Prince in his hereditary "ſucceſſive Kingdom."——

The King, flattered by ſuch addreſſes, and imagining, that terror would by degrees compel his ſubjects to ſubmit to his pleaſure, reſolved to puſh his point at all events. But, on the other hand, he had the mortification to hear, that a ſon of Cartwright biſhop of Cheſter, who had procured this addreſs, was refuſed to be admited to a fellowſhip in one of the colleges at Oxford, and that Gifford, nominated by him to the ſee of that city, was likewiſe denied his doctor's degree. Order from the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners concerning the reading of the declaration, Gazette, No. 2364. Kennet, p. 515. Burnet, p. 744.

But the reſolution taken by the King and his council was not to be ſhaken by any obſtacles. Tho' the ſeven biſhops had been acquitted of the pretended crime laid to their charge, the new eccleſiaſtical court did not think itſelf bound by that precedent. Wherefore, the commiſſioners, by an order made the twelfth of July, "Command all chancellors, "archdeacons, commiſſaries, and officials, to in"quire in what churches and chapels his Majeſty's "declaration was read, and to tranſmit an account "thereof upon the ſixteenth day of Auguſt next." But the major part of thoſe to whom the order was directed, took not the leaſt notice of it. The commiſſioners being met on that day, were not a little puzzled how to proceed. At length, after a long conſultation, they were contented to renew their firſt order, "Requiring all perſons, having eccle"ſiaſtical juriſdiction, to tranſmit to them, upon "the ſixth day of December next, an account of "the inquiry they are hereby commanded to make "in their viſitations, together with the names of "the parſons, vicars, and curates, that had ei"ther obeyed, or diſobeyed his Majeſty's com"mand." The affairs which happened before the expiration of that term, ſo retarded this buſineſs, that it was not known what the eccleſiaſtical court intended to do, or whether this order would have been better obeyed than the former.

A ſecond. Gazette, No. 2375. Kennet. Ibid.

The biſhop of Rocheſter leaves the commiſſioners, and ſends his reaſons. Echard, Vol. III. p. 876. Burnet, p. 744.

Doctor Sprat, biſhop of Rocheſter, one of the biſhops of the new eccleſiaſtical court, now thought it time to withdraw. Wherefore he wrote to his collegues a letter, wherein he told them: "That "ſince their lordſhips were reſolved to proceed "againſt thoſe, who had not complied with the "King's command in reading his declaration, it "was abſolutely impoſſible for him to ſerve his "Majeſty any longer in that commiſſion." He proceeds farther and ſays, "That tho' I myſelf "did ſubmit in that particular, yet I will never be "any ways inſtrumental in puniſhing thoſe my "brethren who did not: for, as I call God to "witneſs, that what I did was merely upon a prin"ciple of conſcience, ſo I am fully ſatisfied, that "their forbearance was upon the ſame principle." This biſhop was one of thoſe on whom the court relied, and therefore his defection could not but extremely perplex the King. Several have thought, that the principal motive of this proceeding, was to ſcreen himſelf in time from the approaching ſtorm, of which he had received ſome intimation.

From the Prince's birth, thoſe who had any concern for their religion or country, ſaw clearly the danger with

with which both were threatened. It was manifeſt, that the King no longer pretended to govern by the laws of the land, but according to his will and pleaſure. He had ſufficiently diſcovered his intention; ſo that nothing leſs than a total ſubverſion of the government in church and ſtate could be expected. If this did not ſufficiently authoriſe the moſt conſiderable members of the ſtate to take meaſures for the prevention of ſuch a deſign, it is hard to conceive, what difference there can be between a government, like that of England, limited by laws, and an abſolute Monarchy. And yet it cannot be queſtioned that the government of England is different from that of moſt other ſtates. I am very ſenſible this point is not without difficulty, and that it is not eaſy in England to fix the limits of the ſubjects obedience. While the church of England prepoſterouſly believed, that the King had no deſign to alter the form of the government, but intended only a little to inlarge his prerogative, inſtead of thinking proper to oppoſe it, ſhe believed it for her advantage, as it might prevent attempts like thoſe which had occaſioned ſo many miſchiefs in the reign of Charles I. The Preſbyterians, the Independents, the Anabaptiſts, had carried the principles of the Republicans ſo far, and drawn ſuch terrible conſequences from them, that after the reſtoration of Charles II, it was thought in ſome manner neceſſary to run into the other extreme, by inveſting the King with a power, which rightly conſidered, might have had conſequences no leſs dangerous than the Republican principles. But herein the ſole aim was to curb the Non-conformiſts, by the King's authority, without apprehending, that a time might come, when the King would uſe the power aſcribed to him, againſt all his ſubjects in general, and the church of England in particular. That time being come under James II, the church of England opened her eyes, tho' a little too late, and ſaw that ſhe had been laboring for her own deſtruction, in maintaining, and even openly preaching Paſſive-obedience, without any reſtriction. It was from this doctrine, inculcated ſo carefully, and ſo long, on the minds of the Engliſh, as eſſential to the church, that theſe ſubmiſſive addreſſes proceeded, which were daily preſented to the King. And indeed, as no bounds had been ſet to Paſſive-obedience, many people did not conceive that they could, with a ſafe conſcience, refuſe an unlimited obedience to the Sovereign. But at length, the danger of the kingdom convinced men of ſenſe, that the Royal authority was neceſſarily to be bounded, otherwiſe the church and ſtate were going to be ruined.

The church of England departs from her former principles: and takes meaſures to oppoſe the King.

Affairs being in this ſituation, ſeveral church of England men, both of the clergy and laity, thought it time to take meaſures for ſtoping the King's progreſs, and bounding his power. Tho' they had themſelves carried it very high, they choſe rather to retract, than, by their obſtinacy, to throw the church and ſtate into imminent danger, in continuing to maintain a doctrine which could juſtly be conſidered as the principal fountain of the kingdom's calamities.

An union projected between the church of England and the Preſbyterians. Echard, Vol. III. p. 875.

The firſt and moſt neceſſary precaution taken by them, was to form a ſtrict union between the church of England and the Non-conformiſts, for their common ſecurity. This union was become more eaſy than ever. The two parties agreed, that their diviſion had been the ſole cauſe of their ruin. This was a ſtrong motive for their union. The Churchmen acknowleged, they had carried Paſſive-obedience too far, and that it had produced ill effects. They ſhowed a readineſs to comply with the ſcruples of the Preſbyterians, in relinquiſhing the ceremonies which might be conſidered as indifferent, or at leaſt to leave every man at liberty to practiſe or not practiſe them. This was all the Preſbyterians could reaſonably expect. In ſhort, as the Churchmen appeared touched with the calamities occaſioned by their exceſſive rigor, ſo they ſeemed diſpoſed to more condeſcenſion, if things were reſtored to their former ſtate. The Preſbyterians, who had hitherto groundleſly accuſed the church of England of leaning to Popery, could not forbear acknowleging their error, after the firmneſs of the ſeven biſhops had diſcovered the injuſtice of that accuſation. Theſe diſpoſitions being well managed by prudent and well-meaning men of both parties, produced at length an uniformity of ſentiments, with regard to the principal point in queſtion, viz. that it was abſolutely neceſſary to think of means for the preſervation of religion and the ſtate, from the impending danger. The leading men on both ſides, took great pains to curb the paſſionate, whoſe views were very narrow. In ſhort, without the King's knowlege, the Whigs and Tories were reconciled, and reſolved to labor jointly for the preſervation of their country. But unfortunately, this union ended with the danger. However, it may be affirmed, that this reconciliation of the two parties was the moſt fatal blow that could be given to the King's affairs, ſince his greateſt ſtrength lay in their diviſion. Father Orleans calls this union, a league againſt the King. It would be needleſs to diſpute about this term. The queſtion is only to know, whether this union, this league, or whatever elſe it may be called, was contrary to law, to conſcience, to the duty which ſubjects owe to their Sovereign. But to decide this queſtion, the government of England muſt be diſtinguiſhed from that of other ſtates, and on pretenſe of the name of King, common to ſo many Princes, the rights of one Sovereign not confounded with thoſe of another, in order to apply to a King of England, whatever is aſſerted of Sovereignty in general. This was an artifice frequent with James I. The queſtion therefore is to know, whether, in ſuppoſing the conſtitution of England ſuch as it appears in this hiſtory, James II had violated it in the moſt eſſential parts; whether he had now changed, or conſiderably altered it; whether there was ground to fear an intire ſubverſion; and whether the Engliſh were obliged to ſuffer it without oppoſition. Of this the readers may judge, from what they have hitherto ſeen. But in ſuppoſing even that James II had changed, or deſigned to change the conſtitution, a ſtrong objection lay againſt thoſe, who believed it proper to oppoſe the intire execution of his deſigns, viz. the frequent declarations of the parliament and the church of England, ſince the reſtoration, that an unlimited obedience was due to the King. This objection was ſo ſtrongly impreſſed on the minds of ſome Churchmen, that they could not reſolve to oppoſe the King's deſigns, by reaſon they looked on ſuch oppoſition as an act of rebellion. Nay, many perſiſt in this opinion even to this day, and with the Papiſts form the party of the Jacobites. Happily for England, moſt of the clergy and laity of the eſtabliſhed church were of a contrary opinion, and labored effectually for the preſervation of religion and the government, in conjunction with the Whigs, who made no ſcruple of uniting with them in the ſame deſign.

A reſolution taken to call in the Prince of Orange. Kennet, p. 745, &c.

The union between the Whigs and Tories being effected, ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, as well among the clergy as the laity, began to form a ſcheme for the execution of the great deſign to preſerve the church and ſtate. They found no expedient more proper than to put the Prince of Orange at the head of the party againſt the King. That Prince was ſo intereſted in the affair, that it was not doubted he would contribute whatever lay in his power, both to ſave England, and ſecure the ſucceſſion succeſſion to the Princeſs his wife, lately defeated of her right by a Prince, who generally paſſed for ſuppoſititious. Theſe were very powerful motives to actuate the Prince of Orange. But there was ſtill another, which might naturally be ſuppoſed to have a great effect on him; viz. the extreme danger to which Holland would be expoſed, in caſe the King accompliſhed his deſign, by reaſon of the cloſe union between the Kings of England and France. It was with this view that ſeveral great men timely repaired to the Hague, on diverſe pretenſes, to confer with the Prince of Orange. The firſt were, mr. Sidney, brother to Algernoon Sidney (beheaded in the laſt reign) afterwards earl of Romney, ſir Robert Peyton, ſir Rowland Gwin, dr. Burnet, and others. It is to be preſumed, that aſſurances were tranſmited from them to their friends in England, of the good inclination of the Prince to the common cauſe. In July, one Joſeph Flight brought over into England about fourſcore letters from perſons of quality and credit, and carried back anſwers to the Hague. The affair being thus begun, the old lord Wharton pretending a journey into Germany, paſſed thro' the Hague. Colonel Sidney, uncle to the earl of Sunderland, went to the Spaw, on pretenſe of only drinking the waters. The lord Dunblain, ſon to the earl of Danby, and commander of an independent frigate, croſſed and re-croſſed the ſeas, to carry ſeveral diſpatches and reſolutions. The earl of Shrewſbury mortgaged his eſtate for forty thouſand pounds, and went over to the Prince to offer him both his purſe and his ſword. He was quickly followed by admiral Herbert, his couſin mr. Herbert, mr. Ruſſel, the lord Mordaunt, and the earl of Wiltſhire. The principal perſons with whom they held correſpondence in England, were, the earls of Danby, Devonſhire, and Dorſet, the lords Lovelace and Delamere, the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Halliſax, his ſon the lord Eland, the marquis of Wincheſter, his ſon the lord Pawlet, the lord Willoughby ſon to the earl of Lindſey, mr. Leſter, mr. Hampden, mr. Powle, and many others, beſide ſeveral eminent citizens of London. (1)

The Engliſh lords apply to the States General; p. 880.

The Prince of Orange being fully determined to head the party, it was, after ſeveral conſultations, reſolved, that the Engliſh lords at the Hague ſhould demand aſſiſtance of the States, in the name of all England. But to prevent the ſecret from being divulged, they applied at firſt only to perſons of the greateſt credit and influence, who promiſed to uſe all their intereſt, at a proper time, to promote the deſign. There was no need of many arguments to prevail with the States to aſſiſt the diſtreſſed Engliſh. They were equally concerned in the affair with the Engliſh themſelves; for the ruin of Holland would doubtleſs have ſoon followed the ſlavery of England. Of this the deſigns of Lewis XIV, and his union with James II (2), left no room to doubt. All the difficulty lay in making preparations; in concealing the deſign of them; in raiſing forces in the room of thoſe which the Prince ſhould lead into England, and in ſecuring a timely relief, in caſe the King of France ſhould attack Holland. But all theſe things were taken care of, with great addreſs and ſecreſy. The difference at that time, about the election of an archbiſhop of Cologne, between Prince Clement of Bavaria, and the cardinal of Furſtemburg, furniſhed the States with a pretext to aſſemble an army near Nimeguen. On the other hand, the Prince of Orange, by his intrigues, prevailed to have the direction of affairs then on the carpet, commited to the management of three or four members of the States, on pretenſe of the correſpondents the count d'Avaux the French embaſſador had in Holland, who might inform him of their reſolutions. Theſe commiſſioners, all in the Prince of Orange's confidence, under color of the Cologn affair, gave orders for incamping an army, and preparing a fleet. At length, the Prince of Orange, on pretenſe of providing for a war againſt France, which ſeemed near, had an interview at Minden in Weſtphalia, with the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh, the Princes of the houſe of Lunenburg, and the Landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and ſecured their aſſiſtance, in caſe France ſhould attack Holland or the Low-Countries, while he was ingaged in the Engliſh expedition. All this was tranſacted with ſuch ſecreſy, that the embaſſadors of France and England, at the Hague, could get no certain intelligence. They were forced to recur to conjectures, tho' the firſt had uſually been informed of the reſolutions of the States, as ſoon as they were taken.

The affair of Cologne made uſe of to cover the deſign upon England. Burnet, p. 757.

His plan.

When the Prince of Orange had ſecured to the States, in caſe of need, the aſſiſtance of theſe Princes, he concerted his expedition with ſuch prudence and ſecreſy, that his ſcheme was not known till after the execution; viz. that the States, under color of being ready to ſupport the election of the Prince of Bavaria, ſhould form a camp on the heath near Nimeguen, a place too remote from the ſea to give any ſuſpicion that theſe troops were deſigned for an imbarkment: that a fleet of fifty men of war ſhould be prepared, with a ſufficient number of tranſports, for the imbarkation of twelve or thirteen thouſand men; that, to prevent the alarm which theſe tranſports might give, the merchants of Amſterdam, Rotterdam, and other maritime places, ſhould freight as many as they could on diverſe pretenſes; that theſe ſhips ſhould repair to ſeveral ports, at a time aſſigned, to take the forces aboard, and afterwards to the Goree, where the men of war ſhould expect them; that the Prince of Orange ſhould put himſelf on board this fleet, and, at his landing in England, the Engliſh perſons of quality, by whom he was invited, ſhould diſperſe themſelves into diverſe parts of the kingdom, to excite inſurrections, and levy troops, while the Prince, with his little army, ſhould make head againſt the King. It was not doubted, but the Prince's army would conſiderably increaſe when he ſhould be in England, and the people in general be ready to ſecond the efforts of thoſe, who were laboring for their deliverance. This whole ſcheme was executed in the manner it had been reſolved, without the embaſſadors of England and France being able to learn any thing certain. They conjectured, however, by the naval preparations, that ſomething was ſecretly contriving againſt England. Indeed it was difficult to prepare four or five hundred tranſports, and fifty men of war ſo privately, that they ſhould have no intelligence from their ſpies. The count d'Avaux failed not to ſend his conjectures to the court of France, which were immediately tranſmited to England. Moreover, mr. Skelton, King James's envoy at the Hague, had before informed him of an intercepted letter, which intimated, that a great project was ſecretly carrying on againſt him. But the King was then ſo ſecure of ſucceſs, that he neglected this intelligence, believing it only an artifice to divert him from his deſigns.

preparations in Holland, he wrote to mr. Skelton, then envoy at Paris, that he had things to communicate to the King of England, that were of no leſs concern than his crown, but would not diſcover the ſecret to any but the King himſelf; and that if his Majeſty would let him know his pleaſure, he would immediately repair to London. Skelton was not wanting to give information to the court of England, and to repeat it by five or ſix letters. But no notice was taken of it, whether thro' a too great ſecurity, or that the earl of Sunderland, to whom the letters were addreſſed, did not think proper to communicate them to the King.

Mean time as it was difficult any longer to conceal the armament in Holland, and the King receiving repeated advices of it, he judged it convenient, at all events, to flatter the people with the expectation of a parliament: therefore, the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, he declared in council his intention to call a parliament for the ſeventeenth of November, and the chancellor had orders to iſſue out the writs the fifth of September. However, the writs were not ſent, which gave occaſion to think, the King only deſigned to amuſe the public.

Rejects the offers of France. Ibid. Kennet, p. 518. Burnet. p. 767.

Next day mr. de Bonrepos arrived at London from Paris, and had ſeveral conferences with the King. It is pretended, that he offered him from the King of France a fleet, and an army of thirty thouſand men, but that the earl of Sunderland prevented the offer from being accepted. He is ſaid to repreſent to the King, "That it would be very "dangerous to introduce a foreign army into Eng- "land, at the very time he was preparing to hold "a parliament; that he would intirely loſe the "hearts of his ſubjects, and even of thoſe who "were moſt devoted to him; that if the French "ſhould have a mind to render themſelves maſters "of the kingdom, he would find but very few "who would join to deliver him from ſuch trouble- "ſome gueſts, and that in accepting ſo powerful "an aid, he would quickly become only a vice- "roy to Lewis XIV." Some have inſinuated, that this advice was evident treachery in the earl of Sunderland, who was gained by the Prince of Orange. But this accuſation reſts only on the ill ſucceſs of the King's affairs afterwards, and on the ſuppoſition that he would have ſucceeded in his deſigns, had the King of France's offer been accepted.

A new treaty with France. Burnet, p. 768.

However, the King refuſed the aid, becauſe he thought it unneceſſary, and yet, it is pretended, that he made at this very time a new alliance with Lewis, but which was never publiſhed.

Memorial of the marquis of Albyville to the States; Auguſt 23. Kennet, p. 518.

While theſe things were tranſacting, the King, hearing from ſeveral parts, that an armament was making in Holland, ordered the marquis of Albyville, his embaſſador, to preſent a memorial to the States, to demand what they meaned by their warlike preparations, eſpecially by ſea, at that time of the year. The States anſwered, That they armed in imitation of his Britannic Majeſty, and might with more reaſon demand an explanation about the alliance into which he was lately entered. This anſwer increaſing the King's ſuſpicions, he now began to take the neceſſary meaſures for puting himſelf in a poſture of defenſe. With this view, he gave the governments of Portſmouth and Hull, the two keys of the kingdom, to Papiſts, and took care to have the majority of the officers and ſoldiers of theſe gariſons of that religion.

The King puts himſelf upon his guard. Echard, Vol. III. p. 885.

But continues to flatter himſelf.

After all, he could not be perſuaded, the Prince of Orange would venture to attack him. He ſtill relied on his fleet and army, tho' before now he had ſeveral demonſtrations of their diſaffection. The court of France could not conceive the cauſe of ſo ſtrange an indolence; nor was Skelton leſs puzzled to anſwer the queſtion ſo often aſked, why the King his maſter refuſed the aſſiſtance of France? He could only ſay, that he had no orders about it. At length, in a conference one day with monſieur de Croiſſy upon this ſubject, he told him, it was his private opinion, that if France would threaten to attack the States General, in caſe any thing was attempted by them againſt the King of England, ſuch a declaration would break all the Prince of Orange's meaſures. The court of France approving of this propoſal, the count d'Avaux preſented a memorial to the States the thirtieth of Auguſt, declaring: "That all circumſtances inclined the King, his "maſter, to believe with reaſon, that the arming in "Holland threatened England, therefore his Ma- "jeſty had commanded him to declare to them, on "his part,--That the ties of friendſhip and alliance "between him and the King of Great Britain, "would oblige him not only to aſſiſt him, but alſo "to look on the firſt act of hoſtility that ſhould be "commited by their troops or their fleet, againſt "his Majeſty of Great Britain, to be a manifeſt "rupture of the peace, and a breach with his "crown."——The States, after an ambiguous anſwer to this memorial, demanded of the marquis of Albyville, the meaning of the new alliance between the two Kings. The ſame demand was made to the court of England by the States embaſſador, Van Citters, to whom they ſent a copy of the memorial. Whereupon the King ſummoned a council, and by the earl of Sunderland's means it was reſolved, to diſown the proceedings of the count d'Avaux. This reſolution was immediately communicated to the embaſſador of the States, and to all the King's miniſters in foreign courts. Moreover, to convince the public, that the King was not concerned in the memorial preſented by the count d'Avaux, Skelton was recalled, and immediately ſent to the Tower.

Suſpicions againſt the earl of Sunderland. Orleans. Echard, Vol. III. P. 886.

The earl of Sunderland on this occaſion, reaſoned on the ſame principle advanced by him, when the aſſiſtance offered by France was in debate. It cannot be denied, that his reaſons appeared plauſible to the King. But it is ſuppoſed by ſome, that the King was deceived, and that it was not poſſible for the earl of Sunderland alſo to be deceived. Wherefore they aſcribe his counſels to a premeditated deſign of betraying his maſter. Thoſe who talk thus, are, it is likely, very ſorry, the King did not follow the contrary opinion, and imbrace the offer of France. They are perſuaded, in that caſe, the Prince of Orange's meaſures would have been diſconcerted, his undertaking relinquiſhed, and the King, with the aſſiſtance of thirty thouſand men, been abſolute maſter of his kingdom. But it muſt be conſidered, that this is ſuppoſing an uncertain event; that the prime miniſter's advice, preceded the King's diſaſter ſome months; and, to accuſe him of an intention to betray the King, it muſt be ſuppoſed, that he could have foreſeen what the King himſelf did not: in a word, that he was ſecretly ingaged with the Prince of Orange, of which there does not appear any poſitive proof. The moſt plauſible ground of ſuſpicion againſt him, is, his admiſſion into that Prince's council and confidence, when on the throne. But he was not the only one of King James's miniſters, who was thus favored by King William. It is however certain, tho' the earl of Sunderland imbraced the Popiſh religion, he was, and ſtill is, ſuſpected by the Papiſts. There are even Proteſtants, who owning that he betrayed his maſter, count this pretended treachery an honor to him, ſince it tended to the good of the kingdom.

Tho' the King, as I ſaid, had ordered writs to be iſſued out for a new parliament, the order had not not been executed. This appears clearly in a proclamation of the twenty-firſt of September, wherein the King ſuppoſed, the elections were not yet begun. It imported:

A proclamation about a new parliament. Gazette No. 2384. Hiſt. of the Deſert. in State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 43.

"That his Majeſty having already ſignified his "pleaſure to call a parliament, leſt thoſe whoſe "right it was to chuſe members, ſhould lie under "any prejudices and miſtakes, thro' the artifices of "diſaffected perſons, he thought it fit to declare, "that as it was his Royal purpoſe to indeavor a "legal eſtabliſhment of an univerſal liberty of "conſcience for all his ſubjects, it was alſo his reſolu-"tion inviolably to preſerve the church of England, "by ſuch a confirmation of the ſeveral acts of uniformity, that they ſhould never be altered any other "ways than by repealing the ſeveral clauſes, which "inflict penalties upon perſons not promoted or to "be promoted to any eccleſiaſtical benefices within "the meaning of the ſaid acts, for exerciſing their "religion contrary to the purport of the ſaid acts of "uniformity. And that for the farther ſecuring, "not only the church of England, but the Pro-"teſtant religion in general, he was willing the "Roman Catholics ſhould remain incapable to be "members of the houſe of commons; whereby "thoſe fears and apprehenſions would be removed, "which many perſons had had, 'That the legiſ-"lative authority would be ingroſſed by them, and "turned againſt Proteſtants."——

Produces no great effect.

This proclamation was too obſcure and ambiguous to produce any great effect. There was even a manifeſt contradiction in the deſign to repeal the penal laws, and at the ſame time to preſerve the acts of uniformity. Beſide the King ſpoke only of excluding Papiſts from the houſe of commons, and not from that of the lords. But what ſtill more plainly diſcovered the King's intention to amuſe the people was, that the writs for a new parliament were not iſſued.

In the interim, the King, having received ſo many concuring advices of the Prince of Orange's deſigns, gave out commiſſions for augmenting his forces, and ſent for ſome regiments out of Ireland. He alſo ordered, at the ſame time, the fleet to be equiped with all expedition. Monſieur Barillon, the French embaſſador, propoſed that the King his maſter ſhould be deſired to abandon the ſiege of Philipſburg, undertaken by the Dauphin, and carry the war into Holland. This propoſal was approved by ſeveral of the council, but oppoſed by others, on pretenſe that ſuch a proceeding would allienate the minds of all the Engliſh Proteſtants from the King. This reaſon prevailed the more eaſily, as the Prince of Orange's friends had ſpread a report, that the armament of Holland was only deſigned to prevent the French from landing in England.

The earl of Feverſham made general. Echard, Vol. III. p. 887.

At length, the King, as he could no longer doubt the Prince of Orange's intention, gave the command of his army to the earl of Feverſham, after that poſt had been declined by the count de Roye. The command of the fleet was given to the lord Dartmouth. As the King was not ignorant how prejudicial the report of his ſtrict alliance with Lewis XIV was to him, he uſed his utmoſt indeavors to ſtifle it. For this purpoſe, he ordered the marquis of Albyville to preſent a memorial to the States, to aſſure them from him, that there was no other treaty between him and France than thoſe which were public. He moreover ordered the States to take ſuch meaſures with them, as might beſt ſerve to maintain the peace of Nimeguen, and the twenty years truce concluded in 1684. But their High Mightineſſes, whether better informed than the King imagined, or for other reaſons, took no notice of this memorial. On the contrary, the penſionary of Holland frankly owned to the marquis of Albyville, that the Prince of Orange being invited by the Engliſh nobility, was preparing to carry them aſſiſtance for reſtoring the government to its ancient ſtate, the King having intirely changed it ſince his acceſſion to the crown.

The Prince's expedition declared. Echard, Vol. III. p. 888.

It ſeems that the King had hitherto preſerved ſome hope, either that the States had ſome other deſign, or that the Prince only intended to deter him from finiſhing his work. But after this advice received from his embaſſador, who added, that many Engliſh were at the Hague ready to accompany the Prince in his expedition, he, as well as his whole council, diſcovered the utmoſt conſternation. Indeed, it was eaſy to conceive, that the Prince had projected this undertaking, upon private aſſurances of incouragement from the Engliſh. This reflection made the King begin to ſee the great diſproportion between the number of the Proteſtants, and that of the Papiſts, and conſequently the ſmall hopes of being ſupported by the latter. In theſe melancholly thoughts, he believed his beſt refuge was to recover the church of England to his intereſt. He ſtill imagined, ſhe was unſhaken in her principle of Paſſive-obedience, and that by giving her ſome ſatisfaction, he ſhould ſecure her allegiance, after which, there would be no farther cauſe to fear the efforts of the Prince of Orange. To this end, he ſent for the biſhops who were then in London, viz. Wincheſter, Chicheſter, Peterborough, Rocheſter, Ely, Bath and Wells, and told them, that he deſired their advice in the preſent conjuncture. He aſſured them of his readineſs to do whatever ſhould be thought neceſſary for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion and the liberties of his ſubjects, without derogating from his own prerogative. He concluded with ſaying, this affair required a mature examination, and therefore prayed them to conſult together, in order to give him their advice. The biſhops withdrew, and immediately repaired to Lambeth, to form, with the archbiſhop (then indiſpoſed) a plan of what they were to counſel the King.

Proclamation againſt the Prince of Orange's invaſion. Gazette, No. 2386, State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 44. Echard, Vol. III. p. 889.

The twenty-eight of September, the King publiſhed a proclamation to inform his ſubjects, "That "his Majeſty had received undoubted advice, that "a great and ſudden invaſion from Holland with "an armed force of foreigners, would ſpeedily be "made in an hoſtile manner upon this kingdom; "and altho' ſome falſe pretenſes, relating to liberty, "property, and religion, contrived and worded "with art and ſubtlety, might be given out, it "was manifeſt however, that no leſs matter by "this invaſion was propoſed, 'than an abſolute "conqueſt of theſe his Majeſty's kingdoms, and "the utter ſubduing and ſubjecting them, and all "his people, to a foreign power,' which was pro-"moted by ſome of his ſubjects, being perſons of "wicked and reſtleſs ſpirits, implacable malice, "and deſperate deſigns; who having no ſenſe of "the miſery of former inteſtine diviſions, nor "being moved by his Majeſty's reiterated acts of "grace and mercy, did again indeavor to imbroil "this kingdom in blood and ruin, to gratify their "own ambition and malice, propoſing to them-"ſelves a prey and booty in ſuch a public confu-"ſion. That tho' his Majeſty had notice, that a "foreign force was preparing againſt him, yet he "had always declined any foreign ſuccors, but "rather had choſen to rely upon the true and "ancient courage, faith and allegiance of his own "people, with whom he had often ventured his "life for the honor of this nation, and in whoſe "defenſe, againſt all enemies, he was firmly reſolved "to live and die; and therefore his Majeſty ſolemnly "conjured his ſubjects to lay aſide all animoſities, "jealouſies, and prejudices, and heartily and chearfully

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

" chearfully to unite together, in the defenſe of " of him and their native country.——— That " albeit the deſign had been carried on with all " imaginable ſecreſy and indeavors to ſurpriſe and " deceive his Majeſty, yet he had not been wanting " on his part, to make ſuch proviſions as did be- " come him, and made no doubt of being found in " ſo good a poſture, that his enemies might have " cauſe to repent their raſh and unjuſt attempts." In the concluſion his Majeſty declared, " That he " did intend to have met his parliament in No- " vember next, and that the writs were iſſued " forth accordingly, propoſing to himſelf, among " other things, That he might be able to quiet " the minds of all his people in matters of reli- " gion, but that in regard of this ſtrange attempt, " deſigned to divert his ſaid gracious purpoſes, " he found it neceſſary to recal his foreſaid " writs, &c."

Tho' the King pretended an intire reliance on the allegiance of his ſubjects, he knew, however, he had given them too much cauſe of diſcontent, to be aſſured of their affection. Wherefore he thought it neceſſary to give them more convincing proofs of his ſincerity, than bare words. To this intent, he took off the biſhop of London's ſuſpenſion, and appointed ſir John Chapman, a churchman, to ſucceed ſir John Eyles, the preſent lord mayor of London, who was an Anabaptiſt. Moreover, being informed that the biſhops would adviſe him to reſtore the city charter, he ſent for the lord mayor, aldermen, and ſherifs, and told them, " That he reſolved to reſtore to them their ancient " charter and privileges, and put them into the " ſame condition they were in at the time of the " judgment pronounced againſt them, upon the " Quo warranto." The ſame day, the ſecond of " October, he publiſhed a general pardon by pro- " clamation, out of which were excepted, Robert " Parſons, Edward Matthews, Samuel Venner, Andrew Fletcher, colonel John Rumſey, major John Manley, Iſaac Manley, Francis Charleton, John Wildman, Titus Oates, Robert Ferguſon, Gilbert Burnet, ſir Robert Peyton, Laurence Braddon, Samuel Johnſon, Thomas Tipping, and ſir Rowland Gwyne. But all this was not capable to ſatisfy the people, who aſpired to a more ample and more certain deliverance.

These advices clearly ſhew, that what has hitherto been ſeen concerning King James's government, is not grounded upon calumnies ſpread by his enemies. For how, on the third of October (a month before the Prince of Orange's arrival, and at a time when the events were yet uncertain) could theſe nine biſhops conſpire together to reproach the King with a violation of the laws in all theſe articles, under color of giving him counſel? Beſide, theſe advices agree, for the moſt part, with the Prince of Orange's declaration, ſigned at the Hague, at the very time the biſhops were conſulting together at London. In ſhort, the King's proceedings, two days after, invincibly prove the truth of theſe facts. So, the advocates for King James can only plead, either that he had a right to act as he did, or, tho' he had no ſuch right, his ſubjects were bound to ſubmit to his will. The King finding it neceſſary to comply with the advice of the biſhops, and that a refuſal would only increaſe the people's jealouſy, reſolved, tho' probably with regret, to redreſs moſt of the grievances complained of. For this purpoſe, two days after, the commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical cauſes was diſſolved. Next day, the lord chancellor had orders to carry back in perſon the charter of London. The lord lieutenants of the ſeveral counties were required to inform themſelves of the abuſes and irregularities commited in the late regulations of corporations, in order to redreſs the ſame. The biſhop of Wincheſter, viſitor of Magdalen college college in Oxford, was ordered to ſetle that ſociety regularly, and according to their ſtatutes. A proclamation was iſſued out for reſtoring corporations to their ancient charters, liberties, rights and franchiſes. The lord lieutenants were diſplaced in ſeveral counties. Popiſh juſtices of the peace, mayors, recorders, and other magiſtrates, were removed, and Proteſtants put in their places. Thus, in the ſpace of about twelve days, that formidable fabric was in effect, or in a great meaſure demoliſhed, which the Romiſh cabal had ſpent near four years in erecting.

Gives occaſion for new ſuſpicions.

But all theſe proceedings were not ſufficient to reſtore the King to the confidence of his ſubjects, becauſe they came too late, and ſeemed rather the effect of neceſſity than inclination. No other motive could be imagined of the King's deſtroying his own work, than his fear of being deſerted on the arrival of the Prince of Orange, who was daily expected. Whence it was infered, that the King's condeſcenſion would laſt no longer than the danger. What had been only ſuſpected, was ſoon found to be true. The biſhop of Wincheſter, purſuant to the King's order, having cauſed a citation to be fixed on the gates of Magdalen college, to recal dr. Hough, and the rejected fellows of that ſociety, upon the news of the diſperſion of the Prince's fleet by a tempeſt, was recalled on ſome frivolous pretenſe, and the reſtoration of the college defered. But afterwards, the news proving falſe, the King reſumed his pretended affection for the univerſity, and the college was reſtored. This extremely prejudiced the King, as it manifeſtly ſhewed, that in his late changes in favor of the Proteſtants, his aim had been only to amuſe them, till he ſhould be able to retract. Such as had fallen into the ſnare, and believed the King to have acted with ſincerity, loſt all their former confidence in him. So, James ſaw himſelf at once reduced to the aſſiſtance of his Popiſh ſubjects alone, who were incapable to reſtore his ſinking affairs.

Augments his forces. Echard, Vol. III. p. 893.

As all his hope was placed in his army, he applied himſelf, as far as lay in his power, to augment and ſtrengthen it with troops, which ſhould wholly depend on him. In obedience to orders already given, two thouſand five hundred men landed at Cheſter from Ireland, and three thouſand Scots were advanced to Carliſle. Beſide this, new commiſſions were granted (1), for levying ten regiments of horſe and foot, not to mention ſeveral independent companies. All the militia had orders to be in a readineſs to march. Laſtly a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all horſes, oxen, and cattle, to be driven and removed to the ſpace at leaſt of twenty miles, from the places where the enemies ſhould attempt to land. This was all he could do. But it was out of his power to cauſe his ſubjects to ſecond him with affection, or his troops to ſerve him faithfully. Accordingly, it was not upon an army of thirteen or fourteen thouſand men that the Prince of Orange relied, but upon the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, who impatiently waited his arrival: without this, ſo ſmall an army would not have been capable of conquering England.

Shuts up the Popiſh chapels. Echard, Vol. III. p. 893.

Mean while, the populace of London growing inſolent, by the hopes of the Prince's coming, began to inſult the Popiſh chapels; wherefore the King ordered them to be ſhut up, for fear of an inſurrection in ſo dangerous a juncture. On the other hand, many Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits perceiving the gathering ſtorm, and preſaging nothing good from the diſpoſition of the people, and the court's conſternation, began gradually to diſappear, and to conſult their own ſafety by a timely retreat into foreign parts.

The Prince of Wales baptized. October 15. Gazette, No. 2391.

In the midſt of all theſe diſtractions, the King cauſed the Prince of Wales to be ſolemnly baptized; the Pope repreſented by his nuncio, being godfather, and the Queen Dowager godmother. Father Saban officiated, and named him James-Francis-Edward.

State Tracts, Vol. I. p. 1, &c.

At the ſame time the court received a pamphlet, publiſhed in Holland, intitled, "A Memorial "of the Engliſh Proteſtants, preſented to their "highneſſes, the Prince and Princeſs of Orange." It was aſcribed to dr. Burnet, or major Wildman; wherein after a long narrative of the grievances of the nation, the author complained of King James's obliging his ſubjects to own a ſuppoſititious child for the Prince of Wales, adding, "That his Ma-"jeſty would never ſuffer the witneſſes that were "preſent at the Queen's delivery to be heard and "examined." The King was no ſtranger to the ſuſpicions entertained by the people on this account, but had hitherto pretended ignorance, or at leaſt looked on them with contempt. He perceived, however, that on this occaſion, he could not, without great prejudice to himſelf, help anſwering ſo public a challenge. He therefore held an extraordinary council, the twenty-ſecond of October, to which were called the Queen Dowager, all the lords ſpiritual and temporal then in town, the lord mayor and aldermen of London, the judges, and ſeveral of his Majeſty's learned council. All theſe being aſſembled, the King told them, "He had called them together upon a very "extraordinary occaſion; but that extraordinary "diſeaſes muſt have extraordinary remedies: that "the malicious indeavors of his enemies had ſo "poiſoned the minds of ſome of his ſubjects, that "by the reports he had from all hands, he had "reaſon to believe, that very many did not think "that this ſon, with which God had bleſſed him, "to be his, but a ſuppoſed child. But, he might "ſay, that by a particular providence, ſcarce any "Prince was ever born, where there was ſo many "perſons preſent. That he had taken this time to "have the matter heard and examined there, ex-"pecting that the Prince of Orange, with the firſt "eaſterly wind, would invade this kingdom: and "as he had often ventured his life for the nation "before he came to the crown, ſo he thought him-"ſelf more obliged ſo to do now he was King, "and did intend to go in perſon againſt him, "whereby he might be expoſed to accidents; and "therefore he thought it neceſſary to have this "now done, in order to ſatisfy the minds of his "ſubjects, and to prevent the kingdom's being "ingaged in blood and confuſion after his death: "that he had deſired the Queen Dowager to give "herſelf the trouble to come hither, to declare "what ſhe knew of the birth of his ſon; and that "moſt of the ladies, lords, and other perſons who "were preſent, were ready to depoſe upon oath "their knowlege of the matter."

The King calls an extraordinary council to prove the birth of the Prince of Wales.

His ſpeech to them. Echard, Vol. III. p. 893. Burnet, p. 785.

After this ſpeech, depoſitions were taken, firſt of the Queen Dowager, who only ſaid, "That "ſhe was in the room when the Queen was de-"livered," without any thing more poſitive or particular. After her followed forty witneſſes of which ſeventeen were Papiſts, and it was begun with proving, that the Queen was brought to bed while many perſons were in the room. To this tended the teſtimonies of the eighteen lords who accompanied the King thither. This proof ſignified nothing, or was very ambiguous. It was well known, there were a great many perſons in the room at the time the Queen was ſaid to be delivered; which doubtleſs, was all that was meaned by this proof. But it was not ſufficient to prove the reality of the delivery. Some of the ladies depoſed that they ſaw the child ſoon after in the arms of the midwife. But as no man in the council durſt put any queſtions to the witneſſes, concerning ſeveral circumſtances, theſe general depoſitions were incapable to remove all ſuſpicions. The midwife depoſed poſitively, that ſhe took the child from the Queen's body. The counteſs of Sunderland depoſed, that the Queen called her to give her her hand, that ſhe might feel how the child lay, which, added ſhe, I did, but ſhe did not ſay whether ſhe felt the child or not. The biſhop of Saliſbury adds, that the counteſs of Sunderland told the ducheſs of Hamilton (from whom he had this particular) that when ſhe put her hand into the bed, the Queen held it, and let it go no lower than her breaſts, ſo that really ſhe felt nothing. Many ladies depoſed, that they had often ſeen the marks of milk on the Queen's linen near her breaſts. Two or three depoſed, that they ſaw it runing out at the nipple. But what is remarkable, none of theſe ladies named the time in which they ſaw the milk, except one, who named the month of May. Now if it be true, as was before related, that the Queen was really with child till the ninth of April, and that ſhe miſcarried that day, all that was mentioned of milk in the Queen's breaſts, particularly by her that fixed it to the month of May, might have followed on that miſcarriage, and be no proof concerning the late birth. Mrs. Pierce the laundreſs depoſed, that ſhe took linen from the Queen's body once, which carried the marks of a delivery. The biſhop objects here, that it is ſtrange ſhe ſhould ſpeak only to one time. The lady Wentworth was the ſingle witneſs that depoſed, that ſhe had felt the child move in the Queen's belly, but ſhe fixed it to no time.

Burnet, p. 785.

Remarks upon theſe depoſitions.

In general ſee in few words the uſe that may be made of the ſuſpicions mentioned by ſeveral authors, and of theſe depoſitions, viz. There being three caſes, in none of which the two parties agree, the depoſitions are not applicable to any of the caſes, without being contradicted by thoſe who maintain one of the other two. Let us take for inſtance, the two depoſitions, which, next to that of the midwife, appear moſt convincing, viz. that of the lady who had ſeen milk run from the Queen's breaſts; and that of the lady Iſabella Wentworth, who had felt the child in the womb. Theſe two teſtimonies are ſufficient againſt thoſe who maintain, that the Queen was not with child from January, the time of her declared pregnancy, to the tenth of June, the time of her delivery. But they are inſufficient againſt thoſe who pretend that ſhe was really with child, from the ſixth of October to the ninth of April, when ſhe had a miſcarriage, for the reaſons before-mentioned. To be able therefore to form a certain judgment concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales, it is neceſſary, 1. That facts ſhould be agreed in, I mean, whether it be true, that the Queen was really with child, and that ſhe had a miſcarriage. 2. That thoſe who derive their ſuſpicions from the Queen's obſtinate refuſal to give ſatisfaction to the public, ſhould fix the time of this obſtinacy to the interval between the ninth of April, the day of her pretended miſcarriage, and the tenth of June, the day of her delivery. For in ſuppoſing the reality of her pregnancy till Eaſter week, the ſuſpicions ariſing from the Queen's obſtinacy, cannot but be ill grounded, unleſs this obſtinacy is confined to the ſpace of time, between the miſcarriage and the delivery, which it is not. 3. That the two ladies who depoſed concerning the milk and the motion of the child, ſhould have fixed the time to the ſame interval, otherwiſe their teſtimony proves nothing againſt thoſe who maintain, that the Queen was really with child till Eaſter week, and had then a miſcarriage; but this is what does not appear. As to the teſtimony of the midwife, which is the principal and moſt poſitive, all that can be objected to it is, that it is a ſingle teſtimony, and that beſide ſhe being a Papiſt, might have been corrupted. But this is only a conjecture, a bare poſſibility. It is therefore clear, that to decide this queſtion in a manner capable to ſatisfy thoſe who only ſeek the truth, a more perfect knowlege muſt be had of many circumſtances which as yet lie concealed.

The ſuſpicions not removed by the depoſitions.

The King's precaution produced not the deſired effect. The ſuſpicion of an impoſture was ſo deeply rooted in the minds of moſt of the Engliſh, that it was rather confirmed than removed by this examination. The myſterious conduct obſerved at a time when, conſidering the general ſuſpicion, all poſſible precautions ought to have been taken to render the birth unqueſtionable, made a ſtronger impreſſion than all theſe teſtimonies, and the rather, as they were found to be very defective. Before this examination, the preſumption of law was for the Prince, ſince he was owned by both parents, ſo that the proof lay on the other ſide, and ought to be offered by thoſe who queſtioned it. But after the King had undertaken to prove the reality of his ſon's birth, by forty witneſſes, of which more than thirty ſaid nothing material, and the reſt fixed no time to what they depoſed, he left room to his enemies to object againſt theſe very depoſitions.

The King's ſpeech after the examination of the witneſſes.

The King's own teſtimony was not more effectual. After the witneſſes were examined, he told the aſſembly, "That the Princeſs Anne of "Denmark would have been preſent; but that ſhe "being with child likewiſe, and having not lately "ſtired abroad, could not come ſo far without "hazard." Adding farther, "That tho' he did "not queſtion but every perſon there preſent was "ſatisfied before in this matter, yet by what they "had heard, they would be better able to ſatisfy "others: that beſide, if he and the Queen could "be thought ſo wicked as to indeavor to impoſe "a child upon the nation, they ſaw how impoſſible it would have been; neither could he himſelf be impoſed upon, having conſtantly been "with the Queen during her being with child, and "the whole time of her labor. That there was "none of them but would eaſily believe him, who "had ſuffered ſo much for conſcience ſake, incapable of ſo great a villany, to the prejudice of "his own children; and that he thanked God, "that thoſe who knew him, knew well, that it "was his principle to do as he would be done by, "for 'that was the Law and the Prophets;' and "he would rather die a thouſand deaths, than do "the leaſt wrong to any of his children."

The depoſitions are recorded. Kennet, p. 523.

The reaſons alleged by the King in this ſpeech were far from being convincing, ſince thoſe who believed the impoſture, were perſuaded, that the King was chiefly concerned in it, notwithſtanding all his aſſeverations, which were but little regarded. It is a deplorable thing for a King not to be credited by the body of his ſubjects. The depoſitions were ſolemnly inrolled in chancery, and afterwards printed and diſperſed among the people. But this did not prevent a general belief, that the Prince of Wales was ſuppoſititious. So this birth remains hitherto in uncertainty, and probably will long remain ſo. For it muſt be obſerved, that after the King and Queen had withdrawn into France, neither neither the midwife, or the Queen's ladies, who had depoſed the moſt material circumſtances of the pregnancy or the delivery, were to be found.

The earl of Sunderland removed from all his places. Kennet, p. 523. Echard, Vol. III. p. 895, &c. Hiſt. of Deſert. p. 53.

The twenty-eighth of October, the earl of Sunderland was ſuddenly removed from his places of preſident of the council, and principal ſecretary of ſtate. It is believed, that his neglect of Skelton's letters to him, was the principal cauſe of his diſgrace. He ſaid, on this ſubject, "If he gave no account "of theſe letters to the King, it was becauſe Skelton "never wrote but ſecond hand news." But theſe were not mere letters of news. One Wickſtead, formerly a monk, being ſeized for holding correſpondence with the King's enemies, charged the earl of Sunderland to his face, with revealing his Majeſty's ſecrets to the Prince of Orange. But being commited to the cuſtody of a meſſenger, next day he made his eſcape. However, it is certain, Sunderland had been ſome time ſuſpected by the Papiſts, who, in all appearance, perſuaded the King of his ſecret intelligence with the Prince of Orange. He publiſhed afterwards an apology, but the diſcuſſion of this affair would be too great a digreſſion.

Letters of pardon granted to ſeveral of the moſt obnoxious perſons. Nov. 1. Echard, Vol III. p. 897.

As it was expected the firſt Eaſterly wind would bring over the Prince of Orange, ſome of the moſt devoted to the King during his proſperity, thought proper to ſecure themſelves by letters of pardon for their illegal actions. Among theſe were chancellor Jefferies, ſir Nicholas Butler, the biſhop of Cheſter, the biſhop of Durham, and about twenty more, to whom the King readily granted the favor they deſired.

While theſe things were tranſacting in England, the neceſſary diſpoſitions were making in Holland for the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh: for it was on this account that the States let their troops to the Prince of Orange; and what the King called in England an invaſion, in Holland was termed, "a brotherly "aſſiſtance lent by the States and the Prince to the "diſtreſſed Engliſh." It can hardly be thought, that the Prince of Orange, with an army of thirteen or fourteen thouſand men, would have undertaken a deſcent into England, had he not been aſſured of a favorable reception from the generality of the people. But as it was neceſſary to remove the ſuſpicion fomented by the King, that the Prince was coming to conquer and ſubdue England, he thought proper, in a declaration, to ſhow the true motives of his undertaking. This declaration, dated the tenth of October, new ſtile, was divided into twenty-ſix articles, reducible to theſe three general heads:

The Prince of Orange's declaration. Hiſt. of the Deſert. in State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 67. Kennet. p. 523. Echard.

"The firſt contained a particular enumeration "of the grievances of the Engliſh nation, eſpecially "the King's arrogating to himſelf a diſpenſing "power; his advancing Papiſts to civil, eccleſiaſtical, and military imployments, and allowing them to ſit in the privy council; his ſeting up "an illegal commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs, in "which there was one of his miniſters of ſtate, who "made public profeſſion of the Popiſh religion, "and who at the time of his firſt profeſſing it, "declared, 'That for a great while before, he had "believed that to be the only true religion;' and "by which not only the biſhop of London was "ſuſpended, but the preſident and fellows of Magdalen College arbitrarily turned out of their freeholds, contrary to that expreſs proviſion in Magna "Charta, 'That no man ſhall loſe his life or goods "but by the laws of the land;' his allowing Popiſh "monaſteries and colleges of jeſuits to be created; "his turning out of public imployments, all ſuch "as would not concur with him in the repeal of "the teſt and penal laws; his invading the privileges, and ſeizing on the charters of moſt corporations, and placing Popiſh magiſtrates in "ſome of them; his ſubjecting the courts of judi- "catory to his arbitrary and deſpotic power, and "puting the adminiſtration of juſtice into the hands "of Papiſts; his not only arming the Papiſts, in "contempt of the laws, but likewiſe raiſing them "up to the greateſt military truſts, both by ſea and "land, ſtrangers as well as natives, and Iriſh as "well as Engliſh, that he might be in a capacity to "inſlave the nation; his puting the whole government of Ireland into the hands of Papiſts; his "aſſuming an abſolute and arbitrary power in the "kingdom of Scotland; from which it was apparent, what was to be looked for in England."

Secondly, his Highneſs alleged, "That thoſe "great and inſufferable oppreſſions, and the open "contempt of all law, together with the apprehenſion of the ſad conſequences that muſt certainly "follow upon it, had made the ſubjects to look "after ſuch remedies as are allowed of in all nations, and in the moſt abſolute Monarchies, all "which had been without effect; his Majeſty's "evil counſellors having indeavored to make all "men apprehend the loſs of their lives, liberties, "honors, and eſtates, if they ſhould go about to "preſerve themſelves from this oppreſſion, by petitions and repreſentations; an inſtance of which "was, the proſecution of the ſeven biſhops: that "a peer of the realm (the lord Lovelace) was "treated as a criminal, only becauſe he ſaid, "'That the ſubjects were not bound to obey the "orders of a Popiſh juſtice of peace;' tho' it is "evident, that they being by law rendered incapable of all ſuch truſts, no regard is due to their "orders; that both he and his conſort the Princeſs, "had indeavored to ſignify, with terms full of reſpect, to the King, the juſt and deep regret "which all theſe proceedings had given them, and "declared what their thoughts were touching the "repealing of the teſt and penal laws; but that "theſe evil counſellors had put ſuch ill conſtructions "on their good intentions, that they had indeavored to alienate the King more and more from "them. That the laſt and great remedy for all "theſe evils, was, the calling of a parliament, "which could not yet be compaſſed, nor could be "eaſily brought about; for thoſe men apprehending that a lawful parliament would bring them to "account for all their open violations of law, and "for their conſpiracies againſt the Proteſtant religion, and the lives and liberties of the ſubjects, "they had indeavored, under the ſpecious pretenſe "of liberty of conſcience, firſt to ſow diviſions "between thoſe of the church of England, and "Diſſenters, with deſign to ingage Proteſtants, "who are equally concerned to preſerve themſelves from Popiſh oppreſſion, into mutual quarrellings; that ſo by theſe, ſome advantage might "be given them to bring about their deſigns; "and that, both in the elections of members of "parliament, and afterwards in the parliament "itſelf: That they had alſo made ſuch regulations, "as they thought fit and neceſſary, for ſecuring all "the members that were to be choſen by the corporations; by which means they hoped to avoid "the puniſhment they deſerved, tho' it was apparent, that all acts, made by Popiſh magiſtrates, were null and void of themſelves: ſo "that no parliament could be lawful, for which "the elections and returns were made by Popiſh "magiſtrates, ſherifs, and mayors of towns; and "therefore as long as the magiſtracy was in ſuch "hands, it was not poſſible to have a free parliament legally called and choſen. That there "were great and violent preſumptions, inducing "his Highneſs to believe, that thoſe evil counſellors, in order to the gaining the more time for "the effecting their ill deſigns, had publiſhed,

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

" 'That the Queen had brought forth a ſon;' tho' " there had appeared, both during the Queen's " pretended bigneſs, and in the manner wherein the " birth was managed, ſo many juſt and viſible " grounds of ſuſpicion, that not only he himſelf, " but all the good ſubjects of the kindom, did " vehemently ſuſpect, 'That the pretended Prince " of Wales was not born of the Queen;' And " tho' many both doubted of the Queen's bigneſs, " and of the birth of the child, yet there was not " any thing done to ſatisfy them, or put an end " to their doubts. That ſince his conſort the " Princeſs, and likewiſe he himſelf, had ſo great " an intereſt in this matter, and ſuch a right, as all " the world knew, to the ſucceſſion of the crown; " ſince all the Engliſh did in the year 1672, when " Holland was invaded with a moſt unjuſt war, " uſe their utmoſt indeavors to put an end to that " war, and that in oppoſition to thoſe who were " then in the government; ſince the Engliſh na- " tion had ever teſtified a moſt particular affection " and eſteem, both to his Highneſs's deareſt con- " ſort, and to himſelf, he could not excuſe him- " ſelf from eſpouſing that intereſt, in a matter of " ſuch high conſequence, and for contributing all " that in him lay, for the maintaining both of " the Proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties " of theſe kingdoms: to the doing of which, his " Highneſs, 'was moſt earneſtly ſollicited by a " great many lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, " and by many gentlemen, and other ſubjects of " all ranks."

In the laſt place his Highneſs declared, " That " for the forementioned reaſons, he has thought fit " to go over to England, and to carry with him " a force ſufficient to defend him from the violence " of thoſe evil counſellors; that his expedition was " intended for no other deſign, but to have a free " and lawful parliament, aſſembled as ſoon as it " was poſſible; and that in order to this, all the " late charters, by which the election of bur- " geſſes are limited, contray to the ancient " cuſtom, ſhould be conſidered as null and of no " force; that to this parliament he would refer " the inquiry into the birth of the pretended Prince " of Wales, and of all things relating thereto, and " to the right of ſucceſſion; that he would concur " in every thing that might procure the peace and " happineſs of the nation, under a juſt and legal " government; that he would keep the forces under " his command, under all the ſtrictneſs of mar- " tial diſcipline, and promiſed, that he would " ſend back all thoſe foreign forces, as ſoon as " the ſtate of the nation would admit of it; " that therefore he invited and required all " perſons whatſoever to come and aſſiſt him, " in order to the executing his deſigns againſt all " ſuch as ſhall indeavor to oppoſe him; that he " would likewiſe take care, that a parliament " ſhould be called in Scotland, for reſtoring " the ancient conſtitution of that kingdom, and " for bringing the matters of religion to ſuch a " ſetlement, that the people might live eaſy and " happy; that he would alſo ſtudy to bring the " kingdom of Ireland to ſuch a ſtate, that the " ſetlement there might be religiouſly obſerved, " and that the Proteſtant and Britiſh intereſt there " might be ſecured."

This declaration being printed, and ready to be ſent over to England to be diſperſed among the people, the Prince was informed, that the King, by the advice of the biſhops, had redreſſed ſeveral grievances mentioned in his declaration. Wherefore he thought fit to make the following addition to it:

" After we had printed our declaration, we have " underſtood, that the ſubverters of the religion " and laws of theſe kingdoms, hearing of our pre- " paration to aſſiſt the people againſt them, have " begun to retract ſome of the arbitrary and de- " ſpotic power that they had aſſumed, and to vacate " ſome of their unjuſt judgments and decrees: the " ſenſe or their guilt, and the diſtruſt of their " force, have induced them to offer to the city " of London ſome ſeeming relief from their great " oppreſſions; hoping thereby, to quiet the people, " and to divert them from demanding a re-eſta- " bliſhment of their religion and laws, under the " ſhelter of our arms: they did alſo give out, " 'That we do intend to conquer and inſlave the " nation;' and therefore it is, we have thought fit " to add a few words to our declaration.

" We are confident, that no perſons can have " ſuch hard thoughts of us, as to imagine, we " have any other deſign in this our undertaking, " than to procure a ſetlement of the religion, " and of the liberties and properties of the ſub- " ject, upon ſo ſure a foundation, that there may " be no danger of the nation's relapſing into the " like miſeries at any time hereafter. And as the " forces we have brought along with us are utterly " diſproportioned to that wicked deſign of con- " quering the nation, if we were capable of in- " tending it; ſo the great numbers of the prin- " cipal nobility and gentry, that are men of emi- " nent quality and eſtates, and perſons of known " integrity and zeal, both for the religion and " government of England; many of them being " alſo diſtinguiſhed by their conſtant fidelity to the " crown, who do both accompany us in this expe- " dition, and have earneſtly ſollicited us to it, will " cover us from all ſuch malicious inſinuations: " for it is not to be imagined, that either thoſe " who invited us, or thoſe who are already come " to aſſiſt us, can join in a wicked attempt of " conqueſt, to make void their own lawful titles " to their honors, eſtates, and intereſts. We are " alſo confident, that all men ſee, how little weight " there is to be laid on all promiſes and ingage- " ments that can be now made, ſince there has " been ſo little regard had in the time paſt, to the " moſt SOLEMN PROMISES. And as that imper- " fect redreſs, that is now offered, is a plain con- " feſſion of thoſe violences of the government, " that we have ſet forth; ſo the defectiveneſs of " it is no leſs apparent; for they lay down nothing " but which they may take up at pleaſure, and " they reſerve intire, and not ſo much as mention, " their claims and pretenſes to an arbitrary and " deſpotic power, which has been the root of all " their oppreſſion, and the total ſubverſion of the " government. And it is plain, that there can be " no redreſs, no remedy offered but in parliament, " by a declaration of the rights of the ſubjects that " have been invaded, and not by any pretended " acts of grace, to which the extremity of their " affairs have driven them. Therefore it is that " we have thought fit to declare, that we will refer " all to a free aſſembly of this nation, in a lawful " parliament."

There was publiſhed, about the ſame time, " The reſolution of the States General, containing " the reaſons that had obliged them to aſſiſt his " Highneſs the Prince of Orange with ſhips, " men, and ammunition, in his intended expedi- " tion into England." The two principal reaſons were: 1. That the Prince of Orange had been invited to this expedition by the Engliſh nobility, gentry and clergy. 2. That the States had juſt cauſe to fear, that in caſe the King of England became abſolute in his own kingdom, he would, in conjunction with the King of France, indeavor to bring their State to confuſion, and if poſſible to a total ſubjection. This fear was founded upon the earl earl of Caſtlemain's preſſing the Pope, and the patron cardinal Cibo (during his embaſſy at Rome) to admit his maſter to mediate a reconciliation between the courts of Rome and Verſailles, aſſuring, "When that reconciliation was brought about, "the two Kings would effectually ſerve the cauſe "of the church, and begin with the deſtruction "of Holland." The Pope, to whom ſuch projects were not agreeable, informed the Emperor of it, who communicated it to the Prince of Orange. This is at leaſt what dr. Burnet ſays in one of his letters.

The Prince of Orange takes his leave of the States. He ſets ſail. Kennet, p. 525, 526. Burnet, p. 774, 782.

Every thing being ready for the projected expedition, the Prince of Orange went into the aſſembly of the States General the ſixteenth of October, to take a ſolemn leave of them. This was done in ſo tender and moving a manner, that both himſelf and the States melted into tears. He imbarked the nineteenth of October, on a frigate of about thirty guns. The fleet conſiſted of fifty men of war, twenty-five frigates, as many fire ſhips, with near four hundred victuallers, and other veſſels, for the tranſportation of above four thouſand horſe, and ten thouſand foot. The moſt conſiderable of the Engliſh, who accompanied the Prince, were, the earls of Shrewſbury and Macclesfield, the lords Mordaunt, Wiltſhire, Paulet, Elan, Dunblain, admiral Herbert, mr. Herbert, colonel Sidney, mr. Ruſſel, ſir Rowland Gwyne, major Wildman, dr. Burnet, mr. Harbord, mr. Ferguſon, and many others of leſs note. The Prince had with him, beſide the general officers of the Dutch forces, count Schomberg, marſhal of France, who had laſt ſerved the Elector of Brandenburg, count Charles, his ſon; monſieur Caillemote, younger ſon to the marquis of Rouvigny; and about three hundred French officers, who had left their country for religion. Admiral Herbert led the van of the fleet, vice admiral Evertzen brought up the rear, and the Prince placed himſelf in the main body, carrying a flag with Engliſh colors, and their Highneſſes arms ſurrounded with this motto, The Protestant Religion and Liberty of England; and underneath the motto of the houſe of Naſſau, Je Maintiendrai, i. e. "I will maintain."

His fleet diſperſed by a tempeſt. State Tracts, Vol. I. p. 56. Kennet, p. 526. Echard, Vol. III. p. 902. Burnet, p. 783.

This numerous fleet had been but few hours under ſail, when ſuddenly the wind coming more Weſterly, there aroſe ſuch a ſtorm, that in leſs than two hours the whole fleet was ſo diſperſed, that next day ſcarce two ſhips could be ſeen together. The ſtorm continued two days, during which time, the ſhips indeavored to gain, ſome one port, ſome another. Many were driven Northward, and could not reach the appointed rendezvous till eight days after. Nevertheleſs, the damage was ſo inconſiderable, that there was ſcarce any except loſs of time. But on this occaſion, the States made uſe of an artifice, which did the King great prejudice; they ordered the Haerlem and Amſterdam Gazettes to aggravate the damage ſuſtained by the fleet, and to inſinuate, that the Prince could not poſſibly be in a condition to purſue his deſign till the next ſpring (1). This was intended to amuſe the court of England, and make them leſs vigilant in their preparations. But beſide this advantage, they received from this artifice another ſtill more conſiderable, which was that the King, hearing the news with great pleaſure, flattered himſelf, that he had now nothing more to fear, and that before the ſpring, he ſhould infallibly be able to break all the Prince of Orange's meaſures. In this belief, he revoked ſome of his acts of grace granted to his ſubjects, and thereby clearly ſhewed, that theſe acts were extorted by neceſſity, and that conſequently, no change was to be expected in his conduct for the future.

The King revokes ſome of his acts of grace. Echard.

It was in this critical juncture that captain Langham, an Engliſhman in the ſervice of the States, was ſeized on his arrival in England. In his portmanteau were found many copies of the Prince's declaration, which were ſent to court. The King having read the declaration, was ſurpriſed at that expreſſion, "That the Prince was moſt "earneſtly invited over by diverſe of the lords, "both ſpiritual and temporal, and by many gen-"tlemen, and others." Immediately he ſent for the archbiſhop, and four or five biſhops then in London, and demanded of them, "Whether the "contents of the Prince's declaration, relating to "their inviting him over, were true?" The biſhops contented themſelves with promiſing in general, their faithful allegiance to his Majeſty. But the King, not ſatisfied with this anſwer, required them to juſtify themſelves to the world, as to their part in that invitation. At the ſame time he fixed a day, whereon he obliged them to preſent a paper under their own hand, ſignifying their abhorrence of the Prince of Orange's intended invaſion. He farther let them know, "That a declaration was "then in the preſs againſt the Prince of Orange, "and was only defered, to have their paper of "abhorrence put into it."

The Prince's declaration falls into his hands. Kennet, p. 526. Hiſt. of Deſert. p. 56.

Who is for obliging the biſhops to diſown it.

On the day appointed, the biſhops repaired to Whitehall, and as ſoon as they were in the King's preſenſe he called for their paper. But with all ſubmiſſion, "They begged to be excuſed from writ-"ing any thing of that nature, and for making a "particular defenſe to a general accuſation, leſt "they ſhould give the firſt precedent of that kind "againſt the privilege of peers: beſide, that their "profeſſion being to promote peace, they thought "it belonged not to them to declare war, eſpecially "againſt a Prince ſo nearly allied to the crown." This anſwer threw the King into a violent paſſion. However, in as dutiful terms as poſſible, they perſiſted in their refuſal. The King not being able to prevail with them, ordered them to withdraw, with great indignation. They were afterwards informed, that one of the principal members of the council and jeſuited party, adviſed the King, "To "impriſon them all, and extort the truth from "them by violence."

They excuſe themſelves. Kennet, p. 527. Echard, Vol. III. p. 903.

Sprat's lett.

Mean while, the King being deſirous to conceal the Prince of Orange's declaration from the people, forbad the publiſhing and diſperſing it, by proclamation. But being afterwards informed, that a great number of copies were handed about the kingdom, and ſenſible that his prohibition would be to no purpoſe, he choſe to print the declaration with remarks tending to juſtify his own, and render odious the Prince of Orange's conduct.

The King prints the Prince's declaration, with his own remarks upon it. Gazette, No. 2396. State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 66.

About the ſame time a letter from the Prince of Orange, to the officers of the Engliſh army was printed, and another from admiral Herbert to the Engliſh fleet. The deſign of theſe two letters was the ſame, viz. to inform the army and the fleet of the true intention of the Prince, and to repreſent to them, that in being the King's inſtruments to accompliſh his deſigns, they were laboring their own ruin. Wherefore the officers, ſoldiers, and ſailors, were conjured not to ſuffer themſelves to be abuſed by a falſe notion of honor, to ſerve the King, contrary to the manifeſt intereſt of their religion and country. Theſe two letters had a wonderful effect upon officers, ſoldiers and ſeamen; ſo that from this time many of them reſolved not to draw their ſwords in this quarrel, till they had a free parliament to ſecure their religion and liberties.

The King's fleet ill-affected to him. Burchett. p. 414. Burnet, p. 783.

The King's fleet consisted of sixty-one men of war, of which thirty-eight were of the line of battle. Several English authors venture to affirm, this fleet was more than sufficient to defeat that of the States. I know not upon what their assertion is grounded: but it seems to me, with as great probability, that in case the fleets had ingaged, the King's would have shared the danger. While the English fleet lay at anchor at the Gunfleet, the lord Dartmouth, the admiral, called a council of war, wherein it was debated, whether it was proper to put to sea, and ingage the enemy? An author who has wrote the naval transactions of the English, says on this occasion, "That this proposal carried "the greatest weight with it, had there been a real "design of obstructing the Prince of Orange in his "passage to England. But instead of that (con-"tinues he) matters were so concerted and agreed "among the flag officers and commanders, that "had the admiral come fairly up with the Dutch, "it would not have been in his power to have "done them much damage." Wherefore, by a great majority it was resolved to continue there, in order to intercept the Dutch fleet.

The Prince of Orange sails out a second time. Burnet, p. 787. Echard, Vol. III. p. 906.

The damage sustained by the Prince's fleet in the late storm was so inconsiderable, and so easily repaired, that in eleven days it was in condition to put to sea again. The first of November, in the afternoon, the Prince imbarked on a new vessel called the Brill, and the fleet at first steering Northward, it was thought the design was to land somewhere in the North of England; and Burnet says, the first scheme was to anchor in the mouth of the Humber. But during the night, whether the Prince had changed his mind, or was hindered from pursuing this course by a violent East wind, all the fleet steered towards the Eastern Coasts of England; after which they shortened sail for fear of accidents in the night. Next morning the fleet sailed towards the channel, without meeting any English ship, and in their passage discovered the coasts of Essex and Kent. The third of November the fleet entered the channel (1), and lay by between Calais and Dover, to stay for the ships that were behind. Here the Prince called a council of war. It is easy to imagine, what a glorious show the fleet made. Five or six hundred ships in so narrow a channel, and both the English and French shores covered with numberless spectators, is no common sight. For my part, who was then on board the fleet, I own it struck me extremely.

Kennet, p. 527. Echard, Vol. III. p. 907.

The King, upon advice of the Prince's design to land in the North, had sent part of his army that way. But it was with the utmost surprise that he received several expresses, with the news that the enemy's fleet was sailing Westward. He however flattered himself that the lord Dartmouth would pursue and give a good account of them. But for what reason I know not, the English fleet remained in their station, till the enemy's ships had passed by (2).

Burnet, p. 787. State Tracts, Vol. I. p. 58.

The fourth of November being Sunday, and the Prince's birth day, now thirty-eight years of age, was by him dedicated to devotion, the fleet still continuing their course in order to land at Dartmouth or Torbay. But in the night, whether by the violence of the wind, or the negligence of the pilot (3), the fleet was carried beyond the desired ports, without a possibility of puting back, such was the fury of the wind. This accident gave them the melancholy prospect of being forced to sail on to Falmouth, or some other inconvenient place. But soon after, the wind turned to the South, which happily carried the fleet into Torbay, the most convenient place for landing the horse of any in England. The forces were landed with such diligence and tranquillity, that the whole army was on shore before night. Next morning, the wind turning West, blew so tempestuously, that had the landing been defered a few hours, probably, it would not have been possible to disembark the troops. This wind prevented the lord Dartmouth, who was come in sight of the Dutch fleet, from attacking it, and obliged him to go into Portsmouth. Upon this occasion these two famous verses of Claudian were applied to the Prince of Orange:

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

Lands at Torbay. Burnet, p. 788, 789.

Id. p. 790.

O nimium dilecte Deo, cui militat æther,
Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti.

Heaven's favorite! to whom the skies assistance lend,
Whilst on thy sails conspiring winds attend.

It was thus, the Prince of Orange landed in England without any opposition, the fifth of November, while the English were celebrating the memory of their deliverance from the powder-plot, about fourscore years before. This is one of the most remarkable æra's in the English history, and which probably will never be forgot by that nation.

The Prince marches to Exeter. Ibid.

The Prince's army marched from Torbay next day about noon, in very rainy weather and bad roads. The soldiers, before they landed, were ordered to bring three days bread with them, and they carried their tents themselves. But the officers, even the most considerable, were in a very uneasy situation, at their first incampment, being wet to the skin, and having neither clothes for change, nor bread, nor horses, nor servants, nor other bed than the earth all drenched with rain, their baggage being yet in the ships. Had this situation lasted two days more, the officers, as well principal as subaltern, would have been reduced to great extremities. But the Prince did all that was in his power to procure them refreshment. He ordered horses, carriages, and provisions from the neighboring country, and in this state pursued his march from Torbay to Exeter, which is about twenty miles.

The King orders his army to gather on Salisbury plain. Kennet, p. 527. Echard, Vol. III. p. 909.

As soon as his Majesty heard the Prince was landed, his first care was to order his army to rendezvous in some convenient place. He chose Salisbury plain, whither his army repaired from several parts, with all possible diligence. They who assert that he ought to have marched directly to Torbay at the head of his army, did not consider, that the thing was impracticable. The greatest part of his army was as yet disperse in different quarters. Part had marched to the North, and part to Portsmouth to secure that place, which was of great consequence. The Irish forces were still in and about Chester, and the Scots at Carlisle. The King, when he quited London, could not avoid leaving there a good body of troops, unless he would have hazarded the seeing that powerful city, where he was not beloved, declare for the enemy. But it is surprising, that the King, tho' he had two months notice of the Prince's intended invasion, had neglected to form a camp of twenty thousand men in the heart of the kingdom, to be in readiness to march against him, on the first news of his landing. This was a precaution taken by some of his predecessors on the like occasion, when they expected a deſcent without knowing in what place, and which might have ſerved him for an example. His negligence therefore ſeems inexcuſable, ſince, after the Prince's arrival at Torbay, he was obliged to loſe ſo much time in aſſembling his army of more than thirty thouſand men. Very probably, if his forces had been ready, and he had marched into the Weſt, the Prince would have been extremely imbaraſſed, who ſtayed ten days at Exeter, without any great increaſe of his army. Had he ſhown ſo much firmneſs as Richard III, on the like occaſion, he would doubtleſs have prevented the deſertion of numbers, who perhaps were not yet determined to abandon him, and only reſolved it, becauſe they ſaw in his conduct a conſternation, which to them ſeemed ominous. But this is mere conjecture.

The King ſhews ſome reſolution;

Nov. 17. Gazette, No. 2397. State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 59. Echard, Vol. III. p. 909.

However, the King having ſent a reinforcement to Portſmouth under the duke of Berwick, vainly amuſed himſelf with indeavoring to perſuade the people, that the Prince's forces were too contemptible to inſpire him with fear. He printed a liſt of all the regiments of the Prince's army, with the companies, troops, officers and ſoldiers belonging to each (1). But the Prince's declaration was more relied on than this liſt, wherein it was ſaid, he would not have come with ſo ſmall a number of troops, had a conqueſt of England been intended; from whence it was infered, that he was aſſured of aſſiſtance, which would in due time appear.

and will hear of no accommodation. Ibid. Kennet, p. 527.

The King, as being ſuperior in number of forces, affected to expreſs great confidence. The better to ſhow he was incapable of fear, on his being informed that the counties of Kent and York, and the city of London were preparing to addreſs him for an accommodation with the Prince of Orange, he publicly declared, "That he would look upon "all thoſe as his enemies, who ſhould pretend "to adviſe him to treat with the invader of his "kingdoms." At the ſame time, he publiſhed a declaration, indeavoring to demonſtrate, that the Prince's ſecret deſign was to uſurp the crown. But for ſuch a declaration, to have any effect, it muſt have come from a Prince eſteemed innocent, and unjuſtly attacked. But the people were far from this belief. They rather looked on the King as intending to ſubvert their religion and liberty, and on the Prince of Orange, as the nation's deliverer.

The Prince of Orange meets with but ſmall incouragement at Exeter. Nov. 9. Echard, Vol. III. p. 910. Burnet. *Dr. Lamplugh.

Mean time, the Prince, now at Exeter, found not at firſt the incouragement he expected. The biſhop, * on the firſt news of his landing, poſted to court, where he was rewarded with the archbiſhopric of York, which had been kept long vacant, with intention, as it was thought, to confer it on father Petre, the King's confeſſor. The ſunday after the Prince's arrival at Exeter, dr. Burnet mounting the pulpit to read his declaration, all the canons and part of the congregation left the church, not to be preſent at the reading. On the other hand, few came to offer their ſervice to the Prince, and the levy of three regiments of foot, for which he had granted commiſſions (2), advanced but ſlowly. Not but that in general the people of the country were inclined to the Prince, and wiſhed well to his undertaking. But the memory of the ſeverities againſt the duke of Monmouth's adherents, was yet ſo recent, that every one feared to ingage in a like enterprize, the ſucceſs whereof was uncertain. In fine, the Prince remained nine days at Exeter, without being joined by any perſon of diſtinction. It is even pretended, that in a council of war held at Exeter, he ſuffered it to be propoſed to him to reimbark for Holland. But on the tenth day, ſome of the principal gentlemen of the country joined him. Among theſe was ſir Edward Seymour, by whoſe advice an aſſociation was drawn, and ſigned by all perſons then with the Prince, or who afterwards repaired to him. It was likewiſe ſent to ſeveral other parts of the kingdom, and ſigned by great numbers. It was as follows:

The Prince marches to Saliſbury.

The face of the Prince of Orange's affairs, who left Exeter to march to Saliſbury, was from this time intirely changed. Every day brought him perſons diſtinguiſhed by their birth, eſtates, or imployments. The lord Colcheſter, ſon to earl Rivers, a lieutenant in the life-guards, waited upon the Prince, accompanied by mr. Wharton, colonel Godfrey, John Howe, eſq; four life-guard men, and about threeſcore men more on horſeback. Theſe were followed by the earl of Abington, captain Clarges, mr. Ruſſel, and others. But what was more material, the lord Cornbury, ſon to the earl of Clarendon, colonel of dragoons, leaving Saliſbury, under pretenſe of an order from the King, to beat up one of the enemies advanced poſts * carried with him his own regiment, and thoſe of horſe of Berwick, St. Albans, and Fenwick, and with the major part of them, went over to the Prince at Exeter.

drew up a petition, which was ſigned at the biſhop of Rocheſter's houſe at Weſtminſter. The intent of it was, to pray the King to call a free parliament, and find ſome expedient to ſatisfy the Prince of Orange. The petition being delivered, and afterwards printed by the lords for their own vindication, this anſwer was returned from the King, which was alſo publiſhed, "My Lords, What you "aſk of me, I moſt paſſionately deſire; and I pro- "miſe upon the faith of a King, that I will have "a parliament, and ſuch an one as you aſk for, "as ſoon as ever the Prince of Orange has quited "this realm: for how is it poſſible a parliament "ſhould be free in all its circumſtances, as you "petition for, while an enemy is in the king- "dom, and can make a return of near a hundred "voices?" This anſwer was not ſatisfactory to the lords, who plainly ſaw, that the King was far from deſiring a free parliament, nor would have any but of which he could be maſter.

He is afraid of being delivered up to the Prince of Orange. Echard, Vol. III. p. 915.

Tho' the King ſtill put on a face of aſſurance, the deſertions in his army gave him great anxiety. He knew not what to reſolve, fearing of ſome conſpiracy among the officers to deliver him to the Prince of Orange, if he ſhould put himſelf at the head of the army. This was the reaſon of his ſtoping the march of his forces, artillery, and his own equipage. But in a council, held on this occaſion, it was judged neceſſary for him to be as ſoon as poſſible with his army, in order to keep thoſe firm to their duty who were yet unreſolved. He therefore departed the ſeventeenth of November, after having recommended the care of the city to the lord mayor, and in a ſpeech to the officers about him, renewed his promiſe of calling a parliament as ſoon as the Prince of Orange had quited the kingdom. He told them, "If they deſired any "thing more, he was ready to grant it; but that "if, after all, any of them was deſirous to go "over to the Prince of Orange, he was willing to "grant them paſſes, and ſpare them the ſhame of "deſerting their lawful Sovereign." But at the very time he ſeemed diſpoſed to give a general ſatisfaction, he left, at Whitehall, a council compoſed of five lords, all odious to the people, except the lord Godolphin. The other four were, the chancellor Jefferies, the lords Arundel and Bellaſis, both known Papiſts; and the lord Preſton, ſuſpected of favoring Popery. It is ſaid, the King deſigned to leave there alſo his confeſſor father Petre, but the jeſuit choſe rather to retire to France.

Prepares to meet the Prince. Kennet, p. 529.

Arrives at Saliſbury,

The King arrived the nineteenth of November at Saliſbury, where the officers of his army, who were moſt devoted to him, paid him their compliments, and expreſſed an abhorrence of lord Cornbury's defection. At his arrival he was ſeized with a bleeding at the noſe, which increaſed the next day, as he was going to view part of his army, quartered eight miles from Saliſbury. On the ſame, or the following day, moſt of the chief officers applied themſelves to the earl of Feverſham their general, deſiring him to aſſure the King, "That upon any "occaſion they ſhould be ready to ſpill the laſt "drop of their blood in his ſervice; but yet they "could not in conſcience fight againſt a Prince, "who was come over with no other deſign, than to "procure the calling of a free parliament, for the "ſecuring of their religion and liberties." This declaration, at which the King was extremely ſurpriſed, ſhowed him, that his army, which had always been his principal refuge, could not be relied on. The earl of Feverſham, ſtrongly ſuſpecting the lord Churchill (afterwards duke of Marlborough) one of the King's favorites, lieutenant general, captain of a troop of his life-guards, and gentlemen of his bed chamber, was very earneſt with the King to have him ſecured. But the King, whether he had no ſuch ſuſpicion, or feared it would occaſion a mutiny, would not follow his advice. However, the very next day the lord Churchill went over to the Prince of Orange, accompanied by the duke of Grafton, colonel Berkley, four or five captains of his own regiment, and ſome other officers. Father Orleans inſinuates, that he had formed a deſign to deliver the King to the Prince of Orange, which was prevented by his Majeſty's bleeding at the noſe, at the time he intended to go and view his troops at Warminſter, the moſt advanced poſt of his army. But this accuſation is groundleſs, and intirely deſtroyed by the reſpectful letter writen by that lord to the King, and which I therefore think proper to inſert here.

This letter is a clear evidence, that nothing was farther from the lord Churchill's thoughts, than to deliver the King to the Prince of Orange.

The King returns to London. Hiſt. of Deſert. Kennet.

The lord Churchill's defection quite ſunk the King's ſpirits, who from this time ſaw not on whom he could rely. So, no longer daring to venture his perſon with his army, he left Saliſbury, and returned to London with a precipitation like a flight. Before his departure, he publiſhes a proclamation, "Pro- "miſing a free and abſolute pardon to all his ſub- "jects, who had taken up arms, and joined with "the Prince of Orange, provided they quited and "deſerted him within the ſpace of twenty days." But this proclamation had no effect. In his return, he met with a greater mortification, in the defection of the Prince of Denmark his ſon-in-law, who leaving him at Andover, went off to the Prince of Orange, with the duke of Ormond, ſir George Hewet, and others. That Prince wrote a very reſpectful letter to the King, in vindication of his conduct, wherein he grounds his defection chiefly on his concern for the Proteſtant religion, which his Majeſty had openly attempted to deſtroy, not only in England, but all Europe, by his ſtrict union with France.

The Prince comes to Sherburn. Kennet, p. 530.

Mean while, the Prince of Orange having left Exeter, was advanced to Sherburn, from whence it was in his power to march to Saliſbury or Briſtol, according to the reſolutions taken by the King. The King had an army ſo ſuperior to that of the Prince in number, that had he marched directly to the Prince, and attacked him, he would, doubtleſs, have very much diſtreſſed him. It is not probable, the Prince would have ventured a battle; but on the King's advancing, would poſſibly have retired to Briſtol, in expectation of a more general defection in the King's army. Such a defection was juſtly expected, according to all the advices of thoſe who joined him. Wherefore, it is very unlikely that he would have riſked an advantage, of which he was almoſt aſſured, by a battle, the ſucceſs whereof would have been dubious. I remember a report then in the Prince's army, that the marſhal de Schomberg being told, the King was advancing to give battle, the marſhal coldly anſwered, "If we "think proper." But upon hearing that the King was returned to London, and his army retired to Reading, the Prince marched to Saliſbury, and made a public entry into that city, admidſt the acclamations of the people. During his march, there was a ſmall ſkirmiſh between two parties of the armies, in which that of the Prince, tho' very inferior in number, defended themſelves with ſo much bravery, that the enemy had no reaſon to boaſt of the advantage, the loſs being almoſt equal on both ſides (1).

and to Saliſbury.

The King mortified with a ſucceſſion of ill news. Echard, Vol. III. p. 918, 920.

The deſertion of the principal officers was not the only cauſe of the King's mortal fears. Scarce a day paſſed, but what brought him ſome diſagreeable news from different parts of the kingdom. The earl of Bath had made himſelf maſter of Plymouth, where the Dutch fleet lay ſecure. The earl of Shrewſbury, and ſir John Guiſe had, with the aſſiſtance of the inhabitants, forced the duke of Beaufort to ſurrender the important city of Briſtol. The earl of Devonſhire, at the head of a great number of Derbyſhire gentlemen, had declared for a free parliament, agreeably to the Prince's declaration. The earl of Danby had ſecured York, and having diſarmed and turned out all the Papiſts (who, under the protection of the duke of Newcaſtle, ſtood up for the King) declared for a free parliament. The town of Berwick ſoon followed the example of York, and the gentlemen of Nottinghamſhire had done the ſame. Colonel Copley, deputy governor of Hull, ſurprized that town, and made the lord Langdale, the Popiſh governor, priſoner. The duke of Somerſet and the earl of Oxford, came to offer their ſervice to the Prince of Orange. The duke of Ormond entered Oxford without reſiſtance, and cauſed the Prince's declaration to be read there. In fine, the King heard, that five commiſſioners from Scotland, among whom were the duke of Queenſborough, and the lord of Belcarris, were coming to London, to demand a free parliament in that kingdom. But the King's greateſt affliction was, to ſee himſelf forſaken by his own daughter, the Princeſs of Denmark, who had privately withdrawn from Whitehall, being attended by the biſhop of London, mounted and armed, and retired to Nottingham, from whence ſhe was conducted to the Prince her huſband at Oxford. Some days before it was reported, that the Queen had treated her very rudely, and proceeded ſo far as to ſtrike her. This ſo incenſed the people, that as ſoon as they found that ſhe appeared not at Whitehall, they offered to tear all the Romiſh party in pieces, upon a ſurmiſe of her being murdered, or confined; but on the news of her being in ſafety they were appeaſed. At her going off, ſhe wrote the following letter to the Queen.

The Princeſs of Denmark's letter to the Queen. Kennet, p. 531. Echard.

"Madam, I beg your pardon, if I am ſo deeply "afflicted with the ſurprizing news of the Prince's "being gone, as not to be able to ſee you, but to "leave this paper to expreſs my humble duty to the "King and yourſelf; and to let you know that I "am gone to abſent myſelf, to avoid the King's diſ"pleaſure, which I am not able to bear, either againſt "the Prince or myſelf; and I ſhall ſtay at ſo great "a diſtance, as not to return before I hear the happy news of a reconcilement. And as I am con"fident the Prince did not leave the King with any "other deſign, than to uſe all poſſible means for "his preſervation; ſo I hope, you will do me "the juſtice to believe, that I am not capable of "following him for any other end. Never was "any one in ſuch an unhappy condition, ſo di"vided between duty and affection to a father and "and a huſband; therefore I know not what to "do, but to follow one to preſerve the other. I "ſee the general falling-off of the nobility and gen"try, who avow to have no other end, than to "prevail with the King to ſecure their religion, "which they ſaw ſo much in danger, by the vio"lent counſels of the prieſts; who to promote their "own religion, did not care to what danger they "expoſed the King. I am fully perſuaded, that "the Prince of Orange deſigns the King's ſafety "and preſervation, and hope all things may be "compoſed without more bloodſhed, by calling of "a parliament. God grant a happy end to theſe "troubles, that the King's reign may be proſpe"rous, and that I may ſhortly meet you in per"fect peace and ſafety: Till when, let me beg you "to continue the ſame favorable opinion that you "hitherto had of, Your, &c.

King James abuſed by his counſellors.

From what has been ſaid it appears, that the defection was almoſt univerſal, and not confined to the court and the army. It is inconceivable, that the King ſhould not have foreſeen it, or ſhould have ſo ill an opinion of the Engliſh, as to think, they would quietly ſuffer their laws and religion to be deſtroyed: that he ſhould imagine, the giving a man a commiſſion in his army, and obliging him to take the oath of allegiance, ſhould free him from, or at leaſt make him forget his duty to God and his country. But it muſt be remembered, what the Princeſs of Denmark inſinuated to the Queen, that the King's counſellors cared not to what danger they expoſed him. In making him the inſtrument to execute their deſigns, they no farther regarded his perſon, than as it ſerved to eſtabliſh their religion, in which they could not ſucceed without rendering him abſolute, and James imprudently fell into the ſnare. Herein may be obſerved, the difference between Charles II, and James II. The firſt was always ſenſible, that the zealous promoters of abſolute power intended his grandeur, only as a means to accompliſh other projects. Wherefore, when he ſaw himſelf ingaged in very dangerous courſes, he forſook them as well as he could, and left his counſellors, his miniſters, and even his own brother in the danger. This was his frequent practiſe, and he thereby bequeathed to the duke his brother, the difficulty and peril of a contrary method. But James II, in purſuing a directly oppoſite courſe to that of Charles, gave himſelf up intirely to the counſels of thoſe, who, to attain their own ends, regarded not to what danger they expoſed him, by their violent proceedings.

The different character of Charles II, and James II.

However

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

The King in great difficulties. Kennet, p. 529.

However this may be, the King, at the time I am ſpeaking of, was plunged in a gulph of difficulties, without perceiving any way to eſcape. The Queen was diſmayed, and her conſternation inexpreſſible. Father Petre was retired into France, under the protection of the lord Waldgrave, ſent thither in the room of Skelton. The violent counſels of Jefferies were now unſeaſonable. The Popiſh counſellors ſeeing all their meaſures broken, took care to ſhelter themſelves from the impending ſtorm, to which they left the King expoſed. In fine, mr. Barillon the French embaſſador, and monſieur de Lauſun, then in London, vented themſelves in fruitleſs reproaches on the King, for refuſing the aſſiſtance offered by France, without directing him how to repair that error. In this extreme diſtreſs (more eaſy to be imagined than deſcribed) his ſole refuge was to turn to the Proteſtant peers, whoſe counſels he had before rejected, whom he had deprived of their imyloyments, and, in a word, treated as enemies. He therefore aſſembled all the peers, ſpiritual and temporal, that were in London. The number indeed was but ſmall, there being many with the Prince of Orange, or in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, for his ſervice. When they were met, he prayed for their advice concerning the preſent emergencies. On this occaſion, he had the mortification to hear a long enumeration of all his unwarrantable proceedings, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, and particularly his violent meaſures to deſtroy the Proteſtant religion, and ſubvert the liberties of England. Theſe, it was ſaid, had occaſioned the dangerous ſymptoms that now appeared in the body-politic, and for which there was no other remedy than a free parliament. The neceſſity therefore was repreſented to his Majeſty, 1. Of granting a general pardon to all thoſe who either came over with the Prince of Orange, or had joined him ſince his landing. 2. Of deputing ſome lords to his Highneſs, to treat with him about a ſuſpenſion of arms, and to indeavor to bring matters to an accommodation. And laſtly, of turning all Papiſts immediately out of their imployments, to convince the world, that his Majeſty acted with ſincerity.

The King declares he will call a free parliament. Kennet, p. 531.

His Majeſty took that night to conſider of the advice, and next day declared in council, that he was reſolved to call a free parliament, that ſhould meet the fifteenth of January next inſuing. Accordingly, the chancellor was ordered to iſſue out the writs. Then he publiſhed a proclamation in which he declared, that all his ſubjects ſhould have free liberty to elect, and all the peers, and ſuch as ſhould be elected members of the houſe of commons, ſhould have full liberty and freedom to ſerve and ſit in parliament, notwithſtanding they had taken up arms, or commited any act of hoſtility, or been any way aiding or aſſiſting therein. He likewiſe declared in council his intention of ſending commiſſioners to treat with the Prince of Orange: but as to that part of the advice relating to the Roman Catholics, his Majeſty only ſaid, "He would leave "that matter to be debated in parliament." However, ſir Edward Hales, a Papiſt and lieutenant of the Tower, having been obnoxious to the city of London, by threatening to bombard it, was diſplaced, and colonel Skelton put in his room.

A proclamation for that purpoſe. Nov. 30. Gazette, No. 2406. Nov. 26.

Commiſſioners ſent to treat with the Prince of Orange.

The commiſſioners nominated by the King to treat with the Prince of Orange, were the marquis of Halifax, the earl of Nottingham, and the lord Godolphin. They left London the ſecond of December, and on their way met with paſſes from the Prince.

At the ſame time appeared a printed paper at London, and other places, called, "The Third "Declaration of the Prince of Orange," dated the twenty-eighth of November. It was penned by a private, and ſtill unknown hand, who had the boldneſs to put the Prince's name to it, and diſperſe it thro' the kingdom (1). Among other things he made the Prince ſay, That as he would offer no violence to any but in his own neceſſary defenſe, ſo he would not ſuffer any injury to be done to the perſon, even of any Papiſt, provided he was found in ſuch place, and condition, and circumſtance, as the law required. But he declared, that all Papiſts who ſhould be found in open arms, or in any office civil or military, contrary to the known laws of the land, ſhould be treated by him and his forces, not as gentlemen and ſoldiers, but as robbers, free-booters, and banditti; ſo ſhould all perſons found any ways aiding or aſſiſting to them: That whereas he was certainly informed, that great numbers of armed Papiſts had of late reſorted to London and Weſtminſter, and parts adjacent, not ſo much, he had reaſon to ſuſpect, for their own ſecurity, as out of a wicked deſign to make ſome deſperate attempt upon the ſaid cities and their inhabitants, he therefore required all magiſtrates and officers, civil and military, to diſarm and ſecure them, that all power of doing miſchief might be taken from them: that thoſe magiſtrates, or others who ſhould refuſe to aſſiſt him, to execute vigorouſly what he required of them, ſhould be eſteemed the moſt criminal and infamous of all men; betrayers of their religion, laws, and country, of whom he would require the life of every ſingle Proteſtant that ſhould periſh, and every houſe that ſhould be burned or deſtroyed, by their treachery and cowardice.

JAMES II. AN' 1688.

A falſe declaration publiſhed in the name of the Prince of Orange. State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 84. Echard, p. 922.

This declaration, publiſhed in the Prince's name, though it was diſowned by him, finiſhed the confuſion of the Papiſts; and the more, as ſeveral juſtices of peace cauſed it to be publiſhed, not imagining that any private man would have had the boldneſs to undertake ſuch a thing. From this time the Popiſh party were reduced ſo low, that they durſt not hold up their heads. An hue-and-cry after father Petre, was publicly cried and ſold in the ſtreets, notwithſtanding he was a privy-counſellor. A legal accuſation againſt the earl of Saliſbury, "for infringing the moſt ſacred laws of "the kingdom by turning Papiſt" was prefered to the grand jury of Middleſex, who found the bill.

The Popiſh party ſinks intirely. Id. p. 925. Kennet, p. 532.

The ſixth of December the three commiſſioners, by an expreſs, acquainted the King, "That they "were to meet the Prince of Orange that night at "Ameſbury." But the next day they informed his Majeſty, "That his Highneſs had made a new "appointment to meet them at Hungerford, and "had ſent to them the earls of Clarendon and Ox-"ford, to deſire them to make their propoſals in "writing." This meſſage ſurpriſed the King, chiefly becauſe the Prince had deputed the earl of Oxford, who had never been concerned in any public affair, and the earl of Clarendon was mortal enemy of the marquis of Halifax. He infered from thence, the Prince's unwillingneſs to come to any accommodation. For this reaſon, Barillon and Lauſun earneſtly preſſed the King, to ſecure him ſelf, the Queen, and the Prince of Wales, by a timely receſs from the nation: but he was willing ſtill to wait for the ſucceſs of the negociation with the Prince of Orange.

The King's propoſitions to the Prince. State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 86. Kennet, p. 534. Echard, Vol. III. p. 926.

The ſubſtance of the propoſals delivered by the King's commiſſioners to the Prince were, "That "the King obſerving that all the cauſes of com-"plaint, alleged by his Highneſs, ſeemed to be "refered to a free parliament, he had iſſued his writs

" writs for calling one (1). That he had ſent commiſſioners to his Highneſs for adjuſting all matters relating to the freedom of election, and ſecurity of the parliament; and, in order to that, propoſed, that the reſpective armies might be kept at ſuch a diſtance from London."

The Prince, who was then marching towards London, returned no anſwer to theſe propoſals; but, next day, with the advice of the lords and gentlemen aſſembled with him, he put the following propoſitions into the hands of the King's commiſſioners.

The Prince's propoſals.

" I. That all Papiſts, and all ſuch perſons as are not qualified by law, be diſarmed, diſbanded, and removed from all imployments, civil and military.

" II. That all proclamations that reflect upon us be recalled; and that if any perſons, for having aſſiſted us, have been commited, that they be forthwith ſet at liberty.

" III. That for the ſecurity and ſafety of the city of London, the cuſtody and government of the Tower, be immediately put into the hands of the city.

" IV. That if his Majeſty ſhall think fit to be in London, during the ſiting of the parliament, that we may be there alſo, with equal number of guards: and if his Majeſty ſhall pleaſe to be in any place from London, whatever diſtance he thinks fit, that we may be at a place of the ſame diſtance; and that the reſpective armies be from London thirty miles; and that no further forces be brought into the kingdom.

" V. That for the ſecurity of the city of London, and their trade, Tilbury fort be put into the hands of the ſaid city.

" VI. That a ſufficient part of the public revenue be aſſigned to us, for the ſupport and maintenance of our troops, until the ſiting of a free parliament.

" VII. That to prevent the landing of the French, or other foreign troops, Portſmouth may be put into ſuch hands, as by his Majeſty and us ſhall be agreed on."

Their moderation owned by the King. State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 87. Echard, Vol III. p. 924.

Theſe propoſals were ſo reaſonable, that the King himſelf could not help owning, " They were " better than he expected." Indeed, the Prince of Orange ever adhered to his declaration, in which he only demanded intire freedom for the parliament, and a ſufficient ſecurity for the city of London, without ſtipulating any other advantage for himſelf than the maintenance of his army, till the ſiting of the parliament, that is, for about ſix weeks. As the King could no longer hope to execute his firſt deſigns, it ſeems, that nothing could be more advantageous to him in his preſent ſituation, deſerted by all, and not knowing which way to turn, than to be freed from his difficulties, by reſtoring things to their ancient and natural ſtate. Had he diſcovered a willingneſs to imbrace theſe propoſals, probably, the parliament would have aſked no more of him, than the eſtabliſhment of their religion and laws, ſo as not to be eaſily ſhaken, and he might have kept his crown, tho' perhaps with ſome diminution of the rights claimed by himſelf, his brother, father, and grandfather. This cannot be ſaid to be a hard condition, conſidering how he had governed, and the preſent ſituation of his affairs. He even ſeemed at firſt diſpoſed to except theſe propoſals, and refer to the next parliament the deciſion of all differences, ſince that very day he called an extraordinary council of all the lords who were in town. As it was plain, he would be adviſed to accept the propoſals by all the lords, it could ſcarcely be doubted, that he had ſuch an intention, and only called the council for form ſake. It is not known what paſſed in it, but only that the ſame council was ordered to meet next morning, to give their farther advice upon the exigency of affairs. Before the council broke up, the King, addreſſing himſelf to the duke of Bedford ſaid, " My lord, you are a good man, and have a great " influence: you can do much for me at this time." To which the duke replied, " I am an old man, " and can do but little;" then added with a deep ſigh, " I had once a ſon, who could now have " been ſerviceable to your Majeſty." This was meaned of the lord Ruſſel, beheaded in the late reign, who was ſacrificed to the vengeance of the King, then duke of York. The King was ſtruck dumb with this anſwer, ſo that he could make no reply.

Who calls an extraordinary council. Echard, Vol. III. p. 927.

Every thing ſeemed to promiſe an accommodation, and it was not doubted, but the dext day ſome reſolution would be taken for the peace and ſecurity of the kingdom. But that ſame night, the King, as 'tis ſuppoſed, conſulted with ſome of his Popiſh counſellors, whoſe intereſted advice overthrew all theſe flattering expectations. Theſe counſellors eaſily perceived, what they were to expect from a free parliament. It was manifeſt, nothing could free the King from his preſent difficulties, but the delivering up the Popiſh religion to the reſentments of the Proteſtants, and the paſſing ſuch acts as would hinder its being ever eſtabliſhed in England. They therefore thought it more advangeous to their religion, that the King ſhould preſerve all his pretenſions, though unable to ſupport them, than ſacrifice them to the parliament. To that end, they adviſed him to withdraw into France. They repreſented, how diſhonorable it would be to retract what he had done, how prejudicial to the Catholic religion, to be forced to give his aſſent to ſuch acts of parliament as would tend only to render its eſtabliſhment impracticable. That the Catholics would be intirely deſtitute of any reſource, whereas, by preſerving his rights, he might hope to be reſtored by the arms of France, and finiſh the work ſo gloriouſly begun. In a word, by this intereſted counſel, they clearly diſcovered, if the King had been willing or able to perceive it, that not his perſon, but their religion was the ſole object of their concern. In ſhort, to give more weight to their reaſons, they inſtilled into the Queen ſuch apprehenſions, as made her uſe all her influence with the King, to ingage him to do as he was adviſed. They told her, the parliament would be far from being favorable to the King and herſelf: that being both ſuſpected, and even openly accuſed in the Prince of Orange's declaration, of impoſing an heir on the crown, it was very apparent, the parliament, to favor the Prince of Orange, would declare the Prince of Wales ſuppoſititious: that perhaps ſhe herſelf would be accuſed of the fact, ſince it was not ſcrupled to impeach the Queen, her mother-in-law, of matters much leſs important: that a ſhort exile with a powerful and generous Prince, who was able to reſtore them, was preferable to living in their own kingdom, with only the ſhadow of Sovereignty, in diſhonor, indigence, and in dependence on thoſe whom they ought to command. Theſe conſiderations, ſupported, as is pretended, by Barillon and Lauſun, made ſuch an impreſſion on the Queen, that ſhe reſolved to retire into France with the Prince of Wales, after a poſitive promiſe from the King, that he would follow her with all convenient ſpeed.

in diſguiſe croſſed the Thames to Lambeth in an open boat, expoſed to wind and rain. At Lambeth, under the walls of a church, ſhe waited till a coach could be got ready in the next inn. From thence ſhe went to Graveſend, where ſhe with the Prince of Wales imbarked on a ſmall veſſel, which conveyed them ſafely to Calais; whence ſhe went to Verſailles, where ſhe was received by the King of France with great marks of affection, which was ſome alleviation to her melancholy condition.

His Majeſty being fully determined to follow the Queen, waited but one day to put his deſign in execution. The night between the tenth and eleventh of December, in a plain ſuit, and a bob wig, he took water at Whitehall, accompanied only by ſir Edward Hales, mr. Sheldon, and Abbadie a Frenchman, page of the back-ſtairs, without acquainting any other with his intention. If the manner in which this Monarch deſigned to leave his dominions is impartially conſidered, it will ſcarcely be denied, that this was an intire deſertion of them, and puting of his ſubjects into the ſtate in which nature dictates to men, to provide for their own ſecurity. Firſt, he fled without being purſued, and without any cauſe to fear, either for his life or liberty: ſo that it is evident, his conſcience ſuggeſted evils to him which were never intended. Secondly, he fled without any proviſion for the government of the kingdom. From this conduct it was afterwards infered, that he abandoned his ſubjects in a perfect Anarchy, and thereby authorized them to chuſe what form of government they pleaſed, or to elect another King. Thirdly, by his flight he violated the promiſe ſo ſolemnly made in his proclamation of calling a parliament. Fourthly, before he went off, he wrote to the earl of Feverſham to diſband the army, without any care of their pay, probably, on purpoſe to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom, by the diſcontents of the officers and ſoldiers. Fifthly, he ordered all the writs to be burned, that were not ſent out, for electing the parliament, imagining, doubtleſs, that after his departure, it would not be poſſible to aſſemble a parliament, which by the laws could only be called by the King. Sixthly, when he took water, he threw the great-ſeal into the Thames, that nothing might be legally done in his abſenſe. If this may not be called a real deſertion of his kingdom, it will be difficult to find a name for ſuch proceedings.

As ſoon as the King's flight was known, a general conſternation inſued, moſt people being ignorant how they were to behave on ſo extraordinary an occaſion. However, about thirty ſpiritual and temporal lords met at Guild-hall, and ſent for the lord mayor and aldermen. After a ſhort conſultation, it was reſolved, to adhere to the Prince of Orange, and ſend deputies to him, with this reſolution ſigned by the whole aſſembly. Then they ſent for colonel Skelton, lieutenant of the Tower, of whom they demanded the keys, which he willingly reſigning, they were given to the lord Lucas. An inſurrection of the mob. Echard, Vol. III. p. 932.

Tho', on the King's flight, the militia of London and Weſtminſter were immediately up in arms, they could not prevent the mob from aſſembling and commiting ſome diſorders. They chiefly confined their rage to the maſs-houſes erected by the King in the city and ſuburbs, which they demoliſhed intirely, and made bonfires with the materials. And as there were alſo chapels in the houſes of embaſſadors, thoſe of the Spaniſh and Florentine were rifled, before a ſtop could be put to the diſorder. In the firſt of theſe chapels the principal court Papiſts had conveyed all their valuable effects, and this probably was the chief cauſe of the pillage. The houſes of the other embaſſadors were preſerved, by the great care of ſome lords. The two miniſters of Spain and Florence were afterwards largely recompenſed for their loſſes (2).

Chancellor Jefferies ſeized and ill uſed by the rabble. Dec. 12. Ibid. Kennet. p. 535. Sent to the Tower.

During theſe irruptions of the mob, chancellor Jefferies, diſguiſed in a ſeaman's habit, in order to eſcape in a veſſel freighted for Hamburgh, was diſcovered (3) as he was looking out of the window of the houſe where he had concealed himſelf. He was immediately ſeized by the populace, and, after many indignities offered him, carried before the lord mayor, who declined medling with him. But the chancellor, ſeeing himſelf in the hands of an inraged multitude, who threatened to tear him in pieces, deſired that he might be ſent to the Tower, which at length was granted him, not as a favor, but in hopes of ſeeing him ſhortly conducted from thence to the gallows. It is pretended, he offered to diſcover many ſecrets, and for that reaſon, was kept ſome time in priſon, till the affairs of the government ſhould be ſetled. But in that interval he died, by the blows he had received, according to ſome; by drinking ſpiritous liquors, according to others; and as ſome pretend, of the ſtone. Never man had better deſerved a public puniſhment, as an atonement for all the miſchiefs done to his country, and for all the blood ſpilled by his means.

The earl of Feverſham diſbands his army. Kennet, p. 534. Echard, Vol. III. p. 933.

Mean while, the earl of Feverſham, after having communicated the King's letter to the principal officers, diſmiſſed the army, and gave notice of it by a trumpet to the Prince of Orange, who returned no anſwer. By this it was believed, the Prince did not approve of his conduct: and indeed it ſeems that, in ſuch a juncture, if he was unwilling to pay ſo much deference to the Prince, as to communicate to him the order before it was executed, he ſhould not have done it, at leaſt without the advice of the lords aſſembled at London, who, in the preſent ſtate of the kingdom, had a right to interpoſe in the government. Accordingly, his conduct was greatly blamed; and this fault was the more taken notice of, as it occaſioned an alarm which threw city and country into the utmoſt conſternation. Some Iriſh ſoldiers of the diſbanded troops, finding themſelves moneyleſs, and incapable of ſubſiſting in a country where they were ſo generally hated, reſolved to keep themſelves from ſtarving by forcibly entring a country houſe. Whereupon a man of the neighborhood runs directly to London, crying, as he paſſed, "That the Iriſh were "up, and marching to London, firing of houſes, "and puting man, woman and child to the ſword." The news immediately flew thro' the city, and cauſed a ſtrange pannic fear. This report, as it went along, ſo gathered, that the terror increaſed. All night the city was in alarm, expecting every moment the arrival of the Iriſh. Some prepared for flight, others ran to arms, not a window in London and Weſtminſter but what was illuminated. From London the conſternation ſpread thro' the whole kingdom, ſo that in the remote parts, where people had more time to conſider what was to be done, a reſolution was taken, in caſe the news ſhould prove true, of deſtroying all the Iriſh, and Papiſts in England. Happily this terror vaniſhed in London as ſoon as the real cauſe of it was known.

In the interim, the Prince of Orange being advanced as far as Henley, and fearing the diſorders which might be commited by a diſbanded army, publiſhed a ſhort declaration, requiring all colonels to call together the ſeveral officers and ſoldiers of their reſpective regiments, in ſuch places as they ſhould think convenient, and there to keep them in good order and diſcipline, till farther orders. This declaration was followed by another of the lords aſſembled at London, to the ſame effect, with an additional promiſe of ſubſiſtence, till they ſhould be otherwiſe provided for, to all officers and ſoldiers who ſhould obey, and deliver up their arms to perſons appointed to receive them. Beſide this, all magiſtrates were required to apprehend, and ſeize, all ſuch ſoldiers as ſhould not repair to their reſpective bodies, and to deal with them as vagabonds.

The Prince of Orange re-aſſembles the King's army. Dec. 13. Kennet, p. 535. Echard, Vol. III. p. 934. The lords purſue the ſame deſign.

All theſe things were tranſacted, in the belief, that the King had left the nation; and indeed he was gone from Whitehall with that intention. He was got as far as a little place near Feverſham, and had even imbarked in a ſmall veſſel that was to carry him to a frigate, ready to tranſport him to France. This veſſel not being able to ſail immediately, by reaſon of a tempeſtuous wind, ſir Edward Hales, one of the King's attendants, ſent his footman to the poſt-office at Feverſham. His livery was known by a man, who told ſome others that ſir Edward was not far off. The footman was followed to the river ſide, and ſeen to make ſigns to ſome people on board a bark; whereupon the fiſhermen, and other perſons of Feverſham, immediately boarded the veſſel where his Majeſty was. Sir Edward was ſoon known, and the King being taken for his chaplain, was ſomewhat indecently treated. Then, ſearching him, they found four hundred guineas, and ſeveral valuable ſeals and jewels, which they took from him. Among the people who crouded into the ſhip, there happened to be a conſtable who knew the King, and throwing himſelf at his feet, begged him to forgive the rudeneſs of the populace, and ordered reſtitution to be made of what had been taken from him. The King received the jewels and ſeals, but gave the four hundred guineas among them. After this, he deſired to be gone; but the people, by a ſort of violence conducted him to a public inn in the town. Here he ſent for the earl of Winchelſea, lord lieutenant of the county, who prevailed with him not to leave the kingdom, but to return towards London.

The King arreſted and abuſed by the rabble at Feverſham. Kennet, p. 535. Burnet. p. 796.

This news being brought to London produced various effects. Some wiſhed the King had never been ſtoped, others were glad of an opportunity to convince him, there was never any ill deſign againſt his perſon. The lords and the magiſtrates of London, who had made ſuch advances towards the Prince of Orange, were confounded at their haſte, and were under ſome fear, in caſe the ſtate of affairs ſhould be altered. At length, the lords aſſembling, thought proper to appoint four of their body (1) to wait on the King, with an invitation to return to Whitehall, and with aſſurances of being received with all due reſpect; and coaches were immediately ſent to bring him. At the ſame time, an expreſs was ſent to the Prince of Orange, to acquaint him that the King was ſtill in the nation. The Prince, who was advanced as far as Windſor, was not a little ſurprized at the news. He was marching to London to ſetle with the lords, by whom he was expected, the affairs of the nation, in the ſuppoſition, that the King had abandoned it. But his Majeſty's return threw the Prince into great perplexity, and of courſe obliged him to take other meaſures. Nevertheleſs, as the King had no army, and by his haſty flight, had intirely forfeited the confidence of all his friends, and the eſteem of his enemies, as he was not in a condition to command, but in ſome meaſure depended upon others, the Prince diſpatched monſieur Zuyleſtein to him, to deſire him to remain at Rocheſter, till it could be agreed what was to be done. But Zuyleſtein miſſing his way, the King came to London the ſixteenth of December, about four in the afternoon, where he was received with acclamations as if he had been returning from victory.

Returns to London. Kennet, p. 536 Echard, Vol. III. p. 935. Burnet, p. 799.

The King being reſtored to his palace, and in ſome manner to his deſerted Royalty, diſcovered an inclination to reſume his old meaſures, and ſtill brave the Proteſtants. In all appearance, the acclamations as he paſſed thro' London, had revived his courage, and put him in hopes of a general declaration in his favor. The firſt thing he did was to publiſh an order of council, wherein he ſaid, that being given to underſtand, that diverſe outrages had been commited in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, by burning, pulling down, and defacing of houſes, he commanded all lord lieutenants, &c. to prevent ſuch outrages for the future, and ſuppreſs all riotous aſſemblies. This was his laſt public act, which crowned ſo many others done in his reign, in favor of the Papiſts. Moreover, he diſcharged Leiburn a Popiſh biſhop, who had been ſent to Newgate, and, during his ſhort ſtay at Whitehall, was ſurrounded, as formerly, with Prieſts, Jeſuits, and Iriſhmen.

His laſt act of Royalty. Kennet, p. 536. Echard, Vol. III. p. 935, 936.

The King, in his journey to London, diſpatched the earl of Feverſham, with a letter to the Prince, "Kindly to invite him to the palace at St. James's, "with what number of guards and troops he "ſhould think convenient to bring along with "him, that they might amicably and perſonally "confer together about the means of redreſſing "the public grievances." The Prince returned no anſwer: but the moment the earl of Feverſham was out of his preſenſe, monſieur Bentinck demanded his ſword, and told him, he had orders to ſecure him. This doubtleſs was owing to his precipitate diſbanding the army. Some indeed have thought it only a pretenſe to remove him from the King's perſon, being ſuſpected of giving him ill advice, or, perhaps, becauſe he was too much devoted to him, tho' he ever profeſſed the Proteſtant religion.

The earl of Feverſham ſent by the King to the Prince, is arreſted. State-Tracts. Vol. I. p. 92. Kennet, p. 536. Echard, Vol. III. p. 936.

In a council held by the Prince, and the Engliſh lords who were with him, it was reſolved, "That "the royal palace at Whitehall being ſtill crouded "with Iriſh Papiſts, Prieſts and Jeſuits, his High-"neſs could not with eaſe and ſafety remain at "St. James's, where he muſt neceſſarily go the "next day, without his Majeſty and his Popiſh "guards were removed within a reaſonable diſtance "from London." Moreover, an accident happened two days before, which provoked thoſe who were concerned for the Prince's life. The duke of Grafton marching thro' the Strand at the head of a regiment, to take Tilbury fort out of the hands of the Iriſh, an Iriſh officer riding up to him, fired a piſtol at him; for which he was ſhot dead upon the ſpot. Much more might ſuch an ateempt be apprehended againſt the Prince, from ſome of the King's guards. In the debate, it was propoſed to ſend the King priſoner to Breda: but the Prince of Orange rejected the propoſal with indignation, proteſting that he could not conſent to put him under any reſtraint. At length, ſince the Prince's preſenſe at London was abſolutely neceſſary, it was agreed, that the King ſhould be deſired to remove to Ham, a houſe belonging to the ducheſs of Lauderdale. It appears from hence, that the King's approbation was no longer conſidered as abſolutely neceſſary to ſetle the affairs of the kingdom. And indeed, it ſeems, that ſince he would have abandoned all, he had no right to pretend to any thing. Agreeably to this reſolution, the Prince of Orange ſigned an order, directed to the marquis of Halliſax, the earl of Shrewſbury, and the lord Delamere, to acquaint the King with it, and to tell him, he ſhould be attended by his guards, to preſerve him from any diſturbances.

Three lords ſent by the Prince to the King. Dec. 17.

Immediately after, the Prince ordered the regiment of his guards, conſiſting of three batalions, to march and take poſſeſſion of all the poſts about Whitehall and St. James's, either by perſuaſions or force. The King being informed of it, ſent for count Solms who commanded theſe guards, and deſired him, "If it could be, to let him have his own "guard at Whitehall, only for that night; but "the count alleging his order, to relieve all the "poſts, the King anſwered, do your office." At ten o'clock at night, the Dutch blue guards entered St. James's houſe, and towards eleven, thoſe who were ordered to Whitehall, moved thro' the park, and with lighted match, and in order of battle, marched up to the King's guards. The captain of the guards ſcrupling to diſlodge, at laſt received the King's orders to retire. After this, the Dutch took poſſeſſion of the guard-houſe, and at the ſame time relieved all the poſts about Whitehall and the park, placing every where double centries. So that during the reſt of the night, the King was really in the power of the Prince of Orange. An hour after midnight, the three lords appointed by the Prince came to Whitehall, and ſent to awake the King for an audience. The King ordering them to come to his bed-ſide, they delivered the Prince's meſſage, which was to deſire his Majeſty's departure to Ham; to which the King conſented; but after they were withdrawn he ordered them to be recalled, and bid them tell the Prince, that he deſired rather to go to Rocheſter, according to the Prince's meſſage by Zuyleſtein, to which the Prince conſented that very night. His anſwer coming to the King at eight in the morning, the King about noon took a barge, attended by the earls of Aileſbury, Litchfield, Arran, and Dumbarton, ſix of the yeomen of his guard, and about a hundred of the Dutch guards, commanded by the lieutenant colonel of the regiment. About nine at night he arrived at Graveſend, where he found his own coaches, and ſome troops of the militia, by whom he was the the next day conducted to Rocheſter.

The King. deſired by the Prince to remove to Ham, makes choice of Rocheſter.

The Prince arrived at London the ſame day the King left Whitehall, and lodged at St. James's, where he received the compliments of the nobility, the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London. From this time it may be ſaid, the King was a mere cypher. He was not a priſoner, but had no power left of doing good or hurt; ſo that moſt of the lords who had any imployments at court, laid down the badges of their offices, as the ſtaff, the key, &c. as believing they had no longer any right to exerciſe the ſame.

The Prince of Orange arrives at St. James's. Dec. 18. Kennet, p. 537. Echard, Vol. III. p. 938.

During the rejoicings at London for the Prince's arrival, the mob again inſulted the Papiſts, embaſſadors not excepted. As there was properly no government, ſuch diſorders were almoſt unavoidable, no perſon daring to undertake reſtraining them. At length, the privy council ordered, that all foreignets ſhould be permited quietly to leave the kingdom. The Prince of Orange ſent particular paſſes to the Pope's nuncio, the envoys of Poland, Savoy, and Modena. The Popiſh lords, Langdale and Montgomery, were releaſed: but the earls of Peterborough and Saliſbury were kept in cuſtody, on account of impeachments againſt them. Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits, apprehended ſince the King's flight, were likewiſe detained.

James II. An' 1688.

Mean time, as it was abſolutely neceſſary to put an end to the preſent Anarchy, the Prince of Orange aſſembled the lords ſpiritual and temporal in London, to the number of above threeſcore, and made this ſhort ſpeech to them. "My lords, I have "deſired you to meet here, to adviſe the beſt "manner how to purſue the ends of my declara-"tion, in calling a free parliament, for the pre-"ſervation of the Proteſtant religion, the reſtor-"ing the rights and liberties of the kingdom, and "ſetling the ſame, that they may not be in danger "of being again ſubverted." On ſpeaking theſe words, he withdrew and left them to conſult together. His declaration was read, and the lords voted him their particular thanks. Then they reſolved to aſſemble every day in their old houſe at Weſtminſter, and named five of the moſt eminent lawyers (1) to aſſiſt them in the room of the judges, who were moſt of them abſent. It was farther propoſed, that the whole aſſembly ſhould ſign the aſſociation ſubſcribed by the nobility and gentry at Exeter. To this all agreed, except the duke of Somerſet, the earls of Pembroke and Nottingham, the lord Wharton, and all the biſhops but that of London. The objection of the biſhops was chiefly founded upon the unchriſtian word Revenge, which to ſatisfy them, was afterwards changed for that of Puniſhment.

The biſhops and ſome temporal lords refuſe to ſign the aſſociation. Echard.

The King, all this time, was at Rocheſter in a melancholy ſituation. He perceived his flight had done him an irreparable injury. The proceedings at London ſhowed, that he was no longer regarded as a King to be intruſted with the government, and it was not in his power to reſtore himſelf by arms. Nevertheleſs, ſome of his friends preſſed him to call a parliament, aſſuring him that ſince his misfortune there was a great turn in the minds of the city and army, and that compaſſion for him generally prevailed. But the very mentioning a free parliament made him tremble. For, beſide that his conſcience might reproach him and agravate his fear, he plainly ſaw, the leaſt which could befal him, would be, that the parliament would take effectual meaſures for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion, and that, during his whole life, he ſhould be ever diſtruſted. Probably it was the fear of paſſing the reſt of his days in ſo uncomfortable a ſtate, which determined him to withdraw into France. Indeed in taking that courſe, he might hope one day to be reſtored by the aſſiſtance of that crown: whereas by ſtaying in England, he ſaw no other advantage, than the injoyment of a Royalty, ſurrounded with troubles and mortifications, and in which he could not, without danger, attempt to recover his former authority. Whatever were his motives, the which can only be conjectured, on the twenty-third of December, about three in the morning, he privately withdrew, taking with him only the duke of Berwick his natural ſon, mr. Skelton, and Abbadie, and went on horſeback to a place near the river, where he imbarked on a ſmall frigate, which landed him ſafely at Ambleteuſe in France, from whence he repaired to St. Germains. It was eaſy to execute this deſign, no perſon about him having orders to ſtop or hinder him from diſpoſing of himſelf as he pleaſed. Very probably probably, the Prince of Orange received not leſs ſatisfaction from this ſecond, than he had from the firſt flight. The King's preſenſe in the nation could not but greatly imbaraſs him. Beſide his natural generoſity, he had promiſed the Princeſs that nothing ſhould be attempted againſt the life or liberty of her father: ſo, the King could not do a greater ſervice to the Prince, than voluntarily to retire out of the kingdom. And the more, as this afterwards furniſhed a pretenſe to ſay, he had abdicated the crown, which abdication paved the Prince's way to the throne. When the King quited Rocheſter, he left the following paper written with his own hand:

"The world cannot wonder at my withdrawing "myſelf now a ſecond time. I might have ex- "pected ſomewhat better uſage, after what I "wrote to the Prince of Orange, by my lord "Feverſham, and the inſtructions I gave him: "but inſtead of an anſwer, ſuch as I might have "hoped for, what was I to expect after the uſage I "received by making the ſaid earl a priſoner, againſt "the practiſe and law of nations? The ſending "his own guards at eleven at night, to take poſ- "ſeſſion of the poſts at Whitehall, without adver- "tiſing me in the leaſt manner of it: the ſending "to me at one of the clock at midnight, when I "was in bed, a kind of order by three lords, 'To "be gone out of my palace before twelve that ſame "morning?' After all this, how could I hope to "be ſafe, ſo long as I was in the power of one "who had not only done this to me, and invaded "my kingdoms, without any juſt occaſion given "for it; but that did, by his firſt declaration, "lay the greateſt aſperſions upon me that malice "could invent, in that clauſe of it which concerns "my ſon. I appeal to all that know me, nay, "even to himſelf, that in their conſciences neither "he, nor they, can believe me in the leaſt capable "of ſo unnatural a villainy, nor of ſo little com- "mon ſenſe, to be impoſed on in a thing of ſuch "a nature as that. What had I then to expect "from one, who, by all arts hath taken ſuch "pains to make me appear as black as hell to "my own people, as well as to all the world be- "ſide? What effect that hath had at home, all "mankind have ſeen by ſo general a defection in "my army, as well as in the nation, amongſt all "ſorts of people.

"I was born free, and deſire to continue ſo: "and tho' I ventured my life very frankly on ſe- "veral occaſions, for the good and honor of my "country, and am as free to do ſo again (and "which I hope I ſhall yet do as old as I am, to "redeem it from the ſlavery it is like to fall under) "yet I think it not convenient to expoſe myſelf "to be ſo ſecured, as not to be at liberty to effect "it; and for that reaſon to withdraw, but ſo as to "be within call whenever the nation's eyes ſhall be "opened, ſo as to ſee how they have been im- "poſed on by the ſpecious pretenſes of religion "and property. I hope it will pleaſe God to "touch their hearts, out of his infinite mercy, and "to make them ſenſible of the ill condition they "are in, and bring them to ſuch a temper, that "a legal parliament may be called; and that, James II. An' 1688. "among other things which may be neceſſary to "be done, they will agree to liberty of conſcience "to all Proteſtant diſſenters; and that thoſe of my "own perſuaſion may be ſo far conſidered, and "have ſuch a ſhare of it, as they may live peace- "ably and quietly, as Engliſhmen and Chriſtians "ought to do, and not be obliged to tranſplant "themſelves; which would be very grievous, "eſpecially to ſuch as love their own country. "And I appeal to all men, who are conſidering "men, and have had experience, whether any thing "can make this nation ſo great and flouriſhing, as "liberty of conſcience? Some of our neighbors "dread it. I could add much more, to confirm what "I have ſaid, but now is not the proper time."

This paper remained not unanſwered. As I have not been able to procure dr. Burnet's animadverſions upon it (1), I ſhall indeavor to ſupply the want with ſome obſervations.

The firſt is taken from mr. Echard, who very juſtly obſerves, "That tho' the King gave ſome "reaſons for his ſecond deſertion, he gave none at "all for his firſt." Now it was the firſt which chiefly demonſtrated, that he choſe rather to abandon his kingdoms, than be forced to reſtore religion and the laws. Vol. III. p. 941

2. The King ſuppoſed, that after the diſobliging manner in which he had been treated by the Prince of Orange, he had no room to believe himſelf ſafe. And yet he could not deny, that he had been in the power of the Prince, by whom his perſon was untouched. At the very time of his writing this paper, he was at full liberty to concert meaſures for his eſcape into France, and actually executed that deſign, without any oppoſition.

3. What he ſaid concerning the Prince of Wales, was founded upon the impoſſibility, that thoſe who knew him, ſhould believe him capable of ſo unnatural a villainy: but it was the very belief of his being privy to that unnatural villainy which fixed the imputation upon him.

4. He aſcribes the defection of his army, and the whole nation, to the artifices and calumnies of the Prince of Orange; whereas the whole hiſtory of his reign is a demonſtration, that it could only be imputed to his own conduct.

5. He ſuppoſed, that he withdrew himſelf, in order to come and redeem the nation from ſlavery: but this ſuppoſition has been deſtroyed by the event, there having been but very few in England, who really wiſhed his reſtoration.

6. He inſiſted, that liberty of conſcience was abſolutely neceſſary to render the Engliſh nation great and flouriſhing: but there was not perhaps a ſingle Engliſhman, who believed this was the end propoſed by the King, or that was not convinced, it was only a pretenſe to introduce his own, and to deſtroy the Proteſtant religion.

7. His ſaying, that ſome neighbors dreaded the nation's becoming too great, by the eſtabliſhment of liberty of conſcience, was only an inſinuation to make the people believe, that the Dutch had lent their ſhips and forces to the Prince of Orange for that very reaſon.

INTER-

The INTER-REGNUM.

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

The vacancy of the throne.

ON the King's departute, there was an Inter-regnum, but of ſuch a nature, as the like had never been known in England. It was not owing to the death, but to the flight of the Sovereign: ſo, at the ſame time, the nation was without a King, and without any one to repreſent him, or take care of the government; and yet there was a King, but a fugitive, and who pretended not to renounce his rights. In ſuch circumſtances, it is in vain to appeal to laws, cuſtoms, or precedents, ſince the difference between this ſtate, and that which laws and cuſtoms ſuppoſe, is evident.

The lords take upon themſelves the adminiſtration of the government. Echard, Vol. III. p. 943.

The lords were no ſooner informed of the King's departure, than they believed themſelves inveſted with a power to act in their own names, becauſe indeed, in ſuch a juncture, it could properly belong only to them, to take upon them the government. There was no parliament in being, and conſequently no houſe of commons to join with them. By the death or deſertion of the King, all public offices and imployments ceaſe, becauſe they come from him. There remains therefore no authority but in the peers, who are neareſt the throne, and conſequently, more authoriſed to take care of the government, till it can be ſetled by the body of the nation, by means of a parliament. The ſtate of the kingdom was ſuch, that there was no example of the like to ſerve for a precedent. The King had abandoned the nation, without being forced to it. He was in full liberty, and there did not appear any other motive of his flight than the fear of being obliged to call a free parliament, which, probably would not have approved of his late meaſures, but reſtored the conſtitution to its ancient ſtate. The Prince of Orange pretended not to have a right to govern; his pretenſions conſiſted only in procuring a free parliament. But this parliament muſt be called by ſome authority. And by what authority could a parliament meet, if the nation continued in Anarchy, where no perſon would have a right to meddle with the government? It was therefore the peers, who alone were intitled to take care of the ſtate, or elſe it muſt be ſaid, that becauſe the King was pleaſed to deſert the nation, without ſetling the government, the ſtate was to remain in Anarchy, till he ſhould think fit to reſume the care of it. Let the inconveniencies ariſing from the power aſſumed by the lords, be never ſo much urged, thoſe which Anarchy would have produced, were infinitely greater and more dangerous. Nay, who knows, whether one of the motives of the King's flight, was not to leave the nation in this ſtate of confuſion? However this be, the juncture was ſuch, that extraordinary proceedings could not be avoided.

And to call a Convention. Gazette, No. 2414. Kennet. Echard.

The firſt thing done by the peers, after conſulting together, was the addreſſing the Prince of Orange, "To take upon him the adminiſtration of public "affairs, both civil and military; the diſpoſal of "the public revenue; and the care of Ireland till the "meeting of the intended convention." The addreſs was dated the 25th of December. By a ſecond addreſs they deſired him, "To iſſue out miſſive "letters, ſubſcribed by himſelf, to the lords ſpiri-"tual and temporal being Proteſtants, and to the "ſeveral counties, cities, and boroughs, containing "directions for the chuſing, within ten days, ſuch "a number of perſons to repreſent them, as are of "right to be ſent to parliament." Theſe addreſſes were ſigned by about ninety lords, that were then preſent in the houſe. They were followed by an order from the ſame peers, to all Papiſts to depart the city of London, and ten miles from the ſame, and not to remove from their habitations above five miles; excepting the ſervants of the Queen-Dowager, the domeſtics of foreign miniſters, and all houſe-keepers in London, and ten miles from the ſame, who had been traders for three years laſt paſt, provided they gave in to the lord mayor, their names and places of abode, in eight days; and alſo ſuch Popiſh officers as ſhould give bail in ſix days, to appear the firſt day of the term, and to be on their good behavior in the mean time; but ſuch officers as ſhould neglect, were to be taken into cuſtody.

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

They iſſue out an order againſt Papiſts. Echard, Vol. III. p. 944.

A remark upon the word Convention.

The word Convention, to ſignify a parliament aſſembled without the cuſtomary formalities, was new in England, where it had been, as I think, but once uſed in that ſenſe, viz. after the reſtoration of King Charles II. This Prince finding, on his return into England, a parliament ſiting which had not been ſummoned by him, would not own it for a parliament, on account of the conſequences. But on the contrary, he would not deprive himſelf of the benefit of the reſolutions of this parliament, which had reſtored him to the throne of his anceſtors: ſo, to reconcile theſe two things together, he was willing to own it as a convention. Probably, the word was borrowed from what is practiſed in Scotland, where a difference is put between a convention of the ſtates, and a parliament. It was therefore this convention of the year 1660, that the lords had in view, when they addreſſed the Prince of Orange to call one. But as this was a ſingle precedent, and as the convention of the year 1660, had been firſt called under the name of a parliament, the Prince thought, that beſide the ſuffrages of the peers, it was proper to be authoriſed by others, which might paſs for thoſe of the people. He therefore publiſhed an order, "Deſir-"ing all ſuch perſons as had ſerved in any of the "parliaments during the reign of the late King "Charles II, to meet him at St. James's, upon "the twenty-ſixth of December, by ten of the "clock in the morning. He deſired likewiſe, "that the lord mayor and court of aldermen of "the city of London, and fifty of the common "council, would be there at the ſame time."

The Prince aſſembles ſeveral old members of parliament. Kennet, p. 558. Echard, Vol. III. p. 945, 946.

Agreeably to this order, about a hundred and ſixty members, the aldermen of London (the mayor being indiſpoſed) and the deputies of the common council, met at St. James's on the day appointed, where the Prince briefly told them, "That he had "deſired them to meet him there, to adviſe the "beſt manner how to purſue the ends of his decla-"ration, in calling a free parliament, for the pre-"ſervation of the Proteſtant religion, and the "reſtoring the rights and liberties of the king-"dom." They all repaired immediately to the commons houſe in Weſtminſter, where the firſt queſtion they debated, was, "What authority they "had to aſſemble?" Upon which it was ſoon agreed, that the requeſt of the Prince was a ſufficient warrant. The next queſtion was, "How "the Prince could take upon him the adminiſtra-"tion of affairs, without a diſtinguiſhing name "or title?" But as this queſtion tended to prolong the deliberations, and defeat the ends propoſed by the meeting, it was thought proper to wave ſuch queſtions in their future debates. An aſſociation was likewiſe propoſed to be ſigned, but every perſon was left at liberty to ſubſcribe it or not. After theſe previous debates, they reſolved to addreſs the Prince, to take upon him the adminiſtration of public affairs, until the meeting of the Convention, the twenty-ſecond day of January next. The anſwer returned by the Prince to this addreſs, and to that of the lords, was the ſame, that he would indeavor, as far as he was able, to ſecure the peace of the nation, according to their deſire.

During the King's ſtay at Rocheſter, Barillon, the French embaſſador, had been very active to promote diviſions among the peers, with a view to ſerve the King. Of this the Prince was not ignorant; but as he was not yet inveſted with any authority, he was obliged to ſuffer it, tho' he knew he had not a greater enemy in England than that embaſſador. But the moment he was intruſted with the government, he ſent an expreſs order to him to leave the kingdom within four and twenty hours. At the ſame time, he ſent St. Leger, a French refugee, to attend him to the ſhip. That gentleman could not forbear ſaying to the embaſſador as they were on the road, "Sir, had any one told you "a year ago, that a refugee ſhould be commiſ- "ſioned to ſee you out of England, would you "have believed it?" The embaſſador anſwered, "Sir, croſs over with me to Calais, and I will "give you an anſwer."

The French embaſſador ordered to leave the King.

On Sunday the thirtieth of December, the Prince of Orange went to the Royal chapel at St. James's, where he was preſent at Divine-ſervice, and a ſermon preached by dr. Lloyd, biſhop of St. Aſaph; after which he received the ſacrament from the hands of the biſhop of London. This public profeſſion of the eſtabliſhed faith, greatly contributed to diſpel the fears of thoſe, who dreaded his too zealous adherence to the Preſbyterian religion, in which he had been educated. But it muſt be obſerved, that tho' the difference between the Epiſcopal and Preſbyterian churches has occaſioned much noiſe, diſturbance, and enmity in England, yet, both then and now, very few foreign Proteſtants ſcruple to communicate with the church of England.

The Prince communicates in the church of England. Ibid. Kennet, p. 540.

Next day, the Prince publiſhed a proclamation, authoriſing all public officers, not being Papiſts, to act in their reſpective offices, till the meeting of the intended Convention, or other order to the contrary.

The ſame day he paid a viſit to the Queen-Dowager, who indirectly aſked him to releaſe her chamberlain the earl of Feverſham, which the Prince readily granted.

The Prince viſits the Queen-Dowager. Kennet.

Tho' in the hiſtory of the two laſt reigns I have ſaid but little of the affairs of Scotland, the reader however may have remarked, that this kingdom was intirely ſubjected to an arbitrary power, and withal, to Epiſcopacy, contrary to the general bent of the people. When the Prince of Orange's declaration for Scotland (the ſame in ſubſtance with that for England) appeared there, the Preſbyterians began to take courage, thoſe at the helm not daring to uſe any violence for fear of a general inſurrection, which would have been extremely prejudicial to the King's affairs at that juncture. Things remained in this ſituation, till the King's party began to retire into England. For tho' the Scotiſh biſhops had publiſhed an abhorrence of the Prince's expedition, it was by no means the ſentiments of the nation in general. Every one felt the weight of the yoke impoſed on them, and the Epiſcopalians themſelves had reaſon to fear, that under the pretenſe of humbling the Preſbyterians the King intended to deſtroy the Proteſtant religion. So far their caſe was the ſame with that of the Engliſh. And therefore the duke of Queenſborough, and ſome other Scotiſh gentlemen were come to London, to deſire a free parliament. Hence may be known what the Scots thought of their then condition. The lord chancellor, on the news of King James's withdrawing, immediately reſigned the great ſeal, and retired from Edinburgh. Upon which the populace of that city, inſulted and rifled, not only the Roman Catholics, but alſo thoſe who had appeared moſt devoted to the Epiſcopal party: ſo, the biſhops were forced to retire, to avoid the inſults of the Preſbyterians, who were now much ſuperior to their late perſecutors. On the other hand, ſeveral Scotiſh lords and gentlemen repaired to London, to obſerve the motions there, and to determine their conduct by that of the Engliſh.

The Prince of Orange, who could not viſit Scotland, aſſembled all the Scotiſh nobility and gentry then in London, who meeting at St. James's, to the number of thirty lords and fourſcore gentlemen, he aſked their advice, what was to be done for the ſecuring the Proteſtant religion, and reſtoring their laws and liberties, according to his declaration? After this ſhort ſpeech, the lords and gentlemen repaired to the council chamber at Whitehall, and chuſing duke Hamilton their preſident, conſulted together, what advice was moſt proper to be given to the Prince. This affair was in effect ſetled the firſt day. But on the morrow, they were interrupted by a propoſal from the earl of Arran, that the King ſhould be deſired to return, and call a free parliament. The tendency of this propoſal was eaſily ſeen, and therefore it was unanimouſly rejected. At length, it was agreed to preſent an addreſs to the Prince of Orange to deſire him to take upon him the adminiſtration of all affairs both civil and military, and to call a general meeting of the ſtates to be holden the fourteenth of the following March. This addreſs being preſented to the Prince, he deſired time to conſider of it, and two days after returned much the ſame anſwer as he had to the Engliſh.

Jan. 7. State Tracts, Vol. I. p. 102.

The proſpect from Ireland was not ſo pleaſing. The earl of Tyrconnel, a zealous Papiſt and intirely devoted to the King, was lord lieutenant, and ſupported by an army, which he had taken care to compoſe of Popiſh officers and ſoldiers. There was room therefore to fear, that the earl would not ſubmit to the reſolutions taken in England, and that it would be difficult to force him to obedience. Mean while, the Prince of Orange having received addreſſes not only from the Engliſh lords and commons concerning Ireland, but likewiſe from the Proteſtants of that kingdom, could not but indeavor to procure the happineſs of a nation which depended on England. It was therefore held neceſſary to ſummon the earl of Tyrconnel, by a letter, to ſubmit to the preſent adminiſtration in England. The delivery of this letter was commited to colonel Hamilton, who promiſed to ſecond it with his perſuaſions. But it was afterwards known, that he, with Tyrconnel, acted in direct oppoſition to it.

Affairs of Ireland. Echard, Vol. III. p. 948. Burnet, p. 805.

The Prince, and the lords, as I have ſaid, had ordered the forces diſbanded by the earl of Feverſham to re-aſſemble. When this was done, the Prince diſcharged the arrears of the Engliſh army, with two hundred thouſand pounds advanced in four days by the city of London, ſixty thouſand of which was lent by ſir Samuel Daſhwood. After this, he ordered a reform of eight new raiſed regiments, beſide the troop of life guards, commanded by the lord Dover, who were all Papiſts. Then, ſeveral colonels and other officers having reſigned their commiſſions on account of the new oath exacted of them, he filled their places with Proteſtants, and in a word, took all poſſible care to put the army under ſuch a regulation, as might render it ſerviceable to the ſtate.

length he ſent a compliment to the Prince, and, with ſeven or eight biſhops more, ſigned the aſſociation, after ſome words were ſoftened in it, that gave them uneaſineſs.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury ſigns the aſſociation.

About the ſame time, ninety Diſſenting miniſters attended the Prince, and aſſured him of their fervent prayers for the preſervation of his perſon, and the ſucceſs of his indeavors for the defenſe and propagation of the Proteſtant intereſt. The Prince returned a favorable anſwer, tho' expreſſed in general terms, inſinuating, that it would not be his fault, if they were not made eaſy.

Mean while, the elections for the members of the convention proceeded with all imaginable freedom. The electors gave their votes according to their own inclinations, without any ſollicitations from the Prince, or his friends. Moreover, the Prince had ordered the ſoldiers to remove at a certain diſtance from the places of election, to take away all pretenſe of compulſion.

During this interval, the Prince conſidering, that the convention was to ſettle the government, thought it proper to ſend for his Princeſs; ſince if, as it was probable, the convention ſhould declare the throne vacant, no perſon had a juſter pretenſion to it than ſhe. 'Tis alſo probable, he thought he had himſelf room to aſpire to it, by his late great ſervice to the Engliſh. But a ſevere froſt retarded her departure from Holland longer than he expected.

The convention met the twenty-ſecond of January in two houſes, as a parliament. The peers choſe the marquis of Hallifax* for their ſpeaker, and the commons, mr. Henry Powle. In each houſe was read the following letter from the Prince of Orange, on the occaſion of their meeting:

The convention meets. Id. p. 955. Kennet, p. 541.

* George Savile.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Prince of Orange's letter to the convention.

"I HAVE indeavored, to the utmoſt of my "power, to perform what was deſired from me, "in order to the public peace and ſafety; and I do "not know that any thing hath been omited which "might tend to the preſervation of them, ſince "the adminiſtration of affairs was put into my "hands. It now lieth upon you to lay the foun"dation of a firm ſecurity for your religion, your "laws and your liberties. I do not doubt, but "that by ſuch a full and free repreſentative of "the nation, as is now met, the ends of my de"claration wil be attained: and ſince it hath "pleaſed God hitherto to bleſs my good intentions "with ſo great ſucceſs, I truſt in him, that he "will compleat his own work, by ſending a ſpirit "of peace and union to influence your counſels, "that no interruption may be given to a happy "and laſting ſetlement.

"The dangerous condition of the Proteſtants "in Ireland, requiring a large and ſpeedy ſuccor, "and the preſent ſtate of things abroad, oblige "me to tell you, that next to the danger of un"ſeaſonable diviſions among ourſelves, nothing can "be ſo fatal as too great delay in your conſultations. "The States, by whom I have been inabled to "reſcue this nation, may ſuddenly feel the ill "effects of it, both by being too long deprived of "the ſervice of their troops, which are now here, "and of your early aſſiſtance againſt a powerful "enemy, who hath declared a war againſt them. "And as England is by treaty already ingaged to "help them upon ſuch exigencies, ſo I am con"fident, that their chearful concurrence to pre"ſerve this kingdom with ſo much hazard to "themſelves, will meet with all the returns of "friendſhip and aſſiſtance, which may be expected "from you, as Proteſtants and Engliſhmen, when"ever their condition will require it.

Given at St. James's the twenty-ſecond day of January, 1688-9.

After the reading of this letter, both houſes preſented an addreſs to the Prince, in which they acknowleged him, under God, the deliverer of the nation: they approved likewiſe of all that he had done ſince he had been intruſted with the adminiſtration, which they prayed him to continue till farther application ſhould be made to him by them, which ſhould be done with all convenient ſpeed. They promiſed alſo to diſpatch the matters recommended to them by his letter. The Prince in his anſwer accepted the offers made him by the two houſes, and ſtrongly preſſed them to a conſideration of the affairs of Europe.

The Prince addreſſed by the two houſes. Kennet, p. 541. Echard, Vol. III. p. 956. State Tracts, Vol. I. p. 104.

The firſt thing done by the two houſes, after their addreſs of thanks to the Prince, was to appoint a day of public thankſgiving to God, for the happy deliverance of the nation. As, on theſe occaſions, prayers ſuited to the day are always compoſed by the biſhops, they had an order to inſert a particular prayer for the Prince of Orange.

A thankſgiving appointed. Jan 31. Ibid. Echard.

Mean time, King James, perceiving the prejudice his flight would do him, indeavored to prevent it, by a letter directed to the lords, and others of his privy council. He repeated the reaſons contained in the writing left on his table at his departure from Rocheſter, and declared his intention to return to England for the holding a free parliament. He reproached the Prince of Orange with artifices to hinder his holding ſuch a parliament, and required their advice, "what was fit to be done by him "towards his returning." Tho' this letter was immediately printed and diſperſed, it was little regarded. Even the perſons to whom it was addreſſed, judged it not proper to return an anſwer, at a time the convention was ſiting. James therefore ſent a letter of the ſame tenor to both houſes of the convention, adding, a promiſe, on the word of a King, of a pardon even to thoſe that betrayed him (ſome few excepted) and a reſolution by an act of oblivion, to cover all faults. But both houſes returning the letters unopened, the King's friends complained of it, as of a great hardſhip.

and to the two houſes of convention.

Rejected.

The houſe of commons defered their ſiting till the twenty-eight of January, to give time to the reſt of their members to come up to town. That day, mr. Dolben, ſon to the late archbiſhop of York, made a long ſpeech to prove the vacancy of the throne, by the King's deſerting the kingdom. Upon this aroſe a debate, which held four or five hours, and ended with this memorable vote:

Kennet, p. 542. Echard, Vol. III. p. 959.

"That King James the ſecond, having in"deavored to ſubvert the conſtitution of the "kingdom, by breaking the original contract be"tween King and people; and, by the advice of "Jeſuits and other wicked perſons, having vio"lated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn him"ſelf out of the kingdom, hath ABDICATED the "government, and that the throne is thereby be"come vacant."

Votes of the commons.

Next day, the commons farther voted, "That "it hath been found by experience to be inconſiſtent "with this Proteſtant kingdom, to be governed "by a Popiſh Prince."

Another. Echard, Vol. III. p. 960.

They likewiſe preſented an addreſs to the Prince of Orange, for the ſtoping all ſhips that were going to France. Two days after, they voted, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to the clergy of the church of England, who had refuſed to read in the churches the King's declaration for toleration; and alſo to the officers and ſoldiers, for having testified their ready adherence to the Proteſtant religion; and to all ſuch as had appeared in arms for the defenſe of the ſame. All theſe votes were ſent up to the lords for their concurrence.

Great debates in the houſe of lords. Kennet, p. 543. Echard, Vol. III. p. 960. Burnet, p. 809, 813.

But matters were not carried on with that unanimity in the houſe of lords. There were ſeveral parties, who cauſed every queſtion to be nicely examined. It was on the twenty-ninth of January, that the lords began to conſider the vote of the commons, concerning the vacancy of the throne. The firſt motion was, "Not to agree with the "commons that the throne was vacant, but only "to ſuppoſe it for the preſent, leaving it to be far-"ther examined afterwards, in order to cut ſhort "ſeveral other queſtions, by determining this firſt, "'Whether the throne being vacant, it ought "to be filled up with a Regent or a King"?'

A regency is propoſed;

The * earl of Nottingham, who was at the head of the party for a Regent made a long ſpeech, alleging ſeveral arguments for a Regency, taken from the Engliſh and other hiſtories. He inſiſted particularly on what had very lately paſſed in Portugal, where, Alphonſo VI being depoſed, his brother don Pedro had only the title of Regent of the kingdom confered on him. But the marquis of Halifax and the earl of Darby demonſtrated, on the other ſide, the inſuperable difficulties attending the adminiſtration of the government under a Regent. At length, after a very long debate; the queſtion being put to the vote, fifty-one were for a King, and forty-nine only for a regency (1). Thirteen biſhops were among the laſt, and but two among the firſt, viz. dr. Compton biſhop of London, and ſir Jonathan Trelawney biſhop of Briſtol. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was abſent.

Remark on the Church of England.

If the principles advanced by the church of England in the reign of Charles II, and the doctrine of paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance ſo ſtrenuouſly maintained, and publicly preached, be remembered, it will not be thought very ſtrange, that the biſhops ſhould refuſe to vote for depoſing King James, and ſeting another King on the throne. This was directly contrary to the maxims they had not long ſince approved, and from which they did not think proper to depart intirely. The truth is, by maintaining theſe extravagant principles, without admitting any limitations, at a time when they thought only of oppoſing the principles of the Republicans, they had thrown themſelves into a very dangerous ſtrait, of which they were not ſenſible, till they ſaw the Proteſtant religion expoſed to the danger attending theſe maxims. They perceived then, it was abſolutely neceſſary to limit the Regal authority, and were themſelves the firſt to do it, by openly refuſing to read the declaration for liberty of conſcience. Herein they acted directly contrary to the principle of paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance, maintained before with ſuch ardor by the church of England. This the King reproached them with, when he told them; He did not expect to meet with reſiſtance from the church: ſo, after eſtabliſhing, as an eſſential doctrine of the church of England, that the Royal power is by divine right, and that the King can never be diſobeyed without ſin, they ſhowed by their own practiſe, that it muſt be received with this reſtriction, "When the King in-"joins things according to law. But in caſe his "commands are contrary to law, he not only may, "but even ought to be reſiſted." A doctrine which would never have been conteſted, had it been thus explained at firſt. When I ſay the biſhops, I mean the church of England in general.

It is therefore certain, that when the queſtion was to be decided, Whether (on ſuppoſition of the vacancy of the throne) it ſhould be filled with a King or a Regent? the church of England was ſatisfied that James II had violated the laws, and no longer deſerved to be truſted with the government of the kingdom. This was the general opinion. The only point was to know, whether the title of King ſhould be left him, and a Regent appointed to govern in his room? or, whether another King ſhould be ſet on the throne? It is eaſy to ſee the little difference between a King actually depoſed, whoſe throne is filled by another, and a fugitive King from whom no more orders are to be received, and whoſe authority is exerciſed by a Regent not of his own chuſing. But, beſide the particular view ſome lords might have, of rendering the reſtoration of King James leſs difficult, by leaving him the title of King, the biſhops found a conſiderable advantage in a Regency. For by that they did not ſwerve ſo far from the principle they had before preached, and cauſed to be preached, that the Regal power is jure divino. Indeed when religion was in extreme danger, they had not thought fit to inſiſt upon this principle. They had not only ſuffered and approved the Prince of Orange's coming to the relief of their religion, but moreover, ſome had invited him into England: but the ſtorm being over, the King a fugitive, the Catholic party ſuppreſſed, and all fear vaniſhed, they believed they ought not intirely to depart from their principles. If for their own ſafety, they were willing the kingdom ſhould be governed not by King James but by a Regent, they could not, on the other hand, reſolve openly to recede from what they had maintained, that the Regal power is jure divino, and the King's character indelible.

The queſtion, whether there be an original contract? Kennet, p. 544. Echard, Vol. III. p. 961. Burnet, p. 811, 815.

On the morrow, January thirty, this queſtion was put in the houſe of lords, "Whether or no there "was an original contract between the King and "people?" This queſtion was warmly debated, ſeveral maintaining, that ſuch a contract was only a chimera. Others rejecting the general aſſertions urged by the firſt, and the inſtances brought from the practiſe of other countries, confined themſelves to the particular conſtitution of the Engliſh government. They indeavored to ſhow, that it muſt have been by virtue of ſuch a contract, that the parliament were poſſeſſed jointly with the King, of the legiſlative power; otherwiſe, the right of the parliament, in their opinion, could be founded only upon cuſtom, which was not ſufficient to balance the King's pretended divine right: whence it would follow, that the King, in virtue of his divine right, might aboliſh this cuſtom, and render himſelf abſolute. But that the prevention of ſuch a misfortune was the occaſion of their preſent meeting. The queſtion being put to the vote, fifty-three were for the original contract, and forty-ſix only againſt it.

It paſſes in the affirmative.

Debate about the word Abdicated.

Next day, they took into conſideration the word Abdicated, and entered into a grammatical diſpute, to know whether the word could be underſtood only of a voluntary abdication, without any mixture of compulſion, and it was concluded, that the word Deserted was more proper. They next examined the word Vacant, and put this queſtion, "Whether King James, having broke that "original contract between him and his people, "and deſerted the government, the throne was "thereby vacant?" The debates on this queſtion were longer, and more warm than any of the former. In ſhort, the party who maintained it was a law maxim, That "the King never dies," and conſequently that the throne can never be vacant, carried the negative of the queſtion by eleven voices. But on the morrow, forty lords entered their proteſtations againſt the vote. As the lords vote was founded upon the crown's devolving, on the King's demiſe, immediately to the next heir, without any vacancy, ſome of the other party moved, that, ſuppoſing King James to be dead in law, the Prince and Princeſs of Orange ſhould be declared King and Queen. But this was alſo, by five voices, carried in the negative.

Motion to ſet the Prince and Princeſs of Orange on the throne rejected. Echard, Vol. III. p. 962.

If theſe ſeveral reſolutions be conſidered, and compared together, the lords will doubtleſs ſeem to have rendered it impoſſible to ſetle the government any way. In the firſt place, the firſt vote by which the Regency was rejected, was founded on the ſuppoſition of the throne's being vacant, and yet by the laſt vote it was carried, that the throne was not vacant. Secondly, it appeared, that they were not for King James. It was agreed, he had broke the original contract, and deſerted the government, and yet it was decided, that the throne was not vacant. Thirdly, in voting that the throne was not vacant, becauſe the King never dies, and the Regal authority devolves, after the King's natural or civil death, to the next heir, they refuſed to acknowlege the Princeſs of Orange for Queen. There remained therefore but one expedient, viz, to recognize for King the Prince of Wales, who was conveyed into France; a Prince that, by moſt of the Engliſh, was believed ſuppoſititious, and beſide would probably be educated in the Romiſh religion. But the commons had voted, and the lords concurred afterwards to the vote, that it was inconſiſtent with a Proteſtant kingdom, to be governed by a Popiſh King. The ſeveral reſolutions of the lords on the queſtions propoſed, ſeem therefore to tend ſolely to render the ſetling of the government impracticable. This, no doubt, was the aim of ſome among them, that the difficulties might not poſſibly be ſurmounted, but by recalling King James. Many were ſatisfied of this, and therefore a petition was drawn up to be preſented to the lords, deſiring, in plain terms, that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange might be ſetled on the throne. Care was taken to get this petition ſigned by all ſorts of people, that by the great number of ſubſcribers it might paſs for the ſenſe of the nation. But the Prince of Orange, not liking this way of proceeding, ſent the lord mayor orders, to put a ſtop to this tumultuous project, which was accordingly done.

Remarks on theſe votes.

A petition to the lords drawn up in London. Id. p. 962.

Suppreſſed by the Prince of Orange.

The ſecond of February, the lords ſent a meſſage, to acquaint the commons with two amendments they had made to their vote of the twenty-eighth of January. The firſt was, inſtead of the word ABDICATED, they would have DESERTED be put in. The ſecond, that the words, "and "that the throne is thereby become vacant," ſhould be left out. The commons, not pleaſed with theſe two amendments, appointed a commitee to draw up reaſons why they muſt inſiſt on their vote, and deſired a conference with the lords upon that ſubject. This conference produced no effect, each houſe perſiſting in their opinion. Only the earl of Nottingham intimated from the lords, that they inſiſted upon the amendments, not to favor King James, but ſolely to maintain hereditary right, in the fear that the election of a King might deſtroy that right. But the commons perſiſting ſtill in their opinion, by a ſuperiority of two hundred and eighty two, againſt one hundred and fifty one, appointed twenty-four of their moſt able members to manage on this extraordinary occaſion at a free conference, for which the lords named on their part, the earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, Rocheſter, Pembroke, with the biſhop of Ely, and ſome others.

The lords ſend down the vote with two amendments.

Conference upon the occaſion. Feb. 4. Debates about the Abdication, p. 4—9.

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

As this conference between the two houſes is the moſt remarkable ever known in England, as well for the importance of the thing itſelf, as for the ability of the managers, I ſhall inſert it at large, and take the liberty to add ſome remarks, for the illuſtration of the ſpeeches made on this occaſion.

Mr. Hampden, who opened the conference, ſaid, My lords,——"The word ABDICATED, the "commons conceive, is of a larger ſignification "than the word your lordſhips are pleaſed to uſe, "DESERTED; but not too large to be applied to "all the recitals in the begining of the commons "vote, to which they meant it ſhould be applied. "Nor ought it to be reſtrained to a voluntary expreſs reſignation, only in word or writing; "overt-acts there are, that will be ſignificant "enough to amount to it. My lords, That the "common law of England is not acquainted with "the word, it is from the modeſty of our law, "that it is not willing to ſuppoſe there ſhould be "any unfortunate occaſion of making uſe of it.

"Your lordſhips next amendment is, that your "lordſhips have left out the laſt words in the commons vote, 'and that the throne is thereby "vacant." My lords, The commons conceive it "a true propoſition, and that the throne is vacant; "and they think they make it appear, that this "is no new phraſe; neither is it a phraſe that perhaps ſome of the old records may be ſtrangers "to, or not well acquainted with: but they think "it not chargeable with conſequences that your "lordſhips have been pleaſed to draw from it, "'That it will make the crown of England become elective.' If the throne had been full, we "know your lordſhips would have aſſigned that, as "a reaſon of your diſagreement, by telling us who "filled it; and it would be known by ſome public "Royal act, which might notify to the people, in "whom the Kingly government reſided; neither "of which hath been done, and yet your lordſhips "will not allow the throne to be vacant."——

Mr. Sommers (1) ſaid,——"If it be an objection that the word Abdicated hath not a "known ſenſe in the common law of England, "there is the ſame objection againſt the word Deſerted: ſo that your lordſhips firſt reaſon hath "the ſame force againſt your own amendment, as "it hath againſt the term uſed by the commons. "The words are both latin words, and uſed in the "beſt authors, and both of a known ſignification; "their meaning is very well underſtood; tho' it be "true, their meaning be not the ſame: the word "Abdicate doth naturally and properly ſignify, "'intirely to renounce, throw off, diſown, relinquiſh any thing or perſon, ſo as to have no farther "to do with it; and that whether it be done by "expreſs words, or in writing (which is the ſenſe "your lordſhips put upon it, and which is properly "reſignation or ceſſion;) or 'by doing ſuch acts "as are inconſiſtent with the holding, or retaining "of the thing;' which the commons take to be "the preſent caſe, and therefore made choice of "the word Abdicate, as that which they thought "did, above all others, moſt properly expreſs that "meaning: and in this latter ſenſe it is taken by "others." [Here, to ſhew that it was the true ſignification of the word, he urged the authorities of Grotius, Calvin, Briſonius, Budæus, and Praleius.] "But the word, Deſerted, hath not only a "very doubtful ſignification, but, in common ac-"ceptance, both of the civil and common law,

" doth ſignify only a 'bare withdrawing; a tempo" rary quiting a thing; a neglect only which leaveth
" the party at liberty of returning to it again."
[For this he quoted Spigelius and Bartolus, adding,]
" Hence it appears, that that is called Deſertion,
" which is temporary and relievable: that is " called Dereliction, where there is no power or " right to return. So in the civil law, the word
" Deſert is uſed to ſignify, ſoldiers leaving their " colors. And in the canon law to Deſert a bene-
" fice, ſignifies no more than to be Non-reſident.
" In both caſes, the party hath not only a right of " returning, but is bound to return again: which,
" my lords, as the commons do not take to be the " preſent caſe, ſo they cannot think that your lord-
" ſhips do; becauſe it is expreſly ſaid in one of your
" reaſons given in defenſe of the laſt amendment,
" 'That your lordſhips have been, and are willing,
" to ſecure the nation againſt the return of King
" James;' which your lordſhips would not, in juſ-
" tice do, if you did look upon it as no more than
" a negligent withdrawing, which leaveth a liberty
" to the party to return. For which reaſons, my " lords, the commons cannot agree to the firſt
" amendment, to inſert the word Deſerted inſtead
" of Abdicated; becauſe it doth not in any ſort
" come up to their ſenſe of the thing: ſo they do
" apprehend it doth not reach your lordſhips mean" ing, as it is expreſſed in your reaſons; whereas
" they look upon the word Abdicated, to expreſs
" properly what is to be infered from that part of " the vote, to which your lordſhips have agreed,
" 'That King James the ſecond, by going about
" to ſubvert the conſtitution, and by breaking the " original contract between King and people, and
" by violating the fundamental laws, and by with" drawing himſelf out of the kingdom,' hath " thereby renounced to be a King, according to " the conſtitution, by avowing to govern by a
" deſpotic power, unknown to the conſtitution,
" and inconſiſtent with it; he hath renounced to
" be King according to the law, ſuch a King as he " ſwore to be at the coronation, ſuch a King to " whom the allegiance of an Engliſh ſubject is
" due; and hath ſet up another kind of dominion,
" which is to all intents an Abdication, or aban" doning of his legal title, as fully as if it had " been done by expreſs words (1).

Remark (1). It is eaſy to perceive, that theſe two ſpeeches of mr. Hampden and mr. Sommers refer to what was objected by the lords in a former conference againſt the word Abdicated, and the " vacancy of throne." I thought proper to omit that firſt conference, becauſe moſt of the things therein alleged, are repeated in this. However, it may be ſeen here, by the commons anſwers, what the lords objections were.

Mr. ſerjeant Holt added,—" For that part of " your lordſhips objection, 'That it is not a word
" known to the common law of England,' that " cannot prevail; for your lordſhips very well know
" we have very few words in our tongue, that are
" of equal antiquity with the common law; your " lordſhips know the language of England is " altered greatly in the ſeveral ſucceſſions of time,
" and the intermixture of other nations; and if we
" ſhould be obliged to make uſe only of words
" then known and in uſe, what we ſhould deliver
" in ſuch a dialect, would be very difficult to be " underſtood.

" Your lordſhips ſecond reaſon for your firſt
" amendment, in changing the word Abdicated for
" the word Deſerted, is, 'becauſe in the common
" acceptation of the civil law, Adbication is a vo" luntary expreſs act of renunciation.' That is the " general acceptation of the word, and I think the " commons do ſo uſe the word in this caſe, becauſe
" it hath that ſignification: but I do not know whe" ther your lordſhips mean a voluntary expreſs act
" or formal deed of renunciation: if you do ſo, I
" confeſs I know of none in this caſe: but my lords,
" both in the common law of England, and in the " civil law, and in common underſtanding, there
" are expreſs acts of renunciation that are not by " deed; for if your lordſhips pleaſe to obſerve,
" the government and magiſtracy is under a truſt,
" and any acting contrary to that truſt, is a re-
" nouncing of the truſt, tho' it be not a re-
" nouncing by formal deed: for it is a plain decla" ration by act and deed, tho' not in writing, that
" he who hath the truſt, acting contrary, is a diſ-
" claimer of the truſt; eſpecially, my lords, if
" the actings be ſuch as are inconſiſtent with, and " ſubverſive of this truſt; for how can a man in " reaſon or ſenſe, expreſs a greater renunciation of " a truſt, than by the conſtant declarations of his " actions to be quite contrary to that truſt?"

Interreg. An' 1688.

Then the earl of Nottingham ſpoke on the ſide of the lords, and ſaid, —— " The main reaſon of " the change of the word Deſerted, is upon the " account of the conſequence drawn in the con-
" cluſion of your vote, 'That the throne is there-
" by vacant:' that is, what the commons mean
" by that expreſſion, whether you mean it is ſo
" vacant as to null the ſucceſſion in the hereditary " line, and ſo all the heirs to be cut off, which " we ſay will make the crown elective? And it " may be fit for us to ſetle that matter firſt, and " when we know what the conſequence of the " throne being vacant means in the vote as you
" underſtand it, I believe we ſhould much better
" be able to ſetle the difference about the two
" words". (2.)

Rem. (2.) It does not appear that the commons had any thoughts of making the crown elective. This was a conſequence aſcribed to them by the lords, to have an occaſion to contradict the vacancy of the throne.

To this it was replied by ſerjeant Maynard, "My " lords, when there is a preſent defect of one to
" exerciſe the adminiſtration of the government,
" I do conceive, the declaring a vacancy, and
" proviſion of a ſupply for it, can never make
" the crown elective. The commons apprehend
" there is ſuch a defect now; and by conſequence
" a preſent neceſſity for the ſupply of the govern" ment, and that will be next for your lord-
" ſhips conſideration, and theirs afterwards. If " the attempting the utter deſtruction of the ſub-
" ject, and ſubverſion of the conſtitution, be not " as much an Abdication as the attempting of a
" father to cut his ſon's throat, I know not what is.
" My lords, the conſtitution, notwithſtanding the " vacancy, is the ſame; the laws that are the " foundations and rules of that conſtitution are the " ſame; but if there be in any particular inſtance,
" a breach of that conſtitution, that will be an " Abdication, and that Abdication will infer a " vacancy. It is not that the commons do ſay,
" 'The crown of England is always and perpetually
" elective; 'but it is more neceſſary that there be
" a ſupply, when there is a defect, and the doing
" of that would be no alteration of the Monarchy
" from a ſucceſſive one to an elective."

Then the biſhop of Ely, on the ſide of the lords, ſaid, " Gentlemen,——— That Abdicated may " be tacitly by ſome overt-acts, mr. Sommers
" very truly did allege out of Grotius: But I
" deſire to know whether Grotius, that great au" thor, in treating on this ſubject, doth not in-" terpoſe this caution, 'If there be a yielding to " the times: if there be a going away, with a
" purpoſe of ſeeking to recover what is for the " preſent left or forſaken: In plain Engliſh, if

" there were any thing of force or juſt fear in " the caſe, that doth void the notion of Ab- " dication."

Mr. ſerjeant Maynard replied, " But, my lords, " that is not any part of the caſe declared by the " commons in this vote; when the whole king- " dom and the Proteſtant religion, our laws " and liberties have been in danger of being " ſubverted, an inquiry muſt be made into the " authors and inſtruments of this attempt; and " if he who had the adminiſtration intruſted to " him, be found the author and actor in it, what " can that be but a renunciation of his truſt, " and conſequently his place thereby vacant? Ad- " dication (under favour) is an Engliſh word; " and your lordſhips have told us, the true ſignifi- " cation of it is a renunciation. We have indeed, " for your lordſhips ſatisfaction, ſhewn its mean- " ing in foreign authors; it is more than a De- " ſerting the government, or leaving it with a " purpoſe of returning."

The biſhop of Ely replied, " The objection of the " lords againſt the word Abdicated, is, 'That it " is of too large a ſignification for the caſe in hand. " It ſeems to be acknowleged, that it reaches a " great way; and therefore the lords would have " a word made uſe of, which ſignifies only, the " ceaſure of the exerciſe of a right. (3)

REM. (3) Hitherto the lords had not clearly diſcovered why they rejected the word Abdicated. It appears here, by what the biſhop of Ely ſays, that it was becauſe this word expreſſed the commons meaning too well, and therefore the lords would have another word in its ſtead, from which the vacancy of the throne could not be infered.

The biſhop added,——— If there be ſuch a " defect as hath been ſpoken of, it muſt be ſup- " plied; there is no queſtion of that. And I " think we have, by another vote, declared, 'That " it is inconſiſtent with our laws, liberties, and " religion to have a Papiſt to rule over this king- " dom: which I take to be only as to the actual " exerciſe and adminiſtration of the government. " It is Grotius his diſtinction between a right, and " the exerciſe of that right; and as there is a na- " tural incapacity for the exerciſe, as ſickneſs, lu- " nacy, infancy, doating old age, or an incura- " ble diſeaſe, rendering the party unfit for hu- " man ſociety, as leproſy, or the like; ſo, I " take it, there is a moral incapacity; and that I " conceive to be a full irremoveable perſuaſion in a " falſe religion, contrary to the doctrine of chri- " ſtianity. Then there muſt be a proviſion un- " doubtedly made for ſupplying this defect in the " exerciſe, and an intermediate government taken " care for; becauſe become neceſſary for the ſup- " port of the government, if he to whom the " right of ſucceſſion doth belong, makes the ex- " erciſe of his government unpracticable, and our " obedience to him, conſiſtently with the conſti- " tution of our religion, impoſſible; but that, I " take it, doth not alter that right, nor is an Ab- " dication of the right. (4)

REM. (4) It muſt be remembred, that the biſhop of Ely's poſition, which was afterwards maintained by others, was, that there was a real diſtinction between a right, and the exerciſe of that right. They readily agreed, that James II, ſhould be deprived of the exerciſe of the right to govern, but not of the right itſelf. Upon this diſtinction all the arguments of the lords are grounded.

" Abdication (continued he) no doubt is, by " adoption, an Engliſh word, and well known to " Engliſhmen converſant in books. Now it is " objected, that it is not a word as ancient as the " common law of England. We find it in Ci- " cero,—— where it ſometimes ſignifies, 'The re- " nouncing the actual exerciſe of a right, and ſome- " times, the renouncing of the very right,' ſo " that the ſignification is doubtful; and ſuch " words we hope the commons will not think fit " to uſe in a caſe of this nature and conſequence " as ours now in debate. And beſide, the lords " apprehend, that great inconveniencies will fol- " low upon the uſe of this word, if it mean " a renouncing abſolutely of that right. ——— " Then there is another diſtinction in thoſe au- " thors that write concerning this point, which " are chiefly the Civilians. There may be an " Abdication that may forfeit the power of a " King only; and there may be one, that may " forfeit both that and the crown too. It is a " diſtinction indeed in other words, but to the " ſame ſenſe. Thoſe Abdications that are of " power only, are incapacities; whether thoſe " I call natural and involuntary, as defects of " ſenſe, age, or body, or the like; or moral or " voluntary, as contrariety in religion; an inſtance " whereof there was lately in Portugal, which was " a forfeiture only of the power, and not of the " name, and honor of a King; for tho' the ad- " miniſtration was put into the younger brother's " hand, the patents, and other public inſtruments " ran in the elder brother's name". (5)

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

REM. (5) If the biſhop of Ely had only a view to James II, the inſtance of the natural incapacities which made Alphonſo VI King of Portugal, forfeit the exerciſe of the Regal power, does not ſeem to be to his purpoſe; ſince theſe incapacities were not the point in queſtion, with regard to James II, which may make it ſuſpected, that he had an eye to the Prince of Wales. For, as will hereafter appear, the lords in maintaining, that the throne was not vacant, pretended, that by the civil or natural death of the King, the next heir was immediately to fill the throne, and this heir, according to ſome, was the Prince of Wales. But as he was a minor, an intermediate governor muſt be appointed to govern in his name.

" This is not without all doubt naturally an Ab- " dication in the full extent of the word; nor do " I here (as I ſaid) conſider, whether that the " King be gone out of the kingdom, or ſtay in " it; but only, whether he be fit for the adminiſtra- " tion, which muſt be provided for, be he here, " or gone away. But the higheſt inſtance of an " Abdication, is, when a Prince is not only un- " able to execute his power, but acts quite contrary " to it; which will not be anſwered by ſo bare a " word as 'indeavor.' I take theſe to be all the " diſtinctions of Abdications. Now, if this laſt " inſtance of an 'Abdication of both power and " right,' take place in a ſucceeding Monarchy, the " conſequence will be, 'That there is a forfeiture " of the whole right;' and then that hereditary " ſucceſſion is cut off; which, I believe, is not " intended by the commons. But here is one thing " that is mentioned in this vote, which I would " have well conſidered, for the preſervation of the " ſucceſſion, and that is the original compact: " we muſt think, ſure, that meant of the compact, " that was made at the firſt time, when the go- " vernment was firſt inſtituted, and the condi- " tions, that each part of the government ſhould " obſerve on their part, of which this was the " moſt fundamental, 'That King, lords, and com- " mons, in parliament aſſembled, ſhould have the " power of making new laws, and altering of old " ones:' and that being one law which ſetles the ſuc- " ceſſion, it is as much a part of the original compact " as any: then if ſuch a caſe happens, as an Abdi- " cation in a ſucceſſive kingdom, without doubt, " the compact being made to the King, his heirs, " and ſucceſſors, diſpoſition of the crown cannot

Interreg. An' 1688.

" fall to us, till all the heirs do Abdicate too. " There are indeed many examples, and too many " interruptions in the lineal ſucceſſion of the crown " of England: I think I can inſtance in ſeven ſince " the conqueſt, wherein the right heir hath been " put by: but that doth not follow, that every " breach of the firſt original contract, gives us " power to diſpoſe of the lineal ſucceſſion; eſpecially, " I think, ſince the ſtatutes of Queen Elizabeth, " and King James the firſt, that have eſtabliſhed " the oath of allegiance to the King, his heirs and " ſucceſſors; the law is ſtronger againſt ſuch a diſ- " poſition: I grant, that from King William the " firſt, to Henry VIII, there has been ſeven in- " terruptions of the legal line of hereditary ſuc- " ceſſion; but, I ſay, thoſe ſtatutes are made ſince " that time, and the making of new laws, be- " ing as much a part of the original compact, as " the obſerving old ones, or any thing elſe, " we are obliged to purſue thoſe laws, till al- " tered by the legiſlative power, which, ſingly or " jointly, without the Royal aſſent, I ſuppoſe, we " do not pretend to. (6)

Rem. (6) By this reaſoning the lords and commons being agreed, that a Catholic King could not exerciſe the right of government, and James II, being Catholic, and as he might poſſibly have an infinite ſeries of ſucceſſors from father to ſon, all Catholics, it would follow, that England might be always governed by Regents.

" Theſe laws being made ſince the laſt interrup- " tion, we are not to go by any precedent that was " made before the making theſe laws. So that, all " that I conceive ought to be meant by our vote " is, ' But the ſeting aſide the perſon that broke " the contract: and, in a ſuceſſive kingdom, an " Abdication can only be a forfeiture, as to the per- " ſon himſelf.' I hope, and am perſuaded, that " both lords and commons do agree in this, ' Not " to break the line of ſucceſſion, ſo as to make " the crown elective.' And if that be declared, " that this Abdication of King James the ſecond, " reacheth no farther than himſelf; and that it is to " continue in the right line of ſucceſſion, that, I " hope, will make all of one mind in this im- " portant affair. (7)

Rem. (7) For the better underſtanding the biſhop of Ely's ſpeech, as well as ſome others that follow, it muſt be obſerved, that among the lords who had voted for the vacancy of the throne, by a majority of eleven voices, there were two ſorts of men. The one, without any deſire to favor King James, or the Prince of Wales, had no other view than to oppoſe the Republican party, who, under color of gratitude to the Prince of Orange, were laboring with all their power to have him elected King, reckoning it would be a large ſtep towards advancing the authority of the people, and rendering the crown elective. Some of the lords voted againſt the vacancy of the throne, chiefly in oppoſition to this party. But there were others who carried their views farther, and by rendering the ſetling of the government impracticable, labored indirectly, either to cauſe King James to be recalled, or the Prince of Wales to be acknowleged for King, knowing it would be impoſſible to prove him ſuppoſititious in a legal manner. But as theſe concealed themſelves among the others, and pretended only to defend hereditary right, it is hard to know by the ſpeeches, who deſigned only to maintain hereditary right, and who had farther views. This the reader is to remember, that he may not imagine, all the lords who voted againſt the vacancy of the throne, were for King James.

Then the earl of Clarendon ſpoke on the lords ſide, and ſaid, ——— " This breaking the origi- " nal contract is a language that hath not been " long uſed in this place; nor known in any of " our law-boks or public records; it is ſprung " up, but as taken from ſome late authors, and " thoſe none of the beſt received. It is not de- " nied, ' That the King is bound by law, and " bound to perform the laws made, and to be " made.' But I would take notice, that his obli- " gation thereunto, doth not proceed from his coro- " nation oath; for our law ſaith, ' He is as much " King before he is crowned, as he is after- " wards; and there is a natural allegiance due to " to him from the ſubjects immediately upon the " deſcent of the crown upon him.' I was in great " hopes, that you would have offered ſomething " in anſwer to one of my lord of Ely's reaſons " againſt that part of the vote, which declares, " ' The throne to be vacant,' viz. ' That no act " of the King's alone can bar, or deſtroy, the " right of his heir to the crown, which is here- " ditary, and not elective." (8)

Interreg. An' 1688.

Rem. (8) The earl of Clarendon begins with repreſenting the original contract between King and people, as an imaginary thing. And yet he owns " the King is bounded by law (tho' he " cites none) and bound to perform, &c." But that this obligation proceeds not from his coronation oath. What is it then that binds him?

" And then, if this matter goes no farther than " King James the ſecond, in his own perſon; " how comes the vacancy and the ſupply to be " devolved upon the people? For if he only be " ſet aſide, then it is apparent, where the crown " is to go, to the perſon that hath the next right " of ſucceſſion, and conſequently there is no va- " cancy. (9)

Rem. (9) The lords always ſpoke of the next heir, but without naming the Prince of Wales. The reaſon is, that by raiſing, as they thought, invincible obſtacles to the election of a new King, they deſigned by degrees to lead the commons to propoſe the examination of the Prince of Wales's birth. But the managers for the commons carefully avoided that ſnare, and therefore the Prince of Wales was not ſo much as once mentioned by name in the conference.

The earl of Nottingham added, ——— " The " lords having declared that they are willing, ' to " ſecure the nation againſt the return of King " James into this kingdom; and will therefore " concur with the commons in any act that ſhall " be thought neceſſary to prevent ſuch his return,' " it ſhould ſeem we were agreed in that matter; " and if that were the point, we ſhould find " words proper ſoon enough to expreſs our mean- " ing by. But I find neither of the words, Ab- " dicated or Deſerted, will, on the one ſide or " on the other, be allowed to ſignify this mean- " ing. Therefore we ſhould come preſently to " think of ſome other that would. But the rea- " ſons why my lords did chiefly inſiſt upon the " alteration of the word Abdicated, was, ' Be- " cauſe they did apprehend, that it being a word " not known to our laws, there might be other " inferences drawn from it than they do apprehend " our laws will warrant, from the caſe, as it is " ſtated in the fact of this vote; and, as they " conceive is done in the concluding of the " throne's being vacant.' Therefore, I think it " would ſhorten the preſent debate, if we did " ſetle the point of the vacancy firſt. For if we " were ſure, that the throne were, or were not " vacant, we ſhould eaſily light upon what word " were proper to be uſed in this caſe."

Sir George Treby ſpeaking on the ſide of the commons ſaid, ——— " I think, my lords the " preſent debate is to begin, where the difference " between the two houſes doth begin, and that is " at

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

" at the word Abdicated. Original contract, is a " phraſe and thing uſed by the learned mr. Hooker, " in his book of Eccleſiaſtical Polity. But I have " a greater authority than this, and that is your " lordſhips own, who have agreed to all the " vote, but this word Abdicated, and the vacancy " of the throne. But it is very much beyond what " the vote before us doth lead us unto, 'To talk " of the right of thoſe in the ſucceſſion:' for that " goes farther than the very laſt part of our vote, " and it is ſtill to lead us yet farther, to ſay any " thing about making the crown elective."——

Then he indeavored to prove that King James had actually Abdicated the kingdom, alleging the authority of Grotius, who ſays, " That if there be " any word or action that doth ſufficiently manifeſt " the intention of the mind and will, to part with " his office, that will amount to an Abdication or " Renouncing. 'Now (added he) I beg leave to " put this caſe, that had King James the ſecond " come here into the aſſembly of lords and com- " mons, and expreſſed himſelf in writing or words, " to this purpoſe: 'I was born an heir to the " crown of England, which is a government li- " mited by laws, made in full parliament, by " King, nobles, and commonalty; and, upon the " death of my laſt predeceſſor, I am in poſſeſſion " of the throne; and, now I find, I cannot make " laws without the conſent of the lords and repre- " ſentatives of the commons in parliament; I can- " not ſuſpend laws that have been ſo made, with- " out the conſent of my people; this indeed is " the title of Kingſhip I hold by original contract, " and the fundamental conſtitutions of the govern- " ment; and my ſucceſſion to, and poſſeſſion of " the crown, on theſe terms, is part of that con- " tract; this part of the contract I am weary of, " I do renounce it, I will not be obliged to ob- " ſerve it; nay, I am under an obligation not to " comply with it; I will not execute the laws " that have been made; nor ſuffer others to be " made, as my people ſhall deſire, for their ſe- " curity in religion, liberty and property, which " are the two main parts of the Kingly office in this " nation.' I ſay, ſuppoſe he had ſo expreſt him- " ſelf, doubtleſs, this had been a plain renouncing " of the legal regular title which came to him by " deſcent: if then he, by particular acts, ſuch as " are enumerated in the vote, has declared as " much or more than theſe words can amount to, " then he hath thereby declared his will to re- " nounce the government.——And this doth " amount to a manifeſt declaration of his will, no " longer to retain the exerciſe of his Kingly office " according to law; he has ſufficiently declared " his renouncing of the very office, and therefore " I cannot depart from inſiſting upon the word " Abdicated, which doth ſo well correſpond to the " fact of the caſe, and ſo well expreſs the true " meaning of the commons in their vote."

The earl of Nottingham ſaid,—— " I will " not undertake to diſpute, whether a King of " England may, or may not, renounce his king- " dom. For my own part, I think he can, and " I may go ſo far in agreement with thoſe that " have ſpoken to this point, 'To yield that he " may do it by implicit acts, contrary to the " Kingly office.' For a King to ſay, he will not " govern according to law; and for a King to act " wholly contrary to law, and do that which would " ſubvert the conſtitution, is (I think) the ſame " thing. But then I muſt ſay alſo, that I think " there is a difference between ſaying ſo, and do- " ing ſomething inconſiſtent with what the laws " require; for every deviation from the law, is " a kind of breach of the fundamental conſtitu- " tions; as the laws are neceſſary, ſo far as to " ſupport the foundation. But if every tranſgreſ- " ſion, or violation of the law, by the Prince's " connivance or command, were ſuch a breach " of the fundamental laws, as would infer an Ab- " dication, then were it in vain to call any of his " miniſters or officers to account for any ſuch ac- " tion. Then the action is the King's, and not theirs; " and then adieu to the maxim of, 'A King's not " doing wrong.' I take this matter to be ſo plain, " as to the diſtinction that I have mentioned, that " nothing can be more; and it has been thought ſo " eſſentially neceſſary to have it clear and manifeſt, " that thoſe two great inſtances of Edward II, and " Richard II, were expreſs ſolemn renunciations, " and thoſe confirmed in parliament by the lords " and commons, by the act of depoſing them. " Therefore I cannot infer from the facts enume- " rated in the vote, that this ſhould be an Abdi- " cation for himſelf and his heirs."

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

Sir George Treby replied,——" When a King " breaks the law in ſome few particular inſtances, " it may be ſufficient to take an account of it from " thoſe evil miniſters that were inſtrumental in it, " why ſuch a thing was done, which was againſt " laws? Why ſuch a law was not executed by " them, whoſe duty it was to ſee it put in execu- " tion? You may, in ordinary caſes of breaking " the law, have remedy in the ordinary courts and " courſe of juſtice. But ſure! he does not take " this to be ſuch a caſe, or theſe to be ordinary " violations of the law: and therefore, in the ex- " traordinary caſes, the extraordinary remedy is " to be recured unto. And where ſhall any man " come to have any redreſs in ſuch a caſe as this, " when the malefactor comes to be party, unto " whom all applications for relief and redreſs " from injuries ſhould be made, and ſo he himſelf " ſhall be a judge of his own breaches of law? " This moſt apparently was the caſe as to the Quo " Warranto's, which was a plain deſign to ſubvert " the conſtitution in the very foundation of the le- " giſlature. It is becauſe the King hath violated " the conſtitution, by which the law ſtands, as the " rule both of the Kingly government, and the " people's obedience, that we ſay, he hath Abdi- " cated and Renounced the government; for all " other particular breaches of the law, the ſubject " may have remedy in the ordinary courts of " juſtice, or the extraordinary court of parliamen- " tary proceedings: but where ſuch an attempt as " this is made on the eſſence of the conſtitution, " it is not we that have brought ourſelves into this " ſtate of nature, but thoſe who have reduced our " legal well eſtabliſhed frame of government into " ſuch a ſtate of confuſion, as we are now ſeeking " a redreſs unto."

The lords objecting nothing farther againſt the uſe of the word Abdicated, the commons proceeded to the ſecond amendment, viz. the leaving out the words, 'and that the throne is thereby vacant.'—— Mr. Sacheverell opened the debate, and ſaid,---" My " lords, the commons, in uſing the words Abdica- " tion and Vacancy, had no thoughts of making the " kingdom elective, neither can any ſuch thing be " deduced from their words." (10)

REM. (10) As the principal reaſon which induced the lords to oppoſe the commons vote, was, the conſequence drawn from thence, that the crown would thereby become elective, the commons were very careful to deny this conſequence, by ſaying, That not only they had no ſuch thought, but that it could not be infered from their vote. This was a material point. For if the lords could have drawn from the commons a confeſſion, that the conſe- quence was juſt, they would have pretended, that by declaring the throne vacant, the conſtitution was ſubverted, and the crown made elective inſtead of hereditary hereditary. It ſeems, that the commons might have denied that the crown was originally hereditary, and maintained, it was ſo only by the ſtatutes made in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. From whence they might have infered, that the parliament which ſetled the crown upon the deſcendents of James I, in the direct, and afterwards in the collateral line, had likewiſe power to alter the order of the ſetlement. But they avoided all diſcuſſions of this nature, being ſenſible that the deſign of the lords was to multiply the ſubjects of diſpute, in order to increaſe the obſtacles of the projected eſtabliſhment.

Mr. Sacheverell continued, "The commons reaſon for their diſagreeing to this amendment, was, "becauſe they conceive (that as they may well infer) "from ſo much of their own vote, as your lordſhips have agreed unto, 'That King James the "ſecond hath Abdicated the government; and "that the throne is thereby vacant:' ſo, if they "ſhould admit your lordſhips amendments, 'That "he hath only Deſerted the government;' yet, "even thence would follow, 'It is vacant, as to "King James the ſecond:' Deſerting the government being, in true conſtruction, Deſerting "the throne. If King James had only given over "the exerciſe of the government, [as their lordſhips pretended] he continues in the office, and "is King ſtill; and then all the acts that we have "done in this convention, are wholly (as we conceive) not juſtifiable; you are in no place or "ſtation to relieve yourſelves, or the nation, in "this exigence; unleſs you will think of ſeting up "another Regency by your own authority, without his conſent; which, I conceive, by the laws "of England, you cannot do. What then follows upon all we have done? We have drawn "the nation into a ſnare, by the ſteps we have "taken; and leave all in ſuch an intricacy, as we "have no power by law to deliver them out of; "nor can we anſwer for what we have done, unleſs "the King ſhould die, and that would leave the "ſucceſſion uncertain."

Mr. Pollexfen purſuing the ſame argument, maintained, "That the lords ſaying in their vote, 'that "the government was Deſerted,' could not mean "only the exerciſe of it, but a vacancy: the "King's power, and the exerciſe of that power, "was, in conſtruction of the law, one and the "ſame, and ſo joined, that they could not be ſevered; and therefore, the ſuppoſed diſtinction "was only national, and altogether diſagreeing to "the laws of England. That it was utterly unlawful, and as great a crime, to take away from "the King the exerciſe of the government, as to "take from him the government; it might do "well for their lordſhips to conſider, whether they "were not guilty of the ſame crime, which they "would decline by their amendment. That the "commons therefore could not admit, That there "ſhould be a taking away the exerciſe of the government from the King, any more than the "taking away the government, which, the commons ſaid, he had himſelf given away by Abdication; and that if King James was King ſtill, "they could not by any means agree to the keeping him out of the kingdom. That to have a "regency upon King James, without his own conſent, or till his return, while the right was ſtill "in him, would be a ſtrange and impracticable "thing, and introductive of a commonwealth, inſtead of the ancient government by a limited "Monarchy; and that the concluſion, That ſuch "a vacancy in the throne would make the crown "elective, had no premiſſes either from their "actions, their ſayings, their votes, or any thing "elſe in that caſe. (11)

Rem. (11) The lords anſwered but weakly mr. Pollexfen's reaſons. Several of thoſe who were againſt a vacancy verily believed, it was as unlawful to deprive King James of the exerciſe of the regal power, as of the power itſelf. But they durſt not directly undertake his defenſe, becauſe they knew his perſon was odious to the whole nation. Wherefore, they had deviſed this diſtinction between a right, and the exerciſe of that right, to leave room for his reſtoration. Mr. Pollexfen, as appears, maintains, that this diſtinction is imaginary. Let the reader examine, whether it was well proved, or only ſuppoſed; or whether, in ſuppoſition of its reality, it was applicable to the point in hand.

Interreg. An' 1688.

The earl of Clarendon interpoſed and ſaid, "He "would not declare his opinion about the vacancy "as to King James, but deſired to know the "meaning of the commons, how far the vacancy "was to extend?"

This gave occaſion to mr. Pollexfen to aſk the lords, "whether their lordſhips did agree, 'that the "throne was vacant as to King James the ſecond?' "that if ſo, or if they ſhould ſay it was full of "any body elſe, and would name whom it was full "of, it would then be time for the commons to "give an anſwer."

To which the ſame earl replied, "That admiting, "for diſcourſe ſake, that the throne was vacant "as to King James the ſecond, it muſt then be ſupplied by thoſe that ſhould have come if he were "dead; this government being, by all our laws, "an hereditary Monarchy, which is to go in ſucceſſion by inheritance in the Royal line. That "if the commons ſaid this government was vacant, "that would be to put all thoſe by that ſhould "take it by ſucceſſion, which would make the "kingdom elective for that time: that the lords "ſaid, there was no vacancy; but ſince the commons ſaid, the throne was vacant, he might "very well aſk, who had the right of filling up that "vacancy?"

Mr. ſerjeant Maynard anſwered, "That was "not the queſtion before them, tho' it would "come properly in debate, when they were agreed "upon the vacancy; that he granted the Engliſh "Monarchy to be hereditary; but tho' it ſhould "in an ordinary way deſcend to the heir, yet as "their caſe was, they had a maxim in law as certain as any other, which ſtoped the courſe; for, "ſaid he, no man can pretend to be King James's "heir while he is living: Nemo eſt hæres viventis." (12)

Rem. (12) Mr. ſerjeant Maynard ſeems to have juſtly remarked, that it was proper to agree upon the vacancy before they proceeded to the queſtion, "who ſhould fill the throne?" Otherwiſe the conſequence would be examined before the premiſſes were ſetled, on which it was founded.

The earl of Pembroke replied, "That to that "point the lord Clarendon had given an anſwer, "'That it ſhould go to the next heir in the line, "that were to take it if the King were dead.' "And that as they ſhould be underſtood, they "ſhould make it a caſe of demiſe of the King's, as "the law calls it; that is, the King was dead in "law, by his Abdication or Deſertion. That to "anſwer the queſtion of the commons, 'who the "throne was full of?' it was ſufficient to know, "that there were heirs, who were to take by lineal "ſucceſſion, tho' they did not, or could not poſitively name the particular perſon." (13)

Rem. (13) If the lords had gained this point, that in caſe the throne were vacant with regard to the perſon of King James only, it ſhould be filled by the next heir, they would have thereby ingaged the commons in a diſcuſſion of the Prince of Wales's birth, birth, wherein they would have had great advantages. But the commons desired, above all things, to avoid this examination, into which the lords would have artfully drawn them.

The earl of Nottingham argued, "That if the "lords should grant a vacancy as to the King him-"self, yet they might justly do these acts men-"tioned in the commons reasons; for if barely "the exercise of the government were Deserted, "there must be a supply of that exercise in some "person's taking the administration; and as none "so fit, because of the Prince's relation to the "crown, and in his presense here, to address unto "about it, so none so proper to make that address "as the lords; since, in the absense of the King, "they were the King's and kingdom's great coun-"cil, and might have done by themselves without "the commons but being met in a full representa-"tive body, they joined with them. (14)

REM. (14) This concerns only the vindication of the lords conduct, which had been a little censured by mr. Sacheverell and mr. Pollexsen. This vindication is wholly founded upon the distinction between a right, and the exercise of that right, which the earl of Nottingham supposes, without undertaking to prove it.

"They were told, 'That the next heir in suc-"cession could not take it, because no one could "be heir to one alive;' yet still he thought the "answer given by the lords a very good one, 'That "tho' the King was not dead naturally, yet if, as "they infered, he was so civilly,' the next of "course ought to come in by hereditary succession; "for he knew not any distinction between successors "in the case of a natural death, and those in case "of a civil one: that he would know, if the "next heir should be set aside, and another put in, "Whether that King of England should be King "to him and his heirs, and so being once upon the "throne, the ancient lineal succession be altered? "which indeed would sufficiently make the king-"dom elective, by taking it from the right heir? "That if it was not so, then he asked, Whether "such a King as should be put in, should be King "only during King James's life? That, he sup-"posed, was not the meaning of the commons; "but at least, he must be made a King during his "own life; that then if there was a distinction "made as to the succession, between a natural and "a civil death, if King James should die during "the life of the new King, what would become of "the hereditary Monarchy? Where must the suc-"cessor come in, when the next heir to King James "might not be the present heir to the present suc-"cessor? That therefore they must reduce all to this "point, Whether this would not make the kingdom "elective? That if they made it once elective, it "was enough to make it ever so; for he would be "bold to say, They could not make a stronger tie "to observe that kind of succession, than what lay "upon them to preserve in this case.

He added, "That if the throne was vacant, he "would know whether they were obliged to fill it? "That if they were, they must fill it either by the "old laws, or by the humor of those who were to "chuse. That if they filled it by the old laws, "they declared it was an hereditary kingdom, and "they were to take the next successor, to whom "the succession would belong, and there would be "no need of standing upon a vacancy: that if they "were to fill it according to the humor of the times, "that diverted the course of inheritance; and that "he could not see by what authority they could do "that, or change the ancient constitution, without "commiting the same fault they had laid upon the "King. But, said he, if you please to suppose "the throne vacant as to King James, that is, That "he has no right, then let us go on to the next "step." (15)

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

REM. (15) The earl of Nottingham enumerates here all the inconveniencies, difficulties, and contrarieties to the law which could arise from the commons vote, and all ended in the danger of rendring the crown elective. But he took care not to mention the difficulties which flowed from the lords opinion. The consequences of their opinion were, either that the kingdom should be left in its present confusion, or King James recalled, or the Prince of Wales acknowleged for King. In all three, the danger was as great as in running the hazard of making the crown elective, which was the only danger the earl would have to be considered. As if the danger of leaving the kingdom in confusion, of recalling the King, of owning a Prince who was by most people thought suppositious, who was absent and a minor, who would be bred in France in the Catholic religion, and from whom the same inconveniencies as had caused King James to be rejected, were to be feared when he should be of age: as if I say, all these dangers were to be reckoned as nothing in comparison of the hazard of a breach in the lineal succession. Beside, it was only by way of consequence that the lords pretended that the crown would become elective by this breach, tho' the commons affirmed they had no such intention,

But mr. Sacheverell replied, "That all their "business was to maintain, That the throne was "vacant."

And mr. Sommers added, "That the lords al-"leged as a reason against the word Abdicate, "That it was not a word known to our laws, but "that the word Vacant could not have that objec-"tion made to it, since it was in our records, and "even applied in a parallel case to this in the first "of Henry IV."

To which the earl of Rochester answered, "That as that was the only precedent for the word "Vacant, yet it was attended with this very con-"sequence, that it would make the Monarchy "elective; for it being there declared, That the "Royal seat was vacant, immediately did follow "an election of Henry IV, who was not next in "the Royal line."

The same argument was pursued by the earl of Clarendon, who said, "That it was plain in the "case of Richard II, who had absolute Resigned, "Renounced, or Abdicated, in writing under his "own hand; that after that, the parliament being "siting, they did not think that sufficient to go "upon, because that writing might be the effect of "fear, and not voluntary: that thereupon they "proceeded to a formal deposition upon articles: and "then came in the claim of Henry IV: that this "was undoubtedly an election; tho' he was really "the next heir, the earl of March not appearing. "Henry claimed it as his undubitable right being "the next heir that appeared: that all the Kings "that were thus taken in or elected (for the elec-"tion was not of God's approbation) any one year "scarce passed in any of the reigns, without being "disturbed in the possession: that Henry IV, did not "care to owe the crown to the election, but claimed "it as his right; that it was a plausible pretense, "and kept him and his son upon the throne; but "in the time of his grandson Henry VI, there was "an utter overthrow of his title and possession too: "for, in the first of Edward IV, all the proceed-"ings against Richard II, as well as all the rest "of the acts during the usurpation (as that record "rightly calls it) were annulled, repealed, revoked "and reversed, and all imaginable words used to

Interreg. An' 1688.

" ſet thoſe proceedings aſide, as illegal, unjuſt and " unrighteous: that act deduced the pedigree " of the Royal line from Henry III to Richard II, " who died without iſſue; and then Henry IV, ſays " the act, uſurped; but that the earl of March, " upon the death of Richard II, and conſequently " Edward IV from him, was undoubted King by " conſcience, by nature, by cuſtom, and by " law." (16)

Rem. (16) All the arguments from the acts of parliament relating to the differences between the houſes of Lancaſter and York, muſt be very weak. Becauſe theſe parliaments did not all proceed upon the ſame principle, and becauſe the one pulled down what the other ſet up. This evidently appears, in that both ſides in the preſent caſe, alleged ſome of the acts of theſe parliaments, in ſupport of their cauſe.

Hereupon ſir Robert Howard exerted himſelf, and replied, " He would not ſay that the record of " Henry IV was not a precedent of election; for " the parliament did not much mind his claim, " knowing that he claimed by deſcent, where there " was a perſon that had a title before him: thus " the commons did not doubt but that power which " brought in another line then, upon the vacancy " of the throne by the leaſion of Richard II, was " ſtill, according to the conſtitution, reſiding in " the lords and commons, and was legally ſufficient to ſupply the preſent vacancy: that he would " aſk the queſtion of any lord there, whether, had " there been an heir to whom the crown had " quietly deſcended in the line of ſucceſſion, and " this heir certainly known, their lordſhips would " have aſſembled without his calling, or would have " either adminiſtered the government themſelves, " or adviſed the Prince of Orange to have taken " it upon himſelf? That he doubted they had been " all guilty of high-treaſon by the laws of England, if a known ſucceſſor of the throne " were in poſſeſſion of the throne, as he muſt be if " the throne were not vacant: that from hence " their lordſhips ſaw, that the difficulty in this " matter aroſe from this, That they would all agree " the throne to be vacant, when they knew of " none that poſſeſſed it; that ſome ſuch thing had " been pretended to as an heir-male, of which " there were different opinions, and in the mean " time they were without a government. Muſt we " ſtay, added he, till the truth of the matter be " found out? What ſhall be done to preſerve our " conſtitution, and in a little time it will, perhaps, " through the diſtraction of our conſtitution, be utterly irremediable. He confeſſed it would be a " difficult thing to go upon the examination who " was heir, or elſe their lordſhips would have explained themſelves before. But, continued he, it not " being clear, muſt we always remain thus? Uſe " what words you will, fill up, or nominate, or elect, " it is the thing that we are to take care of, and it " is high time it was done. There is no ſuch conſequence to be drawn from this vote, as an intention or likelihood of altering the courſe of " the government, ſo as to make it elective; the " throne has all along deſcended in an hereditary " ſucceſſion, the main conſtitution has been preſerved. The precedent of Henry IV is not like " that of elections in other countries; and I am " ſorry there ſhould be any occaſion for what " is neceſſary to be done now; but when ſuch " difficulties are upon the nation, that we cannot extricate ourſelves out of, as to the lineal " ſucceſſor, your lordſhips, I hope, will give us " leave to remember, 'Salus populi eſt ſuprema " lex.' And if neither you nor we can do any " thing in this caſe, we, who are met under the " notion of the convention of the ſtates, have then " met to no purpoſe; for after we have voted ourſelves to be without government (which looks as " if ſomething were really intended as to a ſetlement) " all preſently ſinks, and we are as much in the " dark as we were before. Your lordſhips ſay, " you will never make a precedent of election, or " take upon you to alter the ſucceſſion. With " your lordſhips favor, the ſetlement of the conſtitution is the main thing we are to look after. " If you provide for the ſupply of the defect there, " that point of the ſucceſſion will, without all queſtion, in the ſame method, and at the ſame time, " be ſurely provided for. But, my lords, have " not you yourſelves limited the very ſucceſſion, " and cut off ſome that might have a lineal right? " Have you not concured with us in our vote, 'That " it is inconſiſtent with our religion and laws to " have a Papiſt to reign over us?' Muſt we not " come then to an election, if the next heir be a " Papiſt? Nay, ſuppoſe there was no Proteſtant " heir at all to be found, would not your lordſhips " then break the line? If your lordſhips then in " ſuch a caſe muſt break through the ſucceſſion, " I think the nation has reaſon to expect you ſhall " take care to ſupply the preſent defect, where the " ſucceſſion is uncertain; or what can we do further, but even part in confuſion, and ſo leave " the nation to extricate itſelf as well as it can out " of its diſtraction. But even at whoſe doors that " will lie, I muſt leave to your lordſhips own " thoughts."

Interreg. An' 1688.

It is ſaid this ſpeech, wherein good ſenſe, and a zeal for the nation equally ſhined, made a deep impreſſion upon ſome of the lords who aſſiſted at the conference, and upon all the reſt of the audience. However, as the earl of Clarendon, to prove the lineal ſucceſſion, had alleged what paſſed with regard to Edward IV, ſir George Treby undertook to explain that matter, and ſaid:

" That it was very well known, that Edward " IV came in diſ-affirmance of the title of the " houſe of Lancaſter: that as thoſe times went, " whenever there was a turn in government, as " there were ſeveral, there were new and contrary " declarations about the title to the crown, made " conſtantly in parliament; and what one parliament ſetled, another undid: but then, that this " advantage the commons had on their ſide; that " as they had this firſt precedent for them, ſo " they had the laſt, viz. The parliament-roll of " the firſt of Henry VII, where the record is ſet " right again: that the act for depoſing Richard " II, was indeed repealed by Edward IV, and " thereupon it proceeds to attaint Henry VI; " but then came in Henry VII, in the firſt year of " whoſe reign there was an act made, that ſet aſide " all the acts and atttainders made againſt his line, " and conſequenly it repealed the firſt of Edward IV, " which had repealed the firſt of Henry IV: that " Henry VII, was of the line of Lancaſter, and " tho' he had the heireſs of the houſe of York in " his boſom, yet after he came to the throne, he " would not indure to have his crown reckoned " matrimonial, or ſuffer the ſtile to go in the name " of Henry and Elizabeth, as he muſt have done if " he had ſtuck to the title by the right line of " ſucceſſion. That therefore this act for reſtoring " the record of the firſt of Henry IV again, was " as good an authority as it was before, and ſomewhat better; for it had the laſt act on its ſide, " which was yet unrepealed."

Here the earl of Pembroke replied, " That " Henry VII had a good right and title by marriage to the crown, 'in re uxoris;' but that his " own title, as deſcended from Henry IV, was an " uſurpation;

INTERREG. AN' 1688.

" uſurpation; and therefore he would not ſuffer " any one to preſcribe which was beſt, as long as " it was acknowleged he had one good."

Sir George Treby returned, " That if Henry VII's " title by deſcent was an uſurpation, it was hard " to determine what title he did govern by; ſince, " tho' his wife was lineal heir, yet ſhe had no part, or " ſo much as a name in the adminiſtration. But ad- " ded he, if we ſhould allow none for acts of par- " liament, but thoſe that were made in the reigns " of hereditary Kings, and in the right line, I " doubt we ſhould want the greateſt part of thoſe " laws that compoſe the volume of ſtatute-books, " and the records by which we injoy a great part " of our inheritances and poſſeſſions."

Sir Richard Temple alleged, " That if laws " made about the ſucceſſion be ſo obliging, what " then ſhould they ſay to the ſucceſſion of Queen " Elizabeth, who had an act of parliament both " againſt her and her ſiſter."

The earl of Pembroke replied, " That to ſhew " what opinion ſhe herſelf, and the wiſe men of " her time, had in that point, there was an act " made in her reign, and yet in being, which de- " clared it to be a Præmunire, to affirm, the par- " liament cannot ſetle the ſucceſſion of the crown, " or alter it. That intails of the crown had been " in parliament, both ancient and modern; yet " the authority of another ſubſequent act had pre- " vailed againſt ſuch an intail, ſo that they ſhould " be done in parliament."

Sir Richard returned, " He thought they were " in as full a capacity to take care of the govern- " ment, as any of their predeceſſors; and that if " they did as their predeceſſors had done before " them, that ought not to be called a changing " of the Monarchy from an hereditary to an " elective."

Here the earl of Nottingham once more inter- poſed and ſaid, " He could not imagine how a " kingdom could be hereditary, and that the " King, who had children in being at the time of " his forſaking the government, could have the " throne vacant, both of him and his children; " that the courſe of inheritance, as to the crown " of England, was by law a great deal better " provided for, than that of any other inheritance, " 'That no attainder of the heir of the crown " could bar the ſucceſſion to the throne,' as it did " the deſcent to any common perſon; and that " the very deſcent by order of birth would take " away any ſuch defect. That this was the opinion " of the great lawyers of England, in the caſe of " Henry VII; and therefore he could not ap- " prehend, how any act of the father, could bar " the right of the child; ſince even the act of the " ſon, which might indanger an attainder in him, " could not do it; ſo careful was the law of the " Royal line of the ſucceſſion, which was declared " by ſeveral acts of parliament, and very fully and " particularly by the twenty-fifth of Henry VIII.-- " That he deſired to know, whether the lords and " commons had power by themſelves to make a " binding act or law? And whether, according to " the legal conſtitution, every King of England, " by being ſeated on the throne, and poſſeſſed of " of the crown, was not thereby King to him and " his heirs? And that without an act of par- " liament he knew not what determination they " could make of his eſtate. That it was urged " indeed, that the lords had in effect already " agreed to the vacancy, by voting, 'That it " was inconſiſtent with our religion and laws, to " have a Popiſh Prince to rule over us:' But that " a vote of either houſe, or both houſes together, " could not alter the law in that or any other " point; yet becauſe he was deſirous that that " vote ſhould have its effect, he deſired that " every thing of that nature might be done " in the ancient uſual method of parliament. " That ſince they were happily delivered from the " fears of Popery and arbitrary power, God for- " bid they ſhould aſſume any ſuch power to them- " ſelves; for what advantage ſhould they then " give to thoſe who would quarrel with their " ſetlement for the illegality of it? Would not this, " which they indeavor to cruſh break forth into a " viper? That in all the breaches that were made " upon the line of ſucceſſion, ſuch was the force of " the laws, that the uſurpers would not take the " crown upon them, unleſs they had ſome ſpe- " cious pretenſe of an hereditary title to it. That " what he would have avoided by all means, was " the miſchievous conſequences that he feared " would inſue upon the vacancy of the throne, " namely, the utter overthrow of the whole con- " ſtitution; for if the lords and commons only " remained as parts of the government, and if the " head be taken away, and the throne vacant, by " what laws or conſtitutions was it that they re- " tained lords and commons? That they were knit " together in their common head; and that if one " part of the government was diſſolved, he ſaw " not any reaſon but that all muſt be diſſolved. " He confeſſed, that any government was better " than none; but he earneſtly deſired they might " injoy their ancient conſtitution." (17)

INERRTEG. AN' 1688.

REM. (17) The earl of Nottingham, in his ſpeech, reaſoned like Charles I, in his diſputes with the parliament. That is, he ſuppoſed the govern- ment in its natural ſtate, and on that ſuppoſition, his arguments were ſtrong. But it is hard to con- ceive a greater diſorder in the government than at the time of this conference. King James had reigned three years in an arbitrary manner. He had violated, not ſome particular laws of little moment, but fundamental laws, whereon the ſe- curity of the national religion and liberties de- pended. After which, he had withdrawn himſelf out of the kingdom, without taking any order about the government. Moſt men thought his ſon ſup- poſititious, and he had ſent him into France. Could the government therefore be ſuppoſed in a natural ſtate? And if it was not, the reaſoning built upon ſuch a ſuppoſition, ought to fall to the ground. However expreſs the laws may be, they always ſuppoſe ſome certain conſtitution of government. But if this conſtitution is broke, as may happen in all countries under the ſun, how, in order to re- medy this evil, can the laws be taken for rule, which ſuppoſe the government in its uſual and na- tural ſtate, and which have not provided for ex- traordinary unforeſeen caſes?

What the earl of Nottingham would intimate, tho' he does not ſpeak plainly, is briefly this: The lords, and commons are but two of the branches of the government, and can make no law without the third, that is, the King, who is their head. The King has abſented himſelf. He muſt therefore be recalled, or waited for till he returns, or elſe his next heir muſt be owned for King. Now this heir is the Prince of Wales. This is evident from the care that was taken not to name him. Or if none of theſe methods be followed, the kingdom muſt be left in a ſtate of Anarchy, or a Regent ap- pointed to govern in the King's name, during his abſenſe.

The whole debate was cloſed with two ſhort ſpeeches made by mr. Paul Foley, and mr. Eyre: The former ſaid, " He hoped there was no danger " of ſhaking our fundamentals in this caſe; that " they were purſuing thoſe methods which agreed " with

" with our laws and conſtitution; for tho' the " Monarchy of this nation be hereditary in the " ordinary courſe of ſucceſſion, yet there might " fall out a caſe wherein that could not be " complied with, and a plain vacancy might in- " ſue. For, ſaid he, put the caſe the whole legal " line ſhould fail, ſhould we in that caſe have no " government at all? And who then ſhould we " have but lords and commons? And I think that " comes neareſt to the caſe in queſtion, where the " ſucceſſor is not known; for if he had been, we " ſhould have heard of him before now. And " what is the reaſon that it ſhould then, in the former " caſe, devolve to the lords and commons, but " that there is no King? And they being the re- " preſentative body of the kingdom, are the only " remaining apparent parts of the government, " and are only to ſupply the defect by providing " a ſucceſſor?"

Mr. Eyre ſubjoined, " That they were led out " of the way, hunting after the conſequences of " a vote not yet agreed unto; that they had made " a right and apt concluſion from the premiſſes, " otherwiſe all the vote was but hiſtorical: we " declare, adds he, 'That the late King James " has broke the original contract; has violated the " fundamental laws, and has withdrawn himſelf " out of the kingdom; that he has abdicated the " government.' What occaſion was there for ſuch " a declaration as this, if nothing were concluded " from it? That were only to give the kingdom " a compendious hiſtory of thoſe miſeries they have " too well learned by feeling them. Therefore " there was a neceſſity to make ſome concluſion; " and none ſo natural as this; that we are left with- " out a King, that the throne is thereby vacant, " which it may be as to the poſſeſſion, and yet the " right of ſucceſſion no ways prejudiced. But, my " lords, we are come here by the commands of " the houſe of commons, to debate the reaſons of " their vote, and your amendments, not to diſpute " what will be the conſequences, which is not at " preſent our province." And here ended this famous conference.

During all theſe debates in the convention, the Prince of Orange ſtaid at St. James's, without taking the leaſt pains to gain any one perſon to his party. He was never leſs affable, being deſirous to ſhew, by his behavior, that his intention was not to deprive any man of the liberty to vote as he ſhould think fit. The two houſes were ſurpriſed that no body ſpoke to them in the Prince's behalf.

He declares his mind to ſome lords.

At length, finding that his ſilence might be ill conſtrued, as if he was unwilling to take upon him the burden of Royalty, he ſent for the marquis of Hallifax, the earls of Danby, Shrewſbury, and ſome others, and told them:

Ibid.

" He had been till then ſilent, becauſe he would " not ſay or do any thing that might ſeem in any " ſort to take from any perſon the full freedom of " deliberating and voting in matters of ſuch im- " portance: he was reſolved neither to court " nor threaten any one. Some were for puting " the government in the hands of a Regent: he " would ſay nothing againſt it, if it was thought " the beſt mean for ſetling their affairs: only he " thought it neceſſary to tell them, that he would " not be the Regent: ſo, if they continued in that " deſign, they muſt look out for ſome other per- " ſon to be put in that poſt: he himſelf ſaw what " the conſequences of it were like to prove: ſo he " would not accept of it. Others were for puting " the Princeſs ſingly on the throne, and that he " ſhould reign by her courteſy: he ſaid, no man " could eſteem a woman more than he did the " the Princeſs; but he was ſo made, that he could " not think of holding any thing by apron-ſtrings: " nor could he think it reaſonable to have any " ſhare in the government, unleſs it was put in his " perſon, and that for term of life: if they think it " fit to ſetle it otherwiſe, he would not oppoſe " them in it: but he would go back to Holland, " and medle no more in their affairs: He aſſured " them, that whatſoever others might think of a " crown, it was no ſuch thing in his eyes, but " that he could live very well, and be well pleaſed " without it: In the end he ſaid, he could not re- " ſolve to accept of a dignity ſo as to hold it only " the life of another: yet he thought that the iſſue " of the Princeſs Ann ſhould be prefered in the " ſucceſſion, to any iſſue he might have by any " other wife than the Princeſs."

This declaration being immediately divulged by thoſe it was made to, did not a little contribute to bring the debates in the houſe of lords to a ſpeedy determination. As for the commons, about two thirds were for the Prince.

The lords concur with the commons vote. Burnet, p. 821.

When the report of the conference between the two houſes was made to the lords, there was a very warm debate, whether they ſhould inſiſt upon the amendments. During the debate, it was moved, that the birth of the Prince of Wales might be examined into. But this motion was at length rejected for ſeveral reaſons: 1. The Prince of Wales was now ſent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation and the eſtabliſhed religion. What therefore would ſuch an examination ſignify? 2. It was impoſſible for the people of England to know, whether he was the ſame perſon that had been carried over or not. 3. In caſe he ſhould die, another might be put in his room, in ſuch manner, that the nation could not be ſure concerning him. 4. The Engliſh nation ought not to ſend into another country for witneſſes to prove that he was their Prince, much leſs receive one upon the teſtimony of ſuch as were not only aliens, but ought to be preſumed enemies. 5. It was known, that all the perſons who had been the confidents in that matter, were conveyed away; ſo it was impoſſible to come at them, by whoſe means only the truth of that birth could be found out. It is pretended, there were ſome who thought it a deep piece of policy, to let the Prince of Wales's title remain undecided, in order to deter the ſucceeding Kings from imitating King James.

Reaſons againſt examining the Prince of Wales's birth. Id. p. 816.

At length, the majority of the lords, after a long debate, departed from their two amendments, and agreed with the vote of the commons, " That " King James had Abdicated the government, " and that the throne was thereby become va- " cant." Probably, they who had deſerted the party of the earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, and Rocheſter, conſidered, that the ſuggeſted danger of the crown's becoming elective, was not to be compared to that which muſt neceſſarily happen, if the kingdom was left in the preſent confuſion, or King James recalled, or the Prince of Wales acknowleged for King. It is ſaid however, that the ſcale was turned to this ſide, by the arrival of ſome lords, who were not preſent in the houſe when the two amendments were voted: but they are not named. It is hardly probable that the pretended arrival of theſe lords ſhould have occaſioned the change in the houſe of peers. There muſt have been a dozen at leaſt, and all of the ſame ſide, which is not very feaſable.

This great ſtep being made, the next thing to be debated was, who ſhould fill the vacant throne. The marquis of Hallifax moved, that the crown ſhould be given to the Prince of Orange alone, and to the two Princeſſes after his death. But he was was not ſeconded (1). If dr. Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury is to be credited, Bentinck (2), the Prince's favorite and confident, ſtrenuouſly ſupported this propoſal. The debate on this affair was very long. It was readily agreed, that the Princeſs of Orange ſhould be placed on the throne; but the queſtion was, whether the Prince ſhould be King of himſelf, or as huſband of the Princeſs? Upon this, parties began to be formed in both houſes. Mean time, as the Princeſs was detained in Holland by the froſt, and by contrary winds after the thaw, the earl of Danby ſent one over to the Princeſs, with an account of the preſent ſtate of the debate, and to tell her, that if ſhe deſired it, he did not doubt but he ſhould be able to carry it, for ſeting her alone on the throne. The Princeſs anſwered, ſhe was the Prince's wife, and would never be other than what ſhe ſhould be in conjunction with him, and under him. Adding, ſhe would take it very ill, if any, under a pretenſe of their care for her, would ſet up a divided intereſt between her and the Prince. Not content with this, ſhe ſent the lord Danby's letter, and her anſwer to the Prince, and thereby broke all the meaſures of thoſe, who wiſhed to create a miſunderſtanding or jealouſy between them. The earl of Danby received not the leaſt mark of diſpleaſure from the Prince of Orange, who continued ſtill to imploy and truſt him.

The lord Danby propoſes to the Princeſs to be Queen alone.

She refuſes. Burnet, p. 819.

At length, both houſes agreed, and voted ſeverally, that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange ſhould be King and Queen of England, but that the ſole and full Regal power ſhould be in the Prince only, in the name of both. However, this was carried in the houſe of lords but by two or three voices only, and not without a proteſtation entered againſt it by the contrary party (3).

It is concluded that the Prince and Princeſs ſhould be King and Queen. Feb. 7. Kennet, p. 547. Burnet, p. 821.

The laſt debate in the convention, was concerning the oaths that ſhould be taken to the King and Queen. To avoid all cavils upon the terms, ["rightful and lawful King"] in the uſual oath, it was thought proper to reduce the oath to the ancient ſimplicity of ſwearing, "to bear faith and "true allegiance to the King and Queen." Hence aroſe the famous diſtinction of a King 'de facto,' and a King 'de jure,' ſome pretending, that they took the oath to the King and Queen, only as King and Queen 'de facto,' whom they were bound to obey no longer than they continued in quiet poſſeſſion; but that it was lawful for them to aſſiſt King James, if he ſhould come to recover his crown, as being ſtill their King 'de jure.' This diſtinction proceeded chiefly from the clergy, who had ſo far intangled themſelves with thoſe ſtrange conceits of the divine right of Monarchy, and had ſo ingaged themſelves by publicly preaching Paſſive-obedience and Non-reſiſtance, as an eſſential doctrine of the church of England, that they did not know how to diſingage themſelves from the ſnare they themſelves had laid, at a time, when they little thought of being ever taken in it.

The oath of allegiance is altered. Id. p. 821.

Whence the notion of a King de jure and a King de facto.

At length, on the twelfth of February, the Princeſs of Orange arrived at London, and ſeemed very well pleaſed with what had been reſolved, that the adminiſtration of the government ſhould be in the Prince only, in the name of both. Thus the ſtrict union between the Prince and Princeſs broke the meaſures of ſuch as hoped to create a miſunderſtanding between them, in order to ſerve their old maſter.

Next day, the Prince and Princeſs of Orange being ſeated on two large chairs, under a canopy of ſtate in the Banqueting-houſe, both houſes of the convention waited upon them in a full body, to offer them the crown. But before they proceeded to this ſolemn offer, they cauſed the clerk of the crown to read the following declaration of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter.

" Having therefore an intire confidence, that " his ſaid Highneſs the Prince of Orange will perfect " the deliverance ſo far advanced by him, and will " ſtill preſerve them from the violation of their " rights, which they have here aſſerted, and from all " other attempts upon their religion, rights, and li- " berties; the ſaid lords ſpiritual and temporal, and " commons, aſſembled at Weſtminſter, do reſolve, " That William and Mary, Prince and Princeſs of " Orange, be, and be declared King and Queen " of England, France, and Ireland, and the domi- " nions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown " and Royal dignity of the ſaid kingdoms and domi- " nions, to them the ſaid Prince and Princeſs during " their lives, and the life of the ſurvivor of them; " and that the ſole and full exerciſe of their regal " power be only in, and executed by, the ſaid Prince " of Orange, in the names of the ſaid Prince " and Princeſs, during their joint lives; and after " their deceaſe, the ſaid crown and Royal dignity " of the ſaid kingdoms and dominions to be to the " heirs of the body of the ſaid Princeſs; and for " default of ſuch iſſue, to the Princeſs Ann of " Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for " default of ſuch iſſue, to the heirs of the body of " the ſaid Prince of Orange.

" And the ſaid lords ſpiritual and temporal, and " commons, do pray the ſaid Prince and Princeſs " of Orange, to accept the ſame accordingly. " And that the oaths hereafter mentioned, be taken " by all perſons of whom the oaths of allegiance " and ſupremacy might be required by law inſtead " of them; and that the ſaid oaths of allegiance " and ſupremacy be abrogated:

" I A. B. do ſincerely promiſe and ſwear, That " I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to " their Majeſties, King William and Queen " Mary. So help me God. I A. B. do " ſwear, That I do from my heart abhor, deteſt, " and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damn- " able doctrine and poſition, That Princes excom- " municated or deprived by the Pope, or any au- " thority of the ſee of Rome, may be depoſed or " murdered by their ſubjects, or any other what- " ſoever. And I do declare, That no foreign " Prince, Perſon, Prelate, State, or Potentate, " hath, or ought to have, any juriſdiction, power, " ſuperiority, pre-eminence or authority, eccleſiaſ- " tical or ſpiritual within this realm. So help me " God."

After the reading of this declaration, the marquis of Hallifax, ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, made a ſolemn tender of the crown to their Highneſſes, in the name of both houſes, whereupon the Prince of Orange returned the following anſwer: Kennet, p. 549. Echard, Vol. III. p. 980.

" My lords and gentlemen, This is certainly the " greateſt proof of the truſt you have in us, that " can be given, which is the thing that makes us " value it the more; and we thankfully accept " what you have offered. And as I had no other " intention in coming hither, than to preſerve your " religion, laws, and liberties, ſo you may be " ſure, that I ſhall indeavor to ſupport them, and " ſhall be willing to concur in any thing that ſhall " be for the good of the kingdom, and to do all " that is in my power to advance the welfare " and glory of the nation."

All this was followed with the acclamanions of the people, which quickly flew over the whole city. The ſame day the Prince and Princeſs were proclaimed King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, by the names of William and Mary, to the inexpreſſible joy of the people (1).

END of the TWENTY-FUORTH BOOK.

A DISSERTATION on the Riſe, Progreſs, Views, Strength, Intereſts, and Characters of the two Parties of the WHIGS and TORIES. Firſt publiſhed in the Year 1717.

THO' the two parties or factions which divide England, have been long talked of, it is but of late years that all Europe, as I may ſay, is ingaged in their quarrel. Before the laſt peace, foreigners generally looked upon the differences between the Whigs and the Tories, as a matter of curioſity, which no way concerned them. If any ſeemed to regard them, it was ſolely on account of the diverſity of the opinions of the two parties, concerning the hierarchy or government of the church. To this was confined the idea, which moſt private foreigners formed of the Engliſh diviſions. I ſay private foreigners; for Princes and their miniſters knew what influence they had in the political affairs of Europe, according as the one or the other party prevailed in the court or parliament of England; but as for the people, it may be ſaid that in general, they knew not the conſequence of them.

The Peace of Utrecht has opened numberleſs eyes, becauſe it is clearly ſeen to flow from the late revolution in the court of England, by the change of the Whig, into a Tory miniſtry. As all Europe was ingaged in the war, and conſequently concerned in the peace by which it was terminated, thoſe who before only talked of the Engliſh diviſions, as of a foreign affair, are but too ſenſible of what conſequence they are to other States. From that time this matter has been reaſoned and diſputed upon with more warmth. In ſhort, moſt foreigners are become Whigs or Tories, according as they have believed to ſee in the two parties, principles agreeable or contrary to their intereſts. Tho' Whigs and Tories equally profeſs the Proteſtant religion, and tho' their differences ſeem not much to concern either Proteſtants or Roman Catholics, it has happened, that the Papiſts have declared for the Tories, and the Proteſtants for the Whigs. The reaſon of this proceeding is obvious, viz. that the one have conſidered the Tories as men laboring to ſet a zealous Popiſh Prince on the throne of England, while the others have believed, that the preſervation of the Proteſtant religion was the ſole aim of the Whigs. There is yet another motive which has determined foreigners to ſide with one of the parties, that is, their inclination to France, or their fear of the ambitious deſigns of that crown. In this reſpect the adherents of France are Tories, and her enemies Whigs. Every one therefore has made a choice, without troubling themſelves otherwiſe, with the differences of the two parties. This conduct in foreigners is the leſs ſurpriſing, ſince in England itſelf, many are Whigs or Tories, without having a diſtinct idea of the party they have imbraced.

It is very ſtrange, that hitherto the public has not been exactly informed concerning theſe two parties, which by the ſuperiority either may have in England, are in a capacity to influence the moſt important affairs of Europe. It is true, we have tranſlations of ſeveral Engliſh books, or rather pamphlets, upon this ſubject. But it is not from thence, that the true ſtate of the affairs of the two parties may be learned. Theſe writings are publiſhed by Whigs or Tories, and conſequently by authors viſible ſuſpected. Accordingly, there is not one but what carries evident marks of the partiality of its author. It is therefore rather from a foreign pen, that we are to expect a fair account of this matter, tho', to ſpeak the truth, there are few foreigners but what either are not ſufficiently informed, or are biaſſed to one of the factions. However the author of this Diſſertation, tho' a foreigner, thinks himſelf qualified to give the public a more extenſive knowlege of the two parties, than many people have hitherto had. He reſided a long time in England, and has, many years, diligently ſtudied the Engliſh hiſtory. Beſide, he is attached neither by inclination nor intereſt to any one of the parties, and is now in a country where he has nothing to hope or fear from either. His impartiality will evidently appear in the Diſſertation itſelf. To give a diſtinct knowlege of the two parties, the author was unavoidably obliged to deſcend to many particulars of the Engliſh hiſtory, without which the riſe and progreſs of theſe parties could not have been clearly explained. If the Engliſh think this Diſſertation defective in ſome points, and too large in others, they are deſired to remember, it was not penned for their uſe; that the author's aim was to confine himſelf to general ideas; in a word, that the things which paſs for common and well known in England, are myſteries abroad, and require a full explication.

It will perhaps be thought ſtrange, that the author, who was born under a government purely Monarchical, ſpeaks in ſome places, ſo as it may be thought he approves not of ſuch a government. To obviate this ſuſpicion, he deſires his readers to conſider, that he could not ſpeak pertinently of his ſubject, without aſſuming an Engliſh ſpirit, and conforming himſelf to the principles which are common in England. It is thus only that he believed he ſhould be able to diſcover the ſtrength and weakneſs of the two parties. All his reaſonings are founded upon this principle, of the ſolidity of which he is perfectly convinced; "That every private perſon is in conſcience obliged quietly to ſubmit to the government eſtabliſhed in the country where he was born, or Providence has placed him." Wherefore it is his opinion, that all ſecret practiſes, all cabals, all means direct or indirect, tending to the diſſolution of ſuch government, are ſo many crimes for which the authors are reſponſible to God and their ſuperiors.

THE government of England is of a particular kind, of which there is not the like at preſent in all the world. It is, however, the ſame which was formerly eſtabliſhed in all the kingdoms of Europe, formed out of the ruins of the Roman Empire. The preſent difference between England and other States, in this reſpect, is owing to this, that the Engliſh have preſerved the form of their government ever ſince their ſetling in Great Britain; whereas in other nations, it has been loſt by degrees, or extremely altered. This government, which has ſo long ſubſiſted in this iſland, appears, in ſome reſpects, Monarchical, in others, Republican; and yet, properly ſpeaking, it is neither. It cannot be called purely Monarchical, ſince the nobility and the people have a ſhare in the legiſlative power jointly with the King, nor can the King impoſe any tax, without the people's conſent. Neither is it Republican, ſince there is a King, who exerciſes the ſovereign authority, who diſpoſes, as he pleaſes, of all places and dignities eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military; and can make peace or war, without conſulting his ſubjects. It would be therefore in vain to pretend to deſcribe this government, by the uſual names of Monarchy, Ariſtocracy, Democracy, which agree not with it. It is a mixed government, differing from, and yet compoſed of all three. The prerogatives of the Sovereign, and the privileges of the nobles and people, are ſo tempered together, that they mutually ſupport one another. At the ſame time, each of the three powers, concerned in the legiſlature, may inſuperably obſtruct the attempts of one or both the others, to render themſelves independent. In ſhort, it is very near the ſame form of government, eſtabliſhed by the Saxons in Germany, by the Francs in Gaul, by the Viſigoths in Spain, by the Oſtrogoths, and after them, by the Lombards in Italy. Theſe Northern nations introduced this government into the moſt Southern parts of Europe when they ſetled there, and founded new States upon the ruins of the Roman Empire.

If, therefore, it be aſked, How long this government has been in England? I ſhall not ſcruple to anſwer, Ever ſince the Anglo-Saxons finiſhed the conqueſt of that part of Great Britain, which their deſcendents poſſeſs to this day. It is true, a doubt may ariſe, whether the commons, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, were part of the parliament, and I confeſs this point is hard to be determined. But however, when England was divided into ſeven kingdoms, Engliſh and Saxon, each of theſe had its King and parliament. This laſt was called the Wittena-Gemot, or Aſſembly of Wiſemen; and there was alſo the like for the common affairs of the whole Heptarchy. This ſame form of government ſubſiſted, when the ſeven kingdoms were reduced to one and the ſame ſtate. The Fields of Mars [March] or of May, called ſince the States General in France, the Cortes in Spain, and perhaps the Diets of the German Empire, are the remains of this ancient form of government, introduced by the Northern nations, wherever they ſetled.

William, duke of Normandy, ſurnamed th Baſtard or Conqueror, having ſubdued England in 1066, became abſolute, and eſtabliſhed a deſpotic power, tho', in all likelihood, he preſerved the ſhadow of a parliament. To ſecure his conqueſt, he tranſplanted many Norman, French, Breton, and Angevin families, inriching them with the lands, of which he inceſſantly diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh. Theſe tranſplanted families multiplied greatly in a ſhort ſpace, and became in the end ſo powerful, as to make head againſt their Sovereigns, ſucceſſors of the Conqueror. At firſt, they gloried in their intire dependence upon the King, who had put them in poſſeſſion of their lands. Their intereſt required, that they ſhould ſupport that power by which they held all their Engliſh poſſeſſions: but when they were once firmly ſetled they began to dread, that the regal power, which had inriched them, might with the ſame eaſe ſtrip them of their eſtates, if the King ſhould ſo pleaſe. For this reaſon, they wiſhed the government reſtored to the ſame ſtate, as in the times of the Saxon Kings. This was the only means to avoid the inconveniencies of an arbitrary power (which might, in time to come, turn as much to their prejudice, as it had to their advantange) and to perpetuate the poſſeſſion of their lands. What at firſt was only a bare wiſh, ſoon roſe into hope, and at laſt into right, by the methods I ſhall preſently ſpeak of. To explain this fully, a large detail of the Engliſh hiſtory would be neceſſary, and a particular enumeration of all the cauſes which have contributed to put the nobility, and afterwards the people in poſſeſſion of a right, which they did not injoy, under the firſt Norman Kings. But as this detail would lead me too far, I ſhall content myſelf with a ſhort abridgment, concerning the ſubject in hand.

William the Conqueror, in 1087, left the kingdom of England to his ſecond ſon William, ſurnamed Rufus, in prejudice of Robert his eldeſt ſon, who had only Normandy. Robert made ſome attempts to diſpoſſeſs his brother of a crown, of which he believed himſelf unjuſtly deprived. But Rufus defeated them by his addreſs, ingaging as well the Normans as the Engliſh in his intereſt, with promiſes of re-eſtabliſhing the ancient government, and reviving the Saxon laws. He knew that both were paſſionately deſirous of what he made them hope hope. By the Normans, I mean here the foreigners newly ſetled in England. This promiſe of Rufus was therefore the firſt foundation of their pretenſions. I ſay the firſt, for the Normans had no right to demand of the King what he was pleaſed to promiſe them, and the conquered Engliſh had as little, to limit the power of their conquerors. It is true, the Engliſh might ground their pretenſions upon ſome general promiſes made them by William the Conqueror, when he received their firſt homages. But this Prince never pretended that they ſhould found a right on theſe promiſes. Accordingly, he always treated England as a conquered nation. However, Rufus kept his word with neither Normans nor Engliſh.

Upon his death Henry I, his younger brother, aſcended the throne in 1100, in prejudice of his eldeſt brother Robert, ſtill alive. To ſecure his uſurpation, he purſued the ſame courſe as his predeceſſor Rufus. He promiſed to reſtore the ancient government, and confirmed his promiſe by a charter in form, but executed it no better than his brother. However, the rights of the ſubject received ſtrength from theſe promiſes, tho' ill performed.

Henry I dying, Maud his daughter, widow of the Emperor Henry V, and wife to Jeffery Plantagenet earl of Anjou, ought to have mounted the throne; but in 1135 was defeated of her right by Stephen earl of Boulogne, ſon of the Conqueror's eldeſt daughter. He bound himſelf more ſtrongly than his two predeceſſors to reſtore the Saxon laws, but in all appearance with as little intention to perform his ingagements. At laſt, the great men, finding he ſought pretenſes to evade his promiſes, haraſſed him with a war which laſted the moſt part of his reign. In the begining, they called into England the Empreſs Maud, and her ſon Henry by the earl of Anjou; and the war ended in a treaty, which ſecured the crown to Henry after Stephen's demiſe, tho' he had ſons.

To Stephen, in 1154, ſucceeded Henry II. During his reign, and that of his eldeſt ſon Richard I, there were no conteſts between the King and the barons, for ſo the great men of the kingdom were then called. But very conſiderable diſputes aroſe in the reign of King John, ſurnamed Lackland, brother and ſucceſſor of Richard I. An unhappy quarrel between this Prince and the court of Rome, having forced him to do homage to Pope Innocent III, for his kingdom, and bind himſelf to pay him tribute, this diſhonorable proceeding, added to many other cauſes, loſt him the eſteem and affection of his ſubjects. The barons improving ſo favorable a juncture, preſented to him the charter of Henry I, which had never been executed, and reſolved to oblige him to confirm it. John at firſt rejected it with great haughtineſs; but at laſt, compelled by his own weakneſs, and the united oppoſition of almoſt all the barons, he was obliged to grant them a charter, much more ample and advantageous to the ſubject, than Henry the firſt, and which was called Magna Charta, or the Charter of Liberties. By this charter, drawn as the barons pleaſed, the King's power was ſo curbed, that it was in a manner reduced to the ſame ſtate as under the Saxon Kings before the conqueſt. This charter has been ever ſince the principal foundation of the rights of the ſubjects. I ſhall not here pretend to decide a queſtion ſo much above my reach, whether this foundation is very ſolid. It will ſuffice briefly to remark, by what means a conceſſion ſeemingly ſo defective in its origin, ſince it was evidently extorted, changed, as I may ſay, its nature by the firmneſs of the Engliſh, and acquired an indiſputable authority, tho' it might have been conteſted at firſt. To this end, we muſt ſee what paſſed afterwards with reſpect to this charter.

King John who had ſigned it, deſiring to revoke it, drew upon himſelf freſh misfortunes, which laſted as long as he lived. The barons reſolving to adhere to their charter, took at laſt the deſperate courſe to call in to their aſſiſtance, Lewis ſon of Philip Auguſtus King of France, and to put him in poſſeſſion of all, or the greateſt part of the kingdom. John died during the war, deprived by a foreign Prince, or rather his own ſubjects, and left a ſon of ten years of age, little capable to maintain the quarrel. Some lords, who had remained faithful to the late King, appointed the earl of Pembroke Regent, during the minority of the young Prince, who was recognized by his few adherents by the name of Henry III, in 1216.

Shortly after the face of affairs was changed by the prudent conduct of the Regent, who ſeeing the barons bent to ſupport their charter, promiſed poſitively, it ſhould be confirmed and executed. Upon this aſſurance, they deſerted Prince Lewis, who was obliged to return to France.

Henry III was no ſooner out of his minority than he repealed Magna Charta, and thought of reigning uncontrouled. But as he had not a capacity equal to ſuch an undertaking, his long reign of fifty ſix years was one continued ſcene of troubles on account of Magna Charta. He was frequently forced to confirm it, and as often broke all his oaths and ingagements. At laſt, the barons took arms under the conduct of the earl of Leiceſter, ſon of the famous Simon Montfort general of the Cruſade againſt the Albigenſes. The King had the misfortune to loſe a battle, and to ſee himſelf, his brother the King of the Romans, and his ſon Prince Edward, in the hands of the earl of Leiceſter, who obliged them to ſwear, they would never oppoſe the execution of Magna Charta. The earl of Leiceſter governed ſome time in the name of the King his priſoner. It is pretended, the commons were firſt received into parliament during his adminiſtration. But without ſtaying to examine ſo difficult a queſtion, I ſhall only obſerve, that at leaſt it cannot be denied, that ſince the end of Henry III's reign the commons have ever injoyed this privilege.

Prince Edward, ſon of Henry III, having happily made his eſcape from the earl of Leiceſter, gained a battle in which the earl was ſlain. This victory reſtored the King to his liberty, who uſed it not agreeably to the oath he had been obliged to take. But his reign and life ended a few years after his deliverance. Tho' the barons party was very much humbled, yet Edward I, who in 1272 ſucceeded his Father Henry III, confirmed Magna Charta. However, ſome ſteps taken by him afterwards, diſcovered a deſign to revoke it; but the barons begining to ſtir, he retracted, and confirmed it once more.

Edward II, his ſon and ſucceſſor, in 1307, was depoſed by the parliament, for intending to eſtabliſh an abſolute power contrary to Magna Charta.

Edward III, ſon and ſucceſſor of this unfortunate Prince in 1327, confirmed it ten times during the courſe of his reign, which the victories obtained by himſelf and his ſon the Prince of Wales, over France, rendered extremely glorious.

Richard II, grandſon and ſucceſſor to Edward III, in 1377, was ſolemnly depoſed, for having violated, in many inſtances, the privileges of the people, founded on Magna Charta.

Henry IV, who had uſed that pretenſe to dethrone Richard II, in 1399, and put himſelf in his place, made ſome attempts to diminiſh the privileges of the parliament; but did not carry very far the execution of this project.

Henry V, his ſon, who ſucceeded him in 1413, maintained the parliament in all its rights, and left the privileges of his ſubjects untouched. His reign was one continued ſeries of victories and ſucceſſes againſt France. He died in 1422.

From that time the government of England remained ſo well ſetled, and ſo firm upon its foundations, I mean, the prerogatives of the King, and the privileges of the parliament, that for near two hundred years, not one King appears to have had any intention to ſhake it. The policy of the Kings, turned wholly upon governing their parliaments by ſecret intrigues, without diſcovering any deſire of altering the conſtitution. True it is, that ſome Kings, as Henry VIII, did what they pleaſed, but without any prejudice to the privileges of parliament. On the contrary, by ſupporting the parliament in its rights, they had the addreſs to make it ſubſervient to their ends. This, by the way, is the beſt, and perhaps the only method for a King to render himſelf powerful and eaſy.

After ſo long a continuance of the ſame form of government, and ſo uninterrupted a poſſeſſion of the privileges of Magna Charta, the Engliſh nation was ſo accuſtomed to it, that it ſeemed impoſſible to make any alteration without throwing the kingdom into confuſion. Nay, it ſeemed there was no fear that any King ſhould ever think of attempting ſo difficult a thing, at the hazard of his crown, as had been the caſe of ſome former Kings. Notwithſtanding all this, James I, ſucceſſor to Queen Elizabeth in 1603, failed not to take ſome ſteps in this dangerous courſe, and indeavor to diminiſh the privileges of parliament, It was by the pernicious counſels of the duke of Buckingham, his favorite, that he ingaged in this deſign, which probably would have ended unfortunately for him, had not death ſurprized him before he had plainly diſcovered his intention. This duke of Buckingham ought to be conſidered as the firſt author of the troubles, which have ſo long infeſted England, and ſtill do infeſt it to this day.

It was under Charles I, ſon and ſucceſſor of James in 1623, that the project to render the King abſolute, and independent of the laws, was vigorouſly puſhed and advanced by all methods. The duke of Buckingham, favorite to Charles I, as he had been to his father, inſpired him with maxims directly contrary to the eſtabliſhed government, and thereby occaſioned his ruin. The duke being aſſaſſinated, the deſign was purſued by Charles, which had been begun by the deceaſed favorite. He imagined, the nation might be governed without a parliament, or at leaſt that parliaments were only to ſupply him with money. He had diſſolved three in the four firſt years of his reign, and even ſignified his intention of calling no more. Twelve years paſſed without a parliament, during which the King levied taxes by the bare act of his will, upon his ſubjects, and by his conduct diſcovered a deſign to reign arbitrarily. Unhappily for him, he admited to his perſon and council two men imbued with the ſame maxims, by whom he was puſhed on to his ruin: viz. William Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Thomas Wentwotrh earl of Strafford.

While this Prince had no difficulties to ſtruggle with from abroad, he injoyed his uſurped power with ſome tranquillity, but not without the open murmurings of the people. Mean time, no perſon dared to oppoſe ſo violent a torrent. At laſt, the archbiſhop of Canterbury adviſing him to finiſh the reſtoration of the Scotiſh hierarchy, and introduction of the Engliſh liturgy, he followed the pernicious advice, but could not execute his project, without ingaging in an open war, in 1639, with his ancient kingdom of Scotland. He levied forces, and maintained them by taxes, which he himſelf had impoſed. Money failing him after the firſt campain, he at laſt, in April 1640, called a parliament, which was diſſolved in a few days, for the ſame reaſon as the three firſt, and the arbitrary impoſitions continued as before. But the King quickly perceived, that the continuation of his power, depended upon the happy ſucceſs of his arms. The people ſerved him with regret. The lords on diverſe pretenſes withdrew from court. The validity of his orders, by virtue whereof his impoſitions were levied, were conteſted in town and country. In ſhort, the King ſaw his ſubjects every where ready to deſert him, on the firſt occaſion.

This occaſion preſented itſelf ſooner than he expected. His army having received a check, and the Scots ſurprized Newcaſtle, the King was forced to ſeek means to drive them out of England, whereas he had hoped to become abſolute in Scotland. But inſtead of finding his Engliſh ſubjects ready to aſſiſt him, he ſaw them on the contrary rejoice at his diſgrace, and conſidered it as a proper opportunity to recover their privileges. In this extremity, he aſſembled the peers at York, in order to adviſe with them upon what was to be done. Their unanimous opinion was, that the only way to free himſelf from the preſent difficulties, was to call a parliament. He then perceived, that an interval of fifteen years was not capable to efface out of the minds of the Engliſh, the memory of their parliaments, which they looked upon as the ſtrongeſt ſupport of their liberties. Mean while, he was under a ſort of neceſſity to follow the advice of the peers, in calling a parliament (1).

In the preſent diſpoſition of the people to the King, ſuch repreſentatives were choſen, as were eminent for their ability, courage, and firm attachment to the privileges of the ſubject. The parliament being met, inſtead of thinking to drive the Scots out of the kingdom, as the King had hoped, believed they ought, before all things, to ſecure the liberties of the nation, by ſeting bounds to the illegal authority, which the King had for fifteen years aſſumed. This reſolution was no ſooner diſcovered, than all the people adhered to the parliament. From that time the King was ſo deſtitute of friends, that he ſaw himſelf unable to reſiſt the torrent. His only refuge was, to comply with his parliament, and paſs almoſt every bill preſented to him to curb his authority. He hoped, by this condeſcenſion, to convince his ſubjects of his intention to return to the ancient courſe from which he had been diverted by evil counſels, and perhaps he really deſigned it, but could gain no belief. On the contrary, it was thought, that mere neceſſity obliged him to meaſures ſo oppoſite to the former. Hereupon, mutual confidence, ſo neceſſary between the King and his people, being intirely loſt, the parliament would no longer depend upon the ſincerity of a Prince, whom they believed they had juſt cauſe to diſtruſt. They therefore inceſſantly labored to ſecure the liberties of the ſubject from any future invaſion. To this end, they were not ſatisfied with obtaining the King's conſent to acts which reduced the Royal power within its ancient limits, but alſo extorted his aſſent to laws, which conſiderably leſſened the juſt prerogatives of the crown. The friends of the parliament ſcrupled not to affirm, that the ſubject could never be ſecure in his property, while the King had power to return to his former courſes. Thus King Charles, who had hoped to carry the Royal authority higher than any of his predeceſſors, ſaw himſelf, on the contrary, deprived of great part of his legal power. He even had the mortification to ſee himſelf forced, in May 1641, to ſign the earl of Strafford's ſentenſe, who had acted nothing without his orders, or at leaſt his approbation. The archbiſhop of Canterbury alſo, loſt his head on the ſcaffold in 1644.

Had the parliament contented themſelves with ſetling the government upon its ancient foundations, very probably, it would not afterwards have been eaſily ſhaken. But on ſuch occaſions it is difficult to keep a juſt medium. The leading members, willing to ſcreen themſelves from the attemps of the Royal power, almoſt intirely changed the ancient conſtitution, by ſtriping the crown of the beſt part of its prerogatives. It was no longer the King and parliament which governed the nation, but the parliament alone, or rather the houſe of commons, managed all affairs. The houſe of peers had ſcarce any other power, than that of an implicit aſſent to the bills offered to them, and the King was but the ſhadow of a Sovereign. However, it was this very thing that procured him adherents, whom doubtleſs, he would never have had, if the balance had been kept even. Many thought it as ſtrange that the parliament ſhould, as I may ſay, govern without a King, as that the King ſhould attempt to rule without a parliament. The conſtitution of the government ſuffered equally by both uſurpations. But that which brought the ſtrongeſt acceſſion to the King's party was, that the parliament, to gain the Scots to their intereſt, were poſſeſſed with the project, of changing the Epiſcopal government of the church, into Preſbyterian, which they accompliſhed with open force. Moſt of the Engliſh, accuſtomed to ſee the church under the direction of biſhops, could not bear this change without murmuring. But as theſe were not the ſtrongeſt, becauſe the parliament had the treaſure, army, and places at their diſpoſal, their only refuge was to unite with the King.

Then it was that two parties appeared in the kingdom, one for the King, and one for the parliament, with a ſort of equality, which quickly made it believed, they would not long remain quiet, without coming to arms. The King's adherents at firſt had the name of Cavaliers, which was afterwards changed into that of Tories: and thoſe of the parliament, then called Roundheads, have received the name of Whigs. The oirgin of theſe two famous diſtinctions is this: at that time a ſort of Iriſh banditti, or robbers, who kept in the mountains and iſles formed by the vaſt bogs of that country, were called Tories, and at preſent are known by the name of Raparees. As the King's enemies accuſed him of favoring the Iriſh rebellion, which broke out about that time, they gave his adherents the name of Tories. Theſe, on the other hand, to be even with their enemies, who were cloſely united with the Scots, called them Whigs, a name of reproach uſed in Scotland (1). Hence it appears, that theſe two names are as ancient as the troubles, tho' they were not in vogue till many years after. I cannot preciſely fix the time, but am of opinion, that Cavalier and Roundhead, continued till the reſtoration of Charles II, and then by degrees, were changed into Tory and Whig. Theſe are the two parties which began to divide England in the time of Charles I, and which ſtill divide it to this day. The Roman Catholics, called Papiſts in England, joined, from the firſt, the King's party, which was more favorable to to them than that of the parliament, and have always remained united with the Tories.

What has been ſaid, ſufficiently ſhows, that the King's party was compoſed of two ſorts of men, of which the one had principally in view the political intereſt of the King and the crown, and the others, that of the church of England. But they were all re-united in this point, that they found their mutual advantage in the King's proſperity, without which they could not hope to ſucceed in their reſpective deſigns. For this reaſon, they were conſidered but as one party, under the ſame name of Cavaliers or Royaliſts. This mixture of two different views in the ſame party, ſubſiſts to this day, and is not one of the leaſt cauſes of that confuſion of ideas, which the word Tory occaſions. To remove this ambiguity as much as is poſſible, I ſhall call the firſt, the Political or State-Cavaliers, and the others, the Eccleſiaſtical or Church Cavaliers. Each of theſe two branches were again ſubdivided. For among the political Cavaliers there were ſome, who following the maxims of the duke of Buckingham, archbiſhop Laud, and the earl of Strafford, wiſhed to ſee the King inveſted with abſolute power, and able to deſtroy the privileges of the parliament. Theſe may be called the rank Cavaliers. Their number was ſmall, and little capable to ſupport the King in his adverſity, tho', during his proſperity, they made a great noiſe. The other branch of the political Cavaliers, was compoſed of men whom I ſhall call moderate. Theſe deſired indeed the reſtoration of the Royal authority, but according to the ancient conſtitution. The other Cavaliers, whom I call Eccleſiaſtical, were alſo ſubdivided into two branches, one of which was compoſed of rigid Churchmen, who were againſt the leaſt change in the diſcipline of the church of England. Thoſe who compoſed the other branch, were leſs ſcrupulous and obſtinate, and may be called the Low or Moderate Churchmen.

In oppoſition to the Cavaliers or Royaliſts, the Roundheads, or Parliamentarians, were divided into two principal branches, namely, the Political and Eccleſiaſtical. The firſt had principally in view, the maintenance of the rights of the people, and the ſecond, the advancement of Preſbytery. Each of theſe branches was likewiſe ſubdivided into two, one whereof was compoſed of Republicans, who aimed at undermining the Regal power, and erecting a commonwealth; the other, of the Moderate Roundheads, or Parliamentarians, deſired only to reduce the King to an incapacity of abuſing his power, by leaving him the poſſeſſion of his juſt rights. This relates only to the political Roundheads, or Parliamentarians. As for the eccleſiaſtical they alſo formed two branches, of which the firſt was compoſed of the rigid Preſbyterians, who would be contented with nothing leſs than the deſtruction of the Hierarchy; and the other, of the moderate Preſbyterians, who would have been ſatisfied with much leſs, and perhaps with a bare toleration. It was abſolutely neceſſary to premiſe thus much, in order to inable the reader to underſtand the ſequel of this Diſſertation. I ſhall more largely ſpeak of the views and intereſts of the different branches of the two parties, after I have finiſhed the abridgment which their riſe obliged me to interrupt.

While the King was in a deplorable ſtate, without money or friends, and reduced to bear every thing from the parliament, who had him, as I may ſay, at their mercy, he beheld a ray of hope

(1) Rapin by miſtake ſays, they were ſo called from certain robbers in Scotland. But Burnet tells us the name is derived from the word Whiggam, uſed by the Weſtern Scots in driving their horſes, from whence thoſe drivers were called Whiggamors, and by contraction, Whiggs, p. 43.

ſhine

ſhine in the riſe of the two parties, I have been ſpeaking of. He thought immediately, that to foment the diviſion could not but be advantageous to him, wherein he ſucceeded. He thereby ſaw himſelf at laſt in a condition to hope to do himſelf juſtice, by his arms, for the injuries of which he thought he had reaſon to complain. In this expectation he raiſed an army, and ingaged in an open war againſt the parliament, who on their ſide had now taken all the neceſſary meaſures to reſiſt him.

The particulars of this war are needleſs here, ſince the ſad concluſion of it is ſtill recent. It will ſuffice to ſay, that Charles I was vanquiſhed, and beheaded the 30th of January 1648. Thus the King himſelf, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Strafford, archbiſhop Laud, authors of the project to render the King abſolute, came all to a tragical end. If to theſe we add, the examples of John, Henry III, Edward II, Richard II, and laſtly, of James II, who had all the ſame deſign, and all miſcarried in the execution, it will be eaſy to ſee how difficult and dangerous it is for a King of England, to attempt to ſubvert ſo well cemented a government.

Oliver Cromwell, author of Charles I's death, remained maſter of the government. He durſt not however aſſume the title of King; and if he had the addreſs to render himſelf abſolute, it was under the ſpecious pretenſe of maintaining the nation's liberties. He is the ſingle inſtance in England, of an uſurper dying a natural death in his uſurpation.

While the ſovereign authority was in Cromwell's hands, the Cavaliers were extremely humbled. But they revived on the death of this formidable enemy. To give their adverſaries no advantage againſt them, they put themſelves under the conduct of thoſe of their party, who were the moſt moderate, ſo that there ſeemed to be no more rank or rigid Tories. This policy was abſolutely neceſſary, at a time, when the Royal prerogative, and the rights of the church were not to be inſiſted on, as there were neither King nor biſhops. At laſt, by a moſt ſurprizing revolution, aſſiſted by the prudent conduct of general Monk, the Engliſh united to ſet Charles II on the throne, ſon of the deceaſed King, and to reſtore the Monarchy and the Church to their former ſtate.

Charles II reigned peaceably at firſt. He was a Prince who wanted neither wit nor penetration, but was indolent, and addicted to his pleaſures. His intention was to live quietly, and avoid all diſputes with his ſubjects. He was too weary of a long exile, during which he had often wanted common neceſſaries, to be willing to hazard the being again reduced to the ſame ſtate. On the other hand, the Engliſh had time, and frequent occaſion, to open their eyes, and diſcover, that by a pretended maintenance of their liberties, they had been drawn into ſervitude. For it may be affirmed, that England had never injoyed leſs freedom, than under the government of the long parliament, and afterwards of Oliver Cromwell. However, Charles II ingaged himſelf by degrees, farther than he ever intended. This, doubtleſs, was owing either to his indolence, or too great condeſcenſion to his miniſters, who were all Cavaliers, and whom, for the future, I ſhall call Tories, as I ſhall give the Roundheads the name of Whigs, tho' I do not know exactly when theſe two names were firſt uſed. The Tories therefore, who alone were in the King's confidence, were inceſſantly urging him to reſtore the Monarchy and Church to their ancient luſtre. The court of France, for intereſts of their own, labored to inſpire him with the ſame deſign. In a word, his miniſters took great care to hinder the Whigs from inſinuating themſelves into the King's favor.

The Tory party had at their head the duke of York, the King's brother, a Prince naturally impetuous and violent, who having imbraced the Roman Catholic religion in his exile, formed the project of eſtabliſhing it in England. This project could not be executed, without firſt extending the Royal power beyond the bounds preſcribed by the law, that is to ſay, without reſuming and purſuing the ſame deſign, wherein his father had unhappily miſcarried. But the duke, by reaſon of his impetuous temper, was very improper to conduct ſuch an undertaking. He purſued it eagerly during his brother's reign, who had no legitimate iſſue, hoping that the work then begun, would be more eaſy to finiſh on his own acceſſion to the throne.

To ſucceed in this deſign, he had no other way than to begin it with the utter ruin of the Whigs, whoſe principles were directly contrary to the duke's deſigns, both with regard to the church and the ſtate. It muſt be obſerved, that moſt of the Whigs were then Preſbyterians. So, in pretending only to attack Preſbyterianiſm, the duke of York projected the deſtruction of thoſe who oppoſed the increaſe of the Regal power, without alarming the nation. Indeed, after humbling the Whigs, he might fear to meet with great obſtacles from the moderate Tories, whoſe principles did not intirely agree with the arbitrary power he intended to eſtabliſh. But he deſpaired not to ſurmount, if the Whigs, his more dangerous enemies, were once removed out of the way. To this end, he induced his brother to perſecute the Preſbyterians, wherein he was aſſiſted by all the Tories, who with pleaſure beheld this firſt occaſion of being revenged on their enemies, the Whigs. So Preſbyterianiſm was furiouſly attacked, under a pretenſe of reſtoring the church to the ſtate it was in before the troubles. An act was paſſed, forbiding the Preſbyterian aſſemblies, which were called Conventicles; and another known by the name of the Teſt-act, which indeed more directly concerned the Roman Catholics. This act ordained, that no perſon ſhould be admited to any public office, without producing a certificate of his having communicated in an Epiſcopal church. Moreover, it was called the Conformity-act, becauſe all who were to be admited to any office, were obliged, by this ſtatute, to conform to the church of England.

The Whigs ſoon perceived, that under color of maintaining the rights of the church of England, the duke of York's deſign was to change the government of the ſtate, and ruin the Proteſtant religion in England. It required ſome time to take juſt meaſures; and at laſt, with the aſſiſtance of the moderate Tories, who feared the duke of York's going too far, they obliged the King to ſend him out of the kingdom. Nay, the commons prepared a bill, called the Excluſion-bill, to deprive him of the right of ſucceſſion. But the paſſing of this bill was prevented by the diſſolution of the parliament. Another was called at Oxford, in expectation of finding the members leſs violent. But the King was miſtaken, and, after a ſhort ſeſſion, was again obliged to diſſolve them, upon their indeavoring to paſs the like bill.

It will perhaps ſeem ſtrange, that the ſcene ſhould be thus changed, and the Whigs, who were extremely low, ſhould ſuddenly become ſuperior. To let the reader into the reaſon of this change, it is neceſſary to remark, that the moderate Tories promoted the deſigns of the court, while they believed them levelled only againſt the Preſbyterians. But perceiving, by all the proceedings of the King, the duke of York, and the miniſters, that a project was formed to ruin the conſtitution of church and ſtate, and undermine the foundation of Magna Charta, they readily joined with the Whigs to oppoſe the execution of this project. It was therefore this union which gave the Whigs a ſuperiority, to which, otherwiſe, they could never have pretended. On the other hand, the State Tories and rigid Churchmen, deſiring to recover the ground they had loſt, indeavored to gain the people to their intereſt, by accuſing the Whigs of a ſetled deſign to ruin the church, and theſe in their turn accuſed the others, of intending the ſubverſion of the government, and of favoring the duke of York's pernicious deſigns. Thus the enmity of the parties, which ſeemed to have been much weakened by the reſtoration, was revived. It may truly be ſaid, that the Tories were in fault, who to revenge the wrongs received from the long parliament, and Cromwell's uſurpation, raſhly threw themſelves into the duke of York's party. They afterwards repented, when they ſaw to what the duke intended to make them ſubſervient.

Some time after, the minds of the people being a little calmed, the duke of York returned into England, and continued without interruption to foment diviſion, without which he could not hope to effect his deſigns. So this Prince (by an exceſs of zeal for his religion, by a deſire of revenge, and perhaps excited by the ambition of accompliſhing a project, which had been in vain attempted by ſeveral Kings of England) and Charles II, thro' a too great condeſcenſion to his brother, kindled a flame in England, which is not yet extinguiſhed.

Charles II died during theſe tranſactions, and the duke of York aſcended the throne, by the name of James II, without any oppoſition. He at firſt made great promiſes to his ſubjects, that neither religion, nor the conſtitution, ſhould ſuffer any change in his reign. But he was far from performing his promiſes. Shortly after, the duke of Monmouth, natural ſon of Charles II, relying on the diſcontent of the people, left the Low-Countries, where he had lived ſome time in exile, made a deſcent in England with a handful of men, and aſſumed the title of King. But his royalty laſted but few days. His party being much weaker than he had expected, he was defeated, taken, and beheaded. The King was ſo elated by a victory, obtained with ſuch eaſe, that he ſcrupled not to diſcover his deſigns, ſo ſecure did he think himſelf of the ſucceſs. The judges, who were devoted to him, gave their opinion, that the King might diſpenſe with the laws. Their deciſion was founded upon ſome ſtatutes lodging this power in the Sovereign, with regard to certain laws; and upon examples of ſome of his predeceſſors, who had, in this reſpect, exceeded the bounds of their power. Thus theſe corrupted judges drew from particular caſes a general concluſion, and founded a permanent right upon ſome tranſient uſurpations.

This door being opened, the King by his ſole authority repealed the penal laws, inacted by ſeveral parliaments to prevent the deſigns of the Papiſts. He next filled his army with officers of that religion, and beſtowed preferments and titles upon men, who by the laws were unqualified. He took away the charters from London, and other corporations, and reduced them to a dependence upon his pleaſure. In ſhort, by a bare proclamation he granted a full liberty of conſcience, and permited to each ſect the public profeſſion of their religion. This proclamation had a double view, to favor the Papiſts, and to amuſe the Preſbyterians. The King was perſuaded, that as the latter were ſtill liable to the penal laws inacted againſt them in the late reign, they would be glad to be freed from them, and that the fear of forfeiting the liberty granted by the proclamation would keep them in ſubmiſſion. But they were not deceived by an artifice directly tending to their ruin. I omit many other ſteps taken by the King, which were but too capable to fill all his ſubjects with terror.

Hitherto the Tories in general had favored the King's deſigns. But when they perceived, all his proceedings tended to a ſubverſion of the eſtabliſhed government, and ruin of the Proteſtant religion, they began to repent of their paſt conduct. They clearly ſaw, that by the courſe they were made to take, it was intended to lead them where they deſigned not to go, and that they could not attain their end, the ruin of the Whigs, without the loſs of their religion and liberty. In this danger, which could not be more imminent, they joined the Whigs, and with them, reſolved to call in the Prince of Orange to free them from their dangerous ſtate. From that time the King's party became extreamly weak, being compoſed of only Papiſts, rank Tories, and ſome lords, ſlaves of the court, and their fortune. Mean while, the King appeared outwardly as powerful as ever, and near the end of his undertaking; becauſe thoſe who yet ſeemed attached to the court, did not think proper to declare before the time. The Prince of Orange was landed before the King's weakneſs was viſible. His army, his fleet, the lords whom he thought moſt devoted to his perſon, forſook him at once, and he was reduced to the ſad neceſſity of trying in a diſguiſe to eſcape out of his kingdom. But failing even in this attempt, he had the mortification to ſee himſelf at the mercy of the Prince of Orange, and, in all appearance, indebted to his generoſity, or perhaps his policy, for the indirect means which were furniſhed him, of flying into France. This example ſhows, that tho' the Engliſh are divided into two parties, and there is great enmity between them, their paſſion does not however cauſe them, in general, at leaſt, to abandon the intereſts of religion and liberty.

William and Mary being crowned, on the flight, or, as it was called, the Abdication of King James, their chief care was to ſtifle the ſeeds of diviſion ſtill ſubſiſting between the Whigs and Tories, tho' the danger had united them. In order to this, it was neceſſary to remove from the miniſtry and their confidence, the favorers of King James's deſigns, and the bigots to the minuteſt rites and ceremonies of the church of England. Whithout this, the Whigs could never have injoyed any quiet, ſince they ever conſidered the rank and rigid Tories, as their irreconcileable enemies. On the other hand, it was not leſs neceſſary to remove from the council the moſt rigid Whig Preſbyterians, for fear of giving occaſion to think, there was a deſign to change the church government. This fear would have been the more juſt, as the new King having ever profeſſed in Holland the Preſbyterian religion, the leaſt ſtep in its favor, might have raiſed a ſuſpicion of his deſigning to eſtabliſh it upon the ruins of the national church. Great addreſs was therefore to be uſed to remove all cauſe of fear and jealouſy in the Tories. It was for theſe purpoſes that, during the reign of William and Mary, the offices were generally confered on the moderate men of both parties. This maxim was purſued by King William when he reigned alone, after the Queen's death. But as it was impoſſible to pleaſe both parties at once, unleſs there had been more places to give, he affected frequently to change his miniſtry, and imploy the two parties alternately. This was all he could do, till time ſhould have extinguiſhed intirely the flames of diviſion.

Under ſuch circumſtances, and a King of ſuch wiſdom and foreſight, it may be almoſt affirmed, that no disturbance would have happened to the government from the difference of the principles of the two parties, if the Church Tories could have been contented with seeing their church remain established. But they could not be satisfied, so long as they saw the Presbyterians injoy an intire liberty of conscience, publicly exercise their religion, and fill offices, contrary to the conformity act of Charles II. They were jealous that the Whigs intended by degrees to undermine the church, and that the King concured with them in that design. What they had seen during the long parliament gave them occasion to fear the same attacks. The rank Tories, having lost King James, their patron and defender, inspired the Episcopal party with these fears and jealousies, to animate them against King William. They perceived, they were no longer able to suport themselves, unless means were found to ingage the church in their quarrel. Hence the rumors industriously spread among the people, of the church's being in danger. The Whigs saw by this, that the rank Tories had not relinquished their projects, but would, whenever they were armed with power, make use of the pretense of religion to ruin them, in imitation of King James. It was thus, that animosity was continued between the two parties, notwithstanding King William's care and indeavors.

It seemed therefore, that religion was then the sole point in question between the two parties; the junctures not allowing either the rank Tories, or the republican Whigs, to push their principles. This has given occasion to a false idea of the differences between the two parties, and to an imagination, that they solely consist in a diversity of sentiments concerning church-government. But this is certainly a mistake. When an opportunity offers, the rank Tories show, that the safety of the church is not the sole motive of their conduct, and probably the Republican Whigs would also remember their maxims, at a favorable juncture.

As to the Papists, who may be considered as a branch of the Tories, they would have had reason to be satisfied with King William's moderation, if their extreme desire to see King James again on the throne, had not caused them to look upon the reigning King as their enemy. Some of them were even ingaged in conspiracies against his person, which only turned to their own confusion and ruin. This immoderate desire expressed by the Papists, and even by some Tories, for the restoration of King James, obliged King William to seek means, not only for the prevention of their ill designs during his life, but also to render their indeavors fruitless after his death. Accordingly, by an act of parliament, the succession of the crown was setled in the illustrious house of Hanover, without any regard to the pretensions which birth or nearness of blood could give to any Papist whatsoever. William died shortly after, and Anne, daughter of James II, and Princess of Denmark, mounted the throne.

This Queen had been educated in the principles of the rigid Tories with respect to religion, and, probably in those of the rank Tories, with regard to government. At least, all who had any power over her, or were concerned in her education, were of this character. Charles II her uncle, James II her father, the earl of Rochester her mother's brother, were all rank Tories, deeming any opposition to the Sovereign's will, a manifest rebellion. Queen Anne was beside of no great capacity, and naturally obstinate. An accidental quarrel with her sister Queen Mary, having made her resolve to withdraw from court, she was so punctual to her resolution, that she would not even visit the Queen her sister, when on her death-bed. The meaness of her genius foretold the power which her ministry would have in the government. On the other hand, her education made it feared, she would be guided by the rank and rigid Tories, of whom her uncle the earl of Rochester, was considered as the head. This lord was equally dreaded by the Whigs and moderate Tories, as a dangerous man, and capable of carrying things to extremities. He was otherwise a person of great parts, but very fond of his principles. Probably, he was going to be at the helm of the government, by the accession of the Queen his niece to the throne. But it is pretended, that the fear of the moderate Tories to see him in so high a post, made them resolve to join with the Whigs, to prevent it. At least it is certain, that such an union was made, which forced the Queen to throw herself into their arms, and trust them with the management of affairs. I am a stranger to the intrigues used to bring the Queen to these measures. The lords Godolphin, Marlborough, and some other leaders of the moderate Tories, were among those who joined the Whigs, and strengthened them more by their ability, than their credit and numbers. From this time, the moderate Tories and the Whigs made but one party.

It is needless to relate here, with what glory to England, and to the Queen in particular, these new ministers directed the public affairs. This is a thing universally known, and the memory of it still recent. But it is pretended, that by reason of the meaness of the Queen's genius, they held her in a kind of servitude, tho' they outwardly affected to give her the honor of all her glorious successes. During their administration, the rank and rigid Church Tories were excluded from all civil imployments, and ecclesiastical dignities. Had this continued to the death of the Queen, these two branches of the Tory party would doubtless have been considerably lessened in number and credit.

Mean time, the Queen saw herself, not without some impatience, forced, as it were, to follow the counsels of those whom she had a right to command, and who, if public report is to be credited, left her not free to pursue her own inclinations or judgment. The rank Tories perceiving, or perhaps suggesting these sentiments to the Queen, industriously cherished her discontent, by the assistance of a certain lady, who was in her confidence. Such was their success, that after they had satisfied her, that she was a slave, they brought her to a resolution of freeing herself. This intrigue was conducted with such art and secresy, that her ministers found themselves supplanted, before any measures could be taken to prevent their ruin. Immediately, their places were filled with rank and furious Tories. The parliament, in which the Whigs had a great superiority of votes, was dissolved, and another called, to which the new ministers took care to have members returned devoted to their party. Any person, ever so little acquainted with the affairs of England, knows what influence the court has in the elections. It may, however, be affirmed, that in respect of number, the party of the ministry was still inconsiderable. But they had the Queen and the parliament on their side. Beside, they were very careful to strengthen their party, by infusing jealousies on the account of religion, and persuading the Episcopalians that the church had been in great danger, during the late administration, and would always be so, as long the Whigs had any share in the government. These insinuations revived the passion of the Church Tories, and carried them to such excesses against the Presbyterians, as should not be allowed in a well ordered state, but which these ministers affected to connive at. Indeed, their deſign was not to leſſen, but rather to increaſe the animoſity between the two parties, becauſe their own was thereby ſtrengthened.

Hitherto every thing ſucceeded to the wiſh of the new miniſtry. But they were very ſenſible, that the preſent advantages, procured by theſe imaginary terrors, would be of no long continuance. Beſide, tho' they could have kept the people always in this diſpoſition, the Queen might die very ſoon, eſpecially as ſhe was very infirm. In that caſe, they had reaſon to fear, the fabric they had raiſed, would be demoliſhed, by the Elector of Hanover, who was to ſucceed the Queen, by virtue of the act of ſucceſſion, for which he was chiefly indebted to the Whigs. They were therefore to think of preventing this danger without loſs of time. Their party was too weak to ſtruggle with the Sovereign, ſhould he happen to be againſt them, as had been often ſeen during the reign of King William, and in the firſt years of Queen Anne. They therefore concluded, at leaſt, if we may judge by their proceedings, that their ſureſt way would be to ſecure the crown to the Pretender, in order to have a protector when the Queen ſhoud fail them. It is however ſtill uncertain, whether the earl of Oxford, that able miniſter, now in the Tower, was of this opinion. But it cannot be denied, that they believed the aſſiſtance of France to be abſolutely neceſſary for their ſupport. Accordingly, to ſecure it, they made a diſhonorable and haſty peace, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe, and forced the allies of England to follow her example. Probably had not the Queen died ſo ſoon after the peace, the oppreſſed Whigs would have been obliged to call in to their aſſiſtance, the Elector of Hanover, as they had before the Prince of Orange, but with far leſs hope of having the general concurence of the people. The reaſon is, becauſe King James's deſign to ſubvert the church and ſtate, was ſo open, that it could not be doubted, whereas againſt the Pretender there were only bare preſumptions.

What has lately happened ſince King George's acceſſion to the throne, ſhows, there was a formed deſign to ſecure the ſucceſſion to the Pretender, had not the death of the Queen happened, before the authors of it had time to take all their meaſures. It is however uncertain, whether they could have executed their deſign, or whether, if they could, the Pretender's reign would have been of any long continuance. The Engliſh in general are extremely jealous of their laws and liberties, nor are they leſs ſo of their religion. This is what I think I may venture to affirm, tho' ſome of them ſeem indifferent as to the latter. But, thanks be to God, theſe are far from being the majority. Now it would have been very difficult for the Pretender, advanced to the throne by foreign aid, profeſſing a religion contrary to the national, and guided by rank Tories, to keep himſelf within the bounds of moderation, neceſſary to gain the hearts of his ſubjects, without which a King of England can never ſit firmly on his throne. However, without ſtaying to gueſs what might have happened, let us only obſerve that the rank and rigid Tories have been diſappointed. Not only, the Pretender is not King, but his hopes of becoming ſo were never leſs. King George is in peaceable poſſeſſion of his crown; the Tories are humbled, and the Whigs, lately oppreſſed, are now at the top of the wheel.

After this brief account of the riſe and progreſs of the Tories and Whigs, it will not perhaps be unacceptable to the reader to know more particularly the views, intereſts, ſtrength, and characters of the two parties. For this purpoſe the different branches before-mentioned muſt be carefully diſtinguiſhed. It is therefore neceſſary to repeat here that the two parties may be conſidered under two different relations; namely, with reſpect to the ſtate, and with regard to the church. I ſhall firſt ſpeak of the State Tories and Whigs, after which; I ſhall conſider them with reſpect to religion.

The State Tories are, as I ſaid, divided into two branches, one of which may in French be called, Rank. In England they are known by the name of High Flyers. This idea, taken from birds that by ſoaring above the common flight, loſe themſelves in the clouds, is very ſuitable to men who cannot contain themſelves within the limits of the eſtabliſhed government. Theſe are for having the Sovereign abſolute in England, as he is in France and ſome other countries, and for erecting his will into law. They regard not what I have ſaid in the begining of this Diſſertation, that all the governments at this day in Europe were originally like that eſtabliſhed in England; and conſequently there is no reaſon why the Engliſh ſhould imitate nations who have ſuffered it to be loſt, or at leaſt very much altered. It may be imagined that in ſuch a country as England, this party cannot be very numerous, and yet they are very conſiderable for three reaſons. Firſt, becauſe the heads of this party are perſons of the higheſt rank, and commonly favorites and miniſters of ſtate, or ſuch as hold the greateſt offices at court, and the moſt eminent dignities in the church. Theſe men, who would not willingly put themſelves under the conduct of others, being thus advantageouſly ſituated, become, generally, the leaders of all the Tory party. They manage them as they pleaſe, not only for the advantage of the whole party, but chiefly for their own particular ends. Thus very often, under pretenſe of acting for the intereſt of the party, their proceedings tend only to their own advantage, and the Tories are led by them much farther than moſt of them deſire. It is this which gives occaſion to many perſons to accuſe all the Tories of being for arbitrary power, tho' it is certain that only the High Flyers are chargeable with this principle. But 'tis no great fault, it ſeems, to aſcribe to a whole party what is done by their leaders.

Secondly, this particular branch of Tories is conſiderable, in that, when they are in the miniſtry, they ingage the Church Tories ſtrenuouſly to maintain the doctrine of Paſſive Obedience, which goes a great way towards gaining the people to their party. They inſinuate to the Epiſcopal miſters, that they have only in view the ruin of the Preſbyterians, and under that pretenſe cauſe them to preach a doctrine, the conſequence of which extends to all the ſubjects. This was experienced in the reigns of Charles II, of James II, and of Queen Anne, towards the concluſion.

Laſtly, the party of the High Flyers becomes very powerful, when as it frequently happens, they are ſupported by the King, and then it is that the liberty of the nation is in danger. Proofs of this, have been ſeen in the reigns of James II, and Charles I, Richard II, Edward II, and Henry III; for the High Flyers are more ancient than is imagined.

The ſecond branch of the State Tories is compoſed of thoſe I called moderate. Theſe are for having the King injoy all his prerogatives, but they pretend not, with the High Flyers, to ſacrifice to him the privileges of the ſubject. They are true Engliſhmen, who have the welfare of their country at heart, and are for preſerving the conſtitution tranſmited to them by their anceſtors. They have often ſav'd the ſtate, and will again ſave it, when in danger from the Rank Tories or Republican Whigs, by oppoſing, with all their power, thoſe who ſhall attempt to alter the government. It would be be injuſtice, to confound them with the High Flyers under the general denomination of Tories.

As there are two branches of State Tories, ſo there are two of State Whigs, viz. republican, and moderate Whigs. The Republican Whigs are the remains of the party of the long parliament which indeavored to turn the government into a commonwealth. Theſe at preſent are ſo inconſiderable, that they ſerve only to ſtrengthen the other Whigs with whom they uſually join. The Tories would perſuade the public, that all Whigs are of this kind. And in like manner the Whigs would have it believed that all Tories are High Flyers. But this is only an artifice to render one another mutually odious.

The ſecond branch of the State Whigs contains the moderate Whigs, who are nearly allied to the moderate Tories in principle; and conſequently are to be conſidered as true Engliſhmen, who deſire, the government may be maintained upon its ancient foundations. Herein they would be exactly like the moderate Tories, were it not that theſe incline more to the King, and the moderate Whigs to the parliament. The moderate Whig is perpetually hindering the peoples rights from being invaded, and ſometimes even takes precautions at the expenſe of the crown. By him the triennal act was procured, with ſome others, which it is needleſs to mention, to prevent the abuſe of the Royal power. Hence it is evident that the High Flyers have no greater enemy than the moderate Whig, and that theſe two branches of Whigs and Tories properly form the oppoſition between the State Tories and State Whigs. Theſe laſt laugh at Paſſive-obedience when its conſequences are carried too far. Their principle is, that the Royal power has its bounds, which cannot be tranſgreſſed, without injuſtice. Conſequently they believe, that whenever the Sovereign exceeds his prerogatives, he may be reſiſted by his ſubjects. Hence it is eaſy to infer, they do not think the King can diſpenſe with the laws.

What has been ſaid is ſufficient to ſhow that the moderate State Whigs and Tories are almoſt of the ſame ſentiments. Their being of different parties proceeds from their mutual fear that either may make the ballance incline too much to the King's or the parliament's ſide. It is not therefore ſtrange, that theſe two branches of the oppoſite parties, unite in the preſſing exigencies of the ſtate. For, their views equally point to the preſervation of the government; tho' often they purſue their end by different paths. Accordingly ſince the union of theſe two branches upon the death of King William, they have remained inſeparable, and the moderate Whig and Tory form almoſt the ſame party, under the common appellation of Whig. I dare not however affirm that there are not yet moderate Tories who keep by themſelves, and are unwilling to be confounded with the Whigs.

It muſt be remembered that hitherto I have only ſpoke of the Tories and Whigs in relation to the government, without any regard to religion. I take care not to confound things which ought to be carefully diſtinguiſhed. It is not true that all Churchmen are Tories, or all Preſbyterians Whigs in point of government, as is commonly imagined. Many Preſbyterians are in this reſpect of the ſame principles with the moderate Tories, and would not be leſs concerned to ſee the King ſtriped of his prerogatives, than the ſubject of his privileges. In like manner, many Church-men, even biſhops themſelves, are Whigs, very good Whigs as to the government, and as conſidered in oppoſition to the High Flyers, which ſhows the neceſſity of diſtinguiſhing State Tories and Whigs, from Church Whigs and Tories, of whom we are now going to ſpeak.

I preſume the reader knows that the church of England, when ſhe received the reformation, admited only ſome alterations in her doctrine, but preſerved the Hierarchy with all the ceremonies in which ſhe ſaw nothing ſuperſtitious. The reformation was not properly compleated till the reign of Elizabeth. Then it was that ſeveral conſtitutions of the convocation, confirmed by acts of parliament, ſetled the public worſhip as it ſtands to this day. Mean while, many Engliſhmen who had fled from the rage of Queen Mary, returned home with favorable ſentiments of the reformation, as eſtabliſhed in France, Switzerland, Geneva, and other parts of Germany. Theſe men could not comply with the reformation in England, which in their opinion, had not been carried far enough from the church of Rome. For this reaſon they not only abſented themſelves from the aſſemblies of the eſtabliſhed church, but alſo compoſed ſeparate aſſemblies which were called Conventicles. Theſe Separatiſts were likewiſe ſtiled Preſbyterians, becauſe, refuſing their ſubmiſſion to the biſhops, they maintained that all prieſts or miniſters had an equal authority in the church, which ought to be governed by Preſbyteries, or Conſiſtories, compoſed of miniſters and Lay-elders. Upon this occaſion were two parties formed, who, wanting the mutual forbearance of perſons profeſſing in the main the ſame religion, began to moleſt one another with diſputes in conference and writing. The church of England men were very angry, that private perſons ſhould pretend to reform what, after mature deliberation, had been eſtabliſhed by national ſynods and parliaments. On the other hand, the Preſbyterians thought it no leſs ſtrange, that they ſhould be compelled to practiſe what they believed contrary to the purity of religion (1), and with what their conſciences could not comply. The Preſbyterians were long oppreſſed, becauſe their adverſaries ſupported their arguments with reaſons from the authority of the Queen and parliament.

The Preſbyterians conceived great hopes of the acceſſion of James I, becauſe that Prince had always profeſſed their religion while he reigned in Scotland. But as he readily conformed to the church of England, they were not much eaſed. Mean while, this party, tho' oppreſſed, ſo increaſed, that in the beginning of the troubles they were become very numerous. King Charles I, was ſo attached to the church of England, that it may be affirmed he died a martyr to it, as is evident from his hiſtory. His opinion of the purity of this church, made him hearken to William Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſuggeſting to him the reduction of the church of Scotland under the ſame government with that of England, by introducing the Hierarchy. This undertaking ingaged him in a war with Scotland, and the war produced the long parliament, againſt which he thought himſelf obliged to take arms. This parliament wanting the aſſiſtance of the Scots, could not obtain it but by an ingagement to make the church of England Preſbyterian. A quarrel was therefore ſought with the biſhops, deans, and chapters, in a word, with the whole church of England, which ſaw its Hierarchy, eſtabliſhed by Queen Elizabeth, intirely ſubverted, and the Scotiſh Preſbyterian government introduced. In this diſtreſs the Epiſcopalians had no other reſourſe than to unite the Epiſcopal party with the King's party, and as they had one common intereſt with the Cavaliers, viz. the maintenance of the King's cauſe, they were confounded with them under the ſame party denomination. The Preſbyterians were in the like manner reckoned among the Roundheads, becauſe they adhered to the parliament.

(1) This procured them the name of Puritans.

During the long parliament, and even to the death of Cromwell, the diviſion of the branches juſt mentioned, was hardly perceived. All who were known by the name of Roundheads, or Parliamentarians, were rigid Preſbyterians and Republicans. This was the party then in vogue, and the only one that could prefer ſuch as aſpired to the poſts in the gift of the parliament. In like manner the followers of the King's party appeared to be rank Cavaliers, or rigid Epiſcopalians, becauſe theſe were then moſt regarded at court. But on the reſtoration of Charles II, the ſeveral branches of the two parties began to be diſtinguiſhed. All being tired with the troubles which had ſo long haraſſed the kingdom, the moderate no longer feared to diſcover their ſentiments. Some of the Preſbyterians teſtified a readineſs to relax, and many Epiſcopalians were of opinion that, for the ſake of peace, ſome condeſcenſion might be uſed to the Preſbyterians. Theſe therefore were the men of both parties, who preſerving this moderation, formed the two branches of the moderate Whigs and Tories, with reſpect to religion. But ſtill the majority in both parties firmly adhered to their principles with inconceivable obſtinacy. Among the Epiſcopalians there were thoſe, who, upon no account whatſoever, could be perſuaded to recede in the leaſt from the practiſe of their church. On the other hand, there were Preſbyterians who were no leſs offended at ſeeing a miniſter officiate in a ſurplice, than at hearing him preach hereſy, and who branded with the name of Idolatrous and Superſtitious, every ceremony retained by the church of England. This gave birth to the two branches of the rigid Epiſcopalians and Preſbyterians, which ſubſiſt to this day. The hierarchy is the principal point, on which they are divided. They are both compriſed under the name of Whigs and Tories, becauſe the rigid Epiſcopalians join with the Tories, and the Preſbyterians with the Whigs.

From what has been ſaid concerning the ſeveral branches of Whig and Tory, it is eaſy to gather that theſe two names are very obſcure and equivocal terms, becauſe they convey, or ought to convey to the mind different ideas, according to the ſubject diſcourſed of. For inſtance, if I hear it ſaid, that the Tories and Whigs are at great enmity, this raiſes in my mind an idea comprehending all the ſeveral branches of Whigs and Tories in general. But if I am told, the Tories are for having the King abſolute and independent, or that the Whigs would be glad the regal power were aboliſhed, my idea can only extend to the High Flyers and the Republican Whigs. The reſt of the Whigs and Tories would doubtleſs be offended at any ſuch imputations. In like manner, if I hear that the Tories had rather ſee a Papiſt on the throne than a Proteſtant, favorable to the Whigs, I ſhould injure the Tories in general, by imputing ſuch a thought to them, which can only be entertained by the Popiſh and ſome rigid Church Tories, and perhaps ſome High Flyers. Laſtly, if I hear that the Whigs aim at the ruin of the church of England, I can underſtand this only of the Preſbyterian Whigs, ſince the Epiſcopal Whigs, among whom are ſeveral biſhops, cannot with juſtice be accuſed of laboring the ruin of their own church. Thus the names of Tories and Whigs convey to the mind certain confuſed ideas, which few are capable of rightly diſtinguiſhing. But this difficulty ſtill increaſes, when it is conſidered that the ſame perſon may be either Whig or Tory, according to the ſubject in hand. A Preſbyterian, for inſtance, who wiſhes the ruin of the church of England, is certainly for that reaſon in the Whig party. But if a Preſbyterian oppoſes with all his power the attempts of ſome of his party, againſt the regal authority, it cannot be denied that he is in that reſpect a true Tory. In like manner, when the church only is concerned, the Epiſcopal party are to be conſidered as Tories. But how many even of theſe are Whigs with reſpect to the government? Nor have foreigners only ſuch confuſed ideas in this matter; the Engliſh themſelves are liable to them. Nothing is more frequent than to hear a Whig charging all the Tories in general with an intention to deſtroy the rights and liberties of the ſubject; and a Tory arraigning the Whigs without diſtinction, as utter enemies to the church and ſtate. Every man uſes this confuſion of ideas, occaſioned by the names of Whig and Tory, to accuſe his adverſaries of what is moſt odious in both parties.

Having ſhown, as diſtinctly as I could, what is to be underſtood by the Tories and Whigs, I am next to examine the ſeveral motives and intereſts of the two parties. Were we to rely on what is ſaid by both, nothing is more juſt, more equitable, than the motives by which they are actuated, viz. the glory of God, the honor of the King, the public good, and the welfare of the nation. For my part, if I may ſpeak my mind, it is my belief, that as they are all men, intereſt is the main ſpring of all their actions. Since the two parties were formed, each has earneſtly labored to gain a ſuperiority over the other, becauſe this ſuperiority is attended with poſts, honors and dignities, which are confered on their own members by the prevailing, in excluſion of thoſe of the contrary party. This made King William ſay that, "If he had places "enough to beſtow, he ſhould ſoon reconcile the "two parties." There would be yet another expedient to ſupply what that Prince imagined, viz. to confer all the great places upon neutral lords. But where ſhall we find a ſufficient number of ſuch, who are qualified to exerciſe the higheſt offices? Certainly there are but very few. I own however, there are ſome, who, by their capacity, their impartiality, their diſintereſtedneſs, would deſerve a particular diſtinction. I wiſh I knew them all, that I might inſert their names, and give them in part their due praiſe. But theſe lords, ſo worthy of beign known, are little heard of in foreign parts, becauſe, as they make their court to neither party, the public poſts generally fall not to their ſhare. Nevertheleſs, it ſometimes happens that miniſters are in a manner obliged to find out theſe neutral lords, and advance them to the firſt dignities in the kingdom. We know one eſpecially, who without ever courting the Whig or Tory miniſters, was ſent embaſſador and plenipotentiary at the peace of Ryſwick, honored with the order of the garter, ſucceſſively raiſed to the offices of lord privy ſeal, lord preſident of the council, lord high admiral of England, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, tho' he never ſollicited theſe great offices. I ſpeak of the earl of Pembroke, whoſe reputation is better known to me than that of ſome other lords of the ſame character, who ought to receive no injury from my ſilence. Among all his other virtues, his integrity in the great poſts which he has filled, calls for much nobler incomiums than he can receive from a foreigner, who has neither the honor to know him perſonally, nor to be known by him. If there were in England twelve ſuch lords, advanced to the great offices, it would be an infallible means to humble both parties at once. Then the aſpirers to imployments would make it a merit to eſpouſe neither party, and this impartiality would ſoon deſcend from the great men to the people. But this is a happineſs rather to be deſired than hoped. Neutrality, far from promoting perſons of diſtinguiſhed merit, is rather a ſure impediment to their riſing, becauſe the miniſters and party leaders think only of gratifying their creatures.

Intereſt, as I ſaid, is the principal motive which actuates the two parties, and this is but too apparent. If, for inſtance, the High Flyers wiſh to ſee the Sovereign in poſſeſſion of abſolute power, I very much doubt whether this flows from a deſire of procuring the welfare of the kingdom, tho' they ſhould be perſuaded that deſpotiſm is the moſt compleat form of government. If the public good was the ſole ſpring of their actions, they would not be ſo warm. The ſame may be ſaid of the other branches of the two parties. Each would have it believed, they have only the good of the kingdom in view, while in fact they are only laboring for themſelves, their family and poſterity. But when I ſay that intereſt is their principal motive, I pretend not to exclude intirely many others, which may actuate as well the heads as the members of each party. Some believe that their principles really tend to the good of the ſtate; others act from a religious motive; ſome are ſwayed by revenge, party ſpirit, and the deſire of ſuperiority. Numberleſs other motives there are on which I think it needleſs to inlarge, that I may not be led to examine the conduct of particulars. It is certain, many may purſue the ſame end from different motives. It will be better to ſhow the ſtrength and ſeveral intereſts of both parties. In order to this, it is neceſſary to proceed in this examination according to the different branches into which they are divided. I ſhall begin with the Tories.

It is difficult at firſt to conceive, that in a country like England, bleſſed with ſo many noble privileges which other nations do not at preſent injoy, there ſhould be men who wiſh to ſee the King inveſted with unlimited power. There are indeed but very few who openly profeſs themſelves to be of the party which I call High Flyers. Nevertheleſs it is but too true that ſuch a party has always been in England, and ſtill ſubſiſts to this day, tho' diſowned by moſt of thoſe who are ingaged in it. Can it be denied that ſuch a party exiſted under Charles I? The very judges of the kingdom, who are conſidered as the interpreters of the law, gave it as their opinion, that in caſes of neceſſity the King might impoſe taxes upon his ſubjects, and that the King himſelf is the ſole judge of ſuch caſes. This was rooting up the nobleſt prerogative of the parliament, and the principal cauſe of their frequent meetings. If the Sovereign could levy taxes upon his ſubjects, without authority of parliament, it may be affirmed, that their ſeſſion would be very rare, and perhaps in time, intirely ceaſe. But if the parliament were once laid aſide, what would become of the privileges and immunities of the ſubject? In all likelihood the caſe would be the ſame as in France, ſince the general aſſembly of the ſtates has been diſcontinued. Has it not alſo been ſeen under James II, that the judges aſcribed to the King a power of diſpenſing with the penal laws? And was not this making him abſolute? In ſhort, we have ſeen Charles I, Charles II, James II, taking large ſteps towards arbitrary power, which they would never have attempted, had they not expected to be ſupported by a numerous party. Let Queen Anne's proceedings in the laſt years of her reign be conſidered; for inſtance, the negociation and concluſion of the peace of Utrecht; the creation of twelve peers at once; the violences uſed in parliamentary elections; and it cannot be denied that they were ſo many advances towards deſpotiſm, to which ſhe was excited by the party I am ſpeaking of. It is therefore certain, there is ſuch a party in the kingdom. But as they dare not openly avow their principles, they cover them with the pretenſe of maintaining the rights of the crown, to which they ſeem to confine themſelves, willing to have it believed that they are of the party of the moderate Tories. But the principal High Flyers, being commonly favorites or miniſters of ſtate, it generally happens that they become heads of the whole party of the Tories, and ingage them to do more than they would. They begin with attacking the Preſbyterians, and ſo ingage the Church Tories to follow their meaſures, without knowing whither it is intended to lead them. On pretenſe of having the Diſſenters only in view, they cauſe the clergy to preach Paſſive-obedience, which tends directly to arbitrary power. It is this which renders the High Flyers more powerful than appears at firſt ſight. The main concern of this party lies in drawing the church into their quarrel, by pretending an extreme zeal for her rights. They are thereby confounded with the Church Tories, whoſe number is very conſiderable, who avoid giving the alarm to the moderate Tories, and ſo keep themſelves undiſcovered till they have made the whole party ſubſervient to their particular deſigns. But for all this, notwithſtanding their care to obſerve what I have been ſaying, they have the misfortune never to arrive at the end of their carreer. After they have made themſelves leaders of the whole Tory party, and by ſecret paths, conducted the Moderate and Church Tories to a certain point, they are at laſt forced upon ſome proceedings which diſcover their deſigns. Then they loſe many of their followers, who not only deſert them, but go over to the Whigs. This was the caſe of James II, who ſaw himſelf ſuddenly abandoned by all the world, juſt as he thought himſelf ſecure of his ends. If in the laſt years of Queen Anne, the High Flyers, who governed in her name, had attempted to procure a repeal of the act of ſucceſſion, very probably, they would have met with the ſame mortification, and I do not doubt but the ſame thing will happen upon every the like occaſion. The reaſon of what I advance ſeems to me evident, viz. that it can be advantageous but to very few Engliſhmen, to have a Popiſh or abſolute King.

The party or branch of the Moderate Tories much exceeds in number that of the High Flyers; whatever advantage this laſt may have from the quality of their leaders, the other is more powerful from the goodneſs of their cauſe, I mean the preſervation of the King's juſt prerogatives. This is properly the intereſt of all Engliſhmen, who cannot hope for greater happineſs under any other form of government, than under that which has been ſo long eſtabliſhed. This branch of the moderate Tories becomes ſtill more conſiderable as often as any attempt is made to extend or to abridge the Royal prerogative. If to abridge it, they are joined by all the Whigs; if to extend it, they are aſſiſted by all the reſt of the Tories. Nevertheleſs it ſometime happens, that the junctures produces ſome change in the principles, as well as in the intereſts of this party. When the Sovereign favors the Tories in general, by confering places and poſts upon them, nothing is capable to detach the moderate Tories from his intereſt: but their affection cools whenever he inclines to the other ſide. Then if they ſee the Whigs, by a precaution common to them, make any attempt upon the prerogative Royal, they are ready to join them. But herein their ſole aim is to let the King know that they deſerve his regard. This courſe was frequently taken by them in the reign of King William, who often changed ſides. In general, it is the intereſt of the moderate Tories to oppoſe the attempts of the Whigs againſt the authority of the Sovereign, becauſe this ſupports their credit at court and in the country. But withal they are to take care that the High Flyers do not, under the ſpecious pretenſe of being of the ſame name and party, carry them farther than is neceſſary.

As to the Church Tories, it may eaſily be conceived that they include almoſt the whole kingdom in their party, ſince this branch conſiſts of all the members of the church of England. Therefore when religion is in queſtion, between the Whigs and Tories, the former are not able to reſiſt their adverſaries. To this ſuperiority is owing the readineſs with which the Church Tories ſhow their reſentment againſt the Preſbyterian Whigs. It is not ſo with the Whigs, who even in their greateſt proſperity dare not ſo much as diſcover the leaſt thought of attacking the church. They did it once under the long parliament, and it will never be forgot by the Tories. They look upon the Whig party as an enemy always ready to undermine the foundations of their church; and, from what was once done, infer the deſire of doing the like again, when a favorable opportunity preſents. This makes them ſo readily receive every impreſſion which from time to time is given them of the church's being in danger, and ſuffer themſelves to be eaſily deluded on that account. Their leaders know ſo well how to improve this diſpoſition, that they project nothing in relation to the ſtate, without including the church. This is an infallible expedient to unite the whole party, which would be very much divided, were the government only concerned. This procured Charles I many adherents, whom aſſuredly he would have wanted, had the parliament not attacked the church of England. Moreover it was this, which, in the reign of Charles II, put the duke of York, tho' a Papiſt, at the head of the Epiſcopal Tories, who willingly concured with him in the deſtruction of their enemies. Whenever King William turned to the ſide of the Whigs, the Tories were full of imaginary fears of his laboring the ruin of their church. The ſame method was practiſed in the firſt years of Queen Anne, becauſe the miniſtry was then compoſed of Whigs or moderate Tories. The ſame imaginary fear threw the Epiſcopalians, towards the concluſion of that reign, into the ſchemes of men who had viſibly no religion at at all. In ſhort, on this very pretenſe, we lately ſaw in the reign of King George, a Popiſh Pretender called in to ſcreen the church of England from the pretended attempts ſhe had to fear from the Whigs. It is therefore religion which gives power to the Tory party. It is certain, if the ſecret of intereſting the church in the quarrel was not practiſed, the High Flyers would make a very contemptible figure, and the differences between the Whigs and moderate Tories would cauſe none of thoſe diſturbances in the Kingdom, which have ſo long prevailed.

It is true that among the Church Tories, there are many who are very ſenſible of the artifices by which the whole party is ingaged in a quarrel, advantageous but to few. Of this are thoſe I call Low-Churchmen, among whom ſome poſſeſs the firſt dignities of the church. But they are not the ſtrongeſt. The party of the rigid Churchmen is much more numerous. This laſt branch conſiſts of almoſt all the inferior clergy, of ſome biſhops, of both univerſities, particularly that of Oxford, and theſe bodies draw after them great numbers of the laity. It is theſe that compoſe what is called in England, High Church, that is, a church which has no mixture of Preſbyterianiſm. Theſe men are ſo attached to the leaſt ceremony of the church of England, that they would not relax upon any thing whatſoever, and by this ſtiffneſs, they diſcover more of the ſpirit of party, than of zeal for religion. I will even venture to ſay, that many of them would rather chuſe to ſee England under Popery than Preſbyterianiſm. Now, as the Low-Churchmen, tho' more moderate in their ſentiments, look upon the hierarchy as an eſſential point, it is not ſurprizing that the Tories unite when the growth of Whigiſm is to be oppoſed, which has all the Preſbyterians in its party. It is, perhaps, an artifice of the State Tories to have given, or at leaſt to continue with ſo much care, the name of Tories to the Epiſcopalians, in order to confound, in the ſame party, intereſts of a different nature, becauſe this confuſion is very ſerviceable to them.

The Papiſts are likewiſe conſidered as a branch of the Tories, becauſe they always remain attached to that party. As they can never hope to ſee Popery eſtabliſhed but by means of an abſolute King, it is not ſtrange that they rank themſelves with the High Flyers. Indeed, this aſſiſtance would not be very conſiderable to the Tories, if confined to the Engliſh Papiſts, ſince injoying neither places, nor votes in elections, they cannot have much credit. But this admiſſion of Papiſts, ingages likewiſe foreign Powers in the Tory intereſt, who can on certain occaſions be very ſerviceable. Nevertheleſs it cannot be denied, that by this, the Tories give their enemies great advantage againſt them, who uſe this pretenſe to render them odious.

If the leaders of the Tory party aimed only at maintaining the prerogatives of the King, and the rights of the church, it may be affirm'd, that party would be invincible, becauſe that is the true intereſt of the kingdom. But as it ſometimes happens, that theſe are only pretenſes to cover other projects, leſs agreeable to the good of the ſtate, when once their deſigns are diſcovered, their friends generally draw off; a diviſion of the Tory members being a neceſſary conſequence of ſuch diſcovery. This makes me think that it is almoſt impoſſible they ſhould ever ſucceed in ſeting the Pretender on the throne, or inveſting any King whatſoever with abſolute power. This opinion is founded upon its not being the intereſt or deſire of the nation in general. And hence it is, that they ſo firmly eſpouſe the intereſts of France, becauſe they are very ſenſible they want her aſſiſtance. It was ſeen in the laſt war, that the ill ſucceſſes of that crown were terrible mortifications to them, and therefore they indeavored, as much as poſſible, to leſſen them. Accordingly when they were at the helm, their firſt care was to cure the wounds France had received. However, it is very difficult for France to put them in poſſeſſion of their wiſhes. Great Britain is an iſland which can hardly be attacked unawares; and which, while there is a good underſtanding between the King and the parliament, can ſend out fleets which France is not in condition to oppoſe.

The High Flyers are therefore to be conſidered as a party, to which the junctures of the time are not at all favorable, and conſequently it ſhould be their intereſt to remain in a ſtate of inaction, till time ſhould produce ſome opportunity to exert themſelves. But to be quiet is no part of their character. They can't poſſibly be eaſy, while they ſee themſelves excluded from all places of honor and profit, which probably are the ſprings of their motions.

tions. It is however certain, that the disturbances raised by them from time to time, to very little purpose, are attended with great injury to themselves, as well as to all the Tories in general, who are always charged with the faults and passions of those who are looked upon as their leaders. This very consideration induces some to desert their party.

As to the three other branches of the Tories, namely, the moderate, the rigid, and the low, it would be folly in the Whigs to think of their ruin by violent methods. This could not be effected without over-turning the kingdom. They may indeed exclude them from public posts and imployments. But should they be so imprudent as to meddle with the church of England, they would run the hazard of raising a storm, which might cost them the superiority they at present injoy. Therefore it is the interest of the Whigs to leave the church unmolested, and their conduct shows they are perfectly convinced of this truth. Tho' they have lately had frequent provocations, it is not seen, that now they are in power, they seek to be reveng'd upon the Episcopal party. On the contrary, their grand aim is to divide that party if possible, from the rest of the Tories, by convincing them that they bear no ill-will to the church. If they could succeed, their victory over the High-Flyers would be certain. But these last, sensible of the prejudice, which this conduct does them, indeavor to prevent its effects by always ingaging the church in their quarrel, and inspiring the people with continual fears of the designs of the Whigs against the church.

Having shown the views, strength, and interest of the Tory party, I am next to speak of the four branches of the Whigs. As to the Republican Whigs, they are at present very inconsiderable, and their party daily diminishes. There is not the least probability of their ever finding again an opportunity like that during the troubles of Charles I's reign.

I have already observ'd that the principal difference between the moderate Whigs and moderate Tories is, that the latter are more inclin'd to the King's prerogatives, and the former to the privileges of the subject. But this prevents not their union when the state is in danger. Were the moderate Tories not Episcopalians, and had the moderate Whigs fewer Presbyterians among them, it might be hoped that these two branches of Whigs and Tories would remain for ever united, as they seem to be since the death of King William. But when I say that the one incline more to the King, and the other to the subject, I speak the truth, and not what they say themselves. The two parties affirm, on the contrary, they have no other aim, than the preservation of the government as established many ages. So to hear them, you would think they form, and always have formed one and the same party. It is however but too true, that their different inclination frequently obliges them to divide, tho' it is to be presumed, their intentions are equally good, and that they differ only in the means they imploy. The one perhaps are too jealous of the increase of the Royal prerogative, and the other fear it not enough. But it is religion which chiefly makes them to be considered as different parties, because the one is composed wholly of Episcopalians, and the other has a great mixture of Presbyterians. Now to separate the interests of the church from those of the state, requires abstractions of which all are not capable. Nevertheless it may be affirmed, that the branch of the moderate Whigs considered separately, and in itself, is not less powerful than that of the moderate Tories. But when both join together, they form a party which would be resistless, if religion were out of the question. The great business therefore of the moderate Whigs is to assist the people as much as possible, to discern the interests of the church from those of the state; for which purpose they are to treat the Episcopalians with great moderation. Nor ought they to be less careful how they listen to the Republican Whigs, for fear of alarming the moderate Tories, of whom they have frequent occasion. But, on the other hand, nothing ought to be neglected by them for breaking the measures of the High Flyers, who are their real enemies. Such is the course they must take to preserve their credit.

I proceed now to the Church Whigs, who are divided into two branches, of which the first is of the rigid Presbyterians, who absolutely reject not only the hierarchy, but moreover every ceremony practised in the church of England. Their number is very great in England, but they are still more considerable by having all Scotland for them. They are continually laboring the propagation of Presbyterianism, and on some occasions the leading Whigs, to content them, are obliged to take some steps prejudicial to the whole party. It is easy to conceive that the interest of the rigid Presbyterians requires an innovation in the established religion, because it can only be by some great revolution that their own can come to be uppermost. Wherefore they are considered as dangerous men, and very unfit to head the Whig party, who in all appearance, would be ill conducted by such leaders.

Lastly, there is another branch of Church Whigs, which includes the moderate Presbyterians, and to which may be added all the rest of the Non-conformists, as Quakers, Anabaptists, &c. who find more support from the Whigs than from the Tories, tho' their junction adds no great strength to the party. The moderate Presbyterians, less scrupulous, less passionate, and less obstinate than the rigid, make no difficulty to join the assemblies of the established church, and even to communicate therein, when their interest requires it. If it were left to their choice, Presbyterianism would be the reigining religion. But they do not think it prudent to labor to make it so by violent methods. They know, it would be an infallible means to unite all the Tories against them; whereas it is the interest of all the Whigs to keep them divided, by continually insisting upon the distinction between State and Church Tories, and showing that they have no ill design against the latter. These are doubtless, the most dangerous enemies of the High Flyers and rigid Tories, because by their moderate conduct they deprive them of the pretense to complain that the church is in danger. These were aimed at by the Tories in their act, towards the conclusion of Queen Anne's reign, against occasional conformity. As few are acquainted with the nature of this act, I shall briefly explain it.

In the reign of Charles II, an act was made called the Conformity Act, whereby any person admited to any public office was to bring a certificate of his having received the sacrament in the church of England. The intent of this act was to exclude all Non-conformists from places of any kind. Indeed, it produced this effect with regard to the rigid Presbyterians, who could not resolve to receive the communion from the hands of a bishop, or a minister of the Episcopal church. But the moderate Presbyterians were not so scrupulous. On their admission to any post, they scrupled not to receive the communion in an Episcopal church, and to take the proper certificates. It was not possible for for the Tories to add any explication to this act during the reign of King James, who, on the contrary, granted an univerſal liberty of conſcience, nor in the life time of King William, or the firſt years of Queen Anne. But having the power in their hands, at the concluſion of her reign, they were not contented with reviving this act, but added to it a clauſe to prevent occaſional conformity, or the communicating in the church of England on account of ſome imployment. This excluded not only the rigid but alſo the moderate Preſbyterians from all public offices: for by this act, which is ſtill in force, to communicate once in an Epiſcopal church, is not a ſufficient qualification for a place, as before, but a man muſt ſhow that he is really a member of the church of England. If the Whigs, who at preſent prevail, dared to meddle with this act, it would ſoon be repealed. But for reaſons before intimated, very probably it will be ſuffered to ſubſiſt, and its violation only connived at.

The ſtrength of the two parties being ſuch as we have ſeen, and the intereſt of the ſeveral branches ſo oppoſite, it ſeems to me a natural conſequence, that the placing a Popiſh Prince upon the throne, while the King and parliament are in union, and the rights of the church are untouched, is a thing almoſt impoſſible. The people may from time to time be deluded by imaginary fears of the church's danger; but this deluſion muſt quickly vaniſh, when it is ſeen that the church is not really attacked. Now if religion is not concerned, that is, if the Epiſcopalians do not think themſelves under an abſolute neceſſity of trying all ways to ſave their church from ruin, the indeavors in favor of the Pretender, will prove ineffectual. As often as it ſhall be attempted to place him on the throne, the moderate State and Church Tories will join the Whigs, and then, that party will be too ſtrong for the High-Flyers, tho' in matter of religion, they ſhould be joined by all the rigid Tories, which however is not very likely. For it muſt not be imagined, becauſe a few rigid Tories make a great noiſe, that the whole branch wiſh to ſee a Popiſh Prince on the throne. They are zealous for their church, but their church is Proteſtant, and this very zeal will not ſuffer them to indanger their religion. It will be ſaid perhaps that France will aſſiſt the High Flyers with all her forces. This is what I can hardly believe for reaſons I ſhall mention hereafter. But tho' France ſhould heartily ingage in this undertaking, the execution would be difficult on account of the ſituation and naval power of England. Nothing but a ſurpriſe can produce the effect deſired by the High Flyers, Papiſts, and ſome rigid Tories. However, the attempt lately made, will probably induce the King and parliament to take good precautions againſt ſuch ſurpriſes for the future.

There is ſtill another everlaſting obſtacle to the eſtabliſhment of a Popiſh Prince, and that is, the poſſeſſion of ſome part of the lands of the monaſteries ſurpreſſed by Henry VIII, by almoſt every noted family in England. The anceſtors of the preſent poſſeſſors either received them in preſents from the King, or purchaſed them at an eaſy rate. If therefore a Popiſh Prince ſhould now mount the throne, there is no doubt but he would try to eſtabliſh his religion. But ſhould his attempt prove ſucceſsful, in what danger would theſe eſtates be? In all probability the preſent owners would be diſpoſſeſſed. Nay, who knows whether they would not be called to account for the profits? It is therefore manifeſt, that the Tories and Whigs have an equal intereſt in the prevention of this danger. If the advocates for a Popiſh Prince were to be ſtrictly examined, it would be found, without doubt, either they have no poſſeſſions of this kind, or believe they have particular reaſons to flatter themſelves with an exemption from the general law, or with being made amends ſome other way.

I am now to give a more diſtinct idea of the two parties of Whigs and Tories, by ſhewing their reſpective characters.

The Tories in general are fierce and haughty. The Whigs are treated by them with the utmoſt contempt, and even with rigor when they have the ſuperiority. As the Tory party is compoſed of Epiſcopalians, who properly make the body of the nation, they look upon themſelves as the prevailing party, and cannot bear an equality, much leſs a ſuperiority, in their adverſaries. I cannot better compare the behavior of the Tories to the Whigs, than to that of the Roman Catholics to the Proteſtants in countries where the Papiſts have the advantage of number, and the ſupport of the government. It is with regret that the Tories allow the Preſbyterians liberty of conſcience. When the power is in their hands they ſeldom fail to prohibit their aſſemblies, and to exclude them from public imployments by acts of parliament. The laſt years of Queen Anne afforded flagrant inſtances of the haughtineſs of this party.

There is ſtill another character which belongs to them. They are exceeding paſſionate and precipitate in their motions. This often diſconcerts all their projects. When they have the reins in their hands they drive with amazing rapidity. Very remarkable proofs of this were ſeen under Charles II, James II, and the late Queen. Nevertheleſs it muſt be confeſſed that this rapidity is not always the effect of an impetuous paſſion, but is ſometimes founded in policy. As the High Flyers, who are commonly at the head of the party, ſometimes project the alteration of the government, they are obliged to imbrace, with great haſte, the opportunities which offer, becauſe theſe opportunities are naturally tranſient. For inſtance, under Charles II, it was neceſſary to put a ſpeedy ſtop to the progreſs of the Whigs, for fear the King, who was with ſome difficulty, and for other intereſts than his own, ingag'd in the plot, ſhould alter his mind. Beſide, there was no time to loſe, becauſe it was well known that the Whigs were laboring with all their power to inform the people of the true deſigns of the court. So again, when James II aſcended the throne, the preſumptive heir to the crown was his eldeſt daughter the Princeſs of Orange, who was firmly attached to the Proteſtant religion. Wherefore as the King might die without ſons, all his projects would vaniſh by his death, if his work was not finiſhed during his life. It was neceſſary therefore to make haſte, becauſe the like opportunity would probably never offer again after his death. For the ſame reaſon, Queen Anne having no children when ſhe put the miniſtry into the hands of the High Flyers, a peace was quickly to be concluded with France, and ſpeedy meaſures taken for ſecuring the crown to the Pretender, leaſt her death ſhould prevent the execution of their projects, as it really happened. It was undoubtedly on this account that a peace was ſo haſtily concluded with Lewis XIV, becauſe his aſſiſtance was thought neceſſary to accompliſh the work. Probably, if the Queen had lived a little longer, the act of ſucceſſion had been repealed. But this precipitation which ſeems ſo neceſſary to the Tories, is on the other hand, prejudicial to them, inaſmuch as it too ſoon diſcovers the deſigns of their leaders, which require a gradual execution. In order to ſucceed, they muſt have a long and peaceable reign, a King favorable to their deſigns, and of great ability, or at leaſt ready to be guided by their counſels.

Another character of the Tories is, their change of principles as their party prevails or is humbled. When they have the Prince on their ſide, the doctrine of Paſſive-Obedience is ſupported with all their power, and every ordinance of the King is to be obeyed without examination, becauſe then, they would have the Whigs ſuffer themſelves to be oppreſſed without any reſiſtance. But when the government is in the hands of the contrary party, this doctrine lies dormant, or is forgotten. Thus, in all the Tory writers, who have tranſmited the troubles of the reign of Charles I, Paſſive-Obedience is eſtabliſhed as a principle certain and inconteſtable. This is owing to their intention of repreſenting the meaſures of the parliament for their own defenſe, and in oppoſition to the deſigns of the King, as a horrible rebellion. When the Preſbyterians were perſecuted in Charles II's reign, Paſſive-Obedience was every where talked of. But it was ſtill much worſe under James II. I remember to have heard, from the pulpit, the conſequences of this doctrine carried as far, and perhaps farther than ever they were in France, under Lewis XIV. Great ſtreſs was laid upon a canon of a convocation of the church of England, which imported, that arms taken up againſt the King by the ſubject, on any pretenſe whatſoever, is direct rebellion: That whether the ſubject be upon the offenſive or defenſive, he is clearly condemned by St. Paul, who ſays, "he ſhall receive to himſelf damnation." But the convocation in which this canon was made, was held under archbiſhop Laud, when Charles I govern'd in an abſolute manner, a little before the the begining of the troubles. But when King William was on the throne, the doctrine of Paſſive-Obedience was no longer inforced, becauſe that King was conſidered as no friend to the Tories. The caſe was the ſame under Queen Anne, while the miniſtry was compoſed of Whigs and moderate Tories. But the doctrine revived when that Princeſs delivered herſelf up to the conduct of the High Flyers. But ſince King George has filled the throne, the High Flyers and rigid Tories plainly ſhow, this doctrine is only admited by them when they have a Prince of their own party, but is rejected without any ſcruple when the government is not for them. For this purpoſe they have a diſtinction ready between a King de jure, and a King de facto, and maintain that only the King de jure has a title to this obedience, but ſuch is every King who favors them, whether he is upon the throne, or has only pretenſions to it.

Let us now ſpeak of the character of the Whigs. Thoſe of this party who are rigid Preſbyterians, are a ſtubborn and obſtinate generation, who perhaps would be as hot and as paſſionate as the Tories were they in poſſeſſion of power. But as, ſince the long parliament, the party have never been under their direction, it is not upon them that we are to form the general character of the Whigs, whereas that of the Tories is to be taken principally from the High Flyers and rigid Tories, who are their leaders and directors.

The heads of the Whig party, are much more moderate than the leaders of the Tories. Beſide, they proceed generally upon fixed principles, from which they never ſwerve, except when they are obliged to give ſome ſatisfaction to the Preſbyterians to keep them from deſponding. Far from deſiring, like the Tories, to carry things with a high hand, they advance gradually, without heat or violence. Their greateſt trouble is to curb the paſſion of ſome among them, who, were they unreſtrain'd, would quickly ruin the party. By this moderation, they try to inſinuate mildly into the people, that they have no ill deſigns againſt the church of England, in order to ſeparate the Church Tories from the High Flyers. As it is the intereſt of the Tories to confound all the branches of their party, and unite them into one body, to be directed by the leaders; ſo it is the buſineſs of the Whigs to have theſe ſeveral branches diſtinguiſhed, that the Epiſcopalians may be prevented from promoting the deſigns of the High Flyers. But they would never be able to gain this point were they to uſe violence. Thus the gentleneſs and moderation of the Whigs is no leſs founded in policy, than the haſtineſs and precipitation of the Tories.

The Whigs are charged with being greedy of riches and honors, and ungrateful to their adherents, which makes their friends often forſake them. I can ſay nothing to this, not being ſufficiently informed of the particular concerns of the party. Beſide, the examination of this charge would lead me to conſider the conduct of thoſe who think themſelves ill uſed, which I would avoid, as contrary to my intent of confining myſelf to general ideas. However, it may be ſaid for the moderate Whigs, that generally they ſupport a good cauſe, viz. the conſtitution of the government as eſtabliſhed by law. They err indeed ſometimes thro' too much care and diſtruſt, which throws them now and then upon proceedings contrary to their true intereſt and their own principles, ſince on certain occaſions they maintain the privileges of the nation and parliament, at the expenſe of the Royal authority.

As to the eccleſiaſtical Whigs, who are no other than the Preſbyterians, all that can be ſaid of them, is, that they are extremely prejudiced againſt biſhops, and the whole hierarchy. Now, the queſtion is, whether this prejudice be well grounded, or being ſo, whether it affords juſt cauſe for ſeparation. For my part, I look upon this diſpute between the Epiſcopalians and Preſbyterians as of little conſequence. And therefore I cannot approve of the ſtiffneſs of the Preſbyterians in a country where the reformation is eſtabliſhed according to the church of England, ſince the two churches differ in no eſſential point. I ſay the ſame thing of the Epiſcopalians of Scotland, and perhaps in England itſelf, greater regard ſhould be had to the ſcruples of the Preſbyterians. But this is only my private opinion, which I do not pretend to give for a rule to the one or the other.

Before I proceed, it will be proper to obviate an objection which may naturally occur to the reader, viz. that every thing in England being done by way of parliaments, theſe unions above mentioned, whether of the branches of the ſame party, or of the branches of two different parties, ſeem to no purpoſe, unleſs made in the parliament itſelf between the members. But ſo far are ſuch unions from taking place in the parliament, that one of the parties generally ſo prevails there, as to render the union of the reſt of the members intirely fruitleſs.

To this I anſwer, firſt, that the parliament conſiſting of two houſes, whereof that of the lords remains always the ſame without any conſiderable change, theſe unions may take place in that houſe whoſe principles are not ſo variable as thoſe of the commons. Now as the upper houſe has power to throw out the bills ſent up by the lower, it follows that the lords, by means of ſuch unions, may break the commons meaſures. Conſequently theſe unions may produce great effects.

Secondly,

Secondly, these unions may influence the elections of members. For instance, on suspicion that a Popish Prince is intended to be set on the throne, the moderate Tories and Low-Churchmen may join with the Whigs, and cause such representatives to be chosen as are against what is feared, and thereby break the measures of the High Flyers and rigid Tories.

Thirdly, even in a house of commons, consisting mostly of Tory members, the moderate among them seeing some design in hand prejudicial to the nation, may join with the Whigs, and hinder the execution of it. The moderate Whigs might also unite with the Tories, if they saw the Republican party growing too strong.

It must however be owned, that party spirit; the cabals of the leading men; the intrigues of the court; the interest of particular persons, have but too much influence upon the debates of parliament. To say all in a word, the parliament is composed of men who are not free from passions. If the parliament were to answer the idea which those conceive of it who are not thoroughly acquainted with its nature, it should be composed of perfect men. But as that is impossible, it would be proper, at least to reform certain abuses, for which hitherto no remedy has been found, or perhaps sought. Tho' this leads me a little from my subject, I shall stay a moment and take the liberty to point out some of these abuses. This may at least serve to give a more extensive knowlege of the English constitution, which tho' excellent in its nature, is however liable to some imperfections.

The first abuse lies in the too great influence of the court in the elections of members, and consequently in the resolutions of the parliament. This influence is visibly owing to the division between the Whigs and Tories which gives the King an advantage, he would doubtless not have, were all the people well united. When one of the parties gets into the ministry, the lieutenancies of the counties, and all the court places, are confered on persons devoted to them. After which, a new parliament is called. Then beside the money privately distributed by the ministry, if report is to be credited, those who are in authority in the towns and counties, use all their interest and skill to get members chosen favorable to the court, that the ministry may have the superiority of votes in the house of commons. We may judge of the effect of these intrigues by this single consideration, that commonly there is a Whig parliament when the ministry is so, and a Tory parliament when the ministers are Tories. Nevertheless the thing is not so very certain, but that we find sometimes most of the elections carried against the court. But this rarely happens, unless the nation in general is satisfied that the court has designs pernicious to the state or the liberties of the subject. I say nothing of our seeing in the late reign twelve peers created at once, with the sole view of procuring the court a majority of votes in the house of lords. This is a palpable as well as a very dangerous abuse.

Another abuse lies in many small boroughs having a right to send representatives to parliament, whose votes have the same weight with those of the members of London and Westminster, notwithstanding the great disproportion between the electors of the one and the other. In these inconsiderable boroughs, by the influence of the court, members are chosen that have not a foot of land near the place. It is pretended by some, that these boroughs have a right as ancient as the parliament itself, having injoyed it ever since the time of the Anglo-Saxons. Others think it of much later date. But however, it is at present a monstrous abuse, that villages of four or five thatched houses, should be upon the level in parliament with the largest cities of the kingdom.

A third abuse there is of great importance, and which ought to be reformed, since it is in some measure contrary to Magna Charta, on which the English found their liberties and privileges. In this charter, King John promises, in expres terms, for himself and successors, to declare beforehand the causes of calling a parliament. As long as this custom was observed, the points debated in parliament were not many, for which the members came prepared, and the session lasted but a few days. If this was observed now, the boroughs and counties might give their representatives instructions upon the affairs for which the parliament should be called, or at least, might chuse such members as are of the same sentiments with the electors. But at present, several abuses spring from the non-observance of this method.

In the first place, the sessions hold as long as the King pleases, and are ended when he thinks proper. Henry IV, improved this advantage by keeping the parliament assembled, till the desired subsidy was granted. In the next place, the electors not knowing the busines on which the parliament is to proceed, are forced to give their representatives an unlimited power. Hence arises another abuse, that the representatives of a borough or county are often of a contrary opinion to those that send them. It may therefore happen, nay it has frequently happened, that the resolves of the lower house are directly opposite to the sentiments of the people whom they represent. So it is not the people or commons of England that share the legislative power with the King and peers, but their representatives, who injoy a privilege which belongs only to the people in general, to whom however they are not accountable for their conduct. All they can suffer, in case they have acted contrary to the sense of their borough or county, is not to be chosen another time. This seems therefore to be lodging too great a power in bare representatives. It was not so in France, when the states of that kingdom were convened. Every province drew up, beforehand, their particular instructions (1), from which their deputies were not allowed to swerve. In like manner, in important affairs to be debated by the States General of the United Provinces, the deputies receive instructions from their Provinces; and in the particular states of each province, the magistrates of the towns give their orders and instructions to their deputies.

A fourth abuse lies in the public canvassings at the time of elections, with great expense. It costs some men several thousands of pounds to be elected, and this openly in the face of all the world.

Lastly, there is another sort of abuse in the house of commons, viz. that the members are allowed to go and come, or absent themselves as they please,

(1) Called in French, les Cabiers.

except on certain great occaſions, ſo that of five hundred and thirteen members (if I miſtake not) there are not preſent ſometimes above one hundred and fifty. This makes it much more eaſy for the parties to cabal, than if the houſe was full. Moreover many members, tho' in London, do not conſtantly attend the houſe, but keep away upon any the ſlighteſt affair of their own. This puts me in mind of a pleaſant ſtory, with which I ſhall cloſe this digreſſion. A Whig member telling one of the ſame party in great anger, "That if "he had been at the houſe that morning, they "ſhould have carried an important point." The other calmly aſked him, "By how many they loſt "it?" By one ſingle vote, ſays he. The other replies, "Had I been there, we ſhould have loſt "it by four, for there would have been four Tories "more, whom I have kept all this morning on "purpoſe at a tavern."

It remains only that I briefly ſpeak of the intereſts of the neighboring States, with regard to the Whigs and Tories. Tho' the differences between the two parties ſeem only to reſpect England, they have a great influence on the affairs of the other States. The peace of Utrecht clearly ſhows of what conſequence they are to all Europe.

Every one knows that the States General of the United Provinces are friends of the Whigs, and very juſtly, ſince the Whigs have all along ſupported their intereſt in England. The Whigs obliged Charles II, to make a peace with Holland, when he was in league with Lewis XIV againſt her. From that time, they have ever conſidered the intereſt of the Dutch as their own. Accordingly in their turn they have received ſignal ſervices from them, particularly in the aſſiſtance given by the States General to the Prince of Orange, to go and break King James's meaſures. This good underſtanding is ſtill cultivated, ſo that the Dutch may be ſaid to be Whigs, and the Whigs to be Dutch. The reaſon of this union is evident. For France, perpetual enemy of Holland, ever ſupported the Tories; whence it follows, that Holland is obliged to ſtand by the Whigs, ſince ſhe cannot expect aſſiſtance from England, but by their means. This is ſo clear, that it needs no farther illuſtration.

For the ſame reaſon, the Emperor, as Sovereign of the Netherlands, ought to be a friend to the Whigs. As he muſt look upon the King of France, as a very formidable and dangerous neighbor, he can expect the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, in caſe his dominions are invaded, but when the Whigs are in power. In all appearance, the Tories would not exert themſelves in the defenſe of the Netherlands againſt the invaſions of France. But, ſhould the Emperor, thro' exceſſive zeal for his religion, lend his forces to the Pretender to aſcend the throne of England, he would only render France ſtill more powerful, and add to the ballance of Europe a weight which would make it intirely incline to one ſide.

The intereſts of France with regard to the Whigs and Tories, afford matter for many more obſervations. In general, it is doubtleſs the intereſt of that crown to cultivate a good underſtanding with England. Since the growth of the houſe of Auſtria, that is, ſince about two hundred years, England has ever had it in her power to incline the ballance either on the ſide of Auſtria or on the ſide of France, as ſhe pleaſed. But it has been her ſtanding intereſt to keep the ballance even between theſe two powers. This has been the hinge on which all the policy of the Kings of England has turned, for two centuries. Henry the eighth's varying ſometimes from this courſe is to be aſcribed wholly to the private intereſts of cardinal Wolſey his prime miniſter, or to his own caprice. So it was ever the intereſt of France to keep fair with England. Accordingly Lewis XIV, has politicly indeavored, theſe fifty years, either to get England on his ſide, or at leaſt, to prevent her from eſpouſing that of his enemies. But as it was not eaſy for that Monarch to perſuade the Engliſh that to incline the ballance to his ſide was for their advantage, he confined his indeavors to hinder them from concerning themſelves in the affairs of Europe, to the end he might proceed without any oppoſition from them. But it muſt be obſerved, that this policy reſpected only his vaſt deſigns of inſlaving all Europe. Otherwiſe, he would have had no need to trouble himſelf about the Engliſh. To ſet this matter in a clearer light, it will not be amiſs to ſhow briefly how this Monarch managed with regard to England.

Lewis XIV, as every one knows, formed the project of an univerſal Monarchy in Europe. As he was not ignorant that England was concerned to keep the ballance of Europe even, and that the Engliſh conſidered this maxim as the chief foundation of their ſecurity, he was juſty apprehenſive of their oppoſing the execution of his deſigns. For prevention of which, he uſed all his addreſs to gain Charles II to his intereſt, when he had reſolved upon a war with Holland in 1672. The miniſtry being Tory, he drew Charles by their means into a league with him. But this league was of no long continuance. It was ſo evidently againſt the intereſt of England, that the parliament obliged the King to make peace with Holland. Nay, they would have conſtrained him to declare againſt France, if the proſpect of an approaching peace between that crown and the States-General, had not hindered them from going ſo far.

The peace of Nimeguen, concluded in 1678, cauſed not the King of France to diſcontinue the proſecution of his grand deſigns. But as he was very ſenſible, King Charles would not have it in his power to follow his own inclination, he reſolved to take another method, in order to diſable England at leaſt from interpoſing in the affairs of Europe. And that was to raiſe troubles in the kingdom, and then to foment them, that the Engliſh might be imployed at home. The duke of York's plots; the King his brother's eaſineſs to be guided by his counſels; the choice of paſſionate and perhaps corrupt miniſters, proceeded, in all appearance, from Lewis's ſecret practiſes in England. This method ſucceeded to his wiſh. The conſpiracy diſcovered by Titus Oates; the pretended Proteſtant plot; the perſecution of the Preſbyterians; the people's murmurs; the diſcord between the King and parliament, found the Engliſh ſo much imployment at home, that it was not poſſible for them to look abroad. In the mean time, Lewis XIV was rendering himſelf formidable to all Europe, having nothing to fear from the Engliſh who remained idle, when they ſhould have uſed their utmoſt indeavors to put a ſtop to his progreſs.

Upon the acceſſion of James II to the throne, Lewis gave not over a method that had proved ſo ſucceſsful. On the contrary, he preſſed the new King of England to execute the projects he had formed when duke of York, in favor of Popery and arbitrary power. He knew theſe two points were ſufficient to keep England long imployed; however, as his aim was only to imbroil the nation, he never aſſiſted King James to any purpoſe. The too ſudden execution of that Prince's deſigns was not for his intereſt. When he ſaw him on the point of being attacked by the Prince of Orange, he never ſtirred in his defenſe, but rather made uſe of the juncture to carry war into Germany. He imagined that the troubles he had raiſed in England would long diſable that kingdom from oppoſing his ambitious deſigns. This was the ſole end of all his proceedings. Afterwards, when King William proclaimed war againſt him, he ſent King James into Ireland with ſeven thouſand men, an aid too weak to reſtore him to his throne, but ſufficient to make a diverſion, and feed the hopes of the male-contents. Thus is it demonſtrable from Lewis's whole conduct, that his ſole intention was to imbroil England, and that King James was the dupe of his policy. It ſeems however at firſt ſight, that King James's reſtoration would have been for Lewis's advantage. But moſt aſſuredly it was againſt his intereſt for a King of England to be at peace in his dominions. The reaſon is plain; as it is the intereſt of England to keep the ballance even in Europe, Lewis, who had formed vaſt projects, would have been in danger of being oppoſed by a King of England, who having no diſtractions at home, might in the end purſue his true intereſts, or be forced to it by his parliament. And therefore, Lewis XIV, has been ſatisfied to keep England imbroiled, and for that purpoſe, to hold ſecret correſpondence with the leading Tories, who at length have diſcovered themſelves in the laſt years of Queen Anne.

Popery

It ſeems therefore to be the French King's intereſt to preſerve a good underſtanding with the Tories, in order, by their means, to foment the troubles in England. This is ſtrictly true, when he forms deſigns againſt the reſt of Europe. But if he aims to live in peace, and ſtand upon his defenſe, in caſe of invaſion, nothing can be more for his advantage than to cultivate the King of England's friendſhip, according to the conſtant maxim of Lewis's predeceſſors, whether the miniſtry be Whig or Tory. France may now be ſaid to be invincible, as long as England declares not againſt her. But if the King of England is provoked, and enters into a new alliance with Holland and Germany, the laſt war's experience ſhows that France is very far from being invincible. It may therefore be affirmed, that if the illuſtrious Prince (1) now at the helm of the French affairs, intends not to purſue the vaſt deſigns of Lewis XIV, it is not his intereſt to cheriſh the troubles of England, which, inſtead of being for his advantage, may greatly turn to his prejudice (2). I confeſs in the indirect aſſiſtance given the Pretender in France, the regent's proceedings ſeem to deſtroy the maxim I mean to advance. Time will unfold, perhaps, the myſtery of this policy. But in the mean while, I cannot forbear thinking that he is miſinformed of the true ſtate of the two parties in England, and has given too much credit to intereſted and prejudiced perſons. Perhaps, the Pretender himſelf has been deceived in the ſame manner.

I have but one obſervation more to make, with which I ſhall conclude what I have to ſay concerncerning the Whigs and the Tories. In ſpeaking of their ſeveral views, intereſts and characters, I pretend not to include every particular perſon of either party, but only their leaders and managers, with ſome of the moſt active of both ſides. Tho' the people in general, by inclination or intereſt, are either Whigs or Tories, it does not follow that every ſingle perſon acts in the views I have aſcribed to them. It is certain moſt ſuffer themſelves to be led without knowing where it is intended to conduct them, or examining the courſe preſcribed them. Conſequently they are far from being concerned in the intrigues and cabals of their leaders. Such a one has liſted himſelf a Tory, as being attached to the church of England, and afterwards, without knowing how, finds himſelf obliged to maintain the principles of the High Flyers and rigid Tories, tho' contrary to his inclination. There are thouſands of good Engliſhmen, without doubt, who grieve to ſee their country thus rent with diviſions, and would gladly imbrace all expedients to put a ſtop to them. But it is not eaſy to obſerve a juſt neutrality, becauſe it is difficult to be without ambition and avarice. Thoſe who ſtand neuter, as I ſaid, are neither prefered nor truſted, by reaſon that one of the parties are always in power, and have nothing more at heart than the advancing their friends, or gaining ſome of their adverſaries. Conſequently there can be no poſts or offices for men, from whom the prevailing party can expect no manner of ſervice. Moreover, how can a man be neuter between two parties, each of whom repreſent their adverſaries as deſigning thoſe evils which are moſt apt to fill men with fears, I mean, the deſtruction of the religion they profeſs, and the diſſolution of a government, which alone, in their opinion, can render ſubjects happy? A man muſt be very inſenſible not to be moved with ſuch dangers, when convinced of their reality.

All Engliſhmen therefore are not to bear the blame of theſe unnatural diviſions, but only thoſe who cheriſh them for their own private intereſt. Who are they that would inveſt the King with abſolute power? Who are they that would debar free-born ſubjects of liberty of conſcience? Who are they, in a word, that labor to introduce Popery? Can it be ſaid that theſe are the views of every particular Tory? No, by no means. But they are the aims of the leaders, who, for their own ends, ſeduce the poor people, and make no ſcruple to involve them in the danger of a civil war.

It may be affirmed, that it is not the kingdom's intereſt for one of the parties to become ſo ſuperior as to meet with no oppoſition. Should it be the High Flyers, they would introduce arbitary power. And if it were the moderate Tories, their biaſs to the prerogative of the crown, would at length inable the Sovereign to ſhake off the galling yoke of parliaments. Were it poſſible for the Papiſts to be ſuperior, England would ſoon loſe her religion and liberty. On the other hand, if the Republican Whigs ſhould recover the advantage they have loſt, you would hear no more of the kingdom but the commonwealth of England, as in Cromwell's days. Laſtly, were the moderate Whigs to have the management, they would ſo guard againſt the incroachments of the regal power,

(1) The duke of Orleans.

(2) It muſt be obſerved, that what Rapin ſays here of the intereſt of France, with regard to the Whigs and Tories was written before the concluſion of the alliance between that crown, England and Holland, ſigned January 4, 1717, this diſſertation being finiſhed in February 1716.

that the Sovereign would be reduced to the condition of a Doge of Venice.

As for the two parties with regard to religion, it is certain, if the Preſbyterians can ever act without controul, they will not be ſatisfied till the hierarchy of the church of England be intirely demoliſhed. But then, if the rigid Epiſcopalians have nothing to ballance their power, the Preſbyterians muſt expect to be openly perſecuted. And who knows whether they will ſuffer them to injoy a bare liberty of conſcience?

Aſſuredly the welfare of the kingdom conſiſts not in any of the ends propoſed by the leaders of both parties. The only way to reſtore peace and tranquillity, would be to leave the government upon its ancient foot, and the church, as eſtabliſhed at the Reformation. It would alſo be neceſſary to grant a toleration to the Preſbyterians who are very numerous in the kingdom. If this way be not uſed, it will always be better for the ſtate that the people remain in diviſion, than if one of the parties ſhould acquire a ſuperiority, which would be more fatal to the public than the equality which cheriſhes diſcord. I do not ſee what can put an end to this ſort of civil war, but the prudence of a juſt and equitable Sovereign, moderate in his deſires and paſſions, a lover of the Proteſtant religion, and that makes the good and happineſs of his ſubjects his ſole care and ſtudy. This is what may with reaſon be expected from the King who now fills the throne, ſince he poſſeſſes all thoſe virtues in an eminent degree. May Heaven proſper his deſigns, and may he live to ſee the happy effects of his pains and indeavors!

THE

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

By Mr. RAPIN DE THOYRAS,

Continued, to the Acceſſion of King GEORGE I to the Throne.

BOOK XXV.

WILLIAM III, TWENTY-EIGHTH King of ENGLAND ſince the Conqueſt.

The ſtate of England under James II.

JAMES II had happily put an end to the rebellion in England and Scotland, and the blood of Monmouth and Argyle, ſhed round the throne, had fixed its ſecurity for the future, if the King could have prevailed with himſelf to make a right uſe of the patience of the Engliſh. It was ſomething very extraordinary in a Proteſtant nation, where there were hardly thirty or forty thouſand Catholics, and ſeveral millions of the reformed religion, to ſee the crown unanimouſly placed on the head of a Roman Catholic, whom the fundamental laws of the kingdom declared incapable of wearing it (1). But ſtill farther, he was quietly allowed to have maſs celebrated in his palace, that is in a place which belonged more to the nation than to him, and to harbor prieſts and even monks there. A nation, by whoſe conſtitution the title of Head and Defender of the church of England is inſeparably connected with that of King, peaceably acknowleged as Sovereign and Prince, who was an enemy of that church, and in duty ſubject to the Pope, that is, to a biſhop, whoſe authority he was obliged to make his ſubjects formally renounce by the oath of ſupremacy. In ſhort, in a kingdom, where the taking of the Teſt oath was a neceſſary qualification for the injoyment of all manner of preferments, a Prince was raiſed to the firſt dignity, who was by his religion obliged to an abhorrence of the Teſt; and no notice was taken of ſo ſhocking a contradiction between the government and the laws, or thought of having recourſe to the latter for relief.

(1) This muſt not be underſtood, as if there was, at that time, any particular law for the excluſion of a Popiſh Prince from the crown, but intimates the inconſiſtency of a Popiſh Prince with the act of ſupremacy, coronation oath, &c.

James every day made ſome addition to what the good nature of the Engliſh granted him. The duties on goods exported and imported were ſtill raiſed in contempt of the act of parliament which had granted them only during the life of Charles II. The additional exciſe was continued by the aſſiſtance of a ſhuffling explication of the act which authorized it. The elections of members for the Engliſh parliament had been irregular, and under an undue influence; and a ſort of political inquiſition was eſtabliſhed in Scotland. The nation, however, taking no notice of theſe attempts, repaid his verbal promiſes in favor of the Engliſh religion with real grants; and all Europe, attentive to what then paſſed in England, knew not whether more to admire the complaiſance of a people ſo jealous of their liberty, or the aſſurance of a Prince, who put them to ſuch trials.

The happy ſituation of that Prince.

Theſe firſt advantages, and the intire deſtruction of the rebels, induced him to judge that the time for raiſing his religion was now at hand; and it is certain he found very favorable conjunctures. A victorious army ſtill on foot; ſubjects full of ſubmiſſion; a parliament choſen by the court; foreign Princes eagerly preſſing for his friendſhip, and the eſteem of thoſe Sovereigns, who imagined they ſaw in him the umpire of the differences of Europe, appeared to him more than preſages of a glorious and peaceable reign.

His abuſe of it.

His firſt ſtep was to continue the Catholics in the army, whom he had incorporated in it for three months only. In the three kingdoms he prefered noblemen to the firſt poſts from whom he expected a docility which was not promiſed by thoſe, whom he diſplaced in their favor. By his favors and bounties he gained ſeveral proſelites of the firſt rank to the Romiſh church. He at the ſame time affected to condemn all ſorts of perſecution. Not ſatisfied with publicly expreſſing his compaſſion for the French proteſtants, who fled to his kingdom for refuge, and reproaching Lewis XIV with their misfortunes; he aſſiſted them liberally, and ordered very large collections to be made for them. His whole diſcourſes to the Engliſh Nonconformiſts turned on moderation and toleration; and he flattered himſelf that, content with their being ſuffered in England, they would in their turn indulge the Roman Catholics.

Sequel of this matter.

After theſe preliminaries, he declared to the parliament his intention of keeping an army on foot, and continuing the Catholic officers in commiſſion. Both houſes took the alarm at the laſt article, and complained that this was aboliſhing the Teſt, that is, depriving the Proteſtant religion of its ſtrongeſt rampart; and that in ſhort, if the Royal authority was allowed to ſupercede ſo clear and ſo ſtrong a law, no barrier would be able to defend the liberties of the nation, and prevent the Engliſh Monarchy from becoming arbitrary and deſpotic. James, incenſed at the parliament's oppoſition, prorogued it for eighteen months, and then diſſolved it. He brought ſuch perſons into the courts of juſtice as were dependent on him and devoted to his will: he cauſed the judges of the King's-bench, and the other judges, to declare the diſpenſing power inherent in the crown; he erected an eccleſiaſtical court, which he inveſted with a power independent of the laws, and by the aſſiſtance of which he deſigned to conquer the indocility of the High-church, and puniſh their zeal againſt that of Rome; he diſſolved the parliament of Scotland, for refuſing to repeal the penal laws; he filled the army in Ireland with Catholics; he confered biſhoprics on thoſe eccleſiaſtics who were either diſpoſed to give into his views, or incapable of oppoſing them. After which he attempted, by acts of abſolute authority, to force into the univerſities "perſons of the King's reli-" gion;" for that was then the language. At the ſame time, by a proclamation directed to the council of Scotland, he eſtabliſhed an univerſal toleration in that kingdom, and abrogated the penal laws; he ſoon after prevailed with the council of England, tho' not quite ſo tractable, to ſuſpend the oaths in force againſt the Catholics, and exempt from the penal laws all ſuch as had entered into or ſhould enter into public imployments, without taking them.

He offers an univerſal toleration.

The conſiderate part of the Preſbyterians, Independents, Anabaptiſts, and Quakers, had judged from the begining, that if the King was pleaſed to careſs them, it was not becauſe he loved them; and that the church of Rome, by offering them a toleration, labored only to obtain it for herſelf, being fully reſolved to puniſh both them and the members of the church of England for their ſeparation, when it ſhould be in their power. However they had declined both writing and acting openly againſt the Romaniſts: and left that care to the members of the Anglican communion, who were in poſſeſſion of the dignities and benefices, and who put themſelves into motion, not with a deſign of dividing thoſe advantages with their Diſſenting brethren, but with that of ſecuring them to themſelves. They had even apprehended that thoſe two churches, weary of uſeleſly diſputing the ſuperiority, might agree to divide it, and cruſh them at laſt; for which reaſon they had taken care to keep fair with the court and the epiſcopal party.

April. 1687. How it was received.

Theſe diſpoſitions ſeemed changed, when the proclamation was publiſhed, granting a full liberty of conſcience. The Preſbyterians and others, tranſported with joy and gratitude, ran to the King with addreſſes full of the moſt ſhameful and extravagant flattery. In ſome of them the epiſcopal church was accuſed of tyranny: the King's clemency was extolled to heaven, for opening their churches that had been ſo long ſhut, and declaring his ſubjects, of whatever religion, capable of public imploys: they made ſtrong proteſtations of fidelity; and ſome of them even went ſo far as to promiſe him their hearty concurence for procuring the election of ſuch members as ſhould ratify his orders. The pleaſure of ſeeing themſelves put on a level with the epiſcopal church, and the hope of making that church proper return for the treatment they had received from it, furniſhed ſeveral of thoſe new flatterers, with the expreſſions here mentioned. On that conſideration, they readily conſented that the Catholics ſhould injoy a larger indulgence.

The court's ſhort triumph.

The court on its part, triumphed in having brought perſons into a good homour with the religion it protected, who till then had been its enemies. The King himſelf, deceived as well as his confidents, now kept no meaſures with the church of England: he ſeverely condemned the violence it had uſed againſt the Proteſtant Separatiſts. According to him, ſome of the members of that church had retarded the publication of his orders for the toleration, by promiſing him to favor the Romiſh communion, on condition he would give up thoſe who had ſeparated from the national church; and named the authors of this odious bargain. He had given orders at the ſame time for reviſing the proceedings in the eccleſiaſtical courts againſt the Non-conformiſts (1), and making a report of the pecuniary compoſitions, by means of which they had thought themſelves but too happy in purchaſing

chaſing their ſecurity. People were perſuaded, and not without reaſon, that this inquiry would end in the confuſion of the eccleſiaſtical courts, and incourage the ſectaries to take their revenge on the epiſcopal party.

Meaſures taken by the church of England againſt it.

But before theſe laſt abuſes, the Epiſcopalians had taken private meaſures, with the Prince of Orange, to ingage him to maintain the national church and the Engliſh liberties, by force of arms. They had even prevailed with him to ſend the baron Dykvelt into England, to form the party with them, and ſoon eſtabliſhed a correſpondence with the court at the Hague. The King's late proceedings worked up their reſentments to the higheſt pitch. It was to no purpoſe that ſome biſhops ſtrove to perſuade the clergy to thank his Majeſty for having promiſed, in his declaration for liberty of conſcience, to maintain the church of England. The Eccleſiaſtics looked on that promiſe as falacious; and the moſt moderate were thoſe who teſtified their diſcontent only by ſilence. The parliament in its turn, acting on the ſame principles, refuſed to confirm the liberty of conſcience, and abrogate the teſt, which at laſt obliged the King to diſſolve that body. The cities and towns which had likewiſe particular ſubjects of complaint, ſeemed ſenſibly affected at them, and ſaw with grief that by the abuſe of new charters, inſtead of reſtoring the old, as had been promiſed, their magiſtrates were diſplaced, to make room for others (1). The whole nation in general was incenſed at ſeeing that, to ſo many violent proceedings againſt the country and religion, James added that of ſending an embaſſy of obedience to Rome, and publicly receiving a miniſter from that court. Thouſands, who had not been affected with things much more eſſential, were aſtoniſhed at ſo extraordinary a ſight as that of a Pope's nuncio at London; and concluded that a King, who ſeemed to fear them ſo little, had put himſelf into a condition of being feared, and of inſulting the laws of the kingdom with impunity.

Meaſures taken by the King.

By theſe tokens James ought to have known that the warmth of his counſellors and that of his own zeal had hurried him too far. However, whether he did not perceive it, or whether he made it a point of honor and duty not to give ground in a cauſe where both the Royal dignity and his conſcience were concerned, he went on as he had begun; flattering himſelf that in a little time a parliament, which ſhould be intirely at his devotion, would conſecrate his enterpriſe by laws. In this view he did all he judged neceſſary for making himſelf maſter of the elections. The King's lieutenants of the ſeveral counties received orders to interrogate the chief inhabitants on theſe three articles: "Whether they would agree to the revo- "cation of the teſt and penal laws, in caſe they "ſhould have a ſeat in the lower houſe: whether "they would give their votes for ſuch perſons "as ſhould be in the ſaid diſpoſition; and whe- "ther they approved of ſupporting the order for "the toleration." The court furniſhed the towns and cities with mayors and ſheriffs, on whom much depended in the approaching election. It was given out, with a certain air of aſſurance, that the King would go thro' with what he propoſed, and people were thus made to believe, that he would obtain by force what his ſubjects would not grant him voluntarily. He himſelf frequently ſaid, with ſome fire, "That he was King; that he knew how to "command obedience, and that who ever was "bold enough to reſiſt him, ſhould feel the weight "of his anger." But the reſolution of the people rendered theſe efforts uſeleſs; as were all the pains he took, ſometimes to reconcile the Princeſs of Orange, his daughter, to the Catholic religion, and ſometimes to ingage her at leaſt, with the Prince her huſband, to conſent to the revocation of the teſt and penal laws, or make the Engliſh believe their Highneſſes conſented to it.

He quarrels with the foreign powers.

He had the misfortune to quarrel with the foreign powers at the ſame time. The United Provinces had three regiments of Engliſh, and three of Scots in their ſervice. Some of them old ſoldiers, whom the Dutch had kept even in their two laſt wars with England; the reſt had been raiſed ſince that time; no right of recalling them being reſerved by the capitulation. There were ſome Catholic officers among thoſe troops, whom it was pretended the King had gained, and who for that reaſon very much imbaraſſed the Prince, becauſe, in caſe of a rupture with his father-in-law, he could neither confide in them, nor honorable diſcharge them.

During theſe tranſactions, James re-demanded thoſe regiments, without vouchſafing to ſound the diſpoſitions of the deputies of the States, or the officers of the ſaid regiments. He was anſwered with an abſolute refuſal: only it was added, in order to juſtify or ſoften it, that in reality according to the treaties, if England wanted thoſe troops for her defenſe, they muſt be reſtored, as had been done in the time of the laſt rebellion; but that the kingdom now injoyed tranquility. That beſide, thoſe regiments were in great part compoſed of Hollanders, and properly ſpeaking, did not belong to the King, becauſe what Engliſh and Scots were in them, were the remains of thoſe who had long been in the ſervice of the commonwealth, and ſuch as it had purchaſed at a very dear rate.

James, exaſperated at this refuſal, forbid all his ſubjects, of what rank or condition ſoever, to ingage in the ſervice of any foreign Prince, without his conſent, under pain of corporal chaſtiſement. He afterwards publiſhed a ſevere proclamation againſt ſuch Engliſh expreſly as then ſerved the United Provinces, in what quality ſoever, whether on ſea or land, unleſs they immediately quited that ſervice. By this he deſigned to ſatisfy his reſentment, and intimidate the Dutch; but did not ſucceed. On the contrary they were well pleaſed, that by recalling thoſe regiments, he had furniſhed them with ſo ſpecious an opportunity of geting rid of perſons whoſe fidelity was ſuſpected, as that of teſtifying their readineſs to give him ſatisfaction; and thereupon offered thoſe Engliſh officers their diſcharge, who were diſpoſed to aſk it. Only ſuch as were miſtruſted preſented themſelves on that occaſion. But the animoſity of the Dutch was not abated, and it was ſuſpected that the recalling of thoſe troops, preſaged a war would ſoon break out between England and Holland.

What did that Prince ſtill more prejudice with the States General, as well as with the Emperor Leopold, and Charles II, King of Spain, was his conſtant refuſal of entering into a league, which they had made at Augſbourgh with the German Princes, againſt France. Thoſe powers concluded from his conduct that he was united in intereſt, and ingaged to Lewis XIV, by a private treaty. They thought this the more probable, becauſe Spain having promiſed him, on condition he would accede to the league, to make the parliament approve of all he had attempted to eſtabliſh in regard to religion, he had rejected an offer which would have been moſt advantageous to him, had he not expected more effectual ſuccors from ſome other quarter. I ſhall not undertake to decide the truth of this ſuſpicion. On one hand, Lewis XIV denied any ſuch ingagement, and James II. ſtill more ſtrenuouſly. On the other hand, all the actions of thoſe two Princes, for a conſiderable time, ſeemed to prove that formidable concert. To go back to the origin of things, it was ſaid that Charles II

(1) The Regulators, who were for the moſt part Diſſenters gained by the court, went on boldly, and turned men out upon every ſtory that was made of them, and put in others whom they confided in; but often ſo haſtily, that men were put in one week, and turned out another. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 719.

In 1670. had concluded a private league with France, the end of which was to ſecure that Prince an abſolute authority over his parliament, on condition he ſhould eſtabliſh the Catholic religion in his kingdoms, and concur in the deſign of humbling the Dutch power, and it was improbable that James II, then duke of York, ſhould decline an alliance ſo ſerviceable to his religion. The letters of the famous Coleman, and father la Chaiſe, which were public at that time, contained ſome things, that one can hardly avoid looking on as undoubted proofs of the ſtricteſt and moſt intimate friendſhip between the three Princes, and of the ardor with which they jointly indeavored the deſtruction of the Proteſtant religion. Lewis XIV had then taken ſuch ſteps in favor of James II, as are not uſually the reſult of a common tie among Princes. He had propoſed the duke's marriage with the Princeſs of Modena, and treated that affair at his own expenſe: he received that lady in France with extraordinary magnificence, and bore her charges into England. It is added that he paid beſt part of her portion, if not the whole. James, in his turn, both before and after his acceſſion to the crown, ſeemed to act only by the impreſſions of France, and it might be ſaid he was no more than the firſt miniſter of that court in England. The principality of Orange three times
In 1660, 1673, and 1682. taken from its lawful Sovereign by Lewis XIV, which neither Charles the uncle, nor James, both uncle and father-in-law of that Prince, intereſted themſelves in his favor, was conſidered as a certain indication of the influence of the counſels of Verſailles over thoſe of St. James's. Beſide which, there were formal and public acknowlegments of a ſtrict alliance lately concluded between the two crowns (1). On theſe grounds the two branches of the houſe of Auſtria conceived a prejudice againſt James II, and conſidered him as a Prince inſeparably attached to France.

A league formed againſt Lewis XIV and James II. Intereſt ſoon brought them in allies. The Elector Palatine ſtood in need of a powerful protection, for ſupporting him againſt France, who would not fail of maintaining by arms the right of the ducheſs of Orleans to the ſucceſſion of the Elector her brother. The Prince of Orange had reaſon to apprehend his religion would exclude him from the throne of England; and even without that motive, his inveterate hatred of Lewis XIV, had been ſufficient; an hatred of which no one then doubted, and with which Lewis XIV was too well acquainted, not to repay. Nor were other Princes and States without their particular views. Thus was King James publiſhes an order for reading his declaration for liberty of conſcience in the churches. Apr. 27. We ſhall now ſee by what a ſeries of events James II loſt the crown. His declaration for liberty of conſcience had been publiſhed a year and ſome days, when he renewed and confirmed it by an order, which was attended with terrible conſequences. Dr. William Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, thought of an officious innovation, when he propoſed reading in the pulpits a ſort of manifeſto, ſet out by Charles II, after the parliament of Oxford. James made his advantage of this dangerous example to the prejudice of the church of England. The council ſent an order to the biſhops to diſperſe copies of the new declaration in their dioceſes, and lay an injunction on the miniſters to read it two ſeveral Sundays in their churches at the time of divine ſervice. This order threw the clergy of London into extreme perplexity. In 1681.

The perplexity of the church of England on this occaſion. On one ſide it was ſaid that diſobedience to the commands of the Sovereign, expoſed the miniſters to criminal proſecutions; and that it did not ſeem prudent to run ſuch hazards for an affair like this. That the reading of the declaration did by no means infer the approbation of the order. That to read it, was only to notify an act of the King, and that the perſons ſo complying might be diſcharged from all blame, by declaring that this notification was a proof of their obedience, not a mark of their conſent.

On the other ſide, it was obſerved, that this declaration, tending to the ruin of the church of England, the epiſcopal miniſters were required to read it in their pulpits, only that they might draw the contempt and hatred of the nation on themſelves. That if the clergy betrayed the intereſt of the church, the nobility might, out of ſpite, come to an agreement with the court at the expenſe of the church: that if they now gave ground, it would be impoſſible for them ever to recover it: that proteſtations would not prevent this conſequence, and that for the ſame reaſons alleged for reading the declaration in queſtion, there would be none, which they could avoid reading: that therefore it ought to be agreed to publiſh only thoſe things in the pulpit, which the miniſters were ſuppoſed to approve of. That the preſent inquiry was not whether the tolleration is lawful or neceſſary: that the whole matter was reduced to an acknowlegment of a power in the kingdom ſuperior to the laws; a pretenſion, which abſolutely changes the form of the government: in ſhort, that it was certainly dangerous to diſobey; but that their ruin was reſolved unleſs they would ſave themſelves by an intire and baſe ſacrifice of their conſcience. That they ought therefore to prepare themſelves for ſuffering; and that it was not worth while to keep off the ſtorm for a ſmall time, by ſubmiting to a ſtep, which would only alienate the friends of the Epiſcopal clergy, and give their enemies an occaſion for triumph.

They all refuſe to obey. The reaſons alleged by the laſt, gained the conſent of the others. The diſobedience of the London clergy would however have been but a ſmall matter, if the example had not been at all followed in the country, or only by halves. On this occaſion a conſiderable part would have concluded for the whole; and perhaps the court, flattered by ſome biſhops, had really expected that the number of ſuch as ſhould obey would be large enough to give occaſion to boaſt of the ſuffrages of the church of England, and proceed againſt the refractory with ſome appearance of juſtice. The reſolution of the London clergy had its intended effect, and animated the country eccleſiaſtics.

Debates of the biſhops on that affair. Sancroft appeared at the head of them, with a vigor not expected from his former conduct. At his intreaty, ſuch of his ſuffragans as were able to

An' 1687. come to London, repair'd thither to confer with him, and for thoſe whoſe age or infirmities would not allow of it, they were conſulted by letter. Conferences were held at Lambeth; whither ſeveral divines, who were noted for their learning and integrity, were invited, and previous to their deliberations, the aſſiſtance of the ALMIGHTY was intreated in prayer. Eighteen biſhops, and two thirds at leaſt of the inferior clergy, concluded not to read the declaration, and it was agreed that ſome of the prelates, together with the archbiſhop, ſhould deliver a petition to the King, as well in their own names, as in thoſe of their abſent brethren, to ſet forth the motives of their conduct. The archbiſhop ſigned it, and ſix biſhops carried it to Whitehall, viz. William Lloyd biſhop of St. Aſaph, Thomas Kenn biſhop of Bath and Wells, John Lake biſhop of Chicheſter, Francis Turner biſhop of Ely, John White biſhop of Peterborough, and ſir Jonathan Trelawney biſhop of Briſtol (1).

1688. The petition of the ſeven biſhops.

In this petition they ſet forth, "That their "averſeneſs proceeded neither from any want of "duty to the King, nor of due tenderneſs to Diſ"ſenters, in relation to whom, they were willing "to come to ſuch a temper as ſhould be thought "fit, when that matter ſhould be conſidered and "ſettled in parliament and convocation: But "that this declaration was founded upon ſuch a diſ"penſing power, as had been often declared ille"gal in parliament *. Beſide, as this matter was "of the greateſt moment to the whole nation, they "could not, in prudence, honor or conſcience, "make themſelves ſo far parties to it, as to publiſh "this declaration, even in GOD's houſe, and in the "time of divine ſervice.

* In 1662, 1672, and 1685.

Upon the reading of their petition, by the King's command, his Majeſty ſtartled, and being greatly provok'd, told them angrily: "He did not ex"pect this from the Church of England, eſpecially "from ſome of them; That, if he chang'd his "mind, they ſhould hear from him: If not, he ex"pected his command ſhould be obey'd." To which the biſhops replied, they reſign'd themſelves to the will of GOD, and immediately retired.

The King's anſwer.

He propoſes the matter to his council:

After a ſtep of this importance, in which the honor of the King and biſhops was equally at ſtake, it could not but be with great uneaſineſs, that every one was attentive to the conſequences of it, and impatient to ſee which would, in the end, obtain their point, the King or the nation. Some days were ſpent in conſultations. The court immediately indeavor'd to ſtifle the petition, but in vain. They then conſulted perſons of different perſuaſions. Some were for impriſoning the biſhops who had ſign'd it, and for this father Peters, who was now almoſt firſt miniſter, with the title of privy-counſellor, was very urgent. There were, however, other Roman Catholic lords, who were for the King's putting up the affront, and not inſiſting, with the clergy, upon a point, which might determine them to a profeſs'd diſobedience.

And follows the worſt advice.

This advice was by ſo much the more prudent as it is dangerous to drive matters to an extremity, with a body of men, who have a ſure refuge in the love of the people for religion, and whom oppreſſion itſelf renders venerable. James was ſenſible of this truth, by a fatal experience. There were but very few, and thoſe the moſt inconſiderable of the clergy, who ſubmited. In London no more than ſeven, and about 200 throughout all England, in which, it is computed, there are 9500 pariſhes. And it is obſervable, that of the few who were obedient, ſome read the declaration one Sunday only, and for the reſt, moſt of them declared from the pulpit, that it was by command, and not thro' inclination. One even turn'd it into ridicule, and told his pariſhioners, "That tho' he was oblig'd to read this piece, they "were not bound to hear it;" and did not read it, till they had all left the church. An' 1688.

Addreſſes on this occaſion.

The ſubmiſſion of the biſhops of Durham and Rocheſter, and ſome addreſſes which were preſented the King, were to him a ſufficient balance, for the marks of diſſatisfaction ſhewn by the epiſcopal party. That of Carliſle, in particular, deſerves, for its ſingularity, to be preſerv'd in hiſtory. "They thank'd "the King for having eſtabliſh'd a liberty of con"ſcience, and a royal army; an army which they "were convinc'd, whatever the Tekelites might ſay "or think of it, was undoubtedly for the honor "and ſecurity of the nation. They promis'd to "elect ſuch members, as would promote a revoca"tion of the teſt and penal laws, and who had ne"ver any ways declared in favor of ſuch cannibal "laws:" and concluded with theſe expreſſions: "Surely theſe men, that oppoſe your Majeſty in "ſo gracious a work, do not conſider what a ſove"reign Prince, by his royal power, can do. A "work which Heaven ſmiles upon, and will re"ward with no leſs a bleſſing than a Prince of "Wales, that we may never want a Prince of your "royal race, to ſway the ſcepter of theſe king"doms, while either Sun or Moon ſhall give light "to this world."

The biſhops ſummoned to appear before the council.

The King's hopes were greatly increaſed by the promiſes he drew from his counſellors, one by one, after about a fortnight's tampering with them, that they would comply with his meaſures. He then cauſed the biſhops to be ſummon'd before the council, and, upon their appearance, the petition being produced, they were ask'd whether they own'd it? They anſwer'd: "That if the deſign was to ac"count it a crime in them, they hop'd the King "would not take advantage of the confeſſion they "were about to make in his preſence, and that "they allowed it to be the petition they had "preſented." Being ask'd how they came to print and publiſh it, they proteſted "that they "had no hand, either in one or the other." And, indeed, it has been aſſur'd, that they had conceal'd it with all the care imaginable: the archbiſhop wrote the rough draught with his own hand, kept it in his own poſſeſſion, without ſuffering any one to ſee it, and the only engroſs'd copy was that which was ſign'd and preſented by the biſhops. It muſt therefore have been handed to the preſs by ſome one to whom the King had intruſted it, and perhaps by a miniſter who was then pretty much in the confidence, both of his Majeſty and the Prince of Orange.

The council declaring this petition to be a libel, publiſh'd with the ſiniſter deſign of diminiſhing the King's authority, told the biſhops, they muſt give recognizances to appear before the court of King's-bench, at a time limited, to anſwer this high miſdemeanor. This they all refus'd to do, alledging their peerage, as biſhops, which placed them above the juriſdiction of that court. This Reſolution threw the whole council into aſtoniſhment. They threatned to proſecute them as rebels, with the utmoſt ſeverity of the law; and that unleſs they immediately withdrew their petition, they ſhould be ſent to the Tower: and an order for their commitment was ſign'd by all the members preſent, excepting father Peters, whoſe name the King would not ſuffer to appear on this occaſion. They replied, "that the King of Kings "would be their Protector and their Judge, and " that they feared nothing from men, ſince they " had been wholly govern'd by their conſciences, " and the laws of the land.

And are committed to the Tower. * May 28.

Upon this Anſwer, they were conveyed to the Tower * by water, leſt the populace might be excited to riſe, by the view of ſo moving a ſpectacle: But, notwithſtanding this precaution, people flocked in ſhoals, on both ſides of the river, extolling the conſtancy of theſe prelates, and craving their benediction on their knees, with all poſſible marks of a moſt ſenſible affliction. The ſame ſcene preſented itſelf at the Tower, where as well officers as ſoldiers threw themſelves on their knees, to receive their priſoners. In ſhort, grief was viſible in the face of every one, and every eye was a teſtimony of that ſpecies of menacing ſorrow, in which rage ſeems to be predominant over dejection. It was, perhaps, no unneceſſary precaution, that ſome companies of ſoldiers were up in arms, that day, who had orders to fire on all that ſhould offer to diſturb the peace, without which a tumult might probably have inſued.

Diſpoſitions of the King and nation, on this account.

The King, far from being intimidated by theſe tacite reproaches, or the ſhare which his army, then incamped at Hounſlow-heath, publicly profeſſed to take in the affliction of the city, as if theſe circumſtances were only ſo many ſpurs to his rancor, diſcharged all thoſe ſoldiers who had knelt to the biſhops, and was deaf to the intreaties of thoſe prudent Catholics who adviſed the releaſe of the prelates. He anſwered, with great haughtineſs, that his authority would become deſpicable, ſhould he put up with this infraction of it: And choſe rather to be a ſacrifice to the empty honor of acting conſiſtent with himſelf, in hopes of concealing his error, or rather juſtifying his actions, by perſevering in them.

The biſhops, in the mean time, were continued in the Tower, in ſeparate apartments, where they were daily viſited by perſons of the greateſt diſtinction, ſome lords coming ſeventy, or more, miles to ſhew them this regard. After a week's impriſonment, they were brought before the court of King's Bench, by virtue of a Habeas Corpus, and were inlarged upon the moderate recognizances of 100 l. for each biſhop, and 200 for the archbiſhop. The court appear'd, on this occaſion, as ſplendid as it was numerous. Several lords accompanied the biſhops to and from the court, and the populace followed with loud acclamations. Bonefires ſucceeded, at night, in all parts of the town; and the following days, theſe confeſſors, as they were ſtiled, were imployed in receiving the viſits of their well-wiſhers.

Trial of the biſhops.

No leſs ſplendid was the day of their trial: they were attended to the bar, by ſeveral biſhops, and by above thirty temporal lords, (1) who were curious to know the event, and who came provided with ſums of mony, to pay the fines which it was apprehended would be laid upon them. The unwearied aſſiduity of the clergy, and eſpecially of dr. Tenniſon, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, contributed very much to the procuring of a ſplendid appearance for the priſoners, which had this double advantage, that it at once did honor to the church of England, and excited the zeal of the people. The council for the King, were ſir Thomas Powis, attorney-general, ſir William Williams, ſolicitor-general, ſir Bartholomew Shore, recorder of London, mr. ſerjeant Baldock, and mr. ſerjeant Trinder: and for the biſhops, ſir Robert Sawyer, ſir Francis Pemberton, ſir George Treby, mr. Heneage Finch, mr. Henry Pollexfen, and mr. John Somers. On the bench ſat ſir Robert Wright, lord chief juſtice, and the judges Holloway, Powel and Allybone, the latter of whom was a Roman Catholic (2). As for the jury, it conſiſted of ſir Roger Langley, baronet, ſir William Hill, mr. Roger Jennings, mr. William Avery, mr. Thomas Auſtin, mr. Nicholas Price, mr. Thomas Harriot, mr. Geoffrey Nightingale, mr. William Withers, mr. Michael Arnold, mr. Thomas Done, and mr. Richard Shoreditch; whoſe poſterity will probably not be diſpleaſed to find their names recorded in hiſtory.

Pleadings on both ſides.

The debate was begun upon theſe two queſtions of fact: firſt, " whether the petition was compoſed " by the biſhops; and, ſecondly, whether they pub- " liſh'd it?" The council for the King not being able to prove the firſt, by any other evidence, than the ſelf-confeſſion of the biſhops before the council, it was ſtrenuouſly argued, that a certain confidence placed in the King, as a ſign of an intire dependance on his equity, ought not to be produced in evidence againſt them. All the proof they could bring on the ſecond queſtion was, that they had preſented the petition to the King, who was then alone, and afterwards acknowledg'd it to be of their compoſing before the council. The court, therefore, proceeded to the queſtion of law; " whether that petition " was a libel?"

" Williams and Powis took upon them to demon- " ſtrate that it tended to caſt a blemiſh on the " King's adminiſtration, and to defame his perſon;" to which the counſel for the biſhops anſwer'd, " that " their lordſhips having receiv'd a command, " which in conſcience they could not obey, they " thought it their duty, as biſhops and ſubjects, to " acquaint his Majeſty with the reaſons of their " non-compliance: that as peers, and members of " the great council of the nation, they had yet a " more ample right to do it: that in matters of " religion, it was, in a more eſpecial manner, their " duty; and that by the act of uniformity, paſs'd " in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, they were in- " joyn'd, under pain of incurring the curſe of the " Almighty, not to be remiſs in caſes of this na- " ture. That the diſpenſing power aſſumed by " ſome Kings had been frequently oppos'd in parlia- " ment, where it had always been adjudg'd illegal. " That King Charles II had allow'd as much when " he revok'd his proclamation for a liberty of con- " ſcience; and that, all theſe things conſider'd, the " biſhops had authority for what they had done."

To this the council for the King replied; " that " the reſolutions of the two houſes, whether jointly " or ſingly, have not the force of a law, 'till they " have the ſanction of the royal aſſent. That " King Charles II might decline his right, in a " particular caſe, without a precedent being made of " it. That the Majeſty of Sovereigns was ſacred; " that the writing might be a libel, and yet contain " nothing but the truth; and finally, that the parlia- " ment, in a body were, indeed, intitled to re- " monſtrate; but that it was criminal in every one " elſe, to aſſume that liberty."

The biſhops acquitted.

Theſe debates laſted above ten hours; during all which time, an incredible throng of people waited in expectation of the event. The witneſſes againſt the biſhops, were not only inſulted, but in danger of their lives, had not they been convey'd away by a private door, and by that means eſcaped the fury of the people. The judges themſelves were divided: Powel and Holloway averr'd the petition to be no libel; but Allybone inſiſted it was; Wright agreed

Be this as it will, the next morning, they brought in the priſoners, NOT GUILTY.

Great joy of the nation on this account.

In a moment, the hall rung with loud and repeated acclamations, and perſons of the higheſt diſtinction were not aſham'd to join with the populace in their continued ſhouts. The marquis of Hallifax ſet them an example, by throwing up his hat and crying huzza; and ſome carried their exceſs of joy ſo far, to fire their muſkets in the very hall. The lord chief juſtice, having caus'd one who had been guilty of this indecency to be taken up, could not forbear ſaying; "I rejoice as much as you "can, that my lords the biſhops are acquited, "but the manner of your expreſſing your joy is "indecent in this place." Nor did theſe tranſports terminate here, the whole city ecchoed with them. Hardly a houſe but what was preparing a bonefire. The officers who were ſent by the court to put a ſtop to them, could not hinder the people from making illuminations, and firing great guns in every part of the town. Some put ſix lighted candles in their windows with a ſeventh in the middle, longer than the reſt, to denote the ſix biſhops and the archbiſhop. In ſome places they obliged the conſtables to drink a health to the biſhops bare-headed. Out of the juriſdiction of the lord-mayor matters were carried yet farther. From Temple-bar, along the Strand, to Charing-croſs, within ſight of Whitehall, and about Somerſet-houſe, the reſidence of the Queen Dowager, the ſtreets abounded with bonefires, and nothing was heard but ſhouts of "Long live the biſhops." The news ſoon got into the country, and occaſion'd the ſame rejoicings every where: In the very army, where the King happen'd to be, there was no ſtopping their courſe.

The King attempts, in vain, to gain the army.

James hoped, however, by means of his army, and eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, to recover the ground he had loſt by the court of King's-bench. To this end, he endeavour'd to induce the former to come into his meaſures, for repealing the teſt, and the penal laws. He caus'd the matter to be firſt open'd to the lord Litchfield's regiment, with orders, that thoſe who would not inſtantly comply ſhould lay down their arms. This, he imagin'd, would intimidate them, and that having gain'd one regiment the reſt would ſoon follow; but how was he ſurpriz'd to find, that excepting two captains and four or five ſoldiers, who were Catholics, they all prepar'd to incur the penalty injoin'd. He order'd them to take up their arms again; adding, "That "for the future, he would not do them the honor "to ask their advice:" and this diſcourag'd him from any farther attempt with the other regiments.

And to incorporate Papiſts into it.

This project miſcarrying, he was the more intent upon reſuming that of forming an army for his purpoſe, by recruiting it with Iriſh Papiſts. His firſt attempt this way was with the regiment commanded by the duke of Berwick, his natural ſon, by ordering five Iriſhmen to be incorporated into each company. Lieutenant-colonel Beaumont, captain Paſton, captain Pack, and three others oppoſed it: but to ſoften their refuſal, they alledged, that "they could depend upon the fidelity "of their men, which had been put to the trial, in "Monmouth's rebellion; that they could find "recruits ſufficient in England, and that to mix "Iriſh with them, would give ſuch diſtaſte to the "reſt, that the officers could be no longer anſwer-"able for them." In vain the duke of Berwick came in perſon to inforce the King's commands; and to as little purpoſe it prov'd, to threaten the refractory with death, and that a council of war ſhamefully broke them. All the court gain'd thereby was the vexation of ſeeing not the army only, but the whole nation eſpouſe the cauſe of the diſgraced captains; their pictures, as of ſo many confeſſors were engraven, and, together with thoſe of the biſhops, hung up in private houſes. AN' 1688

The eccleſiaſtical commiſſion broken.

His Majeſty ſucceeded no better with his eccleſiaſtical commiſſion. In vain this court ſummon'd the chancellors and archdeacons of each dioceſe, to give a liſt of ſuch as had refuſed to read the declaration. Some abſolutely refuſed to ſubmit to this new juriſdiction, while others thought to wave it by civil excuſes: and as an additional misfortune, dr. Sprat, biſhop of Rocheſter, a member of that commiſſion, quitted it at once, and wrote a letter to his colleagues, ſetting forth his reaſons for it: He ſaid, "he could no longer join with them in it; that "he had indeed done it, in obedience to an order "of council, and proteſted he then thought it his "duty: that, nevertheleſs, he did not queſtion "but his brethren, who had been diſobedient to it, "had acted upon the ſame principles of conſcience, "and that he had rather ſuffer with them, than "concur any longer in giving them trouble." This unexpected blow put a ſtop to their farther proceedings, and thus ended the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, and the proſecution of the biſhops.

Birth of the Pretender.

While theſe things were tranſacting, the Queen was ſaid to bring forth a Prince, now known in Europe, by the melancholy name of the Pretender. The reader has already ſeen in the foregoing ſheets, that many, as well Engliſh as foreigners believed, or pretended to believe, that this Princeſs had not been with child at all; and that others would have it, ſhe had miſcarried, and ſubſtituted another child in the room of her own, which dying, as did likewiſe a ſecond, the place was ſupplied by a third. Be that as it will, this event, which was intended to have fix'd James more firmly on the throne, was one, among others, which contributed the moſt to his fall. Many Proteſtants in England had pretty patiently born with a Catholic Prince on the throne, in expectation of a Proteſtant ſucceſſor; but their hopes were fruſtrated by the birth of a Prince, who being brought up in the Roman perſuaſion, would undoubtedly, ſoon or late, attempt to make that the national religion. This conſideration greatly advanced the intereſt of the Prince of Orange, and increaſed the number of his friends. As well thoſe of the church of England, as the Diſſenters, concur'd in inviting him hither, that he might oblige the King to govern according to law. Several of the nobility waited on him at the Hague, and, in the name of the whole nation, privately intreated the aſſiſtance of the States, who gave them ready aſſurances of it. The Prince ſent a gentleman * to England, who, as he deſired, returned with an invitation in form, ſign'd by a great number of ſpiritual and temporal lords, and, at the ſame time, acquainted him with the ſtate of the nation.

* Monſieur de Zuyleſtien.

The Engliſh call in the Prince of Orange.

He informed him, "that the nation was highly "provok'd, and called aloud for a deliverer; that "the eyes of the people were fix'd on him, for "this glorious exploit, and that the law of nations "gave him a juſt call to it, the heir being, by that "law, intitled to prevent the diſſipation of an "eſtate, intail'd on him by ſucceſſion, when by "the default of the poſſeſſor, it is running to ruin; "that if the preſent diſpoſition of the minds of the "people was diſregarded, the like favorable op-

An' 1688.

" portunity would hardly ever return, that even " the army, notwithſtanding the horrid licentiouſ- " neſs, into which it had been ſuffer'd to plunge " itſelf, that it might become odious to the peo- " ple, and bear an averſion to them, in its turn, " was not backward in their wiſhes, that the chains " with which the nation was fettered, might be " broken. That the troops, tho' equally ſtrangers " to the knowledge as well as practiſe of their re- " ligion, ſhewed, nevertheleſs, a contempt and ha- " tred for the Roman church, and that this had " induced the King to diſperſe them in the ſeveral " counties: that the fleet gave him the ſame ſub- " ject of uneaſineſs, and beſide ſhewed no inclina- " tion to come to blows, with that of the United " Provinces; and that having been ſounded by " certain perſons, on that head, they made no " ſcruple to anſwer, that the Dutch were their " friends and brethren, and that the French were " the natural enemies of the Engliſh."

He accepts their invitation.

This relation fixed the Prince of Orange's reſolution; and the ſituation of affairs, at this time, very much facilitated the execution of it. The principles, by which the nation in general was actuated in his favor, have been already ſhewn. Some, by inviting him, intended nothing more, than with the help of his troops, to bring matters into their natural order: others, by far the ſmaller number, prompted either by their hatred for James, or by their ambition, made a ſhew of having the ſame views only, tho' their real deſign was to dethrone their Sovereign, and the event has made it be thought, that the perſon, for whom they intended the throne, was not unacquainted with their deſign, and approved of it.

Foreigners, in their turn, had more than one reaſon, not to be the greateſt friends to King James. There was nothing more wanting, than to render the ſupport of France of no ſervice to him, by giving her imployment in her own defenſe. In this the Prince ſucceeded, as much by the evil conduct of his enemy, as his own ability.

The ſtate of Europe about the time of the revolution.

The powers and intrigues of Lewis XIV had excited a great part of Europe againſt him, and peace itſelf had furniſhed him with means of extending his conqueſts, with greater advantage and ſecurity than ever. He had bought Caſal of the duke of Mantua, made himſelf maſter of Straſsburg, by the credulity or corruption of its magiſtrates, and by judiciary proceedings re-united to his crown almoſt all that the Emperor had retain'd in Alſace. He had, partly by the ſame means, and in part by open violence, depriv'd Spain of ſeveral towns and lordſhips in the Low-countries, and the haughty and oppreſſive behavior of the French miniſtry had every where thoroughly exaſperated thoſe who were before but too much injured by his incroachments.

The Empe ror and Spain uneaſy at the conduct of France

The two branches of the houſe of Auſtria had made ſome weak attempts, as well in their own defence, as to be revenged. The treaty of guaranty * between Spain, Holland, and Sweden had proved ineffectual. The conferences held at Frankfort and Ratisbon, in order to ſpirit up Germany againſt France, had been fruitleſs for two whole years, † and what by the favor of fortune, what by the efficacy of a refined policy, Lewis the XIVth triumphed over the juſt arguments and complaints of his enemies.

* Concluded in 1681.

Spain, inraged at the loſſes ſhe had ſuſtained, and the contempt with which ſhe had been treated, reſolved at length, ‡ to ſeek an adequate ſatisfaction, by means of her own forces alone. The Prince of Orange, then ſtatholder of the United Provinces, would gladly have aſſiſted the Spaniards. But the city of Amſterdam oppoſing it, all he could obtain was the feeble and ineffectual ſuccor of 8000 men, ſtipulated by the treaty of 1672; ſo Charles II King of Spain, was reduced to the neceſſity of puting up with the diſadvantageous terms offer'd by France, after having loſt Courtray, Dixmuyde, Luxemburg, and ſome other places.

‡ In 1684.

The Emperor Leopold had ample cauſes of diſcontent. Neither the twenty years truce ſo lately concluded at Ratisbon, ‡ nor the league made at Augſburg, * in which he had ingaged ſeveral Princes, had been ſufficient to ſcreen him againſt the intrigues of France: ſhe bouyed up the malecontents of Hungary, and, by her agents at the Port, ſtired up the Grand-Signor to continue the war there.

* In 1686.

Being conſtantly intent upon unfolding the Emperor's views, and perplexing his deſigns, France kept up ſuch correſpondences and alliances in the Empire, as inabled her to prevent the Emperor from imploying his forces, or his allies, in the defenſe of Germany, on the Rhine.

Conduct of Lewis XIV. towards the Proteſtants.

Nothing was wanting to crown theſe meaſures, but either to leave the Proteſtants unmoleſted, or intirely to root them out: but Lewis XIV was not able to effect either. He deprived the Proteſtants in his kingdom of their liberty of conſcience, by revoking the edict of Nantz, ‖ granted them by Henry IV, and by ſubjecting them to the moſt rigorous treatment if they perſevered in their religion. He conſtrained the duke of Savoy, to treat his Proteſtant ſubjects, in the vales of Piedmont, in like manner. The capitulation of Straſsburg could ſcreen the Proteſtants of that city, but from a part of the rigour of his edicts. The reformed of Orange were little the better for being the ſubjects of another power. That city and principality being rent from the houſe of Naſſau, and re-united to Dauphiny, the violences commited there by his dragoons eſtabliſh'd the authority and the religion of Lewis XIV. The ſtrict alliance that was between him and James II King of England, ingaged the latter to leave no ſtone unturned to re-eſtabliſh the Roman Catholic religion in Great Britain.

But the too precipitate proceedings of theſe two Princes, far from extinguiſhing the Proteſtant religion, tended only to loſe France the friendſhip of the Proteſtant Princes and States, who had and would always have taken her part againſt the houſe of Auſtria. They ſtrengthned the enemies of Lewis XIV with 800,000 French ſubjects, who carried immenſe riches, and the moſt valuable manufactures out of his kingdom, and furniſhed their armies with ſoldiers, who, beſide their valour and experience, were ſtimulated by the deſpair and reſentment of an exile, to which they had been oblig'd to condemn themſelves. In ſhort, they drove James II, from the throne, and ſet William III, upon it.

Some Roman Catholic Princes even contributed to, or at leaſt ſhewed their approbation of, this change; England and France being ſo ſtrictly united as they had now long been, and governed by two Monarchs, who were animated by the ſame principles and paſſions, ſeemed to threaten Europe, with a ſhameful and burdenſome ſlavery. Others hoped that the eſtabliſhment of a new government in England would furniſh them with an opportunity of ſhaking off the yoke laid upon them, or of ſhewing their reſentment for the injuries that had been done them. Pope Innocent XI was one of thoſe who were the moſt ſenſibly affected with theſe ſentiments.

Pope Innocent XI oppoſes France.

James II had omited nothing that might ingage him in his intereſt; he ſent an embaſſy to him, and once more let England ſee the entry and audience of a Papal nuncio. He talked of nothing but a ſpeedy reduction of the whole nation, to the obedience of the Holy See, and, indeed, he labor'd at it with more ardor than prudence: but every

An' 1688. every thing, at Rome, ran againſt him. His very manner of devotion, and want of ability were alone more than ſufficient to draw upon him the contempt of that politic court: and his miniſters ſeem'd made to be the ſport of it. They were ſenſible there, that the converſion of Great Britain, which he was ſo full of, would end in nothing, and be of no real benefit to the Pope: to all which they added James's partiality for Lewis XIV.

The two courts of Rome and France had been long at variance, concerning the regalia. The latter talked of nothing leſs, than withdrawing their duty from the See of Rome. The Gallican church had reviv'd the famous tenets of the councils of Conſtance and Baſil, againſt the pretenſions of the Popes, in four propoſitions. They threatned Rome with a formidable army, and the Pope, without any emotion, gravely told the terrified cardinals, "that he had courage enough to undergo martyr-"dom."

The buſineſs of the immunities had inflam'd his reſentment. He pretended they were limited to the palaces of embaſſadors, and to the perſons of their retinue: but France inſiſted very ſtrenuouſly on their privilege. The marquis de Lavardin, their embaſſador, had made his entry into Rome in a military manner, and as if it had been an enemy's town: his quarters, being carefully fortified, had the appearance of a ſtrong-hold, and it was no unreaſonable queſtion, whether his deſign was to ſtand a ſiege there, againſt the Pope, or to beſiege him in the Vatican? The Holy Father, at length, flew out beyond all bounds. Lavardin, whoſe credentials he would never allow of, was excommunicated, the church of St. Lewis, at Rome, was put under a ſuſpenſion; Chanlay, a ſecret agent of France, was diſmiſs'd with contempt, and new meaſures were taken with the Emperor and Spain.

Thus ſtood matters, when King James undertook the imprudent and odious commiſſion of exhorting Innocent XI to quit ſome of his pretenſions. He fondly believed, that all poſſible regard was due to his and Lewis XIV's zeal for the Roman church, and, according to him, the world could not, without offenſe, behold the ſovereign Pontiff continue to diſoblige two ſuch pious and mighty Princes. To crown his error, he on every occaſion ſhew'd his repugnancy to whatever could be propos'd to him, in oppoſition to France.

The Pope, on this occaſion, followed the example, which Sixtus V, left his Succeſſors in a caſe not much differing from this. He was not ſatisfied with having advis'd the States General, that Lewis XIV was preparing to fall upon their provinces, before he had declared war againſt them, and that King James would take his part: he went yet farther. About the time the revolution was concerting, France, who having poſſeſſion of Alſace, was miſtreſs of the Upper Rhine, had fortified Landau, to render Philipſburg thereby uſeleſs to the Imperialiſts. Luxemburg held the country of Triers in a dependance on France, and Mont-Royal was erected on the Moſel, to curb the Electors Palatine and of Mentz. The Electorate of Cologne was all they now wanted to ſecure, and, to this end, after having procured the election of Prince William of Furſtemburg to the co-adjutorſhip, they were actually bent upon obtaining the archbiſhopric for him.

Double election of the archbiſhop of Cologne.

The Pope was very eager to imbrace this opportunity in his turn, to mortify France, who diſtributed mony, and ſent troops to facilitate the election of this Prince; and he was indeed choſen by a plurality of votes, notwithſtanding all the intrigues of the Pope, the Emperor and Holland, who eſpouſed the intereſt of Prince Clement of Bavaria: but an obſtinate refuſal of the inveſtiture and bulls render'd this election of no effect, and Clement only was acknowledged elector and archbiſhop in the Empire and at Rome. An' 1688.

Circumſtances of the revolution.

Theſe conjunctures, I ſay, extremely favored the revolution in England. The marquis de Seignelay, ſon of monſieur Colbert, had diſcovered the deſign, and offered a fleet of forty ſail to oppoſe it. King James, whoſe falſe dependences had long impoſed on Lewis XIV, being recovered from that fatal ſecurity, preſs'd him urgently to make a diverſion, and had it been done on the ſide of Cologn or Maeſtricht, as he propoſed, it is certain the Dutch would have found too much buſineſs cut out for their troops, to have left their frontiers bare, for the ſake of the expedition to England: but Lewis XIV had other concerns more at heart. To render the election of Prince Furſtemburg valid; to ſupport the pretenſions of his ſiſter-in-law, the ducheſs of Orleans, againſt the Elector Palatine, and to prevent, at the ſame time, the irruption he was threatned with, by the league of the Empire, employed his thoughts: and thus begun that long war, which broke out by the invaſion of the Palatinate, and ſoon after ſpread over all Europe.

Holland, being thus freed from the apprehenſions the motions of the French had cauſed, lent their fleet and their forces, to the Prince of Orange. His deſcent in England met with no oppoſition. All declared immediately in his favor, and King James, being abandoned by his ſubjects and his allies, gave himſelf up to deſpair, and, by his flight, left the throne vacant for his ſon-in-law.

The INTER-REGNUM.

Diſpoſition of the Engliſh nation towards the Prince of Orange.

From that moment, there appeared a change in every thing: the Tories, who were united, by the ſame common intereſt, with the Whigs, to call in the Prince of Orange, loſt all remembrance of what they had done, and regreted the yoke they had but juſt ſhook off. Some of them, who had imbib'd the principles of the divine and indefeaſible right of Kings, and paſſive obedience, ſtill look'd upon the perſon, whom they themſelves had dethron'd, as their King: others were under apprehenſions for the High Church party, during the reign of a Prince who was born a Preſbyterian. Many were in fear of nothing but of being proſecuted for the faults they had commited during the two preceding reigns, or of ſeing the Whigs, and the Dutch, who came over with the Prince, prefered before them.

They had forgot the danger the church of England was expos'd to, when King James, having led father Peters into the council, made a ſpeech in his favor, and declared, "That he expected his "power ſhould be acknowledged abſolute, and to "be obeyed without reſerve." They no more called to mind the new law cited by the lord chancellor Jefferies, in the high commiſſion court; "it is the King's pleaſure, that you be ſuſpended, "fined and deprived." They no more conſidered an expreſſion King James had let fall, ſoon after his flight, "That he hoped never to return to "England, but by means of fire and ſword." They did not reflect, that by the aſſociation they were all become guilty of high treaſon againſt King James, and that his reſtoration could not but prove fatal to them. Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was one of thoſe who had the moſt reaſon to be liable to theſe fears; he who had diſplaced the governor put by this Prince in the Tower, and ſet the lord Lucas in his room. He was as forgetful of his danger as the reſt. The view of this prelate, of the other biſhops, and of the reſt of the Tories, in calling over the Prince, was merely to make uſe of his authority and forces, to obtain a redreſs of their grievances, and they imagined they had paid too dear for theſe bleſſings, when they ſaw a Prince aſcending cending the throne, who would grant his protection equally to all Engliſh Proteſtants, under whatever denomination.

Hence proceeded the many ſnares which were laid in the Prince's way, and the difficulties he had to incounter with, on every ſide. The firſt propoſal was a treaty between King James and the Prince, while the latter was yet at Littlecot, and they prevailed on the former to command writs to be iſſued for calling a parliament. This artful counſel would have excluded the Prince for ever from the crown of Great Britain. A free parliament, which he himſelf had deſired in his manifeſto, would have diſpelled the uneaſineſſes, allayed the heats, and mitigated the diſcontents of the nation. It would have bound King James by ſuch laws, as, at the ſame time they limited his power, would have fixed him more ſecurely on the throne: while the Prince muſt have been contented with a large ſum of mony, and fair promiſes: but King James, who was as weak in his counſels, as he was intrepid in battle, ſoon deſerted his friends, and after having ſign'd a commiſſion for this treaty, his fears threw him into the power of the Prince, who prudently wink'd at his flight.

Snares laid for him by his pretended friends.

The deſperate counſels, which King James followed, might reaſonably have diſpirited his friends: nevertheleſs, it has been affirm'd, that ſome of them, by pretending to adhere to the contrary party, continued to ſerve him with the ſame zeal as before; and that theſe counſeled the Prince to cauſe himſelf to be proclaimed King, by the army. This advice had a fair appearance, on one ſide. The Prince, being indebted to his ſword only for the crown, might have reign'd ſuperior to the laws, which had done nothing for him, and not have been liable, before his election, to the vexatious delays, and imperious caprices of a convention of the nation: but then the Engliſh looking upon themſelves as a conquer'd and inſlav'd people, would have own'd no obligation to him for his favors; becauſe they would have received them at the hands of a conqueror, and have ſuſpected his own intereſt to be the motives of them. The Prince avoided theſe ſnares, and reſolved to hold the crown of the nation only.

The lords offer him the adminiſtration.

The firſt thing the lords did was to tender him the adminiſtration, till the ſtates could be aſſembled, under the name of a convention, a name invented by the Royaliſts, and given that parliament which reſtored King Charles II. They then deſired his Highneſs "to cauſe letters, ſubſcribed by himſelf, "to be written to the lords ſpiritual and temporal, "being Proteſtants, as likewiſe to the ſeveral counties, univerſities, cities, boroughs, and cinque-ports of England, directing them to chuſe ſuch "a number of perſons to repreſent them, as they "had right to ſend to parliament, within the ſpace "of ten days." Theſe two addreſſes were ſign'd by 90 Peers (1). Beſide theſe ſuffrages, the Prince thought it neceſſary to have the ſanction of ſome others, which might be looked upon as thoſe of the people: he therefore ſummon'd all thoſe who had been members of the houſe of commons, in the reign of King Charles II, to repair to St. James's the 26th of December, at ten in the morning, when the Prince having acquainted them with the cauſe of his deſiring them to meet, they went to the houſe of commons, where they reſolved upon an addreſs conformable to that of the lords, which being preſented to the Prince, the next day, it was reſolved, that the convention ſhould meet the 22d of January inſuing.

On the day fix'd, every thing was prepared, and the conferences were opened by the reading of a letter from the Prince, directed to both houſes. Interreg An' 1689.

He aſſembles a convention.

"After modeſtly hinting at what he had done for "the nation, he, in a few words, took notice of "the dangerous ſtate of Ireland: he recommended "unanimity and diſpatch in their conſultations. "He repreſented the danger that might attend de-"lays; that the States, by whom he had been in-"abled to reſcue this nation, and whom they were "obliged, by treaty, to aſſiſt, might ſuddenly feel "the ill effects of it, by being too long deprived "of the ſervice of their troops, or for want of the "ſuccors, which they ſtood in need of againſt "France, which had juſt declared war againſt "them." In this letter, the Prince gave an image of himſelf; haughty, and at the ſame time modeſt: he did not value himſelf upon the ſervices he had done the Engliſh, and ſcorning to win their affections by adulation, he would receive no return, but what proceeded from their eſteem and good will. In a word, to give him intire ſatisfaction, it was requiſite, that a ſenſe of gratitude, and their own intereſt alone, ſhould inſtruct them what obligation they had to him.

The commons declare the throne vacant.

The firſt ſteps the convention took could not but be acceptable to him. Both houſes returned an anſwer to his letter, in an addreſs full of acknowledgments and praiſes; and they appointed a day of public thankſgiving for the happy deliverance of the nation. The lower houſe, after a debate of five or ſix hours, reſolved, notwithſtanding an oppoſition of 150 members; "That King James II having "indeavoured to ſubvert the conſtitution of the "kingdom, by breaking the original contract be-"tween King and people, and, by the advice of "Jeſuits, and other wicked perſons, having vio-"lated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn him-"ſelf out of the kingdom, had abdicated the go-"vernment, and that the throne was thereby be-"come vacant." The next day, the ſame houſe voted, "That Popery was inconſiſtent with the "Engliſh conſtitution, and that all Roman Catho-"lics were for ever excluded from the ſucceſſion "to the crown of England," to which the houſe of lords gave their concurrence.

Several biſhops and lords diſſent from this vote.

And now the diſpoſition of the nation began to appear more and more. Archbiſhop Sancroft, on hearing of theſe votes, would no more appear in the houſe of lords. He did not conſider, that the public had a right to expect, upon ſuch an occaſion, at leaſt ſomething from a prelate of his rank; and the exalted ſtation to which he was raiſed, in church and ſtate, requir'd that he ſhould give a public teſtimony of his approving or condemning the Prince's cauſe. The archbiſhop of York followed his example, as did, likewiſe, the biſhops of Wincheſter, Ely, Norwich, St. Aſaph, Bath and Wells, Oxford, Gloceſter, Lincoln and Durham: the earls of Huntington and Mulgrave, likewiſe abſented from the houſe, and ſickneſs hindered the lord Churchill from being there. Some of the prelates, and among others the biſhops of Wincheſter and Durham, afterwards reſumed their places, and declared for a King.

Reaſons alleg'd by ſome for their diſſention.

The votes of the houſe of commons met, at firſt, with a very warm oppoſition. It was ſtrenuouſly objected, "That Europe could not behold, with-"out aſtoniſhment, the Engliſh nation declaring Pa-"piſts incapable of ſwaying that ſcepter, which "had been born by a ſucceſſion of forty Princes "of that perſuaſion, from Egbert to Elizabeth. "That the Kingdom had but lately diſavowed that

" maxim in numerous addreſſes; That the univer-
" ſities of Oxford and Cambridge had cenſured it
" as an error; that as the whole nation had ac-
" knowleged King James for their ſovereign,
" tho' he openly profeſſed Popery, it was a ridi" culous incongruity to pretend any Prince could " be diſqualified for the crown of England on that " account."

Several peers exclaimed with more vehemency againſt the other vote: "How, ſaid they, could " the name of deſertion, and much leſs of abdication, " be given to the neceſſary retreat of a Prince, who " had no way but this left to ſcreen his royal cha- " racter from the inſults of the populace; who ſaw " himſelf the captive of a foreign power, in his " own kingdom; who from his receſs, did not " ceaſe to proteſt againſt the acts of the convention; " who had a continued recourſe to the loyalty of his " former ſubjects, for his re-eſtabliſhment, and " who by the ſteps he himſelf took, to recover his " crown, evidently ſhewed, that he had not given " it up, but ſtill looked upon it as his right? And " beſide, what errors had he commited on the " throne, that the re-iterated offers he made the " nation, of redreſſing their grievances, in a " free parliament, were not a ſufficient attonement " for? But then it is alledged, that he has fled the " kingdom: an enormous crime indeed, continued " they! Did not the Saxon King Ethelred retreat " into Normandy? and of the Plantagenets, did " not Edward IV retire into Flanders? By a parity " of reaſoning, the flight of theſe Princes muſt " likewiſe have been a crime: but it never was " imputed to them as ſuch. The Royal dignity " would be a melancholy ſtate, if Kings only were " debared from avoiding danger, by flight, when " no other remedy is to be found."

The anſwer to them.

The moſt minute words of this vote were therefore to be canvaſſed, with a ſcrupulous nicety; " the exiſtence of an original contract was proved " by many arguments. The word abdication, " which in the common acceptation of it ſignifies a " reſignation abſolutely ſpontaneous and free, was " ſhewn to be likewiſe in uſe, in ſpeaking of a pub- " lic perſon, who commits ſuch actions, as " by right authorize the diveſting him of his dig- " nity: but the vacancy of the throne was an ex- " preſſion which gave more trouble to juſtify."

Another objection of the houſe of peers.

Some peers urged the maxim; " that the King " never dies, and therefore, that the throne can " never be ſaid to be vacant: " and thence infered, " that ſuppoſing King James had abdicated, his " throne was actually devolved to his immediate " heir ": of which the oath of allegiance was an inconteſtable proof; ſince, " the perſon " taking it does not, thereby, bind himſelf more to " the King, then reigning, than to his heirs and " ſucceſſors."

Reply to it.

To this it was anſwered, that " King James " having broken that tie, by which his ſubjects " were bound to his perſon, had thereby broken " that to his poſterity. He who ſucceeds to the right " of a perſon deceaſed is properly called heir; for " no man can be heir to the living. If therefore, " King James had forfeited his right, in his life- " time, he could not tranſmit it to any one, at " his death. In caſe of high-treaſon, the perſon " condemned forfeits his eſtate, while living, and " being poſſeſſed of none, at his death, his heirs " have no pretence to any, their right being anni- " hilated before it could devolve to them; the " application of which to the caſe in queſtion was " eaſy: to which might be added, that after " having ſhaken off the yoke of a tyrant, it would " be imprudent to admit the ſucceſſion of an heir " who could carry a reſentment of the injury done " to his anteceſſor, with him, to the throne. If " neceſſity would juſtify a nation in oppoſing a vio- " lent invaſion, and preventing their intire ruin, the " purſuit of thoſe meaſures, as far as their ſecurity " required, muſt be allowable: they agreed, " that natural equity, and the public tranquillity " demanded a direct lineal ſucceſſion, as far as was " conſiſtent, and it was what they wiſhed, but they " denied being abſolutely fixed down to it."

INTERREG AN' 1689.

A propoſal made to inquire into the ſuppoſititious birth of a Prince of Wales:

After an anſwer like this, it was of little or no moment whether the birth of the Prince of Wales was ſuppoſititious or not; ſince, be that as it will, he was declared to have no right to the crown. Some, however, thought the pretended birth of that child ought to be inquired into, for the honor of King James's two daughters, the Princeſſes Mary and Ann. Dr. Burnet was imployed in it: but after he had gathered together a number of preſumptive circumſtances, which, in his opinion, proved the impoſture more clearly than any formal evidences, which might have been ſuſpected of corruption, could have done, the court, the lords, and many others, out of different views, agreed to drop the inquiry.

But dropped.

The opinion of the cabinet-council was, that the evidences of his legitimacy, publiſhed by King James, rather confirmed than removed the ſuſpicions, and it was feared, that imperfect teſtimonies of the impoſture might but make it more doubtful. The lords ſeemed to expreſs but very little concern about the matter. It was enough that he was to be educated in the court of Lewis XIV, an enemy to the nation and the Proteſtant religion; and in the caſe of his deceaſe, another might be trumped up, and the Engliſh no way able to diſcover the deceit; Should they go to France for evidence, and receive at her hands ſuch a King as ſhe ſhould pleaſe to give them? Beſide, ſeveral who were preſent at the Queen's labour, and they only could ſet this matter in a true light, were no more in being. Wildman, and others, found likewiſe in this incertitude, wherewithal to indulge their republican notions. The pretenſions of the excluded Princes, would keep the perſon in awe, who was about to reign in their ſtead, and the little regard which appeared to be had for the ſucceſſion, in a direct line, ſeemed to open a diſtant path towards rendering the crown elective. There were not wanting perſons in the moſt diſtinguiſhed ſtations, who looked on this matter with another eye, and thought the proofs offered by dr. Burnet againſt the birth not ſufficient. The Queen Dowager, the lord chancellor, the earl of Middleton, and ſeveral other lords aud ladies, of both religions, were preſent at the Queen's labor, and had given evidence in a legal manner, that the Prince of Wales was her ſon. He had been ſolemnly acknowleged as ſuch by the people of Great Britain, by the United Provinces, and even by the Prince of Orange, who did not ſeem to doubt of it 'till many months after. No objections, therefore, never ſo little probable, could be founded on any thing, but the abſenſe of the Princeſs of Denmark, and of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had a legal call to be evidences of the Queen's labor: but the Princeſs was then at the Bath, from whence the Queen's unexpected ſudden labor had not allowed time for her return: And as for the Primate he was in the Tower with the biſhops. Was it juſt that ſuch unhappy circumſtances ſhould forfeit the Prince's legitimacy? On this foot, how hard would not the caſe be of thoſe children, whoſe mothers falling ſuddenly into labor, in loneſome or deſert places, muſt bring them into the world without witneſſes: theſe and other arguments contributed to the ſudden dropping of the propoſal for an inquiry into the birth of the Prince of Wales.

The throne declared vacant.

The houſe of peers then returned to the vote of the commons, which, after two conferences between the two two houſes, at length paſſed, without any amendment, and the throne was declared vacant.

Debates on the queſtion for electing a King.

The next queſtion was whether a King was to be elected? This was oppoſed, among others, by the dukes of Ormond, Southampton, Grafton, Beaufort and Northumberland, the earls of Kent, Pembroke, Clarendon, Rocheſter, Craven, Scarſdale, Weſtmorland, Cheſter, Litchfield, Cheſterfield, Yarmouth, and Lindſay, the viſcount Weymouth, and the lords Coventry, Brooke, Leigh, Ferrers, Mainard, Jermyn, Arundel, Dartmouth and Griffin: (1) At the head of this party was the earl of Nottingham, who moved; "That King "James II having, by the abuſe of the regal authority, diſqualified himſelf for governing, they might "proceed, with regard to him, as in caſes of lunacy, that is, that the right of ſovereignty ſhould "remain in him, but the exerciſe of it be commited to the Prince, with the title of regent."

Reaſons alledg'd by thoſe who were for a regent.

His reaſons were, "That this expedient would "be a ſecurity to the nation, whereas all others "would indanger the honor of the church of "England, and the ſacred rights of the crown. "That if we once aſſumed the power of dethroning "Kings, the regal authority would become precarious: that the people being, for the future, "judges of their ſovereigns, would be the umpire "of the Monarchy, which would thereby degenerate into a Commonwealth. That both law and "hiſtory prove the perſon and authority of the "Kings of England to be equally ſacred. That, "indeed, they are under tuition during their minority, and guardians may be aſſigned them, "when arrived to a maturity of years, if they appear to be as incapable of governing of themſelves, as if they were in the ſtate of infancy: "but it was unprecedented, that this perſonal impediment ſhould exclude their heirs in a direct "line. That if we deviated never ſo little from "the right of deſcent, for the ſucceſſion, the "crown would ſoon become elective, which would "ſet the kingdom in a flame. That ſome inconveniencies would, without doubt, attend a "regency: but no method would be wholly exempt "from them. Beſide, this expedient would be "agreable to the greateſt, as well as the moſt "judicious part of the nation; whereas all others "would only pleaſe the republican party, which "conſiſted of Non-conformiſts and Atheiſts, who "aim at no more than the faint ſhadow of royalty, "dependent on the will of the people, whereby "they might ſoon or late, overthrow the Epiſcopal church, and the Monarchial government."

Their different motives.

Many others ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe, tho' moved by different principles. King James's private friends believed a regency would be moſt conducive to his reſtoration: that the fears of the people being removed, they would, by degrees, be lulled into a ſecurity, and change their ſentiments with regard to him. The main point was, to keep up the title of King, for him, during his abſence; for whenever he returned in that quality, royalty itſelf they concluded would ſoon follow him. Others had no view, but to ſhew their upright intentions, and if they argued with ſome warmth, for the preſervation of King James's perſonal rights, it was from a principle of conſcience, as long as the matter remained undecided. "Otherwiſe, they declared "they ſhould, without difficulty, render obedience "to another King, when crowned, being ſatisfied, "as well from hiſtory as the laws of the land, that "an actual poſſeſſion of the crown juſtified the "obedience of the ſubject, even in oppoſition to "the excluded ſovereign, tho' inveſted with a "better right". Theſe, in particular, were the ſentiments of the earl of Nottingham, who ſaid, "That tho' his conſcience obliged him to vote for "a regency, he ſhould be very glad, if it was "carried againſt him, and that, tho' he was ſcrupulous in making Kings, he ſhould know how at leaſt "to obey them perhaps with greater loyalty, than "thoſe who put the crown upon their heads."

It will be proper to obſerve, that moſt of the lords, who, with different views, had taken this ſide of the queſtion, were, at firſt, for reſtoring the fugitive King, on certain terms, which they thought ſufficient to prevent all abuſe of the regal authority, and to ſecure the national religion and liberties, from all future attempts. Such were thoſe rigid church-men, who had ſtrained the doctrine of paſſive obedience to the utmoſt, and could not at once depart from it, without expoſing themſelves to cenſure, by a too open and incongruous change. But to theſe it was objected, that according to their principles, they ought to replace King James on the throne, without preſcribing him any terms, and then offer him their moſt humble remonſtrances; and this it was induced them to argue for a regency.

The anſwer of thoſe who were for a King.

The oppoſite party, who were for a King, grounded their arguments as follows: they ſuppoſed an original contract, between the ſovereign and the nation, by virtue of which the King was equally obliged to protect his ſubjects, as they were to be obedient to him. One of their proofs was taken from the form of the coronation: for before the crown is placed on the Prince's head, the people are aſked, "if they will have the perſon then ſet "before them for their King:" and he is obliged to promiſe, "that he will protect his people, and "govern according to law". Nor is the crown given, or homage paid him, 'till after the people have teſtified their conſent, and he has made this promiſe.

A ſecond argument was, that this relick of the ancient coronation-ceremony is conformable to the practiſe of thoſe times, which either preceded the conqueſt of the Saxons, or were immediately ſubſequent to it. William I, tho' a conqueror, promiſed to obſerve the laws of Edward the Confeſſor, and this promiſe, which was the original contract, between the nation, and the Norman race, was often re-iterated by his ſucceſſors. Edward II and Richard II were depoſed for no other reaſon but for violating it: and it is evident their depoſition was eſteemed legal, becauſe it was never repealed, or, properly ſpeaking, the right of the parliament, to proceed in that manner, was never called in queſtion.

"And how (added they) could it be queſtioned? "have we not inconteſtable proofs of it in the wars "with the barons, and in the Magna Charta, "granted by King John called Lackland. Beſide, "to what end are reſtrictions laid on the regal authority, and the limits which Kings have often ſet "to it themſelves, if the people have no right to "inforce them? They may, indeed, in ſome caſes, "make a wrong uſe of this right. But then if "this privilege be denied them, on any occaſion "whatſoever, what ſecurity have they for their "liberties? How ſhall they repreſs tyranny? Is it "not reaſonable to let tyrants once again ſee, "what they have to truſt to, ſince former inſtances "will not terrify them."

After this they gave a hideous deſcription of the preceding reign: the moſt venerable and ſacred

(1) Our hiſtorians take notice, beſide theſe, of five temporal lords, without mentioning their names; and of the ſpiritual lords, the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhops of Norwich, Winchester, Ely, St. Aſaph, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, Chicheſter, Rocheſter, St. David's, Glouceſter, and Lincoln.

laws trodden under foot, and the King's will ſubſtituted in the room of them. The Roman church which is proſcribed by thoſe laws, incouraged and protected: proteſtants, who alone are thereby intitled to imployments, obliged to give way to Roman Catholics: cities and towns deprived of their charters; Ireland made a ſacrifice to its native Papiſts; and to crown all theſe wrongs, the church of England ſubjected to an eccleſiaſtical commiſſion. "And not ſatisfied (added they) with all theſe acts "of tyranny, James has abandoned his dominions, "and chuſes rather to throw himſelf into the arms "of foreigners for aſſiſtance, to inſlave his ſub-"jects, than to take their advice in a free parlia-"ment. Thus he has abdicated the crown, and "left the throne vacant. The nation is therefore in "right, for its own preſervation, to nominate a "ſucceſſor."

Objections made againſt a regency.

The arguments againſt a regency were no leſs prevalent. "This expedient (ſaid they) is as con-"tradictory to the rights of the crown as the other, "if not more. It is liable to the ſame inconveni-"ency, with regard to the ill uſe the people may "make of it. To eſtabliſh a regent, is to give two "Kings to the ſame kingdom; one of which "would have the title, the other the authority; "while the ſubject would be at a loſs which to "obey. In the reign of Henry VII the parliament "adjudged the right of government to be in the "Prince who was in actual poſſeſſion, and by virtue "of that act, the people may, without crime or "danger, pay obedience to ſuch a Prince. But "what ſecurity can there be under the laws of a "regent, while the crown is on the head of another? "Muſt not that other be obeyed; or can he be diſ-"obeyed with impunity? It may be objected, that "this convention may make a law to remove that "difficulty: but this will be another ſubject of un-"certainty, becauſe it is without a precedent. If "it be pretended, that the oath of allegiance to "James is ſtill in force, by which the ſubject is ob-"liged to maintain his authority as well as his title, "with what conſcience can he be deprived of the "authority, and the title only be left him? To "trifle thus with the ſacredneſs of an oath would "be to mock both GOD and man. If this obliga-"tion does yet ſubſiſt, it ought to be, not in "one, but in both its parts. Which ever way it "be taken; ſo long as James is inveſted with the "title of King, and every thing is tranſacted in his "name, the body of the nation will always eſteem "him their lawful Sovereign. In this caſe, "plots laid againſt the perſon of the regent, in "favor of the King, can never be deemed high-"treaſon: nor can the conſpirators be puniſhed "with death, unleſs murder accompanies the per-"jury; and it is certain no jury will bring in a "verdict againſt them. In a minority, where the "King has yet no will of his own, that of the re-"gent muſt be accounted his: but will that "be the caſe here, where the will of the "King, and that of the regent will be in a conti-"nual oppoſition; one indeavoring to recover his "authority, and the other to keep it in his own "hands."

Private views of this party.

At the head of this party were the marquis of Hallifax, and the earls of Devonſhire, Macclesfield and Danby. The deſign of ſome in ſupporting this party, was only to take advantage of the preſent conjuncture, to weaken the regal authority, and thereby to render the crown precarious and elective, in order to raiſe the authority of the people on the ruins of the throne. With this view, ſome were ſo bold, to advance, "that the government was "diſſolved"; as raſh and dangerous a concluſion as poſſibly could be: for from thence would follow, that all rights, which had iſſued from the crown, were extinct and annihilated with the government. The moderate party was therefore ſatisfied with advancing, that JAMES II had broken that knot, by which his ſubjects were attach'd to his perſon; that in deſparate caſes, neceſſity takes the place of law; that England was now involved in ſuch circumſtances, and that the Sovereign having firſt acted like a public enemy, and afterwards abandoned the nation, ſhe was certain, in right, to provide for her own ſafety; that to object to theſe maxims, the wrong uſe which might hereafter be made of them, was to raiſe phantoms, in order to contend with them; that every man ſlept quietly in his own houſe, tho' no one was ignorant, that in caſe of fire it was lawful to pull it down. That what is not lawful at all times, every one allows, may become ſo upon extraordinary occaſions, where there is no other remedy; and, in ſhort, that to drive a tyrant from the throne, could not be deemed either aboliſhing the Monarchy, or opening the way to a Common-wealth.

INTERREG AN' 1689.

Debates of the two houſes concerning the choice of a King.

The force of theſe arguments, and the rapid torrent, which then hurried the nation away, removed the ſcruples of the peers, and they agreed to elect a King. The Republicans themſelves concured with the unanimity which now began to appear. They pleaſed themſelves with the hopes of geting King James depoſed by a trial in form, and of raiſing the Prince to the throne, by way of election: but this project ſoon miſcarried. That auguſt aſſembly, however, again diſcovered the ſame contrariety of opinions, which 'till then had been ſo viſible in their debates, and which ſo different intereſts could not fail of producing. What were the Prince's ſentiments, cannot be plainer ſhewn, than by a relation of what paſs'd, three years before, between the Princeſs Mary, and doctor Burnet (afterwards biſhop of Saliſbury) who was then at the Hague.

The Princeſs of Orange promiſes to transfer her right to the crown, to the Prince.

The doctor (ſays my author) aſked her one day, What ſhe deſigned the Prince ſhould be, if ſhe was Queen of England. Her highneſs, unacquainted with matters of this nature, imagined, that the matrimonial vow left her no right to any thing but in common with her huſband. This obliged the divine to ſhew her, by examples, that according to the law of England it was otherwiſe: but he repreſented to her, at the ſame time, that a Prince would not be ſatisfied with the bare name of royalty, eſpecially when it depended upon the life of another perſon, and that this ſhadow of honor might indanger a real and ſubſtantial authority, ſuch as the Prince poſſeſſed in Holland. He adviſed her to reſolve upon being only the wife of the King, that is, to tranſmit the royal authority to him, whenever it ſhould devolve to her, and to have it ſecured to him, by the laws, for life. This juſt condeſcenſion (he added) would ſtir up a new affection towards her in the Prince, who for ſome time, had ſhewn a ſort of coldneſs, and that he would then have the affairs of Great Britain, more at heart. She replied, without heſitation, "that ſhe had no occaſion to conſider of "a thing, where the teſtimony of her love and reſpect "for the Prince were in queſtion". She opened the matter to the Prince himſelf, and told him, "ſhe "had been 'till then ignorant, that the laws of Eng-"land were ſo repugnant to the laws of GOD as "ſhe now was informed. That ſhe never imagined "the huſband ought, in any caſe, to be obedient "to the wife: that he ſhould always be her maſter, "and that ſhe deſired no more on his part, than to "have regard to that precept which injoined huſ-"bands to love their wives, as ſhe, on her part, "would obſerve that which commands wives to be "in all things obedient to their huſbands." The Prince was reſerved and of few words; however, he could not forbear confeſſing, that during the whole nine years of his marriage, he had had this matter at heart, but never preſumed to open his mouth of it to the Princeſs.

Some propoſe to give him the crown, with the intail to the Princeſſes.

The marquis of Hallifax was for doing yet more in favor of the Prince's perſon, and whether it was with a view of ſupplanting the earl of Danby, or to expiate his former luke-warmneſs, he propoſed, "to confer the crown on the Prince, with the intail to the two Princeſſes, Mary and Ann."

This pleaſed the Republican party, becauſe it was a ſtep towards making the crown elective. The immediate dependents on the Prince came into it with ſome warmth. They thought the nation owed too much to the Prince, to offer him any thing leſs than the crown in return, and to divide the regal authority was, in their opinion, to rob him of one half of his glory.

Others are for placing the Princeſs Mary alone on the throne.

Others were for placing the Princeſs Mary alone on the throne, and leaving her the power, when inveſted with the regal authority, to confer ſuch part of it on the Prince as ſhe ſhould think proper. This was the opinion of thoſe who were in the intereſt of the Princeſſes. The earl of Danby wrote thereupon to the Princeſs Mary, that it would be her own fault if ſhe did not ſit upon the throne ſingly. Her anſwer was, "that ſhe never deſired or intended "to be any thing but the wife of the Prince, and "that they could not diſoblige her more, than by "doing any thing to the prejudice of her huſband." The Princeſs Ann gave as little incouragement to her friends: and it is worthy of remark, that the Prince, who was informed by the Princeſs his ſpouſe, what temptation the earl of Danby had thrown in her way, was ſo far from reproaching him for it, that he continued the confidence he had repoſed in him, and confered new honors upon him.

Reſerved behavior of the Prince during theſe debates.

During theſe debates in the convention, the Prince was very reſerved in his conduct, and indeed, he could not well be otherwiſe. The States-general had declared, that they aſſiſted him with no other view, but to maintain the fundamental laws of Great Britain, which were already oppreſſed, and farther threatned, as well by the introduction of a deſpotic power, as the eſtabliſhment of the Roman Catholic religion. That it was for the intereſt and glory of their ſtatdholder to ſupport theſe laws, and to reconcile the King to his people. That his highneſs went to England, as he had aſſured their highmightineſſes, not to invade the kingdom, or in the leaſt to interrupt the lawful ſucceſſion, but to relieve the nation, and to maintain her religion and liberties, by calling a free parliament, who might deliberate upon proper meaſures to prevent the evils they were apprehenſive of. Theſe were, in a great meaſure, the very terms of the Prince's manifeſto; ſo that nothing but a well-managed reſervedneſs could, in any manner, reconcile his honor with his intentions; and this he was very obſervant in.

He kept retired in the palace of St. James's, went little abroad, was difficult of acceſs, heard every thing, and hardly ſpoke at all. He ſhewed none of thoſe affable and popular manners, ſo apt to beſpeak affection. He ſaid, with an air of gravity, "That he was come, as he had been deſired, to "deliver the nation; which being effected, it was "their buſineſs to regulate their own concerns. He "left that matter wholly to them, and only waited "the reſult of their debates, to return to Holland, "ſatisfied with what he had done." Many were of opinion, that there was a real diſguſt concealed in theſe words, under the veil of an affected indifference; and that they contained a tacite threat of leaving all things in confuſion, unleſs they made him abſolute arbiter of them. In this profound taciturnity, he continued near a month.

The Prince declares his mind to ſome lords.

At length, he laid aſide his reſervedneſs, and declared to the lords Hallifax, Shrewſbury, Danby and others, who were aſſembled by his order, "that if he had hitherto kept ſilence, it was to no "other end, but that the convention might injoy "an unlimited freedom in their debates. That "being reſolved not to influence any one, either by "promiſes or threats, he thought it unneceſſary to "declare his ſentiment. But that the diverſity "of opinions which appeared among them, ob-"liged him, at length to break ſilence: that as "for the expedient of a regency, he ſhould not "oppoſe it, if they judged that the moſt proper; only "this he thought neceſſary to inform them, that he "had his reaſons why he would not be regent; and "therefore, if they continued in that reſolution, "they muſt be thoughtful of ſome other perſon. "He ſaw what would be the conſequences of it, "and would not accept of that poſt. Others, he "was informed, were for puting the Princeſs "ſingly on the throne, and that he ſhould reign "by her courteſy: but that, tho' no man could "eſteem a woman more than he did the Princeſs, "yet he could not think of holding any thing by "apron-ſtrings, or that it was reaſonable for him "to have any ſhare in the government, unleſs it "was put in his perſon, and for the term of his "life; if they thought otherwiſe he would not op-"poſe them; but would return to Holland, and "concern himſelf no farther with their affairs. He "could aſſure them, that whatever others might "think of a crown, it had not ſuch an appearance in "his eyes, but that he could live, and be very well "pleaſed without it. But that tho' he could not "reſolve upon accepting a dignity, ſo as to hold it "precarioufly on the life of another; yet he thought "it reaſonable, that the iſſue of the Princeſs Ann "ſhould be prefered in the ſucceſſion, to any he "might have, by any other wife but the Princeſs."

This declaration was not made with the intent it ſhould remain a ſecret; it was ſoon divulged every where. Doctor Burnet, in particular, publiſhed what had paſſed between him and the Princeſs at the Hague. Theſe circumſtances contributed not a little to unite the oppoſite parties, upon which it was ſoon determined, "that William and Mary, "Prince and Princeſs of Orange, ſhould jointly "injoy the rights of ſovereignty, the admi-"niſtration being reſerved to the Prince alone.

The crown confered jointly on the Prince and Princeſs of Orange.

The liberties of the ſubject reduced into an act.

An act, or declaration of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, in convention aſſembled, was accordingly prepared, in which by enumerating the abuſes of the regal authority, in the preceding reign, the liberties of the ſubject were ſtipulated, and a ſort of ſecond Magna Charta eſtabliſhed. In drawing up this declaration, a difficulty aroſe, which might have fruſtrated the deſign of it; for ſome perſons, to make their court to the Prince, took occaſion to ſay, that the diſcuſſion of this matter ought to be defered, till he was in poſſeſſion of the throne, leſt by precipitating it, they might render it ineffectual. The point in queſtion was, the right King James had aſſumed of diſpenſing with the laws in civil matters. It had always been cuſtomary, before his time, for the Kings of England to inſert, in their letters-patent, "any law to the contrary not-"withſtanding," which ſuppoſed the very authority King James had arogated. To conclude, this point was paſſed by, but was regulated afterwards by a particular law, which deprived the crown of this ancient prerogative.

The oath of allegiance altered.

The laſt thing which was done by the convention, was to regulate the form of the oath of allegiance. In the former oath, the title given the ſovereign was "rightful and lawful King" a title no ways proper for a Prince, who, like William, had no right but what was given by the people, it was therefore thought proper to reduce this oath to its ancient ſimplicity, of ſwearing "to be faithful and bear "true allegiance to the King and Queen."

Which gives occaſion to pernicious diſtinctions.

From this oath aroſe the famous diſtinction of a King de facto, and a King de jure. We have already obſerv'd that the laws of England allow of ſuch a diſtinction: but it is only with reſpect to the thing itſelf, and not with regard to the effect. They injoin obedience to the Prince, who is in actual poſſeſſion of the throne, by what means ſoever he acceded to it, and ſo far they are reaſonable; for otherwiſe every ſubject muſt ſcrupulouſly examine into the rights of his ſovereign, before he could tender him obedience, and this perplexing liberty, which would continually expoſe the ſubjects to be deceived in the choice of their ſovereign, muſt of courſe introduce confuſion and diſorder in the ſtate.

For this reaſon, the new oath was made to conſiſt only of very general expreſſions, and it was believed that thoſe who took it, would think themſelves thereby tied down to a ſtrict allegiance: but this proved a miſtake. The enemies of the revolution pretended that this oath laid them under no obligation to William and Mary. In their opinion, it amounted to no more, than that they were both uſurpers, whom they were obliged to obey as being in poſſeſſion of the crown, or King and Queen de facto: but that they were not thereby reſtrained from aſſiſting the late King to regain his crown ſince he ſtill remain'd King de jure. This ſhameful diſtinction proceded chiefly from the clergy, and many of them made uſe of it to reconcile the affection they ſtill bore for the late King to their preſent intereſt.

A ſalvo for the high church.

Doctor Lloyd, then biſhop of St. Aſaph, and afterwards of Worceſter, found an expedient, which being agreable to their notions, was very proper to remove the ſcruples of many of them. Moſt agreed that the Prince had waged a lawful war with his father-in-law. All juſt wars (ſaid the biſhop) are waranted from Heaven; the ſucceſs of ſuch a war is the deciſive award of the Almighty. Thus King James's defeat was the act of condemnation, by which GOD himſelf deprived him of his dignity, and tranſmited it to the Prince, by right of conqueſt. This ſyſtem of political theology was readily imbraced by all thoſe who having deeply intangled themſelves with the ſtrange conceits of the divine right of monarchy, ſtood in need of ſome expedient to retract their opinion, without ſeeming to do it: and they only were pleas'd with it.

INTERREG AN' 1689.

The 12th of February, the Princeſs of Orange arrived. Upon the reports ſpread, that ſhe was diſpleaſed as well with the treatment her father had met with, as with what had been done with regard to herſelf, the Prince had written a letter to her, "to deſire her to appear gay at her firſt arrival, "leſt by ſeeming otherwiſe ſhe ſhould diſcourage "thoſe who were friends to them both, or give "cauſe to ſuſpect ſhe was diſſatisfied." She made ſome poor attempts to ſhew her obedience, which gave occaſion to men of ſenſe, who were not let into the ſecret, tacitely to blame her, for puting on an air of gaiety ſo little becoming a Princeſs, who was taking poſſeſſion of the palace of a fugitive father, and whoſe throne ſhe was, likewiſe, about to mount.

The Princeſs arrives from Holland.

The very next day had been fixed by the convention to make an offer of the crown to her and the Prince. The marquis of Hallifax, as ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, was appointed to perform the ceremony, and the ſame day, they were proclaimed by the title of William and Mary, King and Queen of England, &c. The Prince, upon accepting the crown, reſerved to himſelf the right of croſſing the ſea to the aſſiſtance of Holland, whenever it ſhould be requiſite, and the ſame day, he wrote a letter to the States General, full of the moſt tender marks of his affection and gratitude.

The convention makes a ſolemn offer of the crown to the Prince and Princeſs.

King William and Queen Mary proclaimed.

Among other things, he aſſured them; "that "his new dignity, inſtead of diminiſhing the af-"fection he ever had, or the care he ever took for "the preſervation and proſperity of their republic "would only ſerve to inable him to diſcharge his "office of ſtatdholder, with more weight and ſucceſs, "towards the good and advantage of their ſtate, "and that during his reign, he would make it his "conſtant buſineſs and indeavor to eſtabliſh and "maintain a perfect intelligence, alliance and invi-"olable friendſhip between his kingdoms, and the "United Provinces, for the ſafety, welfare and "repoſe of both ſtates, and ſupport of the Proteſ-"tant religion."

K. William's letter to the States General.

With the ſame meſſenger who was diſpatched with this letter, was alſo ſent an order for the inlargement of the earl of Sunderland, who had been arreſted at Rotterdam, his lordſhip having ſufficiently juſtified his conduct by a letter, which, for the ſatisfaction of the public, was printed and diſperſed (1).

The earl of Sunderland ſet at liberty.

(1) It was thought his detenſion was by collufion, and that he was apprehended on purpoſe to be formally diſcharged, to make way for his more honorable return to England: for tho' he might not be originally in the ſecret of the Prince of Orange's intended expedition to England (which, however was well known to his lady) yet he certainly was very inſtrumental in the ſucceſs of it, by hindering King James from accepting the offer of a French army of 30,000 veteran troops to oppoſe him. The Reign of King WILLIAM and Queen MARY.

Some Reflections on the benefits accruing to Europe by the revolution.

THE hiſtory of the happy revolution having been ſo particularly given in the latter part of the preceding 24th book, as the recapitulation of ſome part of it is in the foregoing ſheets of this, it may now be expected, I ſhould give ſome account of the benefits which accrued from it, not to England only, but to the greater part of Europe, which was never nearer being inſlaved, than it was at this time, by the aſpiring views of Lewis XIV toward an univerſal Monarchy. Some particulars of theſe great benefits having, however, been already interwoven with the hiſtory of this wonderful event, and a far greater number, which are yet recent in every one's memory, having been too viſible in the conſequences to eſcape the notice of any conſiderate perſon (among which the ſecurity of our liberties and conſtitution in the happy eſtabliſhment of our preſent moſt illuſtrious royal family is none of the leaſt) I need to ſay very little on that head.

Next to the important and extenſive advantage which accrued, by means of the revolution, to the Proteſtant religion, in general, the total extirpation of which, as I have already obſerved, was one of the grand deſigns of the Monarch of France, in conjunction with King James; Great Britain and Holland, as they were in the moſt immediate danger, had the moſt reaſon to expreſs their gratitude for their happy deliverance, and to retain, as I hope they do, and ever will do, a due ſenſe of what they owe to the memory of the glorious inſtrument ment of all the bleſſings they partake of, in the peaceable injoyment of their religion and liberties, the hero whoſe reign I am now going to write. But it was not the Britiſh dominions, and thoſe of Holland only, who were reſcued, by the revolution, from impending ruin, and received infinite advantages from thence: The Emperor and the whole Germanic body, Spain, the ſeveral ſtates of Italy, and diverſe other ſtates of Europe, were marked out to be victims to the inſlaving projects of Lewis XIV and James, and tho', I ſay, Great Britain and Holland were in the moſt immediate danger, yet had they been once brought under the yoke, it was more than probable, the other powers I have mentioned, would not long have been able to reſiſt the united force of thoſe two crowns, which would then have been equally active in the ſame deſtructive meaſures. Not only theſe Princes and ſtates, tho' moſt of them profeſs the Roman Catholic religion, but the very ſeat of Popery, Rome itſelf, were ſenſible, that unleſs ſome effectual ſtop was put to the tow'ring projects of France they ſhould all, ſooner or later, become ſlaves to the unlimited ambition of her grand Monarch. It was therefore no wonder, that they all joined in expreſſing the great ſatisfaction it was to them to ſee the Prince and Princeſs of Orange ſiting on the Britiſh throne. This fortunate event ſoon quieted all their fears, and the grand alliance, which, as we ſhall ſee below, was one of the immediate conſequences of it, ſet up ſuch a barrier againſt the exorbitant power and incroachments of the French King, as he was never afterable to pull down: and tho' he once bid fair for it again, by the additional forces of Spain, and the dominions thereunto belonging, which he found means to bring under his yoke, yet the ſame happy principles which formed this firſt grand alliance, cemented another, yet more formidable, which reduced him to the very brink of total ruin: but to return from this digreſſion.

King William and Queen Mary being thus advanced to the throne, and proclaimed, with the greateſt ſigns of a univerſal and ſincere joy, at the uſual places, the firſt thing the King, in whom the ſole adminiſtration of the government was veſted, did, was to chuſe a ſet of counſellors, in whom he could confide, and with whom he might ſhare the important reſolutions of ſtate, in his privy-council. This he did, the 14th of February, the day after he was proclaimed, and the perſons named were theſe following:

K. William appoints a privy-council.

His royal highneſs prince George of Denmark.
William lord archbiſhop of Canterbury.
Tho. earl of Danby, lord preſident of the council.
Charles marquis of Halifax, lord privy-ſeal.
Henry duke of Norfolk, earl-marſhal.
Charles, marq. of Winchester.
Robert, earl of Lindſay, lord great chamberlain of England.
William, earl of Devonſhire, lord ſteward of the houſhold.
Charles, earl of Dorſet and Middleſex, lord chamberlain of the houſhold.
Aubery, earl of Oxford.
Charles, earl of Shrewſbury, one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate.
William, earl of Bedford.
John, earl of Bath.
Charles, earl of Macclesfield.
(1) Daniel, earl of Nottingham.
Thomas, viſcount Falconberg.
Charles, viſcount Mordaunt.
Francis, viſcount Newport, treaſurer of the houſhold.
Richard, viſcount Lumley.
Henry, lord biſhop of London, dean of the chapel.
Philip lord Wharton.
Philip, Lord Montague, maſter of the great ward-robe.
Henry, lord Delamere.
John, lord Churchill.
Mr. Bentinck, groom of the ſtole, and lord privy-purſe.
Henry Sidney, eſq;
Sir Robert Howard.
Sir Henry Capel.
Henry Powle, eſq; ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.
Edward Ruſſel, eſq;
Hugh Boſcawen, eſq;
To whom were added,
Thomas Wharton, eſq; comptroler of the houſhold.
Sir John Lowther, of Lowther, vice-chamberlain to the King.

William & Mary An' 1689.

Great officers of ſtate named.

At the ſame time, his Majeſty being deſirous to reward thoſe who had contributed moſt to his acceſſion to the throne, diſpoſed of ſeveral other offices of ſtate, beſide thoſe mentioned in the above liſt of privy-counſellors, as well to thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves on that occaſion, as to others whoſe merit, in other reſpects, recommended them to his Royal favor. Monſieur d' Auverquerque was made maſter of the horſe; marſhal Schomberg, maſter of the ordnance; monſ. Zuyleſtein, maſter of the robes; lord Lovelace, captain of the band of gentlemen penſioners: the duke of Ormond, the earl of Oxford, the viſcounts Lumley and Mordaunt, the lord Churchill, and mr. Sidney, gentlemen of the bed-chamber; the earl of Wiltſhire, lord chamberlain to the Queen; John How, eſq; vice-chamberlain; mr. Villars, maſter of the horſe, and the counteſs of Derby, firſt lady of the bed-chamber, and groom of the ſtole to her Majeſty; ſir John Maynard, Anthony Kirk, and William Rawlinſon, eſq; commiſſioners of the great ſeal. (2) Admiral Herbert, the earl of Carbery, ſir Michael Wharton, ſir Thomas Lee, ſir John Chickley, ſir John Lowther, and mr. Sacheverel, lords of the admiralty; the lords Mordaunt, Delamere, and Godolphin, mr. Hampden, and ſir Henry Capel, lords of the treaſury, and the earl of Nottingham, one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate. (3)

All theſe imployments, with ſeveral others of leſs conſideration, were diſpoſed of, at different times, but within the ſpace of two months. The ſame day the council was appointed, a proclamation was likewiſe iſſued, for continuing all inferior civil officers, who were Proteſtants, in their reſpective offices and places.

Dr. Burnet made biſhop of Saliſbury.

Of the inferior clergy, dr. Burnet, who had a conſiderable hand in the revolution, was the firſt who reaped the fruits of it; being elected biſhop of Saliſbury, purſuant to his Majeſty's Conge d'elire, of

(1) Some of the ſtaunch friends of the revolution expreſſed ſome diſguſt at the earl of Nottingham's being called to the privy-council; becauſe he ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the vacancy of the throne, and ſtill perſiſted ſo far in the ſame ſentiments, that it was queſtioned whether he would accept of any office, under the new government.

(2) Biſhop Kennet, and ſome others, ſay, the great ſeal was offered to the earl of Nottingham; but that he refuſed accepting it, alleging, as an excuſe, his unfitneſs for an imploy, which required a conſtant application. The truth of this is very much queſtioned by others, as well becauſe it was well known that his lordſhip was capable of great application, but more eſpecially becauſe he afterwards accepted of the place of ſecretary of ſtate, which requires as much, or near as much attendance. The ſame authors ſay, the marquis of Hallifax likewiſe refuſed it.

(3) It has been ſaid (ſee Salmon's Modern Hiſtory) that he was prevailed on to accept of this office with ſome difficulty: perhaps he was ſo preſſed to it, that he could not well refuſe it. His great capacity and uprightneſs might be one motive: or, perhaps his having voted with an oppoſite party, at the head of which he was, it might be neceſſary for the King to ſecure him to his intereſt, by ſome diſtinguiſhing mark of his confidence.

the ninth of March, directed to the dean and chapter of that cathedral, and conſecrated at Fulham, the 31ſt of the ſame month, by the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Lincoln, Landaffe, St. Aſaph and Carliſle, by virtue of a commiſſion from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who refuſed to perform the ceremony himſelf (1).

The King propoſes to turn the convention into a parliament.

Having given this account of preferments, in church and ſtate, in one connection, I now return to the King, who, the firſt time he met his council, which was the 14th of February, put the queſtion to them, "whether the convention might be legally "turned into a parliament"? Which his Majeſty thought the more neceſſary, not only becauſe the delays which muſt be occaſioned by calling of a new parliament, might be of evil conſequence, in this juncture, but that he might thereby preſerve a great number of members then ſiting, whom he knew were to be intirely depended on, as hearty well-wiſhers to the new ſettlement. The council did indeed divide upon the queſtion, but the majority was for the affirmative, and ſome inſtances were produced of the like tranſmutation. (2)

To put this project in execution, the King went to the houſe of lords, the eighteenth, with great ſolemnity, and being ſeated on the throne, the commons attending at the bar, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

His Majeſty's firſt ſpeech to both houſes,

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have lately told you how ſenſible I am of "your kindneſs, and how much I value the con- "fidence you have repoſed in me; and I come "hither to aſſure you that I ſhall never do any "thing which may leſſen your good opinion of me.

"I think it neceſſary to acquaint you, that the "condition of our allies abroad, and particularly "that of Holland, is ſuch, that unleſs ſome ſpeedy "care be taken of them, they run a greater hazard "than you would have them expoſed to.

"You yourſelves muſt be ſenſible, that the poſ- "ture of affairs here requires your ſerious conſide- "ration, and that a good ſettlement at home is "neceſſary not only for your own peace, but "for the ſupport of the Proteſtant intereſt, both "here and abroad.

"And particularly the ſtate of Ireland is ſuch, "that the dangers are grown too great to be ob- "viated by any ſlow methods.

"I muſt leave it to you, to conſider of the moſt "effectual ways of preventing the inconveniencies, "which may ariſe by delays, and to judge what "forms may be moſt proper to bring theſe WILLIAM "things to paſs, for the good of the nation, which & MARY. "I am confident are all your minds, and which, I on AN, 1689. "my part, ſhall be always ready to promote."

Meets with a general applauſe.

This ſhort and modeſt ſpeech, which ſhewed his Majeſty placed an intire confidence in the nation, and was ſatisfied with barely laying matters of fact before them, without attempting to influence them, by propoſing any means himſelf, met with unuſual marks of applauſe, ſuch as it juſtly deſerved. At the cloſe of it, there was that general hum, by which the numerous aſſembly of the commons of England are wont to ſhew their approbation, and it was ecchoed by the people every where, as ſoon as the report of it was ſpread abroad. (3)

A bill to turn the convention into a parliament.

The houſe of lords, purſuant to what was recommended to them from the throne, in the laſt clauſe of this ſpeech, and the motion made by ſome of their members, who were of the privy-council, brought in "a bill, to remove and prevent all queſ- "tions and diſputes concerning the aſſembling and "ſiting of this preſent parliament"; which they read twice, that ſame afternoon, and having paſſed it, the next day, ſent it to the commons for their concurrence.

Debates upon it in the houſe of commons.

Upon the receit of it, the commons went into a committee of the whole houſe, and mr. Hamden, their chairman, put the following queſtion: "whether "a King, elected and declared, by the lords ſpi- "ritual and temporal, and commons aſſembled at "Weſtminſter, the 22d of January, 1688-9, com- "ing to and conſulting with the ſaid lords and "commons, did not make as complete a par- "liament, and legiſlative power and authority, to "all intents and purpoſes, as if the ſaid King "ſhould cauſe new ſummons to be given, and a new "election to be made by writs?"

This queſtion having occaſioned a long and warm as well as memorable debate, an account of it will probably be acceptable to the reader. The party that was againſt it, and which ſtood up for the ſtrict ancient conſtitution, being headed by ſir Edward Seymour, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, ſir Thomas Clarges, and Heneage Finch, eſq; maintained;

Arguments againſt the queſtion.

"That according to ſir Edward Coke, a parlia- "ment conſiſts of the King's Majeſty ſiting there, "as in his politic capacity, and of the three "eſtates of the realm, that is to ſay, (1) the lords "ſpiritual, (2) the lords temporal, and (3) the "commons. That as to the lords ſpiritual and "temporal, every one of them being of full age, "when a parliament is to be held, ought of right

(1) Biſhop Burnet, and the author of the continuation of Rapin, in French, remark, that in all theſe preferments, regard was principally had to the Whigs; and the latter obſerves, that the King's favor was likewiſe wholly diſpenſed the ſame way. It was divided (ſays he) between Monſieur Bentinck, a gentleman of a noble family, in Guelderland, whom he created earl of Portland, and mr. Henry Sidney, afterwards earl of Rumney, vice-roy of Ireland, maſter of the ordnance, governor of the Cinque-ports, and colonel of a regiment of foot-guards. A foreign favorite (continues the ſame author) was very diſagreable to the Engliſh nation: thoſe who were the beſt affected to the King were concerned for him, and accounted theſe viſible marks of diſtinction to certain perſons, an error in his conduct; tho' they concealed their diſſatisfaction, for the preſent; thinking it by no means becoming them, to arraign the conduct of a Prince, who, in the main, had ſhewn ſo much wiſdom in the choice of his miniſters, and more eſpecially in that of the judges. Lib. 25. p. 36.

(2) His Majeſty had the more reaſon for this precaution, becauſe the ſpirit of party, occaſion'd by the dangers the nation was lately in, which were in a manner ſuppreſſed, ſeemed to revive again, the very moment that things were ſettled on this foundation. Some out of a miſtaken principle of conſcience: ſome out of greedineſs for imployments, of which there were not enough to ſatisfy the leaſt part of the demands; ſome out of hatred to the Diſſenters, to whom the King had ſhewn his benevolence; and ſome biaſſed by the prejudices of education, or rather the natural inconſtancy of men, formed together a faction, which appeared in the convention, even before it was turned into a parliament: for it was ſaid in the houſe of commons, that what had been done was not valid, and that the convention not having been called by the King's writ, their acts were not of force. De Cize. p. 16.

(3) There were not, however, wanting thoſe, who being diſaffected to the happy eſtabliſhment, ſo lately brought about, ſtudied to turn this ſpeech to the King's diſadvantage, and to inſinuate from thence ſuch things as they thought moſt proper to excite the diſcontent of the people. They reported, that to conquer Ireland and ſupport the allies, would require a fleet of 90 men of war, and an army of 45 or 50,000 men, regular troops, which would coſt the nation three millions yearly. Malicious computations were made of the expences of the civil government, embaſſies, intelligences, ſecret ſervices, penſions, and the like, which they made to amount to above three millions more, that is (ſaid they) to more than the third part of the annual revenue of the kingdom. They indeavoured to perſuade the nation, that a war would certainly bring on a decay of trade, which would reduce the revenues of the exciſe and cuſtoms to a third of their value, that the latter alone would loſe 400,000 l. That the revenues in general would be diminiſhed to leſs than half. That there would be no imployment for the poor, and the like ungrounded inſinuations, by which they hoped to intimidate the people into a deſire of peace, and a concurrence with thoſe who blindly ſought to reſtore King James. French Cont. of Rapin. l. 25. p. 37.

" to have a writ of ſummons to come to that par" liament; and that as to the commons, the ſame
" author ſays, they are reſpectively elected by the " ſhires, or counties, cities and boroughs, by force
" of the King's writs. That the lords and com-
" mons aſſembled at Weſtminſter the 22d of Janu" ary, were not ſummoned thither, by the King's " writ, and therefore, that tho' the King afterwards
" came to them, yet ſuch a King, lords and com-
" mons could not be a parliament.

" And tho' ſomething like this had been done at the " reſtoration, yet that was done by the conſent of the " lawful King, and upon abſolute neceſſity, the King
" being abſent, and no great ſeal in being: and not-
" withſtanding this, the acts of that convention
" were ratified by a ſucceeding parliament, and
" from thence they received their authority; and
" therefore moved, that the convention ſhould be " diſſolved, and a parliament ſummoned, in the " uſual manner, by the King's writ."

Arguments for the queſtion.

The party for the affirmative, which happened to be the prevailing party, argued:

" That it was generally admited, that in an " hereditary kingdom, if the King ſhould die with" out an heir, either lineal or collateral, the crown,
" in that caſe, would devolve, or, as it were, eſcheat
" to the whole people and nation, and that here-
" upon the eſtates and repreſentatives of ſuch a " nation might diſpoſe of the crown to whom
" they pleaſed, or quite alter and change the govern" ment, into what form they thought fit; exam-
" ples of which were produced, out of Germany,
" Italy, France, and Portugal. That in like " manner it was, where a King did abandon, for-
" ſake or deſert his government, by going or " flying out of his kingdom, without appointing
" any guardian to protect and take care of his peo" ple, in his abſenſe, whereby the throne became " vacant, the eſtates of ſuch a people might ap-
" point another King or governor. That King
" James II having abandoned his people, unguarded
" and undefended, at the mercy of a foreign army,
" even in the heart of the country, without ſo
" much as leaving a guardian, or great ſeal behind
" him, his great officers, and miniſters of ſtate, flying
" ſome one way, and ſome another, what could
" the nation do but what they had done? to wit,
" ſeveral of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, many
" of the knights, citizens and burgeſſes of a for" mer parliament, the aldermen and diverſe common " council-men of the city of London, addreſſed
" themſelves to the Prince of Orange, deſiring him
" to take upon him the adminiſtration of public
" affairs, until the meeting of the intended conven" tion of the three eſtates, or great council of the " realm; and to ſend letters, ſubſcribed by him-
" ſelf, both to the lords ſpiritual and temporal
" that were Proteſtants, to meet on the ſaid 22d of " January, at Weſtminſter, and to the ſeveral
" ſhires, counties, univerſities, cities, &c. for " electing of ſuch a number of perſons to repreſent
" them, as of right were to be ſent to parliament.
" That accordingly ſuch letters were ſent and " elections made, and the convention thus convened,
" after mature deliberation, reſolved; that the " Prince and Princeſs of Orange ſhould be King
" and Queen of England. That after they were " proclaimed King and Queen, and he came and " conſulted with the three eſtates ſo aſſembled, what " could be wanting in that aſſembly to make them
" a full and complete parliament? or what could " be had more than was in this convention of King,
" lords and commons, if the ſaid King ſhould
" iſſue out writs, for calling a new parliament?
" That if (as was agreed by all) the ſubſtantial
" parts of a parliament be and conſiſt of an aſſembly
" or convention, or meeting together of the King
" and three eſtates, the difference of the lords
" and commons being called by writ, or by " letter, was nothing material, ſince both writ
" and letter were both to the ſame effect; and that
" in ſome ancient records, it is mentioned; that
" parliaments ſhould be ſummon'd by letters, par" ticularly in King John's great charter, in the " 17th of his reign, he promiſes to ſummon the " biſhops, abbots, earls, &c. by his letters. That " the Prince of Orange's not being King, at the " time of his ſending forth his letters, mattered not,
" for he was the perſon, to whom the adminiſtra-
" tion of the government was then commited.
" That it was evident, that in many parliaments,
" it was not ſo material, how the King, lords
" and commons came together, as that they were " together. That the manner of calling together
" the three eſtates of the realm, by the Prince of
" Orange's letter, was a much fairer proceeding,
" conſidering the ſtate of affairs, as to the calling
" of them together, than was in ſeveral caſes, where-
" in they were never doubted to be a parliament,
" when joined with a King. That Edward II being
" impriſoned by his Queen, ſon and nobles, they
" iſſued forth writs, in the impriſoned King's name,
" to ſummon the lords, and to chuſe knights, citi-
" zens and burgeſſes, to meet at Weſtminſter (Jan.
" 16, 1325) That this, one would think, was " pretty hard, and an abſolute force upon the " King, by making uſe of his name, againſt his " will, ſo that it could not be ſaid to be his act:
" yet the lords and commons being met, they
" depoſed Edward II, and declared his ſon Edward
" III King, and this new King, and the lords and " commons ſo (as one might ſay) irregularly conve-
" ned together, made ſeveral acts of parliament, and " have been ever ſince adjudged a good parliament
" to all intents and purpoſes, without any ſubſe-
" quent act of confirmation. That, in like man-
" ner, Richard II being taken priſoner, by Henry,
" duke of Lancaſter, the duke iſſued forth writs,
" in the King's name (the King then in priſon) to
" ſummon the lords, and to elect repreſentatives
" for the people, to meet at Weſtminſter, the " 13th of September 1399. That thoſe being " met by this irregular ſummons, they depoſed
" Richard II and declared the duke of Lancaſter
" King, and that new King, and the lords and " commons ſo irregularly convened, being joined " together, were alſo, and are to this day, ad-
" judged a good parliament, to all intents and pur-
" poſes. Laſtly, that the lords and commons aſ-
" ſembled at Weſtminſter, the 15th of April 1660,
" were convened by writs, in the name of the " keepers of the liberties of England, who were
" uſurpers; yet when King Charles II came to " them, and they received him as King, he and
" they together were adjudged a parliament,
" they inacted, that they ſhould be ſo taken; they " made many laws which were put in execution,
" and they continued as a parliament until the 29th
" of December following: and tho' moſt or all
" thoſe acts were afterwards confirmed, by a ſub-
" ſequent parliament convened by the King's writs,
" in May 1661, yet that confirmation, according to
" many good judgments, was rather to ſatisfy ſome
" ſcrupuloſity, than out of neceſſity, moſt of the " ſaid acts having, in a great meaſure, had their " effects, before the ſubſequent parliament began.
" Therefore, that if upon the Prince of Orange's
" being declared and proclaimed King, he came " to the convention of lords and commons, aſſem-
" bled at Weſtminſter; if the ſame number of lords
" was ſummoned, that of right ought to be ſum-
" moned to parliament, and the ſame number of " knights, citizens, and burgeſſes duly choſen, as " ought to be choſen, to repreſent the commons

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

" in parliament, then conſequently, there were all " the ſubſtantial and eſſential parts of a parliament " met together, and being ſo, where was the neceſ- " ſity, advantage, or prudence, to diſſolve theſe, " and thereby give new trouble, of new ſummons, " and new elections, loſe a great deal of time, " ſuffer irrecoverable loſs and damage to Ireland, " and the allies abroad, and after all, at the " next meeting, be but where they now were, as " to the eſſential parts of a parliament, there being " nothing more to be had, at any time, but what " they had already. That a new election might oc- " caſion new diſturbances in the kingdom; and that " thoſe who had ſet the King upon the throne, " would probably be more zealous to eſtabliſh him " in it, than thoſe who would be choſen in their " ſtead, and ſome added, that there was as much " reaſon to ſubmit to a parliament de facto, as to a " King de facto."

The bill paſſes.

Upon theſe, and the like reaſons, the queſtion was carried in the affirmative, and ſome alterations and amendments being made, relating to the oaths, which, by that bill, were appointed to be taken by both houſes, the commons acquainted the peers, two days afterwards, that they had agreed to their bill, with theſe alterations and amendments, which being confirmed by the lords, the whole bill received the Royal aſſent, on the 23d of February. (1)

Debates concerning the revenue.

That there was yet a ſtrong diſcontented party in the houſe of commons appeared more plainly ſoon after: for, on the 26th of February, the queſtion being put: " whether the revenue was expired " by the vacancy of the throne, or whether it was " devolved on their Majeſties?" The firſt part of the queſtion was carried in the affirmative, notwithſtanding the vigorous oppoſition of the contrary party, who alleged it was devolved upon his Majeſty, having been granted to the late King for life. A committee was thereupon appointed, to regulate the revenue for their preſent Majeſties, ſome of the members whereof inclined to have it ſettled on them for three years only.

A bill for the better regulating the peers trials,

In the mean time, a bill was preſented to the lords, " for the better regulating of the trials of " the peers of England", which gave occaſion to great debates, inſomuch that when it was read a third time, fifteen lords entered their diſſents, for the following reaſons:

1. " Becauſe nothing ever was or could be put " into an act of parliament, that could reflect " ſo much on the honor of the peerage as this " would.

2. " Becauſe it ſet the honor of the peers and " commons upon an equal foot.

Dropp'd.

Notwithſtanding theſe proteſts, the bill was ſent down to the houſe of commons, where, after a tedious delay, it was dropped at laſt, by the influence of thoſe peers who were againſt it.

A bill in favor of the Diſſenters.

His Majeſty, having found, by ſeveral inſtances, that the houſe of lords acted with more unanimity than the lower houſe, cauſed ſuch acts, as tended to the confirmation of the preſent ſettlement, to be ſet on foot in that houſe: and as the Diſſenters had been very active in bringing about the revolution, a bill for exempting them from the penalties of certain laws, was read there, the firſt time, on the 28th of February.

Upon this occaſion the earl of Nottingham moved, that a bill of comprehenſion, and another of toleration ſhould be preſented the houſe, whereby all moderate Preſbyterians might be reconciled to the church of England, and admited to eccleſiaſtical benefices. This motion was univerſally applauded, even by the biſhops who were preſent, ſo that the earl of Nottingham received the thanks of the houſe for it, and purſuant thereto a bill was brought in on the 11th of March following, " for uniting their " Majeſties Proteſtant ſubjects (2)."

An order for diſcovering of Papiſts.

On the ſame 28th of February, " upon informa- " tion that ſeveral Papiſts were harbored in the " cities of London and Weſtminſter, the lords " ordered ſir William Waller (a gentleman, who " had pretty much diſtinguiſhed himſelf, at the " time of the Popiſh plot) to ſecure, or cauſe to be " ſecured all ſuch Papiſts, or reputed Papiſts, and " return their names to the committee appointed " to bring in a bill for removing all ſuch from the " city of London;" which bill was accordingly preſented to the houſe, on the firſt of March.

Inquiries into the earl of Eſſex's death.

Some days before this, the houſe of lords had taken upon them to inquire into the circumſtances of the late earl of Eſſex's death, who was ſaid to have murthered himſelf in the Tower, the 13th of July 1683. Captain Holland was, by their lordſhips order, commited to Newgate, on ſuſpicion of having murthered the earl, and ſeveral perſons, particularly ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave and mr. Baker, were examined as witneſſes concerning it: but, notwithſtanding all theſe inquiries, no ſufficient diſcovery could be made of that fatal accident.

A meſſage from the King to the lords.

The firſt of March, the King ſent two remarkable meſſages to the two houſes: the firſt was to the houſe of lords, by the lord viſcount Mordaunt, late earl of Peterborough, who acquainted their lordſhips, " That in this conjuncture of affairs, and " for the public ſafety, his Majeſty had ſecured " ſome perſons, as dangerous to the government,

(1) The paſſing of this act rather increaſed than removed the diſcontents of ſeveral members of the houſe of commons, who had before proteſted, that they neither would ſubmit to the deciſions of ſuch a parliament, nor fit in it: and indeed, ſome of them kept their words, as to this laſt point, retiring into the country upon frivilous pretences, which occaſioned the dilatory proceedings of this ſeſſion, and gave King James an opportunity, to get conſiderable footing in Ireland, and the hopes of reaſcending his throne. Hiſtory of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 9. Kennet's reign of King William.

Of the lords, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of Gloceſter, Worceſter, Ely, Norwich, Bath and Wells, Chicheſter, and Peterborough, refuſed to take the oaths appointed by that act, as did likewiſe ſeveral temporal peers, and in particular, the earls of Clarendon, Exeter, Strafford, the duke of Newcaſtle, the lord Stawel, and two or three more. However ninety of the temporal lords, and eight of the biſhops took the oaths in that houſe. Salmon's Modern Hiſtory, Vol. 24. p. 6. Oldmixon (p. 4.) mentions ten biſhops, who took the oaths, by name, viz. the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhops of St. Aſaph, Briſtol, London, Lincoln, Wincheſter, Rocheſter, Landaff, Carliſle, and St. David's.

(2) Some of the Diſſenters, however, put a ſiniſter conſtruction upon the earl's motion, and pretended that it was with no other deſign, than to try how they ſtood affected towards the church of England. Hiſtory of King William III. vol. I. p. 11.

" and

William & Mary. An' 1689.

" and thought it might be convenient to ſecure more, " and being extreme tender of doing any thing, that " the law did not fully warrant, had given order " that the lords might be acquainted with what he " had thought himſelf obliged to do, for the public " peace and ſecurity of the government". A committee was thereupon immediately appointed to prepare an addreſs to be preſented to the King, upon this occaſion, from both houſes, " expreſſing their " moſt humble thanks, for his Majeſty's great " care of their liberties, and for his gracious com- " munication of this matter; and humbly to ad- " viſe and deſire his Majeſty, to take ſuch extraor- " dinary care of the government, in this conjuncture, " by ſecuring all diſaffected perſons, as might pre- " vent any diſturbance of the public peace, and " that ſuch perſons as were, or ſhould be ſo com- " mited, might be detained till the firſt day of " the next term, if his Majeſty ſhould ſee cauſe " for it."

Reſolutions of the lords thereupon;

The commons were not ſo ready to concur in this addreſs, becauſe it ſeemed to allow the King a power of diſpenſing with the Habeas-corpus act, and therefore thought it more legal to bring in " a bill to impower his Majeſty, to apprehend " and detain ſuch perſons, as he ſhould find juſt " cauſe to ſuſpect were conſpiring againſt the go- " vernment." This bill went thro' both houſes, in a few days, and paſſed into an act, by the royal aſſent. (1)

And of the commons.

Mr. Wharton delivered the other meſſage to the commons, which was, " that the King being ſen- " ſible what a grievous burden the duty ariſing " from fire-hearths was to his people (2) eſpecially " to the poorer ſort, his Majeſty was pleaſed to " agree either to the regulation of it, or to the taking " of it wholly away, not doubting but the commons " would take care of his revenue another way". This political preſent had its effect; for, on the fifth of March, the commons voted an addreſs of thanks to the King, in which they acknowledged themſelves obliged " to declare that his " Majeſty had filled their hearts with an intire " ſatisfaction and gratitude, by his moſt gracious " and unprecedented offer, for the eaſe of his peo- " ple, humbly aſſuring his Majeſty, that they " would make ſuch grateful and affectionate re- " turns, and be ſo careful of the ſupport of the crown, " that the world might ſee, to the diſcouraging of " his enemies, and ſatisfaction of all good men, " that his Majeſty reigned in the hearts of all his " people". This ſeeming liberality of the Sovereign was alſo thankfully acknowledged by the city of London, in an addreſs preſented to the King on the 12th of March.

A meſſage from the King to the commons.

Their addreſs of thanks.

The King had acquainted the houſe of commons, on the 27th of the foregoing month, that he had certain news of the late King James's having ſailed from Breſt, with a conſiderable body of French troops, for Ireland, upon which they unanimouſly voted: " That they would ſtand by " and aſſiſt the King, with their lives and fortunes, " in ſupporting his alliances abroad, in reducing of " Ireland, and in defence of the Proteſtant religion, " and the laws of the kingdom." They communicated this vote to the peers, who confirmed it by entering the ſame into their journal, and on the 5th of March, they concured with the commons in the following addreſs:

A vote of the houſe of commons.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

Addreſs of both houſes.

" We your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and faith- " ful ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and tempo- " ral, and commons, in parliament aſſembled, " being highly ſenſible of our late great and ſignal " deliverance from Popery and arbitrary power, " whereof it has pleaſed Almighty God to make " you the glorious inſtrument, and deſiring, to the " utmoſt of our abilities, to expreſs our gratitude " to your Majeſty, for ſo great and generous an " undertaking, no leſs neceſſary to ſupport the " Proteſtant intereſt in Europe, than for reco- " vering and maintaining the civil rights and liber- " ties of theſe nations, ſo notoriouſly invaded, and " undermined, by Popiſh counſels and counſellors, " and being likewiſe fully convinced of the reſtleſs " ſpirits, and continual indeavors, of your Majeſty's " and the nation's enemies, for the extirpation of " the Proteſtant religion, and the ſubverſion of " our laws and liberties, do unanimouſly declare " that we will ſtand by and aſſiſt your Majeſty, " with our lives and fortunes, in ſupporting the " alliances abroad, in reducing of Ireland, and " in defenſe of the Proteſtant religion and laws of " the kingdom."

The ſum of 400,000 l. which was all the commons had hitherto voted, falling very ſhort of the King's neceſſities, his Majeſty laid hold of this favorable diſpoſition in his parliament, to urge a more ample ſupply, and having, to this end, appointed the 8th of March to receive this addreſs of both houſes, he, in the mean time, prepared the following artful anſwer, which he then gave them accordingly: (3)

The King's memorable anſwer.

" It any thing (ſaid his Majeſty) could add to " the eſteem and affection I have for parliaments, " and particularly for this, they would be much " increaſed by the kindneſs you ſhew to me, and " the zeal you expreſs for the public good, in " the addreſs you have made, which in the manner " as well as the matter, has every thing in it, that " ought to recommend it to me.

" I will aſſure you, that I will never abuſe the " confidence you have put in me, being fully per- " ſuaded, that there is no ſure foundation of a " good agreement between a King and his people " but a mutual truſt; when that is once broken " a government is half diſſolved.

" It ſhall be, therefore, my chief care, never " to give any parliament cauſe to diſtruſt me, and " the beſt methods I can uſe, for that purpoſe, is " never to expect any thing from them, but what " ſhall be their own intereſt to grant.

" I came hither for the good of the kingdom, " and ſince it is your deſire, that I am in this " ſtation, I ſhall purſue the ſame ends that brought " me.

" God has been pleaſed to make me inſtrumental " to redeem you from the ills you feared, and it is " ſtill my deſire, as well as my duty to ſerve you, " in your religion, laws and liberties, which were " the only inducements, that brought me into " England, and to theſe I aſcribe the bleſſings " that attended this undertaking.

(1) This meſſage was occaſioned by the ſecuring the earl of Arran, ſir Robert Hamilton, and two other Scotſmen, who, by ſome intercepted letters from France, were ſuſpected to be in a conſpiracy with ſeveral others of the Scotiſh nation, for the reſtoration of King James, and were thereupon commited to the Tower. Hiſtory of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 13. There were likewiſe, at the ſame time, in cuſtody, the late lord chancellor Jefferies, the lord Montgomery, the earl of Saliſbury, the earl of Caſtlemaine, the earl of Peterborough and the lord Clifford, who were all, excepting Jefferies, ſoon after admited to bail.

(2) This duty, whereby all perſons were required to pay two ſhillings for every fire hearth in their houſes, had occaſioned great murmuring, eſpecially among the mean ſort of people, and particularly, on occaſion of the diſorders frequently cauſed by the manner of levying it: and it being thought proper, that the King ſhould begin his reign with ſome popular act, to ingratiate himſelf with the people, he was adviſed to this: tho', as it afterwards proved, it was but removing one burden to make way for others. It was oppoſed by ſome of the tory-party, and they were, on that account, accuſed of indeavoring to deprive the King of the opportunity of making himſelf agreable to his people.

(3) It was ſuppoſed that this anſwer proceeded from the pen of mr. Powle, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons; or, at leaſt, was drawn up in concert with him.

" When

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

" When I ſpoke laſt to you, I told you of the " neceſſity of aſſiſting our allies, and more eſpe- " cially the ſtates of Holland, whoſe readineſs to " relieve you, at ſo great a hazard and expenſe, from " the extremities you lay under, needs no other ar- " gument, to move you to the conſideration of it.

" As I was then a witneſs of their zeal and af- " fection to promote the expedition, and to ſecond " my indeavors, even with the neglect of their " own ſafety, ſo I am now ſenſible of the inevi- " table ruin they have drawn upon themſelves, in " giving you their aſſiſtance, if you ſhould not " return it to them.

" They have really exhauſted themſelves to ſuch " a degree, both as to men and mony, that it is " not eaſily to be imagined; and I am confident " your generoſity will have as little bounds towards " them, as theirs had towards you, and that you " will not only inable me, to make good the treaty " with them, and repay what they have actually " laid out, upon this occaſion (of which an ac- " count ſhall be given you) but that you will farther " ſupport them, to the utmoſt of your ability, " againſt the power of their enemies, who muſt " be yours too, by their intereſts and their religion, " and do certainly deſign the ruin of Holland to " be a ſtep to your deſtruction.

" I need not take pains to tell you the deplo- " rable condition of Ireland, which by the zeal and " violence of the Popiſh party there, and by the " aſſiſtance and incouragement they have from " France, is brought to that paſs, that it is not advi- " ſable to attempt the reducing of it, but by a conſi- " derable force, which I think ought not to be leſs " than 20,000 horſe and foot, which, by the " bleſſing of God, will make the work ſhorter, and " in conſequence, the charge eaſier, tho' the firſt " expence muſt, of neceſſity, be very great.

" You are to conſider, that towards the moſt " ſpeedy and effectual ſucceſs, in relation to Ire- " land, as well as with a regard to France; there " muſt be ſuch a fleet, as may, in conjunction " with the ſtates, make us ſo intirely maſters of " that ſea, that nothing may be ſent from France " to Ireland, or any where elſe, that may give " diſturbance to us or our allies.

" I muſt alſo recommend to you the conſidera- " tion of the revenue, that it may be ſo ſettled, " as that it may be collected without diſpute.

My lords and gentlemen,

" Theſe things will amount to a great ſum, and " muſt of conſequence be a preſent weight upon " the people: but conſidering that neither your " religion, nor your ſafety, can probably be ſecured " without theſe means, I conclude nothing can be " too great a price for their preſervation. And I " will ingage my ſolemn word to you, that what- " ever you ſhall give, to theſe public ends, ſhall " be ſtrictly applied to them: and as you ſo " freely offer, to hazard all that is dear to you, " ſo I ſhall as freely expoſe myſelf, for the ſup- " port of the Proteſtant religion, and the ſafety " and honor of the nation.

This anſwer, together with the addreſs of both houſes to which it was made, being publiſh'd, were both highly applauded, and the city of London, which had generouſly advanced 200,000 l. to the Prince of Orange, before the throne was declared vacant, and continued in the ſame diſpoſition, expreſſed their ſatisfaction, in a particular manner, by an addreſs of thanks to the houſe of lords, which they preſented the 12th, and was very well taken by the court (1).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

Satisfaction of the public, on this account.

Notwithſtanding this ſeeming harmony, the King had continually one uneaſineſs or other to incounter with; it was not the diviſions in parliament alone which gave him diſturbance, the defection of part of the army was an addition to the weight of them. The royal Scotiſh regiment of horſe, which was in quarters at Abingdon, almoſt totally deſerted, and refuſing to ſerve under King William, marched towards Scotland, being followed by above 500 ſoldiers of Dunbarton's regiment, headed by five captains, and carrying with them four field-pieces. (2)

Defection in the army.

His Majeſty no ſooner received news of this defection, than he ordered mr. Herbert to communicate it to the parliament; whereupon both houſes agreed, on the fifteenth of March, on an addreſs; " humbly to beſeech his Majeſty, to take effectual " care for the ſpeedy ſuppreſſion of the rebellion, " and to iſſue forth his proclamation declaring thoſe " officers and ſoldiers, and their adherents, to be " rebels and traitors, and requiring all his ſub- " jects to apprehend and proſecute them as " ſuch."

Purſuant to this addreſs, the King iſſued out his royal proclamation, and ſent a ſufficient force of horſe and dragoons, under Monſ. Ginkel, the Dutch general, to ſuppreſs the rebels, who quickly brought them to ſubmit: and tho' they had juſtly deſerved a more ſevere treatment, their puniſhment was only to be ſent to Flanders, to ſerve againſt the French; and, to prevent the like for the future, an act paſſed, and had the Royal aſſent, the third of April, for puniſhing mutiny and deſertion.

Act for puniſhing mutiny and deſertion.

I juſt mentioned above, that two bills had been brought into the houſe of lords, one on the 28th of February, and the other on the 11th of March, in favor of the Diſſenters. The diſaffection of ſo many ſpiritual and temporal lords, as I have already ſaid, expreſſed by their reluctance to the oaths, and abſenting from the duty of parliament, on that account, gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to the King, and inclined him more and more to favor the Preſbyterians. When his Majeſty, therefore, came to parliament, the 16th of March, to give the royal aſſent to the act, whereby he was impowered, to apprehend and detain ſuch perſons, as he ſhould find juſt cauſe to ſuſpect were conſpiring againſt the government, and another for reverſing the attainder of the late lord Ruſſel, grandfather to his grace the duke of Bedford, by which act, the death of that illuſtrious perſon is declared a murder; he told both houſes, " that " he would put them in mind of one thing, which Proceedings in parliament, in favor of the Diſſenters.

(1) The next day, to ſhew the ſenſe they had of the conduct of the houſe of commons, they preſented the following addreſs to that houſe:

" We, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, preſume to addreſs " our-ſelves to this honorable houſe, with our moſt humble thanks for your excellent conduct of affairs in the time of our " great emergency and extremity, when our religion, our lives, and eſtates were ſo iminently threatned, and eſpecially " for your addreſs to his Majeſty, the 5th inſtant, declaring your reſolution to aſſiſt and ſtand by his Majeſty in ſupporting " his allies abroad, in reducing Ireland, and in defenſe of the Proteſtant religion." The Anſwer returned to this addreſs by the ſpeaker, to the ſheriffs, upon a reſolution of the houſe directing him thereunto, ſhew'd the mutual and happy harmony which at that time reigned between the repreſentatives of the great body of the nation, and its head or metropolis, the city of London, and the true ſenſe the former had of the courage, conſtancy, and liberality of, and ſervices done by, the latter to the whole kingdom, on this occaſion, when the ſtate of affairs ſo much required it.

(2) It has been ſaid, that this diſguſt proceeded from an apprehenſion, that the Dutch were more confided in, and favored, than the national troops. Salmon's Modern Hiſtory, Vol. 24. p. 11.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

" would conduce much to their ſettlement, as that " would to the diſappointment of their enemies. " That he was, with all the expedition he could, " filling up the vacancies that were in offices and " places of truſt, by the late revolution. That he " knew they were ſenſible, there was a neceſſity of " ſome law to ſettle the oaths, to be taken by all " perſons to be admited to ſuch places; that he " did recommend it to their care to make a ſpeedy " proviſion for it: and as he doubted not but they " would ſufficiently provide againſt Papiſts, ſo he " hoped they would leave room for the admiſſion of " all Proteſtants, that were willing and able to " ſerve; which conjunction in his ſervice would " tend to the better uniting them among themſelves, " and ſtrengthening them againſt their common " adverſaries."

His Majeſty had ſignified this deſire of his to the privy-council, before he made this ſpeech, and it was probably approved of there; for the courtiers, indeed, urged this admiſſion of all Proteſtants indifferently into imployments, with great earneſtneſs: but it was as vigorouſly oppoſed by the Church-party, who looked upon it as a means to introduce a common-wealth, or at leaſt, to let Diſſenters into places of truſt. According to the King's deſire, ſignified in council, a bill was preſented, the 14th of March, in the houſe of peers, " to abrogate " the former oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance, " and appoint other oaths in their ſtead;" which being read a ſecond time, a ſelect committee of the houſe was appointed to draw two clauſes, the one to explain the abrogating thoſe oaths, and the other to take away the neceſſity of receiving the ſacrament, to qualify a man for holding an office. The latter of theſe clauſes being drawn up accordingly, and reported to the houſe, was rejected by a great majority, tho' ſeveral lords inſiſted: (1) that a " hearty union among Proteſtants was a greater ſe- " curity to the church and ſtate, than any teſt which " could be invented. That this obligation to re- " ceive the ſacrament was a teſt on the Proteſtants " rather than on the Papiſts: that as long as it was " continued, there could not be that hearty and " thorough union among Proteſtants, as had always " been wiſhed, and was, at this time, indiſpenſably " neceſſary. And laſtly, that a greater caution " ought not to be required, from ſuch as were ad- " mited into offices, than from the members of the " two houſes of parliament, who are not obliged " to receive the ſacrament to inable them to ſit in " either houſe."

This point being loſt, the court-party made another attempt, in favor of the Preſbyterians, which was by inſerting a clauſe in the ſaid bill, " to pre- " vent the receiving the ſacrament, upon any other " account than in obedience to the holy inſtitution " thereof, and by freing perſons to be admited " into any office or imployment, from the neceſſity " of receiving the ſacrament, in ſuch a manner as " is appointed by an act made the 25th of King " Charles II, that is, according to the church of " England; provided they produced a certificate, " of their having received the ſacrament, under " the hands of a miniſter, and two other credible " perſons;" but this clauſe was alſo rejected, notwithſtanding the warm oppoſition of ſeveral peers, (2) who alledged:

" That it gives great part of the Proteſtant free- " men of England reaſon to complain of inequa- " lity and hard uſage, when they are excluded " from public imployments by a law: and alſo, " that it deprived the King and kingdom of diverſe " men fit and capable to ſerve the public in " ſeveral caſes; and that for a meer ſcruple of " conſcience, which could, by no means render " them ſuſpected, much leſs diſaffected to the " government. That his Majeſty, as the com- " mon indulgent father of his people, having ex- " preſſed an earneſt deſire of liberty to tender con- " ſciences, and to his Proteſtant ſubjects, and the " biſhops having, diverſe of them, on ſeveral oc- " caſions, expreſſed an inclination to, and owned " the reaſonableneſs of ſuch a Chriſtian temper, " they apprehended it would raiſe ſuſpicions in " mens minds, of ſomething different from the caſe " of religion, or the public, or a deſign to heal " our breaches, when they ſhould find, that by " confining ſecular imployments to eccleſiaſtical " conformity, thoſe were ſtruck out from civil af- " fairs, whoſe doctrine and worſhip might be " tolerated, by authority of parliament, there " being a bill before them, by order of the houſe, " to that purpoſe: eſpecially when without this " excluſive rigor, the church is ſecured in all its " privileges and preferments, no body being here- " by let into them, who is not ſtrictly conforma- " ble. That to ſet marks of diſtinction and humi- " liation on any ſorts of men, who have not ren- " dered themſelves juſtly ſuſpected to the govern- " ment, as it is, at all times, to be avoided, by " the making juſt and equitable laws, ſo might it " be of ſo ill effect to the reformed intereſt, at " home and abroad, in this preſent conjuncture, " which ſtood in need of the united hands and hearts " of all Proteſtants, againſt the open attempts, " and ſecret indeavors of a reſtleſs party, and a " potent neighbor, who was more zealous than " Rome itſelf, to plant Popery in theſe kingdoms, " and labored with his utmoſt force, to ſettle his " tyranny upon the ruins of the reformation, all " thro' Europe. That it turned the edge of the " law (they knew not by what fate) upon Pro- " teſtants, and friends to the government, which " was intended againſt Papiſts, to exclude them " from places of truſt, as men avowedly dange- " rous to our religion and government; and the " taking the ſacrament, which was injoined only " as a means to diſcover Papiſts, was now made a " diſtinguiſhing duty, among Proteſtants, to weaken " the whole, by caſting out a part of them. That " myſteries of religion and divine worſhip are of " divine original, and of a nature ſo wholly diſ- " tant from the ſecular affairs of politic ſociety, " that they cannot be applied to thoſe ends, and " therefore, the church, by the law and the goſ- " pel, as well as common prudence, ought to take " care not to offend either tender conſciences within " itſelf, or give offenſe to thoſe without, by mix- " ing their ſacred myſteries, with ſecular intereſts. " That they could not ſee how it does conſiſt " with the law of God, common equity, or the " right of any free-born ſubject, that any one be " puniſhed without a crime. That if it be a crime " not to take the ſacrament, according to the uſage " of the church of England, every one ought to be " puniſhed for it, which no body affirms: and if " it be no crime, thoſe who were capable, and " judged fit for the King's ſervice, ought not to be " puniſhed by a law of excluſion, for not doing

After a long debate the bill was read the third time, paſſed, and ſent down to the commons for their concurrence.

Bill againſt Papiſts.

Both houſes were likewiſe amuſed, for a conſiderable time, by another buſineſs of much leſs importance: which was the bill for removing Papiſts from the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and ten miles diſtance from the ſame, which having paſſed the houſe of lords, the 28th of March, the commons added a proviſo to it, by which the Queen Dowager's articles of marriage were greatly infringed. To this proviſo the peers diſagreed, and alleged: " That her Majeſty had, for ſo many " years, made ſuch moderate uſe of the ſaid articles, " that there had not been any juſt cauſe of com- " plaint in the injoyment of them; and it might " ſeem to be a kind of ſeverity upon her Majeſty " to have thoſe articles ſtill reſtrained by virtue of " that act, which was made for the preſervation of " the perſon of the King her huſband, which reaſon " now ceaſed. That it was evident, that in the " time of the late King James, when her Majeſty " might have been incouraged to entertain more " perſons of her own religion, moſt of her ſer- " vants, and thoſe of the moſt conſiderable places, " were continued, and alſo others received into her " family tho' Proteſtants: and that it might be of " ill conſequence, if her Majeſty, by not living " eaſily here, ſhould be obliged to retire into " foreign parts.

On the other hand, the commons, on the 8th of April, inſiſted on the proviſo, by them added:

" Becauſe it was no new clauſe, and therefore " impoſed no new condition upon her Majeſty, it " being the ſame that was inacted, in the 30th of " King Charles II for the more effectual preſerving " the King's perſon and government.

2. " Becauſe to make an alteration in the law, " as it then ſtood, might look like ſome kind of " countenance to thoſe of that perſuaſion, at a time " when the lords themſelves had judged the reſort " of Papiſts to London, to be of ſo dangerous " conſequence to the government, as to make this " act to remove them ten miles from it. And,

3. " Becauſe the Papiſts were not, at this time " leſs active in their deſigns and practices to diſ- " turb the peace and quiet of the kingdom, than " they were in the thirtieth year of King Charles II, " and therefore the like reaſons, which induced " the parliament to make that ſtatute, remained " at this time, to perſuade the houſe of commons " to keep the force of it intire."

Theſe reaſons being offered by the commons, at a free conference with the lords, their lordſhips, after having duly weighed them, agreed to propoſe that the Queen Dowager ſhould have thirty ſervants, of the King's Engliſh ſubjects, provided none of them were prieſts, monks or friars, to which expedient, the commons, after ſeveral conferences, and warm debates, gave their concurence, the 28th of April. The King gave his aſſent to this act purely out of complaiſance to his parliament, having often declared, that he came over to deliver the Proteſtants, but not to perſecute the Romaniſts.

An act of pardon, indemnity, and oblivion.

I muſt now go back again to the 28th of March, when the earl of Shrewſbury acquainted the houſe of lords; " that his Majeſty, out of an earneſt deſire " to deliver his people from the guilt, reproaches, " and penalties which many of them might be liable " to, and to put an end to all controverſies, ariſing " between the ſubjects, by reaſon of any diſcord " in latter times, and to take away all diſtinction " and occaſions of diſcord among them, to the end " they, having an intire confidence in his Majeſty, " and perfect union among themſelves, might be in- " couraged in their duty to his government, and " more fully and ſecurely injoy the benefit of it; and " his Majeſty judging, that the beſt way to render " this his gracious intentions moſt extenſive and ef- " fectual, was to paſs a free and general pardon, in- " demnity and oblivion, his Majeſty did moſt earn- " eſtly recommend the conſideration thereof to both " houſes of parliament: that with all the expedi- " tion a matter of that kind would admit, they " might prepare a bill for that purpoſe, for the " royal aſſent, with ſuch exceptions only, as to " them ſhould ſeem neceſſary, for the vindication " of public juſtice, the ſafety of their Majeſties, " and the ſettlement and welfare of the nation, for " the future." William & Mary. An' 1689.

The earl of Shrewſbury, deſired leave, at the ſame time, to bring in a bill for naturalizing the Prince of Denmark, whom his Majeſty intended to create a duke of this kingdom, in order to his taking a ſeat in that houſe, and to have the like precedency, as had been allowed to other Princes. The lords, hereupon, ordered the marquis of Winchester, and the earl of Bedford, to attend the King, with the thanks of that houſe, for his Majeſty's meſſage to them, concerning the bill of indemnity and free pardon, and for his intention of creating his Royal Highneſs, Prince George, a duke of this realm. The third of April, his Majeſty gave the Royal aſſent to the act for naturalizing the Prince of Denmark, and to an act for reviving actions and proceſs in the courts at Weſtminſter.

The fourth of April, the houſe of peers entered into a conſideration of the report of the amendments in the " bill for uniting their Majeſties Proteſtant " ſubjects;" and, upon debate, the queſtion was put, whether to agree with the committee, in leaving out the clauſe about the " indifferency of the poſ- " ture, at receiving the ſacrament?" the votes were equal, and therefore, according to the ancient rule, in the like caſe (ſemper preſumitur pro negante) it was carried in the negative. The next day the lords reſumed the debate of the report of the ſaid amendments, particularly of the clauſe concerning a commiſſion to be given out by the King, to the biſhops, and others of the clergy: and it being propoſed, " whether the laity ſhould be added"? the votes were again equal, and that was likewiſe carried in the negative: upon this ſome of the lords (1) entered their diſſents.

1. " Becauſe the act itſelf, being deſigned for " the peace of the ſtate, the puting the clergy into " commiſſion, with a total excluſion of the laity, " laid the humiliation on the laity, as if the clergy " of the church of England were alone friends to " the peace of the ſtate, and the laity leſs able, " or leſs concerned to provide for it.

2. " Becauſe the matters to be conſidered, being " barely of humane conſtitution, viz. the liturgy " and ceremonies of the church, belong to both, " for in what is of divine inſtitution, neither clergy " nor laity can make any alteration at all.

3. " Becauſe the pretending that differences and " delays might ariſe, by mixing laymen with the " eccleſiaſtics, fruſtrating the deſign of the com- " miſſion, was vain and out of doors, unleſs thoſe " which made uſe of this pretenſe ſuppoſed that the " clergy, part of the church, had diſtinct intereſts " from the laity, part of the ſame church, and " would be a reaſon as good, why one or other of

(1) The lords Winchester, Mordaunt, Lovelace, and Stamford.

" them

William & Mary. An' 1689.

" them ſhould quit the houſe of lords, for fear of " obſtructing the buſineſs of it.

4. " Becauſe the commiſſion being intended for " the ſatisfaction of Diſſenters, it would be con- " venient that laymen of differents ranks, nay per- " haps, of different opinions too, ſhould be united " in it, the better to find expedients for that end, " rather than clergymen alone, of the eſtabliſhed " church, who are generally obſerved to have " all very much the ſame way of reaſoning and " thinking.

5. " Becauſe it is the much readier way to facili- " tate the paſſing the alterations into a law; that " lay-lords and commoners ſhould be joined in the " commiſſion, who might be able to ſatisfy both " houſes of the reaſons upon which they were made, " and thereby remove all fears and jealouſies ill " men might raiſe againſt the clergy, of their in- " deavoring to keep up, without ground, a " diſtinct intereſt from that of the laity, whom " they ſo carefully excluded from being joined with " them, in conſtitutions of common concernment, " that they would not have thoſe ſhare any part in " the deliberation, who muſt have the greateſt in " determining.

6. " Becauſe, ſuch a reſtrained commiſſion lay " liable to this great objection, that it might be " made uſe of to elude repeated promiſes, and " the preſent general expectation of compliance " with tender conſciences, when the providing of it " was taken out of the ordinary courſe of parlia- " ment, to be put into the hands of thoſe alone, who " were lateſt in admiting any need of it, and who " might be thought to be the more unfit to be the " ſole compoſers of differences, when they were " looked upon by ſome as parties.

7. " Becauſe, after all, this carried a dangerous " ſuſpicion along with it, as if the laity were not " a part of the church, nor had any power to med- " dle in matters of religion. A ſuſpicion directly " oppoſite to the conſtitution both of church and " ſtate, which would make all alterations utterly " impoſſible, unleſs the clergy alone were allowed " to have power to make laws in matters of reli- " gion, ſince what was eſtabliſhed by law, could " not be taken away or changed, but by conſent of " lay-men in parliament, the clergy themſelves " having no authority to meddle in this very caſe, " in which the laity was excluded by this very vote, " but what they derived from lay-hands. Laſtly, " becauſe it was contrary to three ſtatutes, made " in the reign of King Henry VIII, and one in " Edward VI, which impowers thirty-two com- " miſſioners to alter the common eccleſiaſtical laws, " &c. whereof ſixteen to be of the laity, and ſixteen " of the clergy. "

The 6th of April, the reſt of the amendments were conſidered and agreed to, and the bill afterwards ſent to the commons for their concurrence.

As I am obliged to break off my relation of parliamentary affairs, in this place, to give ſome account of the coronation of their Majeſties, and of what preceded and was immediately ſubſequent to it, I ſhall take this opportunity to mention ſome things, which, for the ſake of connexion in theſe matters, I have hitherto omited.

An order of council was made, the 16th of February, for altering the Common-prayer, in relation to the Royal family.

There was ſoon after a talk of proceeding againſt ſome lords, and others, for having turned Papiſts, in compliance with the court, the latter part of the preceding reign, and ſome ſteps were even taken towards it, but nothing came of it.

The high church diſcontented

During the time of theſe tranſactions in parliament, with regard to the Diſſenters, the rigid High-church clergy, and their adherents, ſhewed great jealouſies and animoſities, and made no ſcruple to divulge, that the King and Queen, notwithſtanding they profeſſed to be of the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, were Preſbyterians in their hearts. Two incidents, tho' exceeding trifling and indifferent in themſelves, were in particular made uſe of to raiſe a clamor, among the vulgar and zealous bigots, of the church being in danger: One of which was, that the King had been once obſerved to put his hat on, in ſermon-time, a thing ſo common in Holland, that it is reaſonable to conclude, it happened thro' inadvertency and not deſign: and beſide, what is there ſo very criminal in this? cuſtom has, indeed, made it an indecency with us to be covered in a place of public worſhip, but it is cuſtom only has made it ſo. The Jews think it as indecent to offer up their prayers to the Almighty, either in their ſynagogues, or their own houſes, with their heads uncovered. The other was, that the Queen had forbidden the uſe of violins in the chappel-muſic: a thing again abſolutely indifferent, and either good or bad, according to the ideas raiſed by it, in the different diſpoſitions of the minds of the hearers, and the management of the performers, a thing, the abuſe of which may have made it diſtaſteful to many more beſide her Majeſty, who were nevertheleſs true members of the church of England. It is a very great queſtion, if the uſe of inſtrumental muſick was to be injoined in all the churches, throughout England, whether by far the greater number of pariſhoners would not oppoſe it. The abuſe even of organs has given cauſe of great exceptions againſt them, and I myſelf know a clergyman of this church, who, in every reſpect, is an honor to his profeſſion, and who will not conſent to have an organ in his congregation, unleſs the organiſt be tied down to make a more ſolemn uſe of it, than moſt of thoſe light-fingered gentlemen are apt to do, who have as little true taſte for muſic, as thoſe dancers, who think the excellency of their art lies wholly in the agility of their heels.

Titles and honors confered.

The day appointed for the coronation drawing near, according to cuſtom, his Majeſty was pleaſed to confer ſeveral titles and honors preparatory to it, viz.

His Royal Highneſs, Prince George of Denmark, was created baron of Ockingham, earl of Kendal, and duke of Cumberland.

The marquis of Winchester, was made duke of Bolton.

The earl of Danby, marquis of Carmaerthen.

Monſ. Bentinck, baron of Cirenceſter, viſcount Woodſtock, and earl of Portland.

Viſcount Fauconberg, earl of Fauconberg.

Viſcount Mordaunt, earl of Monmouth.

The lord Mountague, viſcount Mounthermer, and earl of Mountague.

The lord Churchill, earl of Marlborough.

Henry Sidney, eſq; baron of Milton, and viſcount Sidney of Sheppey, in the county of Kent.

Viſcount Lumley, of Waterford, in Ireland, viſcount Lumley, of Lumley-caſtle, in the county-Palatin of Durham, and earl of Scarborough.

The viſcount Cholmondley, of Kellis, in Ireland, baron of Cholmondley of Witchmalbanck, alias Namptwich, in Cheſhire: and,

Thomas Pilkington, eſq; lord-mayor of London was knighted by his Majeſty.

The marſhal de Schomberg (who with the earl of Devonſhire, and duke of Ormond, had already been elected Knight companion of the moſt noble order of the Garter) was naturalized, by act of parliament liament, and ſoon after created duke of Schomberg, marquis of Harwich, earl of Brentford, and baron Teys.

Sir George Hewet was likewiſe made lord Goran of Ireland, and the lord Coote, of Ireland, treaſurer to the Queen.

Act for eſtabliſhing the coronation oath.

On the ninth of April, the King went to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent to the act for naturalizing the marſhal de Schomberg, another for ſettling the precedency of the Prince of Denmark, and a third for re-eſtabliſhing the coronation-oath, which in complaiſance to King James II, had been altered from the ancient form, whereby the liberties of the people were ſecured, and inſtead thereof great regard had to the rights of the clergy, and the prerogatives of the crown. The oath appointed to be taken by King William and Queen Mary was in the following plain, but comprehenſive terms;

Form of it.

" Will you ſolemnly promiſe and ſwear to go-
" vern the people of this kingdom of England, and
" the dominions thereunto belonging, according to
" the ſtatutes, in parliament agreed on, and the " laws and cuſtoms of the ſame."

K. William and Q. Mary crown'd.

It was provided, that this oath ſhould be adminiſtred either by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or the biſhop of London: And the choice of one of theſe two prelates being left to the King, his Majeſty, leſt the firſt, who ſtill continued diſcontented, ſhould not accept of it, choſe rather to appoint the latter, who performed the ceremony accordingly; the ſermon being preached by the biſhop of Saliſbury. This ceremony being, otherwiſe, the ſame as uſual, as was likewiſe the proceſſion from Weſtminſter-hall to the abby, where it was performed, I ſhall not inlarge upon them, and only mention that part of the latter, which immediately preceded and attended upon their Majeſties perſons.

Towards the cloſe of this proceſſion came the marquis of Hallifax, lord privy-ſeal; the marquis of Carmaerthen, lord preſident of the council; dr. Lamplugh, archbiſhop of York; his Royal Highneſs, George, Prince of Denmark, then the Regalia, and then their Majeſties, in the following manner.

The earl of Mancheſter bearing St. Edward's ſtaff.

The lord Grey of Ruthen, the ſpurs.

The earl of Clare, the Queen's ſcepter.

The earl of Northampton the King's.

The earls of Shrewſbury, Darby, and Pembroke, the three ſwords.

Robert, earl of Lindſey, lord great chamberlain.

The earl of Oxford, with the ſword of ſtate, between the duke of Norfolk, earl marſhal, and the duke of Ormond, lord high conſtable for that day.

The earl of Bedford, with the Queen's ſcepter, with the dove.

The earl of Rutland, with the King's.

The duke of Bolton, with the Queen's orb.

The duke of Graſton, with the King's.

The duke of Sommerſet, with the Queen's crown.

The earl of Devonſhire, lord high ſteward of England, for that day, with the King's.

The biſhop of London with the Bible, between the biſhop of St. Aſaph, with the Patin, and the biſhop of Rocheſter with the Chalice.

The King, ſupported by the biſhop of Wincheſter.

And the Queen by the biſhop of Briſtol.

His Majeſty's train was born by Monſ. Zuleſtein, maſter of the robes, aſſiſted by the lord Eland, ſon to the marquis of Hallifax; lord Landſdown, ſon to the earl of Bath; the lord Willoughby, ſon to the earl of Lindſey; and the lord Dumblain, ſon to the marquis of Carmaerthen.

Her Majeſty's train was born by the lady Elizabeth Pawlet, daughter to the duke of Bolton, the lady Diana Vere, daughter to the earl of Oxford; the lady Elizabeth Cavendiſh, daughter to the earl of Devonſhire, and the lady Harriot Hyde, daughter to the earl of Rocheſter.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

The next day, the houſe of commons, in a full body, walked from Weſtminſter to the Banqueting-houſe, to congratulate their Majeſties upon their coronation, on which occaſion, mr. Powle, their ſpeaker, made the following ſpeech:

The houſe of commons congratulate their Majeſties.

May it pleaſe your Majeſties,

Speech on that occaſion,

" Your moſt loyal and dutiful ſubjects, the com-
" mons of England, aſſembled in this preſent par" liament, having, to their unſpeakable joy, ſeen
" your Majeſties placed upon the Imperial throne of " this kingdom, they have deſired acceſs, at this " time, to your royal preſenſe, humbly to con" gratulate your Majeſties, upon this occaſion, and " to wiſh your Majeſties a long and proſperous
" reign, with all the bleſſings that ever did attend a " crown.

" We are all ſenſible, that your Majeſties great-
" neſs is the ſecurity of your ſubjects. It is from your " power, that we derive to ourſelves an aſſurance
" of being defended from our enemies; and from " your juſtice that we expect a full injoyment of " our laws and liberties: but that which compleats
" our happineſs, is the experience we have of your
" Majeſties continual care to maintain the Pro-
" teſtant religion: ſo that we can no longer appre-
" hend any danger of being deprived of that in" eſtimable bleſſing, either by ſecret practices, or
" by open violence.

To the King.

" May the ſame divine providence, that has " hitherto preſerved your Majeſty in the greateſt
" dangers, and ſo often given you victory over
" your enemies, ſtill crown your undertakings with " ſucceſs.

To the Queen.

" And may thoſe unparalel'd virtues, which " adorn your Majeſty's royal perſon, be the admira-
" tion of the preſent age, and an example to the " future.

" And may the luſtre of both your names, ſo
" far outſhine the glory of your predeceſſors, that
" the memory of their greateſt actions may be
" forgoten, and your people no longer date the " eſtabliſhment of their laws and liberties, from St.
" Edward's days, but the moſt auſpicious King
" William and Queen Mary."

To which ſpeech his Majeſty made the following anſwer, in his Own and in the Queen's name.

Gentlemen,

The King's anſwer.

" We return you our hearty thanks for the kind-
" neſs that you have, upon all occaſions, ſhewed
" to both of us. We ſhall take care, to the beſt
" of our power, of all things that conduce to the " good of the kingdom, and I do not doubt, but by " God's aſſiſtance and yours, we ſhall be able, in a
" ſhort time, to make you a flouriſhing people."

Upon this occaſion, gold medals, of about three pounds value, were given to each member of the houſe of commons.

Medals given to the members.

It was not long after the coronation, before both houſes of parliament, began to ſhew a jealouſy, that the King was inclined to favor the Preſbyterians, rather than the members of the church of England; and to obſerve, that the former were, upon all occaſions, diſcountenanced, and the moſt profitable poſts confered upon the Whigs. The houſe of commons, thereupon formed an addreſs, to which the lords giving their concurrence, it was preſented by both houſes, on the 19th of April. In this addreſs, " they, with utmoſt duty and affection, ren" dered to his Majeſty their moſt humble and " hearty thanks for his moſt gracious declaration
" and repeated aſſurances, that he would maintain

An addreſs in behalf of the church of England.

" the church of England eſtabliſhed by law, which " his Majeſty had been pleaſed to recover from the " dangerous conſpiracy that was laid for its de- " ſtruction, with the hazard of his royal perſon :" To which they added:

" That the doctrine and practiſe of the church " of England had evinced their loyalty beyond the " contradiction of the moſt malicious enemies, and " that the misfortunes of former Princes could be at- " tributed to nothing more than their indeavors to " ſubvert and diſable the members thereof from " contributing to their ſupport and defenſe. They " therefore prayed his Majeſty to continue his care " for the preſervation of the ſame, whereby he " would effectually eſtabliſh his throne, by ſecuring " the hearts of his Majeſty's ſubjects, within theſe " his realms, who could no way better ſhew their " zeal for his ſervice, than by a firm adherence " to that church, whoſe conſtitution is beſt ſuited " to the ſupport of the monarchy :" they likewiſe humbly prayed;

A convocation deſir'd.

" That, according to the ancient practiſe and " uſage of the kingdom, in time of parliament, his " Majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed, to iſſue " forth his writs for calling a convocation of the " clergy of the kingdom, to be adviſed with in ec- " cleſiaſtical matters, aſſuring his Majeſty, that it " was their intention forthwith to proceed to the " conſideration of giving eaſe to Proteſtant Diſ- " ſenters."

The King did not return an immediate anſwer to this addreſs; but, the 21ſt, the lord Nottingham, by his Majeſty's orders, acquainted both houſes: that

The King's anſwer.

" tho' he had had many occaſions of aſſuring them, " he would maintain the church of England, as by " law eſtabliſhed, yet he was well pleaſed with re- " peating theſe promiſes, which he was reſolved to " perform, by ſupporting this church, whoſe loy- " alty, he doubted not, would inable him to an- " ſwer their juſt expectations. That as his deſigns " in coming hither was to reſcue them from the " miſeries they labored under, ſo it was a great ſatiſ- " faction to him, that by the ſucceſs God had given " him, he was in a ſtation of defending that church " which had effectually ſhewn her zeal againſt Po- " pery, and ſhould always be his peculiar care. " And he hoped the eaſe they deſigned to Diſſen- " ters would contribute very much to the eſtabliſh- " ment of this church; he therefore earneſtly " recommended to them, that the occaſions of dif- " ferences and mutual animoſities might be remov'd, " and that as ſoon as might be, he would ſummon " a convocation."

A conference between the two houſes, concerning the oaths.

There was, the ſame day, a conference between both houſes, chiefly about an amendment made by the lords in the bill for abrogating the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy; by which the clergy were excuſed from taking the oaths; except by order of council. To this the commons diſagreed, alleging,

Arguments of the commons.

" That it has been the policy of the common and " ſtatute laws to oblige men to ſwear allegiance to " the King: that allegiance is the common and " neceſſary duty of all the ſubjects, and is moſt " ſtrictly to be required of archbiſhops, and thoſe " who have eccleſiaſtical dignities, benefices and " promotions, in regard they are highly intereſted " in the adminiſtration of the government, draw " great dependencies, and are exemplary to the " reſt of the people, and ſeveral of them are by " law to adminiſter the oath of allegiance to other " perſons. That allegiance is alſo ſtrictly to be " required of all governors, profeſſors and fel- " lows in univerſities, and ſchool-maſters; becauſe " to them the education of the youth of the king- " dom is commited, and therefore they ought to " be perſons of known loyalty to the government. " That the taking the oaths publicly, in open " court, would better manifeſt allegiance, than " the taking them privately, before perſons appoint- " ed by order in council, and would be much more " ſafe to the perſons who are obliged to take the " oaths. That the beſt and moſt certain means to " have the oaths taken was to impoſe it upon the " perſons concerned, to tender themſelves to take " the oaths, under penalties; but if the oaths were " not required to be taken unleſs tendered, the ſaid " perſons might, by abſenſe, or otherwiſe, avoid " them with impunity. That the clauſe which the " commons ſent to their lordſhips, allowed more " favor to the archbiſhops, biſhops, and thoſe who " had eccleſiaſtical dignities and promotions, than " to any lay-peers, or other perſons having offices " or imployments, and was more gentle in the " penalty, than the ſtatutes heretofore made, in " the like caſe. That it was unreaſonable and " unſafe to diſtinguiſh the archbiſhops, biſhops, " and perſons having eccleſiaſtical dignities, bene- " fices or promotions, and ſuch as are intruſted with " the education of youth, from the reſt of the ſub- " jects, in the declaration of their allegiance, and " might tend to make a diviſion in the kingdom, " expoſe the King's perſon and government to ha- " tred and danger, and occaſion a general diſcontent."

The houſe of lords adjourned after this into a committee, to debate and conſider the reaſons of the houſe of commons, and the houſe being reſumed, the lord Bridgwater reported, that, after a long debate in the committee, the queſtion, whether to agree with the houſe of commons, was carried in the negative: Upon which the earls of Macclesfield and Monmouth entered their diſſents, and alleged their reaſons for it.

The next day, the earl of Nottingham reported, from the committee appointed the day before, the reaſons to be offered to the houſe of commons, in anſwer to their reaſons given at the laſt conference, which were in ſubſtance, as follows:

Anſwers of the lords.

To the firſt and ſecond reaſon of the houſe of commons, the lords, in anſwer, agreed that, " the " policy of the law requires men to ſwear alle- " giance, and that it is the common and neceſ- " ſary duty of all ſubjects, and eſpecially of the " clergy; but that the lords did not exempt them " from taking theſe oaths, but only differed from " the houſe of commons, about the method by " which they ſhould be tendered." To the third reaſon it was alleged; " that if the lords ſhould " agree, that it was better to tender the oaths in " open court than privately, yet that was not a " ſufficient reaſon againſt tendering them by per- " ſons appointed by the King in council, becauſe " the officers and the judges of the court might be " ſo appointed, by virtue of the clauſe offered by " the lords." To the fourth, " that the clergy " would be required to take the oaths, by ſuch " order in council, as was propoſed by the lords, " and their not appearing when ſo ſummoned would " amount to a refuſal, or if it ſhould not, the " lords would agree to any ſuch addition as would " make it ſo." As to the other reaſons, they replied; " that the clergy, and the members of the " univerſities, were not diſtinguiſhed from the laity, " becauſe upon the preſenting to any degree or " preferment, they would be, equally with all others, " obliged to take the oaths, when required by or- " der of council. That it ſeemed more to the ſet- " tlement and ſafety of the government, that the " King ſhould be impowered to put the fidelity of " the clergy to a trial immediately, than leave any, " who were ill-affected to the government, ſo " much time as to the firſt of Auguſt, to undeter- " mine it. That the clergy were obliged, by the " prayers which they muſt uſe, in the daily ſervice, " to make ſuch expreſs and ſolemn declarations of " fidelity

William & Mary. An' 1689.

" fidelity to the King and Queen, by name, that " the puting them to the taking of oaths was not " ſo neceſſary to the public ſafety, as in other " perſons who are not bound to make ſuch frequent " declarations of their fidelity. That in ſo critical " a time as the preſent, it was not to be doubted, " but upon any cauſe of apprehending their ill- " affections to the government, the tendering the " oaths by order in council, would not only take off " all imputations of hardſhips from his Majeſty, but " juſtify and even require a more rigorous way of " proceeding, againſt thoſe who ſhould give any " cauſe of offenſe. And laſtly, that ſince, during " Queen Elizabeth's long and glorious reign, in " which ſhe had both the pretended title of the " Queen of Scots, and the depoſing power, aſ- " ſumed by the Popes, to apprehend, this was " found to be the ſafeſt way for the public quiet ; " and the ill effects of leaving the tendering the oaths " to the Queen's diſcretion, not having appeared " in all that time of ſo much danger, the following " pattern, taken from the beſt part of our hiſtory, " ſeemed more ſuitable to the preſent time, than " the falling into other methods."

This anſwer having been communicated to the commons in a free conference, they inſiſted, that according to the ſtatute of the ſeventh of James I, all perſons ſhould be injoined to take the oaths, and held, there ſhould be no difference between the clergy and laity in taking them : but upon mature conſideration of the whole matter, and after a long debate, the lords propoſed a clauſe, whereby, " it " ſhould be left to the King, to allow ſuch of the " clergy as ſhould refuſe the oaths preſcribed by " this act, as he ſhould think fit, not exceeding " the number of twelve, an allowance out of their " eccleſiaſtical benefices or promotions, for their " ſubſiſtence, not exceeding a third part, and to " continue during his Majeſty's pleaſure and no " longer." This clauſe was approved by the commons, and ſo the bill for abrogating the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, having paſſed both houſes, received the ſanction of the royal aſſent, the 24th of April.

They agree upon an expedient.

At the ſame time, his Majeſty gave his aſſent to five other acts, viz.

Acts paſſed.

A ſecond act impowering his Majeſty to apprehend and detain all ſuch perſons as he ſhould find juſt cauſe to ſuſpect were conſpiring againſt the government, the former being expired.

An act for removing Papiſts from the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and ten miles from the ſame. (1)

An act for taking away the revenue ariſing by hearth-money.

An act for the incouragement of the exportation of corn ; and

An act for explaining and making effectual the ſtatute made in the firſt year of King James I, concerning the haven and peers of great Yarmouth.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

Tho' it is not my intent in the courſe of this hiſtory, to treat of the affairs of Scotlnd, farther than they have an immediate connexion with thoſe of England, yet it will be neceſſary to ſay a word or two of them, at the begining of this reign.

Brief account of the affairs of Scotland.

The Scotiſh nobility and gentry, in and about London, had addreſſed the Prince of Orange, to take upon him the government of that kingdom, in like manner as he did that of England, and to ſummon a convention of eſtates there, with which the Prince complied. This convention met, accordingly, the 14th of March, (2) when duke Hamilton was choſen preſident, by a great majority, being ſet up by the party that was for King William, in oppoſition to the marquis of Athol, who was propoſed by the biſhops, and the party which ſtill adhered to the abdicated King (3). The ſixteenth, one Crane, an Engliſhman, ſaid to be a ſervant of the late King James's Queen, brought a letter from that unfortunate Prince, and, at the ſame time, the preſident informed the aſſembly, that the lord Leven was arrived expreſs, with another from King William. Upon this a debate aroſe, which of theſe two letters ſhould be read firſt, and it being carried by a majority, for King William's, it was read accordingly (4). His ſaid Majeſty therein acquainted them, " he was ſenſible of the kindneſs and con- " cern that nation had ſhewn for the ſucceſs of his " undertaking, for the preſervation of their reli- " gion and liberties, which were in ſuch imminent " danger, and adviſed them to enter into ſuch con- " ſultations, as might ſettle them on laſting founda- " tions, which he hoped they would ſet about with " all convenient ſpeed, and lay aſide all animoſities " and factions that might hinder it ; that he was " glad to find ſo many of the nobility and gentry " about London, inclined to an union of the two " kingdoms, and ſo ſhould do all that lay in his " power to promote it, looking upon this, as they " did, to be the beſt means for procuring the hap- " pineſs of theſe nations ; eſpecially at this time, " when the enemies of both were ſo reſtleſs, in- " deavoring to increaſe jeaouſies and diviſions." This letter being read, a committee was appointed to draw up an anſwer to it, in the moſt thankful and dutiful terms.

The next queſtion was, whether the late King James's letter ſhould be read, which was indeed allowed, but before it was opened, they paſſed an act, aſſerting the lawfulneſs of that convention, notwithſtanding any thing that might be alleged, in the ſaid letter, and declared that they would continue to ſit until their government, religion, laws, liberties and properties were eſtabliſhed. This done, the letter was read, in which, " pardon was promiſed " to all who ſhould return to their duty before " the laſt of that month, and thoſe who ſhould

(1) During the debate about paſſing this act, an incident happened which gave occaſion to ſome merriment : an addreſs was preſented to the King, that the ducheſs of Mazarine might be obliged to depart the kingdom ; to which his Majeſty only anſwered, " he would take it into conſideration." The complaint laid againſt her was, that ſhe kept aſſemblies in her houſe, which, ſome would have it, were ſo many Popiſh cabals (that being her religion, if any) but others alleged theſe meetings were only for gaming and other innocent diverſions, as they termed them ; by the former of which, it was thought, ſhe chiefly ſubſiſted : ſhe had her friends, as well in the houſe, as without doors, of the latter the Dutch embaſſador, and his brother Monſ. d' Auverquerque interceded for her. The marquis de Seiſſac ſpoke likewiſe in her favor, and to the credit of the Engliſh nation, obſerved merrily enough, " that ſhe would ſtarve in any other country." The biſhop of Saliſbury made a motion in the houſe of peers, for an addreſs againſt her, but it dropped, and her grace was, by connivance, indulged in getting her bread in England by the polite profeſſions of Ombre, Hazard, &c.

(2) Before they proceeded to the choice of a preſident, prayers were publicly performed by the biſhop of Edinburgh, who prayed for his Majeſty King James's ſafety and reſtoration. Hiſt. of K. William III. Vol. 2. p. 36.

(3) A late author attributes the great majority the party for King William had above the oppoſite one, in part to the timidity of many of the Jacobites, who abſolutely refuſed to be preſent at the convention, and partly to the advice given by the lord Stairs, to allow all Proteſtants, without diſtinction, the fredom of voting at elections, which very much increaſed the number of the Prince's friends. Cont. of Rapin, in French. l. 25. p. 49.

(4) It was alleged, by the favorers of the revolution, that the aſſembly being convened by King William, it was but juſt that regard ſhould be had to his letter firſt, and beſide who knew but King James's letter might injoin a diſſolution of the convention. This latter obſervation had, likewiſe, the good effect, that it was, without doubt, the occaſion of the ſalutary act and reſolution, which preceded the reading of King James's letter.

" perſiſt

William & Mary. An' 1689.

" perſiſt in their rebellion againſt him (as he called " it) were threatned with puniſhment, according " to the utmoſt rigor of the laws." As the greater part of the members of this convention were Preſbyterians, it is eaſy to conceive this letter had no great effect upon them, to his advantage, and it was the more diſagreable, as it was counter-ſigned by the earl of Milton, than whom none was more odious to them. It therefore rather ſerved to heighten their reſentment of the injuries he had done them, and ſo no farther notice was taken of it : the meſſenger who brought the letter, was firſt ſecured, but ſoon after diſcharged, not being thought worthy their notice, and was diſmiſſed with a paſs inſtead of an anſwer. Inſtead thereof they imployed their time in conſulting how to provide for their own ſecurity and defenſe. In order to this, they commanded all perſons, from ſixteen to ſixty, to be ready to appear in arms, raiſed 800 men, and gave the command of them to the earl of Leven, to guard the city. The nineteenth they paſſed an act, by which they approved the addreſs of the Scotiſh nobility and gentry at London, to the Prince of Orange, and they alſo thankfully acknowleged, " the great benefit done to their nation by the " Prince of Orange, and deſired his Highneſs to " accept the adminiſtration of the government of " that kingdom. And having received ſome letters from the Proteſtants in Ireland, deſiring their aſſiſtance, they ordered 2000 muſkets, and 20 barrels of powder to be ſent them immediately, and a farther proviſion of arms to be bought up for them in Holland. They likewiſe ordered two ſmall frigats to cruize between Scotland and Ireland, for mutual intelligence between both kingdoms.

The duke of Gordon, a Papiſt, was, all this while, in poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Edinburg, which he held for King James ; the convention therefore, had required it to be put into their hands. (1) The duke inſiſted upon an indemnity for all that was paſt, and ſecurity for the future. This the convention condeſcended to, in ſo far as he had acted as a Papiſt, and ſent him, by the earls of Tweedale and Lothian, a pardon for himſelf, and all that were with him : but it appeared he only trifled ; for after having deſired firſt twenty-four hours, and then twelve days, to give his reſolution, he, at length, declared, he would not ſurrender it all. The convention, hereupon, ordered it to be blocked up, and being informed, that the lord viſcount Dundee kept a correſpondence with the duke, they ſummoned him to appear before them, but he retired, with 40 or 50 horſe, into the country. This done, they diſpatched the lord Roſs to England, with an anſwer to King William's letter, in which, " they acknowleged him to be, under God, their great " and ſeaſonable deliverer ; congratulated his ſuc- " ceſs, and deſired his Majeſty to diſpoſe the " Engliſh to an equal readineſs with them in the " affair of the union, and that, in the mean time, " he would continue to grant them his protection " in all their concerns." William & Mary. An' 1689.

Major-general Mackay having been ſent by King William to Edinburg, with four regiments of foot and one of dragoons, the convention gave a commiſſion, likewiſe, to that general, to command all the forces raiſed or to be raiſed in Scotland. The 26th they appointed a committee to ſettle the government (2) which came to the ſame reſolution the convention in England had done, viz. " that the " throne was vacant," and this was approved by the whole houſe, excepting twelve. In conſequence of this reſolution they paſſed an act, by which they declared, " that King James, being a profeſſed " Papiſt, did aſſume the royal power, and acted " as King, without taking the oaths required by " law, and by the advice of evil counſellors, had " invaded the fundamental conſtitution of the king- " dom, and altered it from a legal and limited " monarchy, to an arbitrary, deſpotic power ; and " had governed the ſame to the ſubverſion of the " Proteſtant religion, and violation of the laws " and liberties of the nation ; inverting all the ends " of government, whereby he had forfeited his " right to the crown, and the throne was become " vacant." (3)

King William and Queen Mary proclaimed King and Queen of Scotland.

After this, the convention paſſed an act, to ſettle the crown on their Majeſties King William and Queen Mary, and purſuant thereunto, they were proclaimed King and Queen of Scotland, the 11th of April, the very ſame auſpicious day, in which the crown was ſolemnly placed on their heads in England. Having recited in this act, the ſeveral inſtances, by which King James had invaded the conſtitution, digeſted under fourteen general heads, with their claim of right, in the ſame manner as the convention in England had done, comprehended in twenty-three articles, they concluded with " ſettling " the crown on their Majeſties, and their iſſue, " with the remainder to the Princeſs Ann and her " iſſue ; and that failing, to the heirs of the body " of King William.(4)

This act likewiſe abrogated the oath of allegiance, and ſubſtituted another very ſhort one, conformable to that which was preſcribed in England, " in the room of it, in theſe words: I, A B, do ſin- " cerely promiſe and ſwear, that I will be faithful, " and bear true allegiance to their Majeſties King " William and Queen Mary.

So help me God.

(1) It has been ſaid, that upon the Jacobites having loſt their point, in the choice of a preſident, they propoſed to the duke of Gordon, to fire upon the town, and diſperſe the convention ; but that their hopes were fruſtrated by the irreſolution of the duke, who would not do it without orders from King James. Cont. of Rapin, in French, l. 25. p. 49.

(2) This committee conſiſted of eight temporal lords, eight knights and eight burgeſſes, but no biſhops, which confirms what I obſerved above, that this convention conſiſted moſtly of Preſbyterians: however there is this farther reaſon alleged for it, that they had diſguſted the generality of the ſtate, both by their former compliance, with King James's arbitrary government, and by their prayers at the begining of the ſeſſion.

(3) The committee was obliged to have recourſe to theſe violations of the fundamental laws and conſtitutions, to juſtify their vote of the throne being vacant. In England, it was founded upon King James's withdrawing himſelf ; which reaſon could not take place in a kingdom where he had never been in perſon, after his acceſſion to the throne, and where he had left the frame of the government intire at his departure from England. This expedient was firſt propoſed by ſir John Dalrymple, and it had this advantage, that upon the ſuppoſition of King James having forfeited the crown, they thereby excluded the pretended Prince of Wales, from all future expectations.

(4) By the 21ſt article of their claim, which contained theſe words, " that prelacy and ſuperiority of an office in the church " above Preſbyters, is and has been a great and inſupportable burden to this nation, and contrary to the inclinations of the " generality of the people, ever ſince the reformation, they having reformed Popery by Preſbytery, and therefore ought to be " aboliſhed :" by this article, I ſay, a fatal blow was ſtruck at the very root of Epiſcopacy, which occaſioned great uneaſineſſes not only in Scotland, but in England, and rendered the union of the two nations very difficult.

I own (ſays the author of the hiſtory of King William, Vol. 2. p. 51.) the Scotiſh prelates, by reading King James's declaration for liberty of conſcience, and for repealing the teſt and penal laws ; by aſſuring that Monarch, that they looked upon the Prince of Orange's enterpriſe, as a deteſtable invaſion ; in a word, by being the inſtruments of a Popiſh arbitrary King, and by thwarting the proceedings of the convention, had drawn upon themſelves the general odium of the people ; whereas had they imitated the conſtancy of the Engliſh biſhops, their zeal and virtue had gained them the affection of the Scotiſh nation, and given them an opportunity, to ſettle Epiſcopacy, among them : but yet (continues my author) the convention would have done well to have diſtinguiſhed between the function itſelf, and the perſons that exerciſed it.

The

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

The convention having deputed the earl of Argile, ſir James Montgomery, and ſir John Dalrymple to carry this act to England, it was by them preſented to their Majeſties, in the banqueting-houſe at Whitehall, the 11th of May: and his Majeſty was pleaſed to tell the deputies, "he took it very "kindly, that Scotland had expreſſed ſo much "confidence in him, and that he ſhould be ready "to aſſiſt them, in every thing that concerned the "welfare of that kingdom." Their Majeſties then took the coronation (1) oath, and thus the happy revolution was juſtified and perfected in Scotland, with as great or a greater unanimity than in England.

Edinburg caſtle being in the mean time beſieged, a breach was made in the walls, and there being great want of ammunition in the place, the duke of Gordon ſurrendered it the 13th of June, on condition of ſecurity for the lives, liberties, and fortunes of the gariſon. The lord Dundee continued, however, at the head of 6000 foot, and 100 horſe of King James's troops in the hi hlands; major-general Mackay, therefore marched againſt them, with a body of 4000 foot, and four troops of horſe and dragoons. Theſe two little armies met on this ſide the blair of Athol, and fought with great obſtinacy from five in the afternoon till night, when Mackay was obliged to leave the field, and retire, in ſome diſorder, toward Sterling: but Dundee being killed in the action, his party was worſted every-where, and could never appear in any conſiderable body afterwards.

I ſhall mention nothing farther of the affairs of Scotland, in this place, but that the Scotiſh convention being to be turned into a parliament, King William gave his commiſſion to duke Hamilton, and, among other inſtructions, gave him the following: "You are to paſs an act for turning the meeting "of the eſtates into a parliament. You are to paſs "an act for recognizing Our and the Queen's royal "authority, &c. You are to paſs an act eſtabliſhing "that church-government, which is moſt agreable "to the inclination of the people, reſcinding the "act of parliament, 1669, and all the other acts "inconſiſtent therewith." (2)

I might now proceed to give an account of the affairs of Ireland, in the ſame brief manner I have done thoſe of Scotland, but that kingdom having been, in this and the ſucceeding year, a grand ſcene in the actions of war, I ſhall firſt, to go on regularly, return to England, and give ſome account how the tedious and expenſive war which inſued was begun, and premiſe ſome other matters which happened in the mean time there.

King William having pretty well ſettled his domeſtic affairs, and eſtabliſhed his throne in England and Scotland, began now to imploy his thoughts for the general good of Chriſtendom, and to conſider the neceſſities of his allies, who had favored his expedition into England. The Imperial, Spaniſh and Dutch miniſters repreſented to his Majeſty, that France had declared their reſpective maſters her enemies, for being his friends, and therefore earneſtly preſſed him to proclaim war againſt that crown.

King William had ſeveral cogent reaſons to urge him to a compliance with the deſires of his confederates, among which gratitude, and that noble ardor, which he had ever ſhewed to ſuppreſs the exorbitant power of France were not the leaſt: but he knew the nature of an Engliſh parliament too well, to enter into ſo important and expenſive a war, as this muſt neceſſarily be, without their conſent. He managed this with ſo much prudence, that on the 25th of April, the houſe of commons preſented his Majeſty an addreſs, in which: "they moſt "humbly laid before his Majeſty their earneſt de- "ſire, that he would be pleaſed to take into his "moſt tender conſideration, the deſtructive me- "thods, taken of late years, by the French King, "againſt the trade, quiet, and intereſt of the king- "dom, and particularly the preſent invaſion of Ire- "land, and ſupporting his Majeſty's rebellious "ſubjects there. Not doubting, in the leaſt, but "that thro' his Majeſty's wiſdom, the alliances al- "ready made, with ſuch as might, hereafter, "be concluded, on this occaſion, by his Majeſty, "might be effectual to reduce the French King to "ſuch a condition, that it might not be in his power "hereafter, to violate the peace of Chriſtendom, nor "prejudice the trade and proſperity of the kingdom. "And to this end, they moſt humbly beſought his "Majeſty, to reſt aſſured, upon this their ſolemn "and hearty promiſe and incouragement, that when "his Majeſty ſhould think fit to enter into a war "againſt the French King, they would give his "Majeſty ſuch aſſiſtance, in a parliamentary way, "as might inable him to ſupport, and go thro' "with the ſame."

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

The commons addreſs for a war.

To this addreſs, his Majeſty gave the following anſwer:

"That he received it as a mark of the confidence "they had in him, which he took very kindly, "and ſhould indeavor by all his actions, to con- "firm them in it. That his own ambition ſhould "never be an argument, to incline him to ingage "in a war that might expoſe the nation either to "danger or expenſe: but in this preſent caſe, he "looked upon the war ſo much already declared, "in effect, by France again England, that it was "not ſo properly an act of choice, as an inevit- "able neceſſity, in their own defenſe. That he "ſhould only tell them, that as he had ventured "his life, and all that was dear to him, to reſcue "this nation from what it ſuffered, he was ready "ſtill to do the ſame, in order to the preſerving it "from all its enemies; and as he did not doubt "of ſuch an aſſiſtance from them, as ſhould be "ſuitable to their advice to him, to declare war "againſt a powerful enemy, ſo they might rely "upon him, that no part of what they ſhould "give for the carrying it on with ſucceſs, ſhould "be diverted by him, to any other uſe."

The King's anſwer.

The 25th of April, his Majeſty iſſued his royal proclamation, whereby he declared: "that "finding in his ſubjects a true and juſt ſenſe "of their deliverance from the perſecution lately "threatning them for their religion, and of the "miſeries and oppreſſions the French Proteſtants "lay under, ſuch of them as ſhould ſeek their Proclamation for the relief of Proteſtants.

(1) There being a clauſe in the oath, that their Majeſties ſhould be careful to root out heretics, when they came to that, his Majeſty declared, "That he did not mean by thoſe words, that he was under any obligation to become a perſe- "cutor:" to which the deputies made anſwer, "that neither the meaning of the oath, nor the law of Scotland did im- "port any ſuch thing:" upon which his Majeſty replied, "he took the oath in that ſenſe;" and deſired all that were preſent to be witneſſes of his ſo doing. The manner of taking this oath was thus: the earl of Argyle read it very diſtinctly word for word, and the King and Queen repeated it after him, holding up their right-hands, after the manner of taking an oath in Scotland.

(2) Theſe three acts were paſſed in the order they are placed above, ſo that the act for aboliſhing Epiſcopacy, which paſſed the 22d of July, may be ſaid to be the firſt act of the firſt Scotiſh parliament after the revolution: for it was the firſt which paſſed, after they had any power to act, which they had not, as a parliament, till that power was conſtituted by the two acts which preceded it; and thus fell Epiſcopacy in Scotland. "It being left to that nation (ſays a known "author) to ſettle religion, in ſuch manner, as was moſt deſired by the people, there was not a mouth open to give a vote for "Epiſcopacy. Lackhart's memoirs, p. 299.

" refuge in, and tranſport themſelves into this king" dom of England, ſhould not only have his royal " protection, but he would ſo aid and aſſiſt them, in " their ſeveral trades and ways of livelihood, as
" that their being in this realm might be comfor-
" table and eaſy to them." (1)

Imports from France prohibited.

At the ſame time that his Majeſty incouraged the Proteſtants of France, he iſſued out another proclamation, by which he prohibited the importation of all ſorts of manufactures and commodities whatſoever, of the growth, production or manufacture of that kingdom, which was a fore-runner of the war.

His Majeſty, being now aſſured of the aſſiſtance of the commons, declared to the lords, that it was his intention ſpeedily to declare war againſt France, upon which their lordſhips took the unanimous reſolution to ſtand by and aſſiſt his Majeſty therein, to the utmoſt of their power.

A declaration of war was, hereupon, drawn up as it is ſaid, by that eminent civilian mr. (afterwards lord) Summers, and is equal to his extraordinary talents, both in eloquence and reaſon, bearing date the 7th of May, 1689, which was publiſhed as uſual, in the following words: (2)

Declaration of war againſt France.

William Rex,

" It having pleaſed Almighty God to make " us the happy inſtrument of reſcuing theſe na" tions from imminent dangers, and to place us
" upon the throne of theſe kingdoms; we think
" our-ſelves obliged to indeavor, to the uttermoſt,
" to promote the welfare of our people, which can " never be effectually ſecured, but by preventing
" the miſeries that threaten them from abroad.

" When we conſider the many unjuſt methods
" the French King hath, of late years, taken, to " gratify his ambition: That he has not only in" vaded the territories of the Emperor, and the " Empire, now in amity with us, laying waſte
" whole countries, and deſtroying the inhabitants
" by his armies; but declared war againſt our " allies, without any provocation, in manifeſt vi" olation of the treaties confirmed by the guaranty
" of the crown of England; we can do no leſs
" than join with our allies, in oppoſing the de-
" ſigns of the French King, as the diſturber of the " peace, and the common enemy of the Chriſtian
" world.

" And beſide the obligations we lie under, by
" treaties with our allies, which are a ſufficient
" juſtification of us, for taking up arms, at this " time, ſince they have called upon us ſo to do, the " many injuries done to us, and to our ſubjects,
" without any reparation, by the French King,
" are ſuch, that (however, of late years, they " were not taken notice of, for reaſons well known
" to the world, nevertheleſs) we will not paſs
" them over, without a public and juſt reſentment
" of ſuch out-rages.

" It is not long ſince the French took licenſes
" from the Engliſh governor of Newfoundland,
" to fiſh in the ſeas on that coaſt, and paid a tribute
" for ſuch licenſes, as an acknowlegment of the " ſole right of the crown of England to that
" iſland, and yet of late, the incroachments of the " French, upon our ſaid iſland, and our ſubjects
" trade and fiſhery, have been more like the inva-
" ſions of an enemy, than becoming friends, who " injoyed the advantages of that trade only by " permiſſion.

" But that the French King ſhould invade our " Caribbe iſlands, and poſſeſs himſelf of our terri-
" tories of the province of New York, and of " Hudſon's-bay, in a hoſtile manner, ſeizing our " forts, burning our ſubjects houſes, and inriching
" his people with the ſpoil of their goods and " merchandizes, detaining ſome of our ſubjects
" under a hardſhip of impriſonment, cauſing others
" to be inhumanly killed, and driving the reſt to
" ſea, in a ſmall veſſel, without food and neceſſa-
" ries to ſupport them, are actions not becoming
" even an enemy: and yet he was ſo far from de-
" claring himſelf ſo, that, at that very time, he " was negociating here in England, by his mini-
" ſters, a treaty of neutrality and good correſ-
" pondence in America.

" The proceedings of the French King againſt
" our ſubjects in Europe are ſo notorious, that
" we ſhall not need to inlarge upon them: his " countenancing the ſeizure of Engliſh ſhips by " French privateers, forbiding the importation of " great part of the product and manufactures of " our kingdom, and impoſing exorbitant cuſtoms
" upon the reſt, notwithſtanding the vaſt advan" tage he and the French nation, reap by their " commerce with England, are ſufficient evidence
" of his deſign to deſtroy the trade, and con-
" ſequently to ruin the navigation, upon which the " wealth and ſafety of this nation very much de" pends.

" The right of the flag, inherent in the crown of " England, has been diſputed by his orders, in " violation of our ſovereignty of the narrow ſeas,
" which in all ages, has been aſſerted by our pre-
" deceſſors, and we are reſolved to maintain,
" for the honor of our crown, and of the Engliſh
" nation.

" But that which moſt nearly touches us is, his
" unchriſtian proſecution of many of our Engliſh
" Proteſtant ſubjects, in France, for matters of " religion, by ſtrange and unuſual cruelties; and
" impriſoning ſome of the maſters and ſeamen of " our merchant-ſhips, and condemning others to
" the gallies, on pretenſe of having on board
" ſome of his own miſerable Proteſtant ſubjects, or " their effects. And laſtly, as he has, for ſome
" years laſt paſt, indeavored, by inſinuation and
" promiſes of aſſiſtance, to overthrow the govern" ment of England; ſo now, by open and violent
" methods, and the actual invaſion of our king-
" dom of Ireland, in ſupporting of our ſubjects
" in arms, and in rebellion againſt us, he is pro-

(1) Some, who did not rightly conſider the unqueſtionable maxim, that the riches of a nation conſiſts in the number of her ſubjects, provided they are imployed either in trade, husbandry, or manufactures, repined at this invitation and incouragement given to foreigners, to ſettle here. They did not conſider of what advantage the incouragement Queen Elizabeth gave the Walloons was to the nation, by the improvements they made in our ſilk and woollen manufactures. They did not reflect that our neighbors, the Dutch, daily increaſed, in wealth and power, by the favor they ſhewed their perſecuted brethren; nor did they foreſee the benefit which has ſince accrued to this kingdom by the great number of wealthy merchants, laborious and induſtrious artificers, and brave and experienced officers and ſoldiers, who have, by this means, been incouraged to ſettle among us, and to become ſubjects of Great Britain.

(2) Tho' this declaration of war was generally approved by all the King's allies abroad, and was agreable in England, to the Whigs and moderate part of the Tories, yet it was as much exclaimed againſt by others who were either miſinformed or diſaffected to the government. They pretended that the injuries ſuppoſed to have been done by the French to the Engliſh, in America, were not perhaps ſo atrocious as repreſented, and that the Engliſh had drawn ſome of them on themſelves, and took ſufficient revenge for the others. And they found pretexts to palliate all the other grievances alleged. They affirmed that the defenſive treaty of March, 13, 1678, renewed in 1685 and 1689, mentioned by King William, only required England to aſſiſt the Dutch with their ſhips and forces, but not to enter into a war, on their account. They put the public in mind of ſeveral injuries the Dutch had done us, particularly, when, ſoon after the peace of Nimeguen, they ſeized a ſhip belonging to our Eaſt-India-Company, which they had lent to the King of Java, and when they drove away the Engliſh factories from Bantam and Maſulipatan, where they had eſtabliſhed a flouriſhing trade. " moting the utter extirpation of our good and loyal " ſubjects in that our kingdom.

" Being, therefore, thus neceſſitated to take up " arms, and relying on the help of almighty GOD, " in our juſt undertaking; we have thought fit to " declare, and do, hereby, declare war againſt " the French King; and that we will, in conjunction " with our allies, vigorouſly proſecute the ſame, " by ſea and land (ſince he hath, ſo unrighteouſly, " begun it) being aſſured of the hearty concur- " rence and aſſiſtance of our ſubjects, in ſupport of " ſo good a cauſe. Hereby willing and requiring " our general of our forces, our commiſſioners for " executing the office of high admiral, our lieu- " tenants of our ſeveral counties, governors of " our forts and garriſons, and all other officers " and ſoldiers under them, by ſea and land, to do " and execute all acts of hoſtility in the proſecution " of this war, againſt the French King, his vaſſals " and ſubjects, and to oppoſe their attempts. Judges conſtituted.

I have already obſerved, in my account of preferments above, that his Majeſty's choice of the judges was highly applauded by every body, it may not be amiſs to mention more particularly, what regard he had to the eſtabliſh'd laws, in reviving the proceedings in the reſpective courts of juſtice, by filling up the vacancies with ſuch perſons, as in the moſt difficult times had boldly aſſerted them, and were eminent for their learning and integrity; which was done the 4th of May. In the court of King's-bench, ſir John Holt was conſtituted lord chief juſtice, and ſir William Dolbin, ſir William Gregory, and Giles Eyres, eſq; juſtices. In the court of common pleas, ſir Henry Pollexfen was made lord chief juſtice, and ſir John Powel, Thomas Rokeby, and Peyton Ventris, eſqs; juſtices. In the court of exchequer, ſir Robert Atkins was appointed lord chief baron, and ſir Edward Nevil, Nicholas Lechmere, and John Turton, eſqs; barons of that court: Henry Wallop, eſq; was made curſitor-baron; and John Trenchard, eſq; chief juſtice of Cheſter. WILLIAM & MARY. An' 1689.

The declaration of war, which the readers has ſeen above, mentions, in general, ſeveral incroachments, depredations and real acts of hoſtility commited by the French, as ſo many provocations, which juſtly induced his Majeſty, at length, to take to arms: and, indeed, it was high time, for near a week before this proclamation was iſſued, an action happen'd, which more effectually began the war, and deſerves our particular notice, I mean the ſea-fight at Bantry-bay, the firſt of May.

His Majeſty was very ſenſible of what importance it would be to have a conſiderable fleet at ſea, to declare his juſt rights, at the begining of his reign; (2) and eſpecially to prevent the French King's ſending the late King James, with a body of his own troops into Ireland: and no preparations had been wanting for this end, which the ſhortneſs of the time would allow.

Sea-fight at Bantry-bay.

The fourteenth of March, his Majeſty appointed admiral Herbert (afterwards earl of Torrington) commander in chief of this fleet, who when he came to Portſmouth, the 20th of the ſame month, found that the ſhips, which were order'd to join him from the eaſt, lay windbound in the Downs. He had received intelligence that King James landed, at Kingſale, in Ireland, the 12th; he, therefore, reſolved to make for that coaſt, with what ſhips he could get together in haſte, hoping to intercept the convoy in its return. He gave orders for the reſt of the fleet to follow him, ſingly, as they could, and not to wait one for the other. When he came beforeCork, (3) the account he had before of King James being landed was confirmed, with the addition, that he had been convoyed over by 22 ſhips from France. He, thereupon, reſolved to proceed firſt off of Breſt, and to range to and fro in the ſoundings, in hopes of meeting thoſe ſhips, which, as he was now informed, were taking in a conſiderable ſupply at Breſt, for the ſervice of King James: but being diſappointed in theſe hopes, he return'd to the Iriſh coaſts, where, on the 29th of April, in the evening, he diſcover'd a fleet of 44 ſail, off of Kingſale, keeping their wind, which made him do ſo likewiſe, all night, to hinder their geting into that port.

(2) As the royal navy of England was greatly increas'd and improv'd in this and the ſucceeding reign, it may not be amiſs to give the readers a ſtate of it, as it ſtood at the revolution, which I cannot do better than from the memoirs of mr. Pepy's, then ſecretary of the admiralty.

The ſtate of the royal navy of England, as it was on the eighteenth of December, 1688, being the day King James withdrew.

The

William & Mary. An' 1689.

The 30th, advice was brought him, that the enemy was gone into Baltimore, whereupon he bore away for that place: but finding no ſign of them there, and judging that they muſt be to the weſtward, he bore away, with the wind eaſterly to cape Clear, and, in the evening, ſaw them ſtanding in for Bantry-bay. He lay off the bay 'till morning, and as ſoon as day broke, ſtood towards them; the men of war being at anchor, and the tranſports (which had carried about 5000 men to Ireland) being at ſome diſtance, plying to the windward. (1)

The enemy, incouraged by their great ſuperiority got under ſail: and when admiral Herbert, not without great difficulty, worked up within two miles of them, they bore down upon him, in a very orderly line, of all the 28 men of war and 5 fire-ſhips. One of them, being within muſquet-ſhot of the defiance, which led the van, Monſ. de Chateau-Renaud put out the ſignal of battle, and they two began the fight, which was continued by the others, as faſt as they came up with one another. The admiral made ſeveral boards, indeavoring by that means, to gain the wind of the enemy, or, at leaſt, to ingage them cloſer than they ſeem'd willing to do: but finding he could not do either, and that it was not adviſeable to maintain ſo unequal a fight, he ſtretch'd off to ſea, not only to get his ſhips into a regular line, but, if poſſible, to gain the wind.

The French were ſo very cautious of bearing down, that the admiral could meet with no opportunity of obtaining his end; ſo that continuing the fight, and battering upon a ſtretch, till about five in the afternoon, the French admiral then tack'd about, and ſtood farther into the bay. Admiral Herbert could not follow them, his own, and ſeveral of the other ſhips having ſuffered ſo much in their maſts and rigging, that not one of them were in a condition for farther action, and it is not to be queſtion'd but the French, on their ſides, received conſiderable damage likewiſe. (2) If, therefore, all circumſtances be duly weigh'd, and particularly that moſt of the Engliſh ſhips were very ill-manned, they came off more fortunately, than could reaſonably have been expected: and it muſt be ſaid, to their honor, that both officers and ſailors behaved with all the courage and vigor, that could be expected from the braveſt men. There were no more than 94 men kill'd, and about 250 or 300 wounded. Captain George Aylmer, of the Portland, and one lieutenant, being the only officers who were kill'd in the action. The ſhips received little or no damage, except what they had in their ſails and rigging. (3)

William & Mary. An' 1689.

This action being over (4) the admiral repaired to his rendezvous, two leagues weſt from Scilly, where he was in hopes of meeting with ſuch an additional force, as might inable him to proceed in ſearch of the French: but being deceiv'd in this his expectation, he returned to Spithead, where I ſhall leave him refiting, and waiting the arrival of the reſt of the fleet to join him (5); and, in the mean time, give an account of the affairs of Ireland: obſerving only previouſly that about or before, this time, moſt of the Princes and Potentates of Europe, acknowleged their Majeſties titles, and congratulated their happy acceſſion to the Imperial crown of England, by their public miniſters: in particular the Emperor by monſieur Hofman; the King of Spain, by don Pedro de Ronquillo; the King of Sweden, by monſieur Leeuenberg; the King of Denmark by meſſieurs, Pleſs and Gerſtorff; the Elector of Brandenburg, by mr. Schmettau; the dukes of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, by baron Van Schutz; the Landgrave of Heſſe-Caſtle by baron Van Goertz, and the States General of the United Provinces by meſſ. Van Engelnburg, Van Witſen, Van Odyck Van, Cittern, and Van Dyckvelt, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves from the reſt, by a moſt magnificent entry.

Moſt of the Princes of Europe acknowledge the King and Queen's titles.

To give a clearer idea of the affairs of Ireland, at this time, it will be neceſſary to premiſe, that the earl of Tyrconnel (whom King James had made deputy, or lord lieutenant) animated with a zeal for his unfortunate maſter, had ſeized the moſt important places of that kingdom for his uſe, and had diſarmed, pillag'd and impriſon'd the chief of the Proteſtants in Munſter, Lemſter and Connaught. (6) This obliged the Engliſh to retire to their brethren

Affairs of Ireland.

(1) Admiral Herbert had, by this time, increas'd the force of his little fleet, to twenty or two and twenty ſail, the enemy had 28 men of war, moſt of them from 60 to upwards of 70 guns, and ſome larger (there being 18 of them, the leaſt whereof was as big as the Elizabeth, in which the Engliſh admiral was) with five fire-ſhips, under the command of monſ. Chateau-Renaud. Lediard's naval hiſtory. Vol. 2 p. 623-4.

(2) How far the French admiral was reſtrain'd by his order is not known: but certain it is, that he made a very little uſe of the great advantages he might have taken: for he had not only the wind, but double the force, conſidering the bulk of his ſhips, and the advantage of having fireſhips. Lediard's naval hiſtory. Vol. 2. p. 624.

(3) As the French aſcribe to themſelves the honor of this day, and rejoicings were made on acconnt of it, in France, it may not be unaceptable to the reader to hear what they ſay of the action. F. Daniel ſays, that the count de Chateau-Renaud, lieutenant-general of the French fleet, was ordered to carry over a conſiderable convoy of proviſions and ammunition, with three thouſand men to Ireland. While he was landing his forces, he received advice, that the Engliſh admiral Herbert, was approaching to attack him, at the head of the Engliſh fleet. The two fleets were pretty near of an equal force, and monſieur de Chateau-Renaud advanced to receive the Engliſh, whom he defeated and follow'd, 'till night gave them an opportunity of eſcaping. After having landed his men he returned to Breſt, where he was welcomed with loud acclamations of joy; having (ſays my author) made a voyage to Ireland and back again, landed his troops, routed the Engliſh fleet, taken ſeven Dutch veſſels, richly laden, on his return, brought back his fleet in as good condition as when he went out of harbor, and all this within the ſpace of eleven or twelve days. A ſhip commanded by the chevalier de Coetlogon was ſet on fire, during the fight, by a cannon-ball, which accidentally fell among the granadoes and a barrel of powder, and part of the ſtem was blown away. De Larrey, in his hiſtory of France, under Lewis XIV, does yet more honor to the French, and pretends their fleet conſiſted of but twelve ſhips of war. He adds, that with this ſmall fleet they defeated the Engliſh admiral with two and twenty ſhips.

(4) When King William received the news of this ſea-fight, he is reported to have ſaid; "That ſuch an action was neceſſary "in the begining of a war, but it would be raſh in the courſe of it."

(5) The King went himſelf a fortnight after this, to Portſmouth, as well to haſten the refittng of the fleet, as to diſtribute rewards to theſe officers and ſoldiers, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ingagement. Admiral Herbert was declared, and ſoon after made earl of Torrington, captain John Aſhby of the Defiance, and captain Cloudeſly Shovel of the Edgar, were knighted, and every ſeaman had a gratuity of ten ſhillings: and beſide this, a bounty was added to the relicts of thoſe who had loſt their lives.

(6) It is a very great queſtion, whether, if proper meaſures had been at firſt taken, Tyrconnel might not eaſily have been induc'd to declare for King William; and thereby the great expenſe of blood and treaſure, which it afterwards coſt to redeem Ireland been ſav'd. As ſoon as the Prince of Orange came to London, the nobility and gentry of Ireland, who were then there, met at the duke of Ormond's houſe, in St. James's-ſquare, and drew up an addreſs to be preſented to his highneſs, together with a draught of the chief ports of that kingdom, humbly praying him to take them into his protection, which the lords and commons of England had before deſir'd. The negoication with colonel Richard Hamilton, who undertook to prevail with the deputy, Tyrconnel, to deliver up the ſword to ſuch perſon as the Prince of Orange ſhould commiſſion to receive it, and the ill advice of the marquis of Hallifax, not to give that commiſſion to the earl of Clarendon, out of a pique to that lord, who would doubtleſs have been moſt acceptable to the people of Ireland, were the two chief obſtacles to the relief of the Proteſtants.—— thren in Ulſter, who declared for King William and Queen Mary, and ſeiz'd the towns of Coleraine, Kilmore, Inniſkillin and Londonderry. King James, in the mean time, having in vain implor'd the aſſiſtance of ſeveral Princes, and finding he had no friend, upon whoſe help he could rely, but the French King, reſolv'd to make his laſt trial, for the recovery of his dominions, in Ireland, with the ſuccors given him by his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty: to which he was, likewiſe, incouraged by Tyrconnel, who ſent baron Rice and the lord Mountjoy, to France, to invite him. (7)

King James lands in Ireland.

Induced by theſe motives, the unhappy Monarch took ſhiping at Breſt, with about 1500 men, who were commanded by experienced French, Scots, and Iriſh officers (having with him a ſmall ſupply of arms, ammunition and mony) and landed ſafely at Kingſale, the 12th of March. He went, the next day, to Cork, with a numerous attendance, and was there received by the earl of Tyrconnel. The 24th, he enter'd triumphantly into Dublin, and having call'd a council, the next morning, diſplaced the earl of Granard, chairman, judge Keating, and others, and put in their rooms, the French embaſſador, count d'Avaux (who attended him as a ſort of ſpy upon his actions) the biſhop of Cheſter, and lieutenant-colonel Dorrington. The reſult of this counſel was iſſuing of five proclamations, by King James's order; viz. 1ſt, "To require all his Pro-

"teſtant ſubjects, who had left the kingdom, to "return, and remain upon the premiſſes, with "aſſurance of his protection, and all his ſubjects, "of what perſuaſion ſo ever, to join him againſt "the Prince of Orange. 2d, To commend his Ro-"man Catholic ſubjects for their vigilance, in "arming themſelves, but requiring all, who were "not actually under pay in the army, to lay up "their arms in their reſpective abodes. 3d, To in-"vite the country to carry proviſions to the army. "4th, To raiſe ſuch money as was current in "Ireland; 5th, for the parliament to meet "at Dublin, the 7th of May." At the ſame time, he created the earl of Tyrconnel duke, and gave the royal regiment, which the duke of Ormond had, to colonel Dorrington.

The firſt of theſe had very little effect, the Proteſtants reſolving to ſtand on their defenſe; and they made a ſhow of oppoſing King James's forces in the field, but were defeated by lieutenant-general Hamilton at Dunmore; upon which the King and Tyrconnel march'd, with near 20,000 men, towards the north, to drive the reſt of them out of the towns they had ſeiz'd, before the Engliſh ſuccors could arrive; which reduced the Proteſtant cauſe in Ireland, to a very deſperate condition.

King James takes Coleraine and Kilmore.

King James having taken Coleraine and Kilmore, after a ſtout reſiſtance, hoped the ſame ſucceſs at Londonderry, towards which place he, therefore, moved with his army. King William had indeed, already ſent captain James Hamilton, with arms and ammunition thither (the latter conſiſting of about 500 barrels of powder, and the former being ſufficient for 2000 men) and named colonel Lundee, to be governor of the place. In the mean time, mr. George Walker, rector of Donaghmore, in the county of Tyrone, had, out of zeal to his religion, raiſed a regiment for the defenſe of it. This gentleman having received intelligence, the 13th of April, that King James was drawing his forces towards London-derry, haſtened thither in perſon to give an account of it, and upon advice of their being advanced to Cledyford, returned to Lyfford, where he joined colonel Crafton. He afterwards, purſuant to the directions given by colonel Lundee, took poſt at the Long-cauſey, which he defended, with great courage, the whole night, 'till, being over-powered with numbers, he was obliged to retreat to Londonderry, where he indeavored, tho' in vain, to prevail on Lundee to take the field; which he might have done, with ſome probability of ſucceſs, before the late King's army was fully formed (8).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

This officer ſoon ſhewed how miſtaken King William had been in his reliance upon him: for notwithſtanding colonel Cunningham, and colonel Richards, were arrived with their regiments, and all other neceſſaries, in the harbor, to reinforce the gariſon, in a council of war, held the 17th, he influenced the reſt of the officers of the council, which was chiefly packed by him, in ſuch manner, that it was reſolved the town was "not tenable, as "well becauſe they had not proviſions for above "eight or ten days, as becauſe the works were "not in a condition to be defended againſt ſo formi-"dable an army as King James had under his "command." This reſolution being taken, he would not ſuffer the two regiments to land, but, notwithſtanding all indeavors that were uſed, by mr. Walker, and others, to perſuade him to continue his government, he abandoned the place; and, leaving the inhabitants, and the Proteſtants who had retired thither, as a place of ſecurity, to ſhift for themſelves, returned thro' Scotland in his way for England; but was there ſecured, and ſent priſoner to London, where he was confined to the Tower, to anſwer for the neglect of duty laid to his charge. Colonel Cunningham and colonel Richards ſailed back with their regiments to England, where, tho' they urged, in their juſtification, that they were inſtructed to obey the orders of colonel Lundee, they were juſtly caſhiered.

Treachery of col. Lundee.

Theſe poor people being thus abandoned, by thoſe whoſe duty it was to have ſupported them, reſolved nevertheleſs, to maintain their town againſt the whole force of King James's army, in which brave reſolution they were greatly ſtrengthened by that bold and reverend divine, mr. George Walker, whom, together with major Baker, an officer of great courage and experience, they choſe their joint governors. The eighteenth, King James appeared before the town, at the head of a powerful army, when the two new governors, having formed the men in the place, who were able to bear arms, into regiments and companies, to the number of 7020, under eight colonels, and 333 other officers, made a briſk Londonderry inveſted by K. James.

Hamilton, inſtead of influencing Tyrconnel to ſubmit to the Prince of Orange, perſuaded him to ſtand out for King James, and accepted of the command of his army of Iriſh Papiſts under him.——By the advices from Ireland, there was ſome reaſon to believe, that Tyrconnel was not at firſt determin'd in that reſolution: for the day after the late King left Rocheſter, in order to go out of England, which he could not then have heard, he held an extraordinary council, in the caſtle of Dublin, to conſult and adviſe of the then cogent affairs, which were debated at that board. Lord chief juſtice Keating, the only Proteſtant judge in the kingdom, ſpeaking in favor of the Prince of Orange, Tyrconnel heard him with patience.——Being preſs'd to follow the fate of England, and ſubmit to that government, he replied haſtily, "What would you have me fling the ſword over the "caſtle walls?" nay he ſeem'd to comply ſo far with the moderate men, that it was agreed by him and them, to ſend perſons to King James in France, to repreſent the impoſſibility of holding out the kingdom of Ireland, and to deſire permiſſion to treat. ——Thus did Tyrconnel diſguiſe his intentions, if he then really deſigned to enter into a war for reſtoring King James. Oldmixon, p. 16.

(7) Their firſt inſtructions were (as I have mention'd above) to deſire leave to treat with the Prince of Orange: but a French ingineer landing at that time, with a meſſage for the deputy, other meaſures were ſoon taken.

(8) Sir Arthur Rawdon, had two or three hundred horſe well mounted, and the lord Kingſton 1000 horſe, and 2500 foot, ready to have joined him, had he appointed any place of rendezvous, without the walls of Derry. Oldmixon, p. 20.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

And beſieg'd.

ſally upon the King's troops, and forced them to retire to St. John's town. (1)

Notwithſtanding this repulſe, the King inveſted it the 20th, and the next day the batteries began to fire. The governors immediately diſpatched mr. Bennet, with an account of their diſtreſs to England, declaring, at the ſame time, that they were reſolved to hold out to the laſt extremity, and intreating a ſpeedy ſuccor.

The 29th the King was obliged to leave the care of this ſiege to his general, to go and meet the parliament he had ſummoned for the 7th of May, at Dublin. This did not, however, hinder the proſecution of it; many were the attacks of the beſiegers, and as many the ſallies made by the beſieged, in both which the latter had generally the advantage: And in this manner was the ſiege continued during the whole month of May. The 4th of June, the beſiegers made a vigorous aſſault on a part of the place which they thought the moſt acceſſible, but met with their uſual ill ſucceſs, and were repulſed with great ſlaughter.

Great diſtreſs of the inhabitants.

In the mean time, the greateſt danger the beſieged ſeemed to be expoſed to, was from thoſe two cruel and raging enemies, ſickneſs and famine; with reſpect to the latter of which eſpecially, their caſe was very deplorable, they being reduced to the neceſſity of eating horſes, dogs, cats, rats, mice, and all manner of vermin, as likewiſe tallow, hides, and in ſhort, the moſt loathſome things that any men, even in their condition, ever made uſe of for ſuſtenance. (2) And to compleat their misfortune, the 20th of June, they loſt one of their brave governors, major Baker, who was ſnatched away by death, when they could leaſt bear the loſs of him. (3) Some days before his death, the French general de Roſe, who was arrived with a commiſſion to command the beſiegers in chief, had threatned them with not only fire and ſword, but the moſt exquiſite torments, if they continued obſtinate, and on the other hand, lieutenant-general Hamilton had ſent them ſome plauſible offers of favorable conditions if they would ſurrender: but they were as little intimidated with one, as worked upon by the other. On the contrary, theſe threats and offers did but ſtrengthen their reſolutions, and prompted them to return ſuch an anſwer as could hardly be expected from men in their deplorable circumſtances (4).

This ſo inraged the French general, that to add, if poſſible, to their miſery, he cauſed all the Proteſtants of the adjacent country, to the number of about 7000, to be drove under their walls, and there left without any ſuſtenance, that they might ſee them periſh before their eyes, or leſſen their own exhauſted ſtores, to relieve them. But even this unheard of cruelty had no effect upon them; they looked upon it with indignation and contempt, and to ſhew their reſolution, cauſed a gallows to be erected in ſight of the beſiegers, and, in their turn, threatned, if they did not immediately ſuffer theſe poor wretches to return to their habitations, they would hang all the priſoners they had taken during the ſiege, giving them leave, at the ſame time, to ſend ſome of their prieſts to prepare them for death, in their own way. The beſiegers ſeemed at firſt reſolved to ſacrifice their friends to their revenge: at length, however, ſeeing the gallows finiſhed, and being aſſured by a letter from the chief of theſe priſoners, that the beſieged were reſolutely bent to execute their purpoſe, the generals ſubmited to the importunities of thoſe who ſollicited in their behalf, and ſuffered the poor half-ſtarved Proteſtants, to return to their homes, the fourth of July (5).

This unparalleled reſolution of the beſieged was, doubtleſs, in ſome meaſure kept up, by a reaſonable proſpect of relief, they having received ſeveral meſſages from major-general Kirk, that he was come to their aſſiſtance, with men, proviſions and arms, and tho' it would be very difficult for him to come to them with his ſhips, becauſe of the enemies batteries, and other works they had made, to ſecure the narrow part of the river, yet when they were reduced to the laſt extremity, he would certainly come to their relief, tho' with the utmoſt hazard of his own perſon, his ſhips and men. (6) To this criſis matters were come at laſt; and the ſcarcity of the moſt vile of eatables was ſo increaſed, that the gariſon was very near reduced to the neceſſity of preying upon one another. Mr. Walker, being apprehenſive, that the reſolution of the gariſon might at length flag, did all that was in his power to ſupport it; he performed with an incomparable preſenſe of mind, the different functions of governor, captain, ſoldier and divine. After a ſally, in which he always diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage and conduct, he would, with all the tranquility imaginable, perform his office in the government, and that done, indeavor, in the pulpit, to inſpire his auditors with that noble ardor which he himſelf poſſeſſed. Thus he, by his own great example, daily animated the gariſon, and preſerved the place till the 30th of July: when, having ſtill a confi-

(1) To attempt to defend a town ill-fortified, with a gariſon of poor people, moſt of them frightned from their own homes, without a ſufficient number of horſe for ſallies, or ingineers to inſtruct them in the neceſſary works, with only twenty ſmall guns ill-mounted, and with not above ten days proviſion, and that againſt a formidable army, commanded by a King implacable and revengeful, who looked upon them as traytors and rebels, was a bold and almoſt unheard of undertaking, which none but men inſpired with an almoſt ſuper-natural zeal and courage, ſpured on by a neceſſity either of vanquiſhing or falling victims to inraged and unmerciful enemies, could ever have ventured upon.

(2) If we may believe F. Daniel, 7000 perſons were famiſhed to death during this ſiege. A noble example of reſolution in a brave people, who could look death in the face, in its moſt ugly form, rather than bow their necks to the yoke of tyranny and oppreſſion.

(3) Upon this officer's being taken ill, and rendered uncapable of doing the duty of a governor, colonel Michelburn, a gentleman who before had been equally zealous with mr. Walker and mr. Baker, in the defenſe of the place, and had advanced ſeveral conſiderable ſums for the uſe of the gariſon, was choſen to aſſiſt mr. Walker, that if one ſhould fall, the place might not be in danger of being without a government, or laid liable to the inconveniencies of a conteſted election.

(4) They unanimouſly reſolved, when all other means of ſuſtenance failed, to eat the Iriſh, and laſtly, one another, rather than ſurrender, and to general Hamilton's offers, they anſwered, "that they very much wondered he ſhould expect they ſhould "place any confidence in him, ſince he had ſo unworthily broke faith with King William, their ſovereign; that he was once "generouſly truſted (by them) tho' an enemy, and yet betrayed his truſt, and that they could not believe he had learned more "ſincerity in an Iriſh camp. Hiſtory of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 65.

(5) This cruelty of the French general turned out, in ſome meaſure, to the advantage of the befieged: for they found means to get rid of about 500 of their uſeleſs people, by thruſting them among the Proteſtants under their walls, who paſſed undiſtinguiſhed with them, and in exchange, got ſome able and ſtout men of their numbers. Hiſt. of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 67.

(6) The major-general had a fleet of tranſports with ſeveral frigats to convoy them, for this purpoſe: but at their arrival near the place, the 9th of June, upon information how difficult the enemy had rendered the paſſage up the river, it was reſolved, in a council of war, to ſtay 'till their forces were augmented, and then, by making a deſcent, indeavor to oblige the enemy to raiſe the ſiege. In the mean time, he went on an expedition to the iſland of Inch, and upon advice of the great diſtreſs the gariſon of Londonderry was in, he returned and made this bold and ſucceſsful attempt for their relief. Lediard's naval hiſtory. Vol. 2. p. 626.

Some however, who conſider major-general Kirk's cruelties in the Weſt, againſt the Engliſh Proteſtants, after the defeat at Sedgmore, can hardly forbear inſinuating, that there was a ſecret treachery in his delaying the relief of London.derry ſo long, and that the courageous and reſolute defenſe of the gariſon, obliging him, at laſt, to do ſomething, it was attempted in ſuch a manner, that it was next to a miracle it ſuceeded.

dence

dence in God, that he would not ſuffer them to fall a prey to their enemies, he as uſual, preached to the gariſon in the cathedral, and indeavored to confirm them in their conſtancy, by reminding them of the many inſtances of providence they had already been witneſſes of, and of what importance it was at this time, to the Proteſtant cauſe; concluding with aſſurances of a ſpeedy relief; which accordingly almoſt immediately followed: for within an hour after his ſermon was ended, the gariſon, to their unſpeakable joy, ſaw the means imployed by general Kirk to effect it. The manner of their deliverance was as follows:

The ſiege raiſed.

The Montjoy of Derry, commanded by captain Browning, and the Phenix of Cloeraine, by captain Douglas, both laden with proviſions, were ſent towards the town, under convoy of the Dartmouth frigat, commanded by captain Leake. They were obliged to ſtand a furious fire of the enemy from Kilmore-caſtle, and from the batteries on both ſides of the river, which they received and returned with the greateſt bravery imaginable. The Montjoy made a little ſtop at the boom, occaſioned by her rebound, after ſtriking and breaking it, ſo that ſhe was ran a-ground. Upon this the enemy gave a loud and joyful ſhout (tho' a dreadful one to the beſieged) fired all their guns upon her, and were preparing their boats to board her. The trouble and concern of the beſieged, to ſee their laſt hopes diſappointed, is not to be expreſſed; but by a great providence, firing a broad-ſide, the ſhock looſened the ſhip ſo, that ſhe got clear and paſſed the boom. Captain Douglas was ingaged all this while, and the Dartmouth gave the enemy very warm entertainment, 'till at length the three ſhips, having overcome the great difficulty of breaking and paſſing the boom, got up to the city, to the inexpreſſible joy and tranſport of a gariſon, which reckoned but upon two days life, having nothing left but nine lean horſes, and a pint of meal to each man.

The beſiegers ſeing the ſucceſs of this brave attempt, and that now a communication was open between the town and the ſuccors brought to its relief, under major-general Kirk, were ſo diſcouraged, that the very next day, being the laſt of July, they prepared to be gone, and, the night following, raiſed the ſiege, with great confuſion, and in their retreat, ravaged the country in a terrible manner.

When major-general Kirk came to Londonderry in perſon, mr. Walker made him an offer of his regiment, "that after having done the King all "the ſervice in his power, he might return to his "own profeſſion": but the major-general deſiring him to diſpoſe of it himſelf, he gave it to captain White, a gentleman of valor and merit. He was afterwards prevailed upon by a council held at Derry, to imbark for England, to carry an addreſs of thanks to their Majeſties, who upon his arrival gave him a reception and reward equal to his extraordinary ſervices. (1)

Succeſs of the Iniſkillin men.

Having now done juſtice to the reſolution and courage of the inhabitants and gariſon of Londonderry, I think myſelf no leſs obliged to render the ſame to the men of Iniſkillin, a town in the north of Ireland, who having dared to aſſert the Proteſtant cauſe, and to proclaim King William and Queen Mary, were ſummoned by the lord Galmoy, to ſurrender their town to him for the uſe of King James; but their ſteady reſolution detered him from attempting any thing againſt them; and he having attacked the caſtle of Crom, at about ſixteen miles diſtance from them, poſſeſſed by Proteſtants, they not only found means to re-inforce the gariſon but obliged him to raiſe the ſiege, and retreat to Belturbat. The 24th of April, a detachment of their gariſon, with lieutenant colonel Lloyd at their head, made an excurſion into the enemy's country, took and demoliſhed the caſtle of Anghor, and returned home with a conſiderable booty. They had ſeveral other ſkirmiſhes and rencounters with the enemy, in which they ſignalized their valor, and always came off with ſucceſs. They, likewiſe, did good ſervice during the ſiege of Londonderry, by haraſſing the beſiegers, and cuting off their convoys: but of all their actions, none was ſo remarkable, as that which happened, the very ſame day that Londonderry was relieved; in which 2000 Iniſkilliners, under the command of col. Berry, fought and routed 6000 Iriſh, at a place called Newton-Butler: and what with the number killed by them, and thoſe who were knocked on the head by the country-people, the enemy loſt at leaſt 4000 men, with their cannon, and moſt of their ſurviving officers, who were taken priſoners: among the latter was major-general Mackarty, who was ſhot thro' the thigh, and run into the back: all this was performed with the loſs of only 20 men killed, and 50 wounded. About two months after, 1000 of theſe brave men, under the command of colonel Lloyd, routed 5000 Iriſh, of whom they killed 700 and took Kelly, their commander, and forty other officers priſoners, with a great booty of cattle, and this with the loſs of a very few men only.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

Procedings of the parliament in Ireland.

The Iriſh parliament, met at Dublin, purſuant to King James's proclamation, the 7th of May, and was opened by a ſpeech, in which he told them:

"That the exemplary loyalty they had ſhewn, "at a time, when the reſt of his ſubjects behaved "themſelves ſo undutifully, or betrayed him, had "made him reſolve to come and venture his life "with them, in defenſe of their liberties, and his "own rights: that to his great ſatisfaction, he had "not only found them ready to ſerve him, but that "their courage had equalled their zeal: that he had "always been for liberty of conſcience, and againſt "invading any man's right or liberty, and nothing "ſhould perſuade him to change his mind: he "deſigned wherever he was maſter to eſtabliſh it by "law, and to have no other teſt or diſtinction, but "that of loyalty, in which Chriſtian work he hoped "for their concurrence; and he ſhould readily "conſent to ſuch other laws as might be for the "good of the nation, and the improvement of "trade, recommending to them the regulating the "act of ſettlement: and as he ſhould do his part to "make them happy and rich, he made no doubt of "their aſſiſtance to inable him to oppoſe the unjuſt "deſigns of his enemies; and to incourage them "the more in it, he informed them, that the French "King had imbraced his intereſt, and furniſhed "him with ſupplies of all kinds, and that at a time "when he had many conſiderable enemies to con-"tend with; concluding, as he begun, that he was "ſenſible of their ſignal loyalty, and that he ſhould "make it his chief ſtudy, as he had always done, "to make them and all his ſubjects happy."

His Majeſty being withdrawn, two addreſſes were fram'd; one to return his Majeſty thanks for his moſt gracious ſpeech, and another deſiring count d'Avaux to thank the French King for the aſſiſtance he had afforded them. This done, a bill was brought in, containing a recognition of the King's title, and an abhorence of the Prince of Orange's

(1) He received, beſide, the thanks of the houſe of commons, and was deſired, in the name of that houſe, to thank all thoſe who had ſerved under him, in the defenſe of Londonderry. They alſo addreſſed the King that 10,000 l. might be diſtributed, among the widows and orphans of ſuch, as were ſlain or died in that ſiege: and the univerſity of Oxford preſented mr. Walker with a doctor's degree.

uſurpation, usurpation, and of the defection of the Engliſh nation. The next day, King James publiſh'd a declaration, addreſs'd to all his loving ſubjects, in the kingdom of England, in which, "after having "highly extoll'd his many acts of favor and lenity to his Proteſtants ſubjects in Ireland, as an "earneſt of what he deſign'd to do in England, he "promiſed pardon to all thoſe, who, in 24 days "after his appearance in perſon amongſt them, "ſhould return to their duty."

Act of ſettlement repealed.

The 12th of May a bill was brought in, for repealing the act of ſettlement, which having been made for the ſecurity of the Proteſtants, and to depreſs the Popiſh intereſts, both houſes, in which there were a great majority of Roman Catholics, very readily paſs'd it, notwithſtanding, in the upper houſe, the biſhop of Meath argued very long and learnedly againſt it.

Act of attainder paſſed.

But this was nothing to the fatal blow deſign'd, at leaſt, to be given to the Proteſtants, by a bill of attainder: in order to make this bill effectual, and to ſtrike at the root, every member of the houſe of commons return'd the names of all ſuch Proteſtant noblemen and gentlemen as lived near them, or in the county or borough for which they ſerved. By this black act, were attainted "2 archbiſhops, 1 "duke, 17 earls, 7 counteſſes, 28 viſcounts, 2 "viſcounteſſes, 7 biſhops, 18 barons, 33 baronets, "51 knights, 83 clergymen, 2182, eſquires and "gentlemen; and all of them, unheard, declar'd "traytors, and adjudg'd to ſuffer death, and the "forfeiture of their eſtates (1)."

To ſooth this act, at leaſt in pretext, another for liberty of conſcience paſs'd ſoon after, which left the heirs of thoſe whoſe eſtates were forfeited, the injoyment of their religion, if they had virtue enough to bear with penury and want for the ſake of it. Having paſs'd ſome other acts, the 20th of July, King James thought fit to prorogue this parliament (whoſe proceedings occaſion'd no leſs diſturbance in the kingdom of Ireland, than the war it ſelf) to the 12th of January inſuing.

The parliament of Ireland prorogued.

Impolitic behavior of K. James.

King James, all this while, inſtead of ſtudying to heal the breaches his unwary conduct had made, ſeem'd rather wholly bent to widen them; he gave himſelf intirely up to thoſe deſpotic methods, which were ſuggeſted to him by the French embaſſador, who rul'd his council at will, and the reſt of his evil adviſers, and thereby loſt ground daily among thoſe who had remained true to him, in hopes, as any reaſonable man would have done, that his paſt misfortunes would have induced him to alter his conduct. I ſhall give an inſtance or two of his impolitic as well as unjuſt behavior, and then return to the parliament of England. And firſt with reſpect to the univerſity of Dublin; it was not enough, that Tyrconnel had ſtop'd the maintenance of it, King James ſoon after his arrival, proceeded farther againſt the vice-preſident, fellows and ſcholars, and turn'd them out, ſeiz'd their furniture, library and communion-plate, and took away every thing that belong'd to the college, and to the private fellows and ſcholars: and all this notwithſtanding his promiſe to them (2) when they waited upon him, at his firſt coming into that city. A gariſon was put into their houſe, their chapel was turned into a magazine, and their chambers into priſons for Proteſtants; More, a Popiſh prieſt, was made provoſt, and Mackartey another, library-keeper; and, in ſhort, the whole was deſign'd for them and their brethren. But it was not the univerſity of Dublin alone, in Ireland, that felt the weight of King James's indignation; it was leveled in general againſt the Proteſtant religion, and more particularly the church of England. One archbiſhopric, ſeveral biſhoprics, and a great many other dignities and livings of the church were deſignedly kept vacant, and the revenue firſt paid into the exchequer, and afterwards diſpos'd of to titular biſhops and prieſts, while, in the mean time, the cures lay neglected, ſo that it appear'd plainly, the deſign was to deſtroy the ſucceſſion of the Proteſtant clergy. I now return to the parliament of England.

With regard to the univerſity of Dublin.

And the Proteſtants in general.

Proceedings of the parliament of England.

The commons having voted the yearly ſum 1,200,000 l. for the ſupport of the crown, and 600,000 l. for the maintenance of the forces to be imployed in the reduction of Ireland, the next thing they did was to prepare a poll-bill, which having paſs'd both houſes, was preſented, on the 1ſt of May, for the royal aſſent, by their ſpeaker, who, upon that occaſion, made the following remarkable ſpeech to his Majeſty:

An act for poll-mony paſſed.

A remarkable ſpeech.

"The commons aſſembled in this preſent parliament, have taken into their moſt ſerious conſideration the deplorable condition of Ireland, where "thoſe fatal councils, that did ſo long govern the "affairs of theſe kingdoms, have ſo far prevailed, "that your arms and gariſons there have been "taken from your Proteſtant ſubjects and put into "the hands of Iriſh Papiſts, and the Engliſh Proteſtants that remain there, left naked and defenſeleſs, in the power of thoſe enemies, which yet "never ſhewed them any mercy, when they had "them at an advantage.

"Nor is it the ſtrength of the Iriſh natives only, "animated with the zeal for Popery, and a longing deſire to free themſelves from any dependency upon the crown of England, that is likely "to create your Majeſty an oppoſition there, but "they have likewiſe caſt them under the protection "of the French King, who will, without doubt, "imploy that force with which of late years, he "has over-awed Europe, to ſupport thoſe your rebellious ſubjects, thereby if poſſible, to give your "Majeſty a diverſion from oppoſing, in other "parts of the world, his ambitious deſigns of an "univerſal Monarchy.

"The commons, therefore, ſeing ſo evident a "neceſſity of reducing that kingdom, under your "Majeſty's obedience, and the great expenſe your "Majeſty muſt undergo, in maintaining ſuch a "war, do now humbly preſent to your Majeſty "their hearty aſſiſtance in a poll-bill, which they "look upon as the moſt ſpeedy and effectual way "of raiſing ready money, on this occaſion, ſolemnly "ingaging themſelves to ſupply your Majeſty with "ſuch future aids, as may be proportionable to "the charge of the war, as long as it ſhall continue."

This ſupply being afterwards found not ſufficient, an additional poll-bill was brought in to anſwer the preſent emergencies, the commons paſſed an additional act to the former act for raiſing money by poll, which being ſent up to the lords, for their concurence, their lordſhips added, on the ninth of May, a clauſe to it, "for rating and

(2) He was pleas'd to promiſe them, that he would preſerve them in their liberties and properties, and rather augment than diminiſh their privileges and immunities, which had been granted them by his predeceſſors. Welwood's memoirs, p. 235.

"taxing

William & Mary. An' 1689.

" taxing the peers, by commoners of their own " naming, appointing a collector to receive the " rates and taxes of the peers, and freeing their " persons from imprisonment." To this clause the commons disagreed;

1. " Because the bill in question taxed the commons only;

2. " Because the poll-bill, already passed, had " sufficiently provided for taxing all the nobility, " to which the lords had consented."

The peers, however, insisted on their clause, and alleged:

1. " That it is the common course of parliaments " to pass explanatory acts, if any thing has been " omited, or ill expressed, in any other act passed " in the same session, which was the present case.

2. " That the house of commons had in this bill " taken care of the serjeants-inn, and the inns of " court and chancery, that they should be rated by " their own members, and that since there is no " comparison to be made between them and the " peers of England, therefore the peers ought " to be rated by none but those who are of their " own house.

3. " That the house of peers, out of extraordinary " nary zeal for the reducing of Ireland, the poll- " bill coming up so late to them from the house of " commons, that they had not so much time to " deliberate upon every part of it, as had been " necessary, if so pressing an occasion would have " allowed it, did make this omission, which for " that reason only, ought not to turn to their pre- " judice, it being their undoubted right, which " had been preserved in all former poll-bills, and " particularly in the last, which passed in the 29th " year of King Charles II, the proviso in that bill " being conceived in the same form which the clause " was offered by their lordships." To these reasons the commons answered; " that the admiting " their lordships amendment would, in a manner, " repeal the bill for the tax, and therefore they per- " sisted in their disagreement to it."

But dropp'd.

The peers being, however, positive, in adhering to their clause, the commons let drop the additional act, and instead thereof, made and passed a bill, for a grant to their Majesties, of an aid of twelve pence in the pound for one year, for the necessary defense of their realms, to which the lords having given their concurence, it was presented to the King on the 22d of July, by the house of commons, and accompanied with the following speech to his Majesty, by their speaker: (1)

A land tax granted.

Speech on that occasion.

" The commons in this present parliament assembled do, with all duty and humility, acknowlege " your Majesty's great care for the protection of " the people, in that your Majesty hath made it " one of the first acts of your reign to declare war " against the French King, and to seek reparation " for the losses and injuries your subjects have sustained from that nation.

" If we consider the ballance of trade between " the two kingdoms, we shall find the French " King, of late years, continually loading the Eng- " lish manufactures with new duties and impositions, thereby prohibiting in effect all commerce " in his dominions, but for ready money.

" If we consider our laws and liberties, he hath " always assisted and incouraged those who de- " signed their subversion. If we consider our " religion, the miseries he hath inflicted upon his " own subjects of the same profession, do sufficiently demonstrate how great an enemy he is to " ours, and whoever looks upon the present state " of Europe, and sees the injuries made upon your " Majesty's allies, the horrible devastations of their " countries, and the open supporting your Majesty's " rebellious subjects, must needs confess that the " war, which your Majesty has declared against " France, is, at this time, not only just, but " necessary.

" To this war, as your dutiful and loyal com- " mons did humbly offer their advice and assistance, " before your Majesty entred into it, so they are " now come to present your Majesty with a supply " towards the carrying it on, humbly desiring your " Majesty to rest assured, that they shall never be " wanting to expose both their lives and estates, in " defense of your Majesty, against all your enemies."

Having thus given an account of what happened at passing the mony-bills, I must go back a little to see what was done in parliament about other affairs of importance, and first of the act of indemnity. (2) The very first step the commons made in this bill seemed, in a great measure, to destroy the hopes of impunity which a great many had conceived from it: for in a committee of the whole house, it was resolved, on the 23d of May, " that " for the safety, settlement and welfare of the nation, " for the future, and vindication of public justice, " some persons might justly be excepted out of it". What sort of persons these were, whom the commons intended, at least, to exclude from the benefit of this act, it will be necessary for the reader to know, in order to shew the motive to some future proceedings of this parliament, which I shall mention below; and the sense of the house of commons in particular at this time: and as they were excepted in general by the crimes laid to their charge, and not by name, I shall proceed in the same manner; their design being to leave the decision of who were, or who were not guilty, to future examination. These crimes were:

Act of indemnity.

Persons design'd to be exempted.

1. " For the asserting, advising, and promoting " of the dispensing power, and suspense of laws, " and executing of laws, without consent of parlia- " ment, and the acting in pursuance of that dispensing power.

2. " For the commitment of the seven bishops, " and prosecuting of them.

3. " For advising, promoting, and executing " the late commission for eccleſiastical causes.

4. For advising the levying-mony, and collecting " it, for the use of the crown, by pretense of pre- " rogative, for other time, and in other manner, " than granted by parliament.

5. " For advising the raising and keeping a " standing army in time of peace, without consent " of parliament, and quartering of soldiers.

6. " For advising, procuring, contriving, alter- " ing and subverting corporations, and procuring " new charters, and violating the rights and free- " dom of elections to parliament, in counties, cities,

(1) Many, who were friends to the then government, were so hearty in their affections to it, that when this pound-tax came to be levied, they gave in to the assessors, the value of their estates to the full, expecting to have the business over in a year or two, but that value was continued in all future assessments, during both the French wars, except where the proprietors swore it off, by the falling of the rents. And thus those of King William's subjects, who were most zealous for his service, were sufferers by their too forward zeal, while the disaffected were probably not so just and conscientious, in the payments of this tax. Oldmix. p. 11.

(2) This act occasioned great obstructions in passing the mony-bills, for the discontented party (consisting chiefly of those whose compliance with the despotic proceedings of the foregoing reigns, made them liable to the censure of the present government) were justly apprehensive, that as soon as the supplies were provided for, this act, tho' recommended by the King, might be laid aside, and therefore used all their indeavors to have this passed first, and to impede the other, 'till they were assured, by the contrary party, that the said act should speedily be brought into form, to their satisfaction; tho' we shall see it did not pass till the next session.

" corporations, boroughs and ports, and queſtion-
" ing the proceedings of parliament, out of parlia" ment, by declarations, informations, or otherwiſe.

7. " For undue conſtructions of law, and undue
" and illegal proſecutions and proceedings in capital
" caſes.

8. " For undue return of jurors, and other ille" gal proceedings, in civil cauſes.

9. " For the requiring exceſſive bail, impoſing
" exceſſive fines, giving exceſſive damages, and
" uſing undue means for levying ſuch fines and " damages, and inflicting cruel and unuſual pu-
" niſhments; and;

" Laſtly, for adviſing King Charles II, and
" King James II, that parliaments need not be " called, according to the ſtatutes."

By theſe heads of exceptions, if they had paſs'd into an act, a great many members, of both houſes of parliament, and others, would have run a great hazard of being excluded the benefit of it. (1)

The intent of the houſe of commons therein.

What the intent of the houſe of commons was, in making theſe exceptions, is evident by their immediate proceedings: for, the very ſame day, major Wildman reported, from the committee appointed, in relation to the priſoners in the Tower: " that " having inſpected and examined the accounts of " mr. Burton and mr. Graham, who had been " commited ſome time before, they found, that
" the ſaid Burton and Graham, from the year
" 1679 to the year 1688, had received 48,000 l.
" out of the exchequer, which they alleged to have " paid to witneſſes, jurors, ſollicitors, council,
" and to themſelves and other perſons, in their
" proſecutions of indictments, informations and
" trials of perſons, in capital, and other pretended
" criminal caſes, and in Quo Warranto's againſt cor-
" porations, and other proceedings, in the name,
" and on behalf of the late King. That there
" were ſeveral witneſſes concuring with theſe ac-
" counts, to make it manifeſt, that the ſaid Graham
" and Burton were inſtrumental in moſt or all the " illegal proſecutions for the taking away the lives
" and eſtates of thoſe who had ſuffered the loſs of " either, within eight years laſt paſt. And that " they had, by their malicious indictments, in-
" formations, and proſecutions of Quo warranto's,
" openly indeavored the ſubverſion of the Pro-
" teſtant religion, and the government of the realm,
" and waſted many thouſand pounds of the public
" revenue, in their undue proſecutions and ſollici-
" tations. (2)

Attainders reverſed.

And tho' the bill of indemnity, as I have already obſerved, did not paſs with the exceptions I have mention'd above, nor come up to the houſe of lords, by what fate, I ſhall not determine, yet that houſe, if it had come to them, ſeem'd to be much the ſame way inclined: for it having been thought neceſſary, in order to juſtify the preſent ſettlement, to animadvert upon the irregular proceedings of the foregoing reigns, and more eſpecially thoſe of the corrupt judges in Weſtminſter-hall, bills were brought into the houſe of peers to reverſe and annul the attainder of the lord Ruſſel, Alicia Liſle, and Algernon Sidney, which, being beſide recommended from the King, paſs'd both houſes with great unanimity.

The earl of Devonſhire's caſe examined into.

A committee of privileges having been, likewiſe, appointed by the houſe of peers, and having examined the caſe of the earl of Devonſhire, their lordſhips reported their opinion, which was: " that the " proceedings againſt the ſaid earl, in the court of " King's-bench, in Eaſter-term, in the third year
" of King James II, upon an information of an
" aſſault upon mr. Culpepper, wherein his lord-
" ſhip's plea of privilege of parliament was over-
" ruled, and he was fined 30,000 l. and thereupon
" committed to the King's-bench, in execution,
" was a great violation of the privileges of the peers
" of England; and likewiſe, that thoſe judges,
" who ſat in the ſaid court, when the ſaid judg-
" ments were given, and the ſaid commitment
" made, ſhould be required to attend at the bar of " this houſe, to anſwer for the great offenſe, which
" they commited thereby."

Proceedings thereupon.

The lords hereupon ordered, that ſir Robert Wright (who, upon the withdrawing of King James, had been commited to Newgate) ſir Richard Holloway, mr. Bradbury, mr. Petyt, and mr. juſtice Powel, ſhould attend their houſe the ſixth of May, which they did accordingly. When the deputy of the clerk of the crown-office, in the King's-bench, having publicly read the record relating to the earl of Devonſhire's caſe, and the judges being aſked what they had to ſay for themſelves, they only made ſome frivilous excuſes, and aſked the earl pardon: wherefore, upon full conſideration of the ſeveral caſes and precedents, wherein the privileges of the peers have been concerned, the lords ſpiritual and temporal did declare and adjudge; " that " the court of King's-bench, in over-ruling the " earl of Devonſhire's plea of privilege of par" liament, and forcing him to plead over in chief,
" it being within the uſual time of privilege, did
" thereby commit a manifeſt breach of privilege;
" and that the fine of 30,000 l. impoſed by the court
" of King's-bench upon the ſaid earl, was exceſſive
" and exorbitant, and againſt Magna Charta, the " common right of the ſubject, and the law of the " land, and that no peer of this realm, at any time,
" ought to be commited for the non-payment of a
" fine to the King."

Report about forfeitures, &c.

The houſe of commons, having, about this time, appointed a committee to make an eſtimate of forfeitures, ground rents, and additional exciſe, in order to raiſe farther aids to carry on the war, on the 15th of May, mr. Papillon reported, from that committee, " that as to forfeitures, the committee " had peruſed the liſts delivered in by the members

That as to the additional exciſe, it " was the opinion of the committee, that nine " pence per barrel might produce 120,000 l. per " ann. but that, as to the ground-rents, the com- " mittee as yet could not find out means to come to " any probable grounds to make an eſtimate, but " they were indeavoring it, and in a fair way " towards it."

Proceedings concerning Titus Oates.

About this time, the famous (or as ſome will rather have it, infamous) Titus Oates took the opportunity of the favorable diſpoſition both houſes were in, to juſtify his pretended veracity, in his informations relating to the Popiſh plot, and was very buſy to that end, at Weſtminſter and Whitehall. The 31ſt of May, it was moved in the houſe of lords, to reverſe two judgments given againſt him for perjury, for which he had brought his writs of error; but the lords, after having heard the opinions of all the judges, inſtead of reverſing them, thought fit to confirm them, againſt which thirteen lords entered their diſſents. The matter, did not however reſt there; a bill paſſed in his favor in the houſe of commons, to which the lords made ſome amendments, and a proviſo, againſt which ſeveral lords likewiſe entered a diſſent. The bill, with the amendments, being paſſed, and ſent to the commons, that houſe diſagreed to the amendments, and the lords inſiſting upon them, a free conference was held concerning them, the 29th of July (1) in which the matter was long and learnedly debated, on both ſides. The reſult of this memorable conference was, that the commons ſtifly rejected the amendments and proviſo, and that the lords firmly adhered to both, with which they acquainted the lower houſe, the 31ſt of July. The commons, offended at this meſſage, demanded a conference with the lords, for ſettling the method of proceedings between the two houſes, upon conferences and free conferences, and appointed a committee to draw up reaſons to be offered to the lords. The heats between the two houſes, about this matter, were like to increaſe to a dangerous height, when they were happily extinguiſhed by a ſudden adjournment of the parliament: ſo that all Oates was able to obtain, in this ſeſſion, was only an addreſs from the lords, at the deſire of the commons, in which they requeſted his Majeſty; " that whereas Titus Oates, clerk, " had already undergone a ſevere puniſhment, for " the perjury, whereof he had been formerly con- " victed, and ſome of the ſaid puniſhments would " ſtill be continued upon him, unleſs they ſhould " be remited by his Majeſty, he would be pleaſed " to grant his pardon to the ſaid Oates." The King not only readily complied with this deſire of the lords, but as ſoon as he was diſcharged from his confinement, received him into his protection, and granted a penſion of 300 l. per ann. for his own and his wife's life, and the life of the ſurvivor, which they injoyed accordingly.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

And Mr. Johnſon.

The affair of mr. Johnſon met with better ſucceſs in parliament, for his trials and ſufferings being reported to the houſe of commons, they gave an inſtruction to the committee appointed to draw the bill for reverſing the judgment, to declare the proceedings in the eccleſiaſtical court againſt him, as to his degradation, void; and reſolved that he be recommended to his Majeſty for preferment.

Bill of right and liberties.

I muſt now go back again to ſome other parliamentary affairs, which were tranſacting in the mean time. The 9th of May, the commons ſent up a bill to the lords, " for declaring the rights and liber- " ties of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of " the crown". Their lordſhips upon reading this bill, thought the latter part of it defective, no mention being made in it of the Princeſs Sophia, they therefore, among other amendments, added a proviſo in her highneſs's favor. The bill being returned to the commons, with theſe amendments, the 25th, that houſe diſagreed to their lordſhips proviſo, it being alleged, by ſome members, " that the par- " liament of England never determined the ſucceſſion " beyond two or three perſons; that mentioning " the houſe of Hanover would give a handle to " foreigners to intermedle too far in our affairs; " and that before the crown ſhould devolve on the " Princeſs Sophia, it was poſſible, that ſome of " the Catholic Princes, who were to be excluded " by this bill, might turn Proteſtants."

Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover propoſed.

Oppoſed by the commons.

The lords, however, inſiſted ſtrenuouſly on their clauſe, and on the 15th of July, alleged:

Arguments of the lords, for it.

1. " That tho' in the inſtrument offered the " King and Queen, the limitation went no farther " than to their perſons; yet in a law, which has " reſpect in all ſucceeding ages, and that ſettles for " ever the liberties of the ſubjects, they thought it " reaſonable to carry the limitation of the ſucceſſion " of the crown farther than was neceſſary in that " inſtrument in which the crown was offered their " Majeſties, and that had no other view, but " of the ſucceſſion to their poſterity.

2. " That they could ſee no danger, nor any ill " conſequences, that might follow a farther limi- " tation, but very much to the contrary: becauſe this " clauſe would effectually ſecure the nation from " the danger of ever having any Papiſt, or pre- " tended Proteſtant, tho' concealed Papiſt, to " ever reign in it; and becauſe it was the in- " tereſt of England, at that time, to do right to " the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, by limiting " the ſucceſſion, according to the proviſo, eſpeci- " ally as it had been once propoſed, ſince, ſhould " it be now laid aſide, it would have the appearance " of an excluſion, which might be of fatal conſe- " quence." (2)

The birth of the duke of Gloceſter ends the diſpute.

Theſe reaſons were delivered to the commons, and ſeveral conferences were thereupon held between the two houſes, but without effect: when Heaven interpoſed, and put an end to the diſpute, by bleſſing her Royal Highneſs, the Princeſs of Denmark, with a ſon. He was born the 24th of July, and baptiſed three days after by the name of William, his Majeſty, at the ſame time, confering the title of duke of Gloceſter, on the royal infant.

(1) The managers for the houſe of commons opened the debate by ſaying; " That they looked upon that bill not to be " the buſineſs of a particular man, but of every ſubject in England, with regard to his perſon and eſtate, and that the honor " of parliaments, public juſtice, and the Proteſtant religion were concerned in it, as well as the integrity of King Charles II " and his privy-council, and that the amendments made by the lords, if agreed to, would make that bill of great prejudice to " the ſubject, inſtead of anſwering the ends which were intended by the commons.

(2) The King, who was very earneſt to have the bill paſs with this clauſe, did what he could to influence the commons to a compliance with the lords, and to this end, declared in council, that as well the Queen, as the Prince and Princeſs of Denmark, concurred with him, in their deſires for it.

Some

Some days after, it was propoſed in the houſe of commons, to increaſe her Royal Highneſs's revenue from 30,000 l. to 70,000 l. per ann. which motion, however reaſonable, was rejected: and, about the ſame time, a motion was made for an addreſs, to deſire his Majeſty to remove from his preſenſe and councils, ſuch as had been impeached by parliament, and had betrayed the liberties of the ſubject. (1) This matter was debated with great warmth, and had probably been carried that day, had not thoſe who were for it at firſt cooled on a ſudden. The ſame motion was made again, the next day, and was ſtrongly ſupported, but the oppoſite party inſiſting upon their naming the perſons, and no body caring to do that, the motion fell. (2)

Motion for an addreſs to remove ſome perſons from his Majeſty's council.

Drop'd.

Several acts paſſed.

The 11th of May the King came to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to a bill for diſarming Papiſts, and to ſome others. The 24th, his Majeſty came again to the houſe, and gave his aſſent to an act for exempting his Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects, diſſenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws, commonly call'd, "the "act of toleration," whereby the act of uniformity were repeal'd, as far as they related to the Diſſenters; and on the 28th, another act paſs'd, for ſuſpending the Habeas-corpus act, the former being expired.

The 4th of June, after reading the exceptions to the bill of indemnity, a reſolution paſs'd, in the houſe of commons, "that the King's pardon was not pleadable in bar to an impeachment." The ſame day, that houſe appointed a committee to inquire into the delays uſed in ſending the ſuccors to Ireland, and into the miſcarriages, that render'd thoſe ſuccors ineffectual.

Reſolutions againſt the Papiſts.

The 15th, the lords, in a grand committee, having conſider'd the ſtate and condition of the nation, and what means were moſt proper to prevent the deſigns of the Papiſts, and curb the power of the French King, reſolved to addreſs his Majeſty, to put the iſles of Wight, Jerſey, and Guernſey, Scilly, Dover-caſtle, and other places, which were moſt expos'd to the enemy, into a poſture of defenſe; that all Papiſts might be diſarm'd, their horſes taken from them, and they not be permited to travel above five miles from their own habitations, and that care might be taken to prevent Proteſtants from owning or concealing horſes belonging to Papiſts: and a committee was, accordingly, appointed to prepare this addreſs.

Miſcarriages of Ireland inquired into.

The ſame committee was impower'd to look into the miſcarriages in Ireland, and to ſend for perſons and papers for their information: but they having acquainted the houſe, that they could not come to a full diſcovery of theſe miſcarriages, without a ſight of the minute-books of the committee for Iriſh affairs, to the 1ſt of May laſt, the lords ordered another addreſs to be preſented to the King, deſiring, that the ſaid minute-book might be communicated to the committee. This being preſented, the 18th of June, his Majeſty coldly anſwer'd, "he would conſider of it," which obſtructed the proceedings of the committee for almoſt a month. His Majeſty, however, bethought himſelf at length, and, on the 16th of July, ordered the earl of Nottingham to acquaint the lords, and mr. Comptroller the commons, that he gave leave for a committee of the former to inſpect that book, according to their deſires. (3) But this not proving ſufficient neither, the earls of Shrewſbury and Nottingham were ordered, the 29th, to make farther application to his Majeſty, that he would be pleas'd to give order, that the minutes in relation to Ireland, from the time his Majeſty took the adminiſtration of the government upon him, to the time the council-books were open'd, might be communicated to the committee: but the King anſwer'd, "that there "were no minutes of the Iriſh affairs, in the time "mention'd by their lordſhips.

Some time before this, ſeveral letters from King James, ſome of which were ſign'd with his own hand, directed to ſeveral perſons in town and country, were intercepted at Liverpool, and being ſent to court, were, by his Majeſty's orders, laid before the parliament. By ſeveral enigmatical expreſſions they contain'd, and among others, this, "That cer-"tain countraband goods were ready to be ſhip'd off, "in order to be run into ſuch places, where they "might not be ſeiz'd by cuſtom-houſe officers," it ſufficiently appear'd, that there was a deſign of an invaſion. Mr. Hamden happening to be, at the ſame time, chairman of the committee of the whole houſe, took that opportunity to repreſent the apparent danger with which the nation was threatned, and the difficulties the King lay under in preventing it, for want of money, and, to conclude, moved for a farther ſupply.

Letters from K. James intercepted.

Mr. Hamden being a privy-counſellor, this motion from him, eſpecially ſo near the end of the ſeſſion, was thought very much out of the way, and indeed, it was not back'd by any one, and ſo of courſe fell. (4) However the houſe took the intercepted letters into conſideration, and reſolv'd upon an addreſs to his Majeſty, to ſecure all the Papiſts of note, and to diſarm and take away the horſes from the reſt, and as a farther conſequence of this matter, a bill for attainting ſeveral perſons in rebellion againſt their Majeſties was brought in. (5).

Farther reſolutions againſt Papiſts.

(1) Tho' no body was nam'd, yet it was eaſy to gueſs, that the perſons at whom the addreſs was to be levell'd, were the preſident of the council, and the ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, and that, not ſo much on account of their miſmanagements in former reigns, as for their having influenc'd the reſolutions of the convention, and contributed much to the preſent ſettlement. Hiſt. K. Will. Vol. 2. p. 119.

(2) It has been ſaid, that monſ. Dyckvelt diſcourſing with the member who made the motion (probably to diſuade him from renewing it) he anſwer'd, "He did not think it to be of any conſequence to his Majeſty, and beſide that a place at court, "(he was in the Queen's ſervice,) ſhould never ſilence him, when the good of his country requir'd him to ſpeak."

(3) The reaſon of the King's changing his mind, at this time, was ſuppos d to be a vote of the houſe of commons: "That "thoſe perſons who had been the occaſion of the delaying the ſending relief to Ireland, and had advis'd the King to defer the "giving leave for ſome members of the houſe of commons to inſpect the minute-books of the committee for Iriſh affairs, were "enemies to the King and Kingdom": To which we may probably add, the debates in the ſame houſe, to addreſs the King, that he would be pleas'd to remove the marquiſſes of Hallifax and Caermarthen from his council, thoſe delays being aſcrib'd to them, and they being thought to have too great a ſhare in his Majeſty's favor.

(4) There happen'd a very warm debate, on this occaſion; for mr. Hamden, among other dangers to which he ſaid the nation was expos'd, mentioning that of falling into the hands of the French and Iriſh, a diſſaffected member cried out, "Add "the Dutch." And another, whoſe affection was not in the leaſt doubted, ſaid, "They had given money enough for that "year, and if they could have imagined there had been occaſion for more, would have been before hand with the King's de-"mands; that it was not the want of money, but the ill conduct of thoſe who had the management of affairs, which cauſed the "difficulties the King labor'd under; that the miſcarriages in aſſiſting the Proteſtants of Ireland were of ſo bad conſequence, "that if they were not ſpeedily remedied, the houſe would be oblig'd to take notice of them;" to which it was replied by another, "that their preſent dangers proceeded from their not addreſſing the King to remove his evil counſellors."

(5) The city of London, to whom his Majeſty had likewiſe cauſed the intercepted trayterous letters to be communicated, preſented a very dutiful addreſs to his Majeſty on this occaſion.

About

William & Mary. An' 1689.

About the ſame time, the lords having information that the French Papiſts, in and about London, behaved very inſolently, in traducing and publiſhing libels againſt their Majeſties, and diſperſing papers in favor of the late King James, order'd an addreſs to be preſented to his Majeſty, deſiring he would iſſue his proclamation, that no French Papiſts might come within the verge of the court, and that all who were not houſholders nor merchants ſhould depart the kingdom within ſix weeks, and they within ſix months, under penalty of being proſecuted as alien enemies. His Majeſty, at firſt, ſaid he would give ſpeedy orders for it; but a few days after ſent a meſſage to the houſe, that he thought that rigor might be diſadvantageous to the nation, and beſide a forfeiture of his royal word, with regard to thoſe againſt whom nothing could be proved.

The 22d of June, the King came to the houſe, and, beſide the land-tax bill, gave the royal aſſent to an act, declaring the authority of the commiſſioners of the great ſeal, to be equal to that of a lord chancellor or keeper, with ſome others of leſs moment.

Several perſons impeached.

The commons, in the mean time, were drawing up articles of high treaſon againſt ſir Adam Blair, captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, John Elliot, and Robert Gray, both doctors of phyſic, for publiſhing and diſperſing the late King James's declaration. The articles of impeachment were read to ſome of them at the bar of the houſe of lords, who ſoon after gave in their anſwers to them. Others were examin'd by the ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, who likewiſe gave in their anſwers; and all pleaded innocence, ſubmiting to their lordſhips judgments for their trial. Copies of all their anſwers were communicated to the houſe of commons: but the ſeſſion drawing near to a concluſion, no farther progreſs was made in this matter.

The bill for the aditional exciſe being paſs'd, ſome progreſs was made in that of indemnity, the benefit of which, notwithſtanding the exceptions before made, was to be extended to thoſe who had been concern'd in the proſecution of the biſhops: but all who had acted in the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion were to be excluded. (1)

The continual jarings and animoſities between the two houſes, and the ſlow proceedings of both, which obſtructed the King's deſigns, put his Majeſty upon coming to the houſe of lords, the 28th of June, where, the commons being ſent for, he made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

The King's ſpeech to the parliament.

My lords and gentlemen;

"The time of the year being ſo far advanced, "and there being ſeveral acts yet to be paſs'd, for "the ſafety and ſettlement of the nation, I deſire "you would expedite them as ſoon as you can, it "being neceſſary there ſhould be ſhortly a receſs, "both that I may be at liberty to purſue the buſi-"neſs of Ireland with all poſſible vigor, and that "the members of both houſes may repair to their "ſeveral countries, to ſecure the peace, and put "the militia into ſome better poſture.

"I am very ſenſible of the zeal and good af-"fection, which you gentlemen of the houſe of "commons, have ſhewn to the public, in giving "thoſe ſupplies you have done already, and I do "not doubt, but from the ſame inducements you "will be ready to give more, as occaſions require, "which I muſt let you know will be ſooner than "perhaps you may expect, becauſe the neceſſary "expenſe of this year will much exceed the ſums "you have provided for it; and that you may "make the truer judgment in that matter, I am "very willing you ſhould ſee how all the mony "hitherto has been laid out, and to that end I "have commanded thoſe accounts to be ſpeedily "brought you, by which you will ſee how little "of the revenue has been applied to any other "uſe, than that of the navy and land forces.

"I muſt remind you of making an effectual and "timely proviſion of the mony for the ſtates of "Holland, and I doubt not but you will take "care, to ſee a fiting revenue ſettled for myſelf.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I will add no more but to recommend earneſtly "to you, to avoid all occaſions of diſpute or delay, "at a time which requires union and vigor in your "councils, upon which the preſervation of all that "is dear to us doth ſo much depend: and I do "promiſe, that nothing ſhall ever be wanting on "my part, which may contribute towards it."

William & Mary. An' 1689.

Both houſes returned his Majeſty thanks for his moſt gracious ſpeech, but it had not any great effect upon the proceedings of either, for the ſame jarings and delays appeared as before. The firſt inſtance was an account of the "bill for laying cer-"tain duties on coffee, tea and chocolate, to be "collected at the cuſtom-houſe," which being ſent up from the commons to the lords, their lordſhips added a clauſe to it, allowing a draw-back upon exportation, and altered the date, from the 24th of July, to the 25th of Auguſt. The commons diſagreing, a warm diſpute inſued, they alleging, "that they had always taken it for an undoubted "privilege (of which they have ever been jealous "and tender) that in all aids given to the King by "the commons, the rate or tax ought not to be "any ways altered by the lords. That the amend-"ments made by the lords being in point of time, "the commons hoped their lordſhips would not, "at this time renew a queſtion, concerning the "method of granting aids, which had formerly, "in inſtances of this nature, occaſioned great de-"bates, and which might now beget many confe-"rences, ſpend much time, and end in inconve-"niences. That this amendment propoſed by the "lords made the bill incoherent, for both houſes "having agreed, that the forfeitures ſhould com-"mence from the 20th of July, it would look "ſtrange, that the forfeitures, ſhould be given "before the duty was made payable. That ſhips "were then arriving daily with the commodities "mentioned in the bill, which would be a loſs to "the King, by puting the commencement of the "duty ſo far. And that, as to the proviſo their "lordſhips had ſent to the commons, the commons "did diſagree to it, and for that did refer to their "firſt reaſons; for the proviſo being an alteration "and leſſening of the grant made by the commons, "they hoped for theſe reaſons, their lordſhips "would agree with them, and not revive old "diſputes.

Debates about the coffee, tea, and chocolate bill.

"The lords, inſiſting upon their proviſo, ſaid, "they were very much ſurprized at the aſſertion of "the commons, that in all aids given to the King, "by the commons, the rate or tax ought not to "be altered by the lords, ſince they conceived it

(1) Two of them, viz. Jefferies, and the biſhop of Cheſter, were dead; the earl of Sunderland and the lord chief juſtice Herbert, were out of the kingdom, the biſhop of Rocheſter was ſhelter'd by the King's protection, the earl of Huntington liv'd retired in the country, the lord chief juſtice Wright was priſoner in the Tower, and for the earl of Mulgrave, beſide that he had always been againſt the violent and deſpotic proceedings of the reſt, his great parts and eloquence, which had ever bore a mighty ſway in the houſe of lords, inclined King William to indeavor to ingage him in his intereſt, by an offer of a more honorable title. Hiſt. of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 123.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

" had always been their undoubted right, in caſe " of any aids given to the King, to leſſen the rate " and tax granted by the commons, whereof ſeveral " precedents might be given, which for the preſent " they were willing to forbear, that they might " not revive old diſputes. But that, as to the pro- " viſo now offered by the lords, their lordſhips " were of opinion, this general point was not the " caſe, now in difference, it being neither an alter- " ation, nor a leſſening of the duty laid on thoſe " commodities; for what was propoſed to be drawn " back, upon the exportation of them, could not be " ſaid to leſſen the rates impoſed upon them. That " it did indeed, take away ſo much of the King's " income, but added much more to the benefit of " trade, of which the lords conceived, they were " equal and competent judges, and therefore they " thought they were well founded to inſiſt on the " proviſo."

The bill loſt.

One would have thought an expedient might eaſily have been found to remove this difficulty; but ſuch was the ſpirit of contradiction, at this time, that the bill was loſt on this account, at leaſt for this ſeſſion.

The royal aſſent given to ſeveral acts.

The 25th of July, his Majeſty came to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to an act for laying an additional duty on beer and ale; an act to take away the court holden before the preſident and council of the Marſhal of Wales; an act to veſt in the two univerſities, the preſentations of benefices belonging to Papiſts; an act concerning the oath to be taken, by commiſſion and warrant-officers, and acts for erecting courts of conſcience, in Briſtol, Glouceſter and Newcaſtle.

The miſcarriages in Ireland reſumed.

The commons having conſidered the ſtate of the nation, in a committee of the whole houſe, on the 20th of Auguſt, came to a reſolution, that an addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, upon theſe heads:

1. " That there had been delays in the ſuccor " of Ireland.

2. " That there were not ſufficient prepara- " tions to tranſport the forces to Ireland.

3. " That ſeveral ſhips had been taken for " want of guards, and convoys to preſerve " them."

The queſtion was, at the ſame time, put, but carried in the negative, " that it was inconvenient " to his Majeſty's affairs, that the marquis of " Hallifax was in his council." The twelfth of the ſame month; ſir Thomas Littleton made a report from the committee, appointed to examine into the miſcarriages relating to Ireland, and particularly Londonderry; upon which it was reſolved, to addreſs his Majeſty, " that colonel Lundee be ſent " over to Londonderry, to be tried there for " the treaſons laid to his charge."

Uproar of the weavers.

The commons having, the next day, ſent up a bill to the lords, for injoyning the wearing the " woollen manufactures of this kingdom, at certain " times of the year", the bailiffs, wardens, and aſſiſtants of the companies of ſilk-weavers of London and Canterbury, preſented a petition to their lordſhips, in a tumultuous manner, praying to be heard before the ſaid bill paſſed into a law: but their lordſhips ordered their ſpeaker to tell them, " that " they did not think proper to give an anſwer to " a petition delivered in that manner; that they " ſhould return quietly to their homes, and that " then they need not fear, but that their lordſhips " would do juſtice, and hear all objections againſt " this or any other bill that ſhould come before " them". And neceſſary diſpoſitions being likewiſe made to prevent the like diſorders for the future, the weavers remained in their houſes, and upon the ſecond reading of the bill, on the 19th, it was unanimouſly rejected.

The commons having, likewiſe, ſent up the bill, " for attainting ſeveral perſons in rebellion " againſt their Majeſties", the lords deſired a liſt " of the perſons that gave evidence to the com- " mons, againſt the ſeveral perſons deſigned to be " attainted, that their lordſhips might be fully " ſatisfied by evidence, viva voce, to attaint the " ſeveral perſons, as they ſuppoſed the commons " were". This the commons agreed to in a conference, and named William Watts, Matthew Gun, Baſil Pureſoy, and William Dalton: but their evidence not being ſatisfactory to the lords, the bill lay neglected for ſome days, till the commons having preſſed their lordſhips, by two meſſages, on the 29th of Auguſt, the houſe agreed with the committee in leaving out Thomas, lord Howard, the earl of Dover, the lord Hunſdon, ſir Roger Strickland, ſir Edward Herbert, colonel Hugh Southerland, and ſir William Jennings, becauſe there did not appear ſufficient evidence againſt them: but a final ſtop was, ſoon after, put to this bill by the adjournment of the parliament.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

Bill of attainder.

Loſt.

Bill for payment of the States-general paſſed.

At length, in compliance with the King's repeated inſtances, the commons put the finiſhing hand to a " bill for appropriating certain duties for paying " the States-general of the United Provinces, the " charges for his Majeſty's expedition into this " kingdom;" which being ſent up to the houſe of lords, upon the reading of it, the 13th of Auguſt, it was moved, that ſeveral members of the houſe, and diverſe ſervants of King Charles II, had ſecurities appropriated out of ſeveral duties which paſt away from them by this bill, and therefore they deſired to be heard by their council, which they were accordingly; however their lordſhips conſented to the bill, without any amendment, and were contented with ordering their ſpeaker to preſent " an ad- " dreſs to his Majeſty, ſeting forth, wherein ſome " of their members, and others, were aggrieved by " this act; and that they had been induced to poſt- " pone their own private intereſt, for the ſake of " the public good, humbly beſeeching his Majeſty, " to take their condition, and the manner of their " preſent reſignation of it, into his gracious con- " ſideration, not doubting but the particular peers " concerned, would therein find an intire ſecurity". His Majeſty received this addreſs very kindly, and with regard to thoſe peers who were concerned in the bill, he ſaid; " he was ſenſible of their behavior " towards him, on this occaſion, and would not " forget it."

The 23d the King went to the houſe of lords, to paſs this and other bills, upon which occaſion, mr. Powle, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, made the following remarkable ſpeech:

A remarkable ſpeech on this occaſion.

" The commons (ſaid he) in this preſent parlia- " ment aſſembled, taking into conſideration the " great aſſiſtance that was given by the States of the " United Provinces to your Majeſty, in your glo- " rious deſign of reſtoring this kingdom to their " ancient rights and liberties, and how for that " end, they intruſted their army and fleet to your " Majeſty's diſpoſal, at a time when they had war " declared, and an invaſion threatned by the French " King, meerly to divert them; they do here " humbly preſent your Majeſty, with a bill, ap- " pointing certain duties, exciſe and cuſtoms, for " the raiſing 600,000 l. which they deſire may be " applied by your Majeſty for the ſatisfaction of " the charges which have been expended by the " States in this expedition.

" It is a little more than an age, ſince the illuſ- " trious Prince of Orange, your Majeſty's great " grandfather, whoſe name will be ever famous for " his love to his country, did, by the aſſiſtance of " the Engliſh, redeem thoſe provinces from the like " oppreſſions; (1) which ſhews how inſeparable " the intereſts of thoſe two nations are. And ſince " it was the policy of thoſe who labored our de- " ſtruction, to divide us, it ought to be the indea- " vors of all true lovers of their country, to keep " us firmly united, in order to our preſervation.

" The commons have likewiſe conſidered of " the great arrears, that were left due by King " Charles II, to his ſervants, and have therefore, " made a proviſion of 60,000l. for them, which they " humbly deſire your Majeſty would be pleaſed to " diſtribute among them, in ſuch proportion, as " your Majeſty, in your princely wiſdom, ſhall " think moſt fit.

" And having proceded thus far, in the weighty " affairs depending before them, they now become " humble ſuitors to your Majeſty for a receſs, that " thereby they may have the opportunity of re- " pairing to their ſeveral countries, and promoting " your Majeſty's ſervice, and what remains at " preſent for want of time, to diſpatch, they " doubt not but that they ſhall be able to perfect it, " at their next meeting, and as they hope, to the " intire ſatisfaction of your Majeſty, and your " whole kingdom."

The parliament adjourned.

His Majeſty having given his royal aſſent to ſeveral, as well private as public bills, (2) directed the ſpeaker of the houſe of lords (according to the deſire of the commons) to ſignify his pleaſure, that both houſes ſhould ſeverally adjourn themſelves to the 20th of September, upon which day they were farther adjourn'd to the 19th of October following.

Thus have I brought the proceedings and intricate tranſactions of the firſt ſeſſion of this convention-parliament, remarkable for their continual jaring, as well each houſe within it ſelf, as one with the other, to an end. I now return to the affairs in Ireland.

Duke of Schomberg ſent with an army to Ireland.

During the tranſactions in Ireland, of which I have given the reader an account above, King William had iſſued out commiſſions for raiſing eighteen regiments of foot and five of horſe, which were deſigned for the reduction of that kingdom. Theſe troops were compleated in about ſix week's time; but there was not ſo much diſpatch in providing the ſhips neceſſary for tranſporting them, together with a train of artillery, ammunition and proviſions. (3). The King had given the command of theſe troops to duke Schomberg, who having had a preſent from the commons of 100,000 l. his grace obtained leave of the houſe of lords, to return his acknowlegments to that honorable houſe, for their generous gift, (4) and ſoon after began his journey for Cheſter. (5) Captain Hopſon, in the Bonadventure, with ſome other men of war and tranſports (about 90 of all ſorts) being come to Highlake near that city, the troops, being together about 10,000 men, horſe and foot, were put on board, and on the 12th of Auguſt, the duke himſelf imbarked. They ſteered directly for Carrickfergus, and on the thirteenth, in the afternoon, arrived in that bay, where the army immediately landed, at Bangor-ſide, without oppoſition. After having ſent out ſome parties to ſcour the country, and bring him intelligence of the enemy, and they being ſafely returned, he marched his forces to Belfaſt, which the enemy had abandoned, and were retired to Carrickfergus. Here ſeveral of the neighboring Proteſtants joined him, who before durſt not declare.

Belfaſt abandon'd.

The army being ſufficiently refreſhed, after their voyage, the 21ſt the duke detached ſeveral regiments, with ſome cannon and mortars, towards Carrickfergus, where they no ſooner arrived, than the gariſon offered to capitulate; but their demands being rejected, the place was ordered to be attacked in form. The 22d the trenches were opened and ſome batteries raiſed: The attacks were vigorouſly purſued till the 26th, when, conſiderable breaches being made, and every thing for the general aſſault prepared, the gariſon was glad to accept of ſuch terms as the duke would grant them, which were, to be conducted, with their arms, and as much baggage as they would carry on their backs, to Newry, which was the next Iriſh gariſon.

Carrickfergus taken.

In the mean time, the reſt of the troops, which for want of tranſports had been left at Highlake, arrived. The 28th the duke returned to Belfaſt, the 30th his own French regiment of horſe, of 500 men, joined him, and the next day he muſtered his whole army, conſiſting then of four regiments of horſe, one of dragoons, and eighteen of foot; which were joined afterwards, by three regiments more. (1) This reminding the Dutch of their former obligations to the Engliſh, which were never acknowleged in ſo ample manner as this, was ill-taken by ſome, who did not think it enough to acknowlege the obligation, and to pay for it too, to the utmoſt, unleſs we did more than even they had the aſſurance to aſk. Mr. Oldmixon is ſo diſpleaſed at this part of Mr. Powle's ſpeech, that he breaks off a little before he comes at it, with an, &c. and reſumes it immediately after. He expreſſes his diſguſt at it in another place, where he ſays, " it was ſo far from being artful (as ſome hiſtorians call it) that it was neither de- " cent nor ſeaſonable:" I muſt beg leave to diſſent from him, and could ſhew him, if it was not going too far out of my way, that it was both. I do not ſay this out of any diſguſt to the Dutch, I know them, have been frequently among them, and value them; I confeſs they did us real and good ſervice at that time, I allow them to be excellent arithmeticians: but as we paid them within a trifle their own demand (whether exorbitant or not is not for me to determine) I do not ſee the harm, nor indeed ingratitude of reminding them, that there was a time when they had as great an obligation to us.

(2) The public bills were, (1) An act for appropriating ſeveral duties for paying off the States-general, &c. (2) An act for prohibiting all trade and commerce with France. (3) An act for the better preventing the exportation of wool, and incouraging the woollen manufactures of this kingdom. (4) An additional act for appointing commiſſioners for executing the act for a grant to their Majeſties of 12 d. in the pound. (5) An act for the relief of the Proteſtant Iriſh clergy. (6) An act to repeal the ſtatute made in the ſixth year of King Henry IV, againſt multiplying gold and ſilver. And (7) an act for explaining part of an act, in the firſt year of King James I, concerning tann'd leather.

(3) The fault of theſe delays was charged on mr. Harbord, who out of avarice had ingroſſed to himſelf the office of pay-maſter, and purveyor-general of the army, the latter of which, however, he was at length prevailed upon to reſign to mr. Shales; tho' we ſhall find, that did not much mend the matter.

(4) Of this grant of the houſe of commons, he however received but a ſmall part; for the remainder King William paid his ſon 5000 l. per annum. Hiſtory of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 133.

(5) He was very uneaſy at the dilatory proceedings of the managers both of ſhiping and proviſions, and propoſed that the forces ſhould march over land to Scotland, and embark at Port Patrick, from whence it is a ſhort paſſage over into Ireland, and it would have ſaved two or three months time: but it was oppoſed. Oldmixon, p. 22. It was indeed, amazing (as the ſame author juſtly obſerves) that the late King James had been ſix months in Ireland, before ſo ſmall an army as 10,000 men could be ſent againſt him from England, where the diſtreſſes of the Proteſtants of that kingdom were well enough known, and the whole body of the nation was impatient to have them relieved.

(6) The horſe were, the earl of Devonſhire's, the lord Delamere's, colonel Coy's, and the duke's regiments. The dragoons were colonel Levingſton's regiment. The foot, one batallion of the Dutch blue guards, Carelſcoon's white Dutch, colonel Beaumont's, colonel Wharton's, earl of Drogheda's, lord Liſburn's, earl of Meath's, earl of Roſcommon's, lord Lovelace's, lord Kingſton's, duke of Norfolk's, colonel Herbert's, ſir Edward Deering's, ſir Thomas Gower's, and colonel Earl's regiments, with the three French regiments of la Melloniere, du Cambon, and la Caillemote. The three regiments, which joined afterwards, were major-general Kirk's, ſir John Hanmer's, and brigadier Stuart's.

The

William & Mary. An' 1689.

The artillery-horſes were yet moſt of them at Cheſter, which obliged him to ſhip the greater part of the train, and to order the fleet to ſail with them, and all other neceſſaries, to Carlingford-bay, while he marched the army beyond Liſburn, and thro' Hilſborough. He pitched his camp at Drummore, and, the next day, continued his march to Loughbritan, where he was joined by the Inniſkillin horſe and dragoons, who bravely offered themſelves to march in the van of his army. The Iriſh, upon their approach, immediately abandoned the Newry, a very ſtrong paſs, after having burnt the town (1). From thence the duke marched with his army to Dundalk, which he, likewiſe, found abandoned. He incamped about a mile North of it, in a low moiſt ground, having the town and river, towards the Weſt, between him and the enemy, the ſea towards the South, the Newry-mountains to the Eaſt, and hills and bogs intermixed, to the North. Here it was he was joined by the three regiments already mentioned, on the ninth of September, and here likewiſe his wearied men met with ſome refreſhment. The duke's deſign was to have continued his march; but the ſhips, with the artillery, not coming up in time, to Carlingford, he was obliged, to his great diſappointment and uneaſineſs, to continue in that camp, 'till the 20th (2); when he received advice, in the morning, that King James, having gathered all his forces together, near Drogheda, was advancing towards him, and that a party of 2000 foot, and 1500 horſe, were gone on the other ſide of the mountains to attack the paſs at Newry, that they might fall upon his rear. Upon this he detached a party of horſe againſt them, at whoſe approach they retreated towards Sligo.

The Iriſh abandon the Newry.

And Dundalk.

The next day, the enemy appear'd in order of battle, and a great party of their horſe advanced towards the Engliſh intrenchments. Several of their officers were for ingaging the enemy; but the duke ſaid, "let them alone, we ſhall ſee what they will do;" and tho' he ſaw them advance, within cannon-ſhot of his camp, he yet ſaid, "he did not "believe they would fight". However, once, ſeeing them draw their army into two lines, he ſent lieutenant-general Douglas to the camp, to order all the foot to ſtand to their arms, and the horſe, which were foraging, to return to the camp upon a certain ſignal; but the Iriſh made no attempt (3), and in a day or two afterwards, they march'd off for good and all.

The Iriſh, tho' ſuperior, decline fighting.

Notwithſtanding duke Schomberg had his reaſons for not hazarding his own army, with the groſs of which he kept in his camp, yet he did not reſtrain the Inniſkilliners from making excurſions, and it was in one of theſe, on the 27th of September, that they had that ſucceſs under colonel Lloyd, of which I have given an account above (4).

William & Mary. An' 1689.

The Iriſh were, however, ſoon after revenged, at leaſt in ſome meaſure, by taking of Sligo and James-town, with a conſiderable body of troops, commanded by colonel Sarsfield, at the former of which, monſ. de Sauveur, a French captain in Melloniere's regiment, diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in an extraordinary manner, with his own company of grenadiers, as did colonel Lloyd, with his Inniſkillin men, theſe two retreating into two forts, which they defended bravely, after the place was abandon'd.

The Iriſh take Sligo, and James town.

The duke had ſoon a more fatal misfortune than this to incounter with: a raging ſickneſs, occaſion'd by the unwholſomneſs of the place, bad weather, and worſe food, ſwept away, or at leaſt diſabled, daily a great number of brave officers and ſoldiers. Among the reſt, died ſir Edward Deering, colonel Henry Wharton, brother to the late marquis, ſir Thomas Gower, and colonel Hungerford, two young gentlemen of diſtinguiſh'd merit. Of common ſoldiers there periſh'd about 2,000 at Dundalk, and as many more were ſhip'd off ſick, to be tranſported to Belfaſt, of which not above 1100 came aſhore, the reſt dying at ſea. And the mortality grew afterwards to ſo great a height, that by the begining of the inſuing year, near two thirds of the troops, that were tranſported to Ireland, were intirely loſt. This mortality was not alone among the land troops, but ſeized the ſeamen likewiſe, inſomuch that ſeveral ſhips loſt almoſt all their crew. Thus ended this unſucceſsful campain in the north of Ireland; for the winter approaching, both armies went into quarters, and duke Schomberg made preſſing inſtances, that the 7,000 Danes, who, about this time, came over to England and Scotland, as auxiliaries, purſuant to a treaty concluded with the King of Denmark, for that purpoſe, on the 15th of Auguſt, might be ſent to Ireland.

Sickneſs in the Engliſh camp at Dundalk.

While theſe things were doing, in the north of Ireland, the earl of Tyrone declar'd for King William, in the ſouth, and took Waterford, which was follow'd by ſome other ſucceſſes.

Tyrone declares for K. William.

It may not be improper now to ſay a word or two of our affairs at ſea, which were not more ſucceſsful than thoſe of Ireland. We left our little fleet, after the fight of Bantry-bay, return'd to Spithead, to refit. This being done, the admiral arriv'd, about the middle of June, with his fleet at Torbay, where he was join'd by a ſmall ſquadron of Dutch ſhips, under an admiral, a vice and a rear-flag, by mr. Ruſſel (afterwards earl of Orford) admiral of the blue, and by ſeveral other ſhips, as they came in: as likewiſe by vice-admiral Killigrew, with a ſmall ſquadron, which had been Affairs at Sea.

(1) The general, being informed of this inhumanity, ſent a trumpeter to the duke of Berwick, who commanded there, to acquaint him, "that if they continued to burn, in this barbarous manner, he would give no quarter." This meſſage had its effect, for the Iriſh, upon their abandoning Dundalk, did no harm to the town.

(2) The duke had intelligence here, by an ingineer, who deſerted from the enemy, that the French general de Roſe, being then at Drogheda, with about 20,000 men, and hearing that the Engliſh halted at Dundalk, ſaid, "He was ſure they were in want of "ſomething;" and therefore ſent part of his forces to ſeize Ardee, a ſmall town between Drogheda and Dundalk.

(3) It may here naturally be ask'd, why general Schomberg did not attack them, ſince they were ſo afraid of him? the reaſon is very evident: he wiſely conſider'd, that the enemy was much ſuperior in number (being at leaſt 20,000) eſpecially in horſe; that his own men were new, undiſciplined levies, weakened by hunger and ſickneſs, and, on the contrary, the enemy's troops, fluſh'd with health and plenty, and that the loſs of a battle might be attended with the loſs of all Ireland. And beſide, he had diſcovered a dangerous conſpiracy in his own camp, carried on by ſome French Papiſts, who had liſted in the Proteſtant regiments of that nation, and had formed a deſign to go over with a good number of their comrades, to the enemy: for which conſpiracy ſix of them were executed. One of theſe ſix, du Pleſſis by name, had been a captain of horſe, in the French ſervice, but having been obliged to flee, on account of a duel, had taken ſervice in theſe troops as ſimple ſentinel. It is ſaid that he held a regular correſpondence, with the count d'Avaux, in recompenſe for which he demanded the earl's protection and a regiment. Cont. of Rap. in French, L. 25. p. 64. The ſame author affirms, that notwithſtanding what has been ſaid to the contrary, by the writers of thoſe times, King James was certainly imbark'd in this odious deſign.

(4) Duke Schomberg was ſo pleas'd with the news of this ſucceſs, that having order'd all the Inniſkillin horſe and foot, in his camp to draw out, he rode all along their line with his hat off, and cauſed the Dutch guards and the Inniſkillin foot to make three running fires, which were anſwer'd by the Inniſkillin horſe, and by the cannon upon the works, as alſo from the ſhips which lay at the mouth of the river.

cruiſing, for ſome time, off of Dunkirk. With this united fleet, admiral Torrington cruiſed on the French coaſt, and to and fro in the ſoundings, but without any ſucceſs, till the latter end of Auguſt, when a want of beer oblig'd him to return to Torbay, where the fleet ſeparated. The largeſt ſhips, and thoſe which wanted repair, were ſent into harbor, and the reſt imploy'd on different ſtations and ſervices.

Mr. Rook on the coaſt of Ireland.

Mr. Rooke (afterwards ſir George) had been detach'd, in April, with a ſquadron to the Iriſh coaſt, and arriv'd off of Greenock, the tenth of May, whence he ſent orders to Cheſter, for the Bonaventure, and other ſhips, to join him off of Cantire. The 8th of June, he fell in with the little ſquadron which accompanied major-general Kirk, and the tranſports deſign'd for the relief of Londonderry. What ſlender aſſiſtance that brave and diſtreſs'd gariſon had of this ſquadron, till at length, they were reduc'd to the utmoſt extremity, we have already ſeen; the 13th of Auguſt, the commodore of this ſquadron, met duke Schomberg's ſquadron of tranſports and other ſhips, going into Bangor-bay. The 25th the commodore diſpoſed of the ſhips, in thoſe ſeas, on certain ſtations (1). He himſelf indeavor'd to get ſouthward; but was drove into Bantry-bay (2.)

The ſixteenth of September he arriv'd in Dublin-bay, and the 18th off of Cork; but had no great ſucceſs at either. At length, his ſhips being foul, and in want of almoſt every thing, he was oblig'd to quit his ſtation, and repair to the Downs, where he arriv'd the 13th of October.

Before I return to England, and the proceedings of the ſecond meeting of the convention-parliament, I ſhall take a ſhort view of ſome affairs on the continent.

Treaties with foreign Princes concluded.

King William, whoſe intereſt and ſafety, in conjunction with that of the nation, conſiſted as well in the ſucceſs of foreign, as domeſtic affairs, had not been wanting, all this while, in concluding proper treaties with the ſeveral powers which form'd the grand alliance, the baſis of whoſe intention was to curb the exorbitant power of France. The Emperor, the Empire, Spain, and the Dutch were all combin'd in this alliance with England: and had all mutual treaties one with the other, as well as with England.

His Majeſty being oblig'd, by virtue of theſe treaties, to have ſome troops in the Netherlands, gave the command of them to the earl of Marlborough, who, for that end, went into Holland, in the month of May, and arrived at Maeſtricht, the begining of the inſuing month. This campain produced nothing remarkable in theſe parts, but the battle of Walcourt. The allies were much inferior to their enemy in ſtrength, and could, therefore, only act on the defenſive. Their army was incamp'd behind a little town call'd Walcourt, in ſuch a manner, that the French could not come at them, without firſt taking that place. This they attempted, the 25th of Auguſt, N. S. but to their own coſt. The earl of Marlborough, with the Engliſh troops under his command, were at the main-poſt, where they behaved with ſo much gallantry, and made ſuch a continual fire on the enemy's flank, as not only gave their whole army an opportunity of retreating in exact order, but, in the end, obliged the French, who advanced too near them, to withdraw in great confuſion, leaving ſome cannon and ammunition behind them, with the loſs of near 2000 men, officers included, killed and wounded; whereas the allies, on their ſide, did not loſe above 300. The Spaniards, who acted ſeparate about Courtray, levell'd a good part of the French lines, and rais'd large contributions in the enemy's country.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

Campaign in Germany.

In Germany, the allies were more ſucceeſsful, the Elector of Brandenburg took Keyſerſwaert, and laid ſiege to Bonn, where he, however, found a vigorous oppoſition; till the duke of Lorrain, who, in the mean time, was beſieging Mentz, having taken that place, after a ſhort reſiſtance, led part of his victorious troops to join the Elector, which oblig'd that place to ſurrender, the 7th of October, after a blockade of fifty-five days, and a ſiege of twenty-nine.

I return now to England; but before I reſume the affairs of parliament, ſhall mention ſome few things, which, not coming ſo properly under any of the general heads already treated, I have for that reaſon poſtpon'd.

Their Majeſties purchaſe Kenſington-houſe.

After the King's return from Portſmouth, whither he went to reward the officers and ſailors who had behav'd ſo well at Bantry-bay fight, his Majeſty, with the Queen, went to ſee the earl of Nottingham's houſe, at Kenſington, which they were inclin'd to purchaſe. Their Majeſties liked the houſe, on account of the ſituation, in a wholeſome air, and being ſo near London. They had conſider'd what improvements it was capable of, in order to make it a royal palace, fit for the reception of their Majeſties, during the ſiting of parliament. The bargain was ſoon made with the earl, and 20,000 l. paid him for it, out of the treaſury.

Abuſes in the ſoldiery redreſs'd.

Some time before this, the King had information given him, that certain officers of the army made a practiſe of detaining part of the pay of their ſoldiers, which had occaſion'd diſorders among them; and likewiſe, that abuſes and injuries had been put upon perſons where they were quarter'd. To redreſs theſe grievances, his Majeſty granted a commiſſion to the duke of Schomberg, the earls of Devonſhire and Mordaunt, the lord Delamere, mr. Wharton, and ſome others, to make inquiry into theſe matters, of which public notice was given by proclamation, "for preventing of falſe muſters, "and injuries which might be done, either to the "ſoldiers or ſubjects.

Malecontents in England.

Notwithſtanding all the advantages and ſecurity the nation had obtain'd, as well in their civil as religious liberties, there was a ſet of diſaffected malecontents, who bearing a ſecret good will to their abdicated ſovereign, which they durſt not make public profeſſion of, made it their buſineſs to inſinuate themſelves into all companies, and privately to ſow the ſeeds of ſedition in ſuch minds, as they found ſuſceptible of them; in which they were not a little countenanced and incouraged by ſome of the clergy who had refuſed to take the oaths (3). To prevent the prejudice which might ariſe from ſuch inſinuations, dr. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, imploy'd his pen, in a paſtoral letter to the clergy of his dioceſs, concerning the allegiance due to King William and Queen Mary: but the prelate, in the heat of his zeal, could not forbear carrying the matter too far,

Biſhop Burnet's paſtoral letter.

(1) See a particular account of theſe ſtations, in Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. II. p. 628. note (n.)

(2) In his paſſage from Carrickfergus, he was obliged, by a ſtrong ſoutherly wind, to bear up an anchor at the Skerries, about 12 miles from Dublin, where ſending in a yacht to get intelligences, ſeveral ſhot were fired at her from the ſhore. Inraged at this treatment, he order'd the ketches in, and manning all the boats, landed about 200 men, who ſoon clear'd the town. After which, having ſtaved or brought off all the ſmall veſſels and fiſher-boats, that were there, they imbark'd again. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. II. p. 628.

(3) Theſe male-contents diſpers'd, about this time, a libel intitled: "A ſhort hiſtory of the convention, or new chriſten'd "parliament," againſt which his Majeſty iſſued a proclamation promiſing a reward of 100 l. to ſuch perſons as ſhould diſcover either the author, printer or publiſher of the ſaid treaſonable pamphlet.

William & Mary. An' 1689.

and not contented with aſſerting their Majeſties title, by alledging, "that they were actually in "poſſeſſion of the throne, by the unanimous con- "ſent of the repreſentatives of the nation," indeavor'd to prove that, "King William had a "juſt claim to the crown by his ſword;" which ſo offended a future parliament, that it was burnt by the common hangman.

Commiſſioners of the cuſtoms and exciſe appointed.

During the ſeſſions of parliament, his Majeſty was pleas'd to appoint commiſſioners of the cuſtoms and exciſe, which it was obſerved were moſt of them Whigs, and ſeveral of them Diſſenters.

Creations of nobility.

About the ſame time were, likewiſe, ſome creations of nobility. John Aſhburnham, eſq; was created baron Aſhburnham, and Charles lord Durſley, and Robert lord viſcount Liſle, were call'd to the houſe of lords by writ.

The King goes to Newmarket,

And Cambridge.

The begining of October, the King, to gain the affection of the nobility and gentry, by an act of popularity, reſolved to ſhare the diverſions of Newmarket. The concourſe of people, on that occaſion, was very extraordinary, and the univerſity of Cambridge took this opportunity to wait on his Majeſty (1), who was moſt graciouſly pleas'd to make a viſit to that univerſity, the very next day, where he was received and entertain'd with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, duty and loyalty.

Eccleſiaſtical promotions.

At the King's return from Newmarket, the 10th of October, the day appointed for the meeting of the parliament drawing near, at which time his Majeſty deſign'd likewiſe to ſummon a convocation, he thought fit to fill up the vacant ſees of Worceſter, Chicheſter and Briſtol, of which the firſt was beſtowed on dr. Edward Stillingfleet, dean of St. Paul's; the ſecond on dr. Patrick, dean of Peterborough, and the third on dr. Gilbert Ironſide, warden of Wadham college in Oxford, who were conſecrated the 13th at Fulham, by the biſhops of London, St. Aſaph, and Rocheſter, being commiſſioned for that purpoſe.

Dignified clergy ſuſpended ab officio.

The time allow'd by act of parliament for the clergy to take the oaths being expired, ſome of thoſe, who refus'd to qualify themſelves, were ſuſpended ab officio: among whom were the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhops of Glouceſter, Ely, Norwich, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough.

A convocation ſummon'd.

About the ſame time dr. Tillotſon, then dean, and afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, was made clerk of the cloſet to his Majeſty; and the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, St. Aſaph, Rocheſter, Exeter, Saliſbury, Bangor and Cheſter, with twenty of the moſt eminent doctors in divinity, were appointed, by an eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, to prepare ſuch matters as were to be debated in the convocation, to examine the canons and ancient rubric, and to conſider what ceremonies might be laid aſide, in order to invite the Preſbyterians to join in communion with the church of England. After theſe preliminaries, writs were iſſued out for the convocation to meet in November next following.

The marquis of Hallifax, who, during the laſt ſeſſions of parliament had perform'd the office of ſpeaker to the houſe of lords, having made himſelf obnoxious to both parties, King William, finding how ill his affairs ſucceeded in his hands (2), granted a commiſſion to ſir Robert Atkins, chief baron of the exchequer, to ſupply the place of lord chancellor, or lord keeper, and as ſuch to be ſpeaker of the houſe of lords (3).

William & Mary. An' 1689.

The 19th of October, being the day to which the parliament was adjourned, his Majeſty open'd this ſecond meeting with the following ſpeech:

The King's ſpeech to the parliament.

My lords and gentlemen,

"Tho' the laſt ſiting continued ſo long, that it "might perhaps have been more agreable to you, "in relation to your private concerns, not to have "met again ſo ſoon, yet the intereſt of the public, "lays an indiſpenſable obligation upon me, to call "you together at this time.

"In your laſt meeting, you gave me ſo many teſ- "timonies of your affection, as well as confidence "in me, that I do not at all queſtion, but in this "I ſhall receive freſh ſupplies of both.

"I eſteem it one of the greateſt misfortunes can "befal me, that in the begining of my reign I am "forced to aſk ſuch large ſupplies; tho' I have this "ſatisfaction, that they are deſired for no other "purpoſes than the carrying on theſe wars, in "which I entered with your advice, and aſſurance "of your aſſiſtance, nor can I doubt of the bleſſings "of God, upon an undertaking wherein I did not "ingage out of a vain ambition, but from the ne- "ceſſity of oppoſing their deſigns of deſtroying "our religion and liberties.

"It is well known how far I have expoſed myſelf "to reſcue this nation from the dangers that threat- "ened, not only your liberty, but the Proteſtant "religion in general, of which the church of England "is one of the greateſt ſupports, and for the defenſe "whereof I am ready again to venture my life.

My lords and gentlemen,

"That which I have to aſk of you, at preſent, is, "that what you think fit to give towards the charges "of the war, for the next year, may be done without "delay; and there is one reaſon which more parti- "cularly obliges me to preſs you to a ſpeedy deter- "mination of this matter, becauſe the next month, "there is appointed, at the Hague, a general meet- "ing of all the Princes and States concerned in this "war againſt France, in order to concert the mea- "ſures, for the next campain: and 'till I know "your farther intentions, I ſhall not only be uncer- "tain myſelf what reſolutions to take, but our "allies will be under the ſame doubts, unleſs they "ſee me ſupported by your aſſiſtance: beſide, if "I know not in time, what you will do, I cannot "make ſuch proviſions as will be requiſite, but "ſhall be expoſed to the ſame inconveniencies the "next year, which were the cauſe that the prepa- "rations for this were neither ſo effectual nor expe- "ditious as was neceſſary. The charge will be alſo "conſiderably leſſened, by giving time to provide "things in their proper ſeaſon, and without con- "fuſion.

"I have no other aim in this, but to be in a con- "dition to attack our enemies, in ſo vigorous a "manner, as, by the help of God, may in a little "time bring us to a laſting and honorable peace, "by which my ſubjects may be freed from the "extraordinary expenſe of a lingring war: and "that I can have no greater ſatisfaction than in

(2) He is ſaid to have gain'd the ill-will of both parties, by trimming to avoid eſpouſing either, and by his peeviſh domineering temper. He was a good ſtateſman in ſpeculation, but being incapable of thoſe ſubtle inſinuations, feign'd confidences, and politic managements, which are neceſſary to carry on a great deſign, what he had wiſely projected in his cloſet generally miſcarried in the ſenate. (3) The marquis of Hallifax, being in council the 18th (the day before the parliament was to meet) declar'd, "That for "ſeveral reaſons, which he forbore to mention, he muſt deſire to be excus'd from doing the office of ſpeaker in the houſe of "lords." Which was readily granted him.

A ſhort prorogation of the parliament.

The buſineſs of Oates, and ſome other matters, which had raiſed ſuch dangerous heats and animoſities between both houſes, being only ſuperſeded by the adjournment of the parliament, it was moved in council, to put a final end to them, by a prorogation, but the King thought fit to do nothing in ſo nice an affair, without the advice of both houſes. The houſe of peers readily came into it, and tho' ſome members of the houſe of commons pretended, that it was irregular, after his Majeſty had made a ſpeech, in which he had propoſed new matters to their conſideration, it was carried againſt them by a majority: upon which his Majeſty came to the houſe of lords the 21ſt, when ſir Robert Atkins, their new ſpeaker, acquainted both houſes with his Majeſty's pleaſure, that the parliament ſhould be prorogued till the 23d of the ſame month. (2)

Proceedings of parliament.

Accordingly, the 23d of October, the parliament being met, the King refer'd them to what he had ſaid to both houſes, the 19th. The ſpeaker of the houſe of commons having read his Majeſty's ſpeech, the conſideration of it was put off 'till the next day, when they unanimouſly reſolved, " effectually to " aſſiſt his Majeſty, both to reduce Ireland, and to " proſecute the war againſt France." And becauſe the act for detaining ſeveral ſuſpected perſons in priſon, notwithſtanding the ſtatute of Habeas-corpus, was expired, and that thoſe perſons had petition'd the houſe, to be tried at the King's-bench bar, a committee was appointed to inquire into the informations which had been given againſt them, and to inſpect the journals of the houſe, in order to find out precedents, relating to commitments order'd by the commons: and another committee was named to report what bills were depending in the laſt ſeſſion, with which they had chiefly the bill of rights in view.

With reſpect to ſtate priſoners.

The court was buſied in ſecuring the moſt ſuſpected perſons; but the commons, in the mean time, granted the benefit of Habeas-corpus to the lords Preſton and Forbes, and ſir John Fenwic, on ſufficient bail: the earls of Saliſbury, Peterborough, and Caſtlemain, ſir Edward Hales, baron Jenner, and mr. Walker, were upon the point of injoying the ſame favor; but after reading the informations againſt them, the three lords were remanded to the Tower, upon a ſuppoſition that they might be proſecuted for high-treaſon; the two firſt for reconciling themſelves to the church of Rome, and the third for indeavoring to reconcile the kingdom to that communion, and for other crimes. Sir Edward Hales and baron Jenner, beſide the treaſon in turning Roman Catholics, were accuſed of high miſdemeanors; but the latter, having been already ſet at liberty, had eight days given him to make his defenſe, during which he was to remain in the cuſtody of a ſerjeant at arms; which eaſy confinement was likewiſe granted to Graham and Burton.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

Bills of rights, and indemnity.

The next thing of moment the commons did, was to put a finiſhing hand to the bill of rights, which they did with great unanimity and diſpatch, tho' without mentioning the houſe of Hanover. The attorney-general was, at the ſame time, ordered to bring in a bill of indemnity, in ſuch ample manner as might anſwer his Majeſty's gracious intentions and clemency: and, on the other hand, the King ordered accounts of the expenſes of laſt ſummer, and of the neceſſary charges for the next year's ſervice, to be laid before the houſe of commons, who having read the ſame, unanimouſly voted a ſupply of two millions ſterling, to his Majeſty.

A ſupply voted.

Colonel Ludlow comes to England.

Colonel Ludlow, who upon King Charles II's reſtoration, was excluded the general pardon, by act of parliament; in 1661, as having been one of King Charles I's judges, came over into England, about this time, as it was ſuppoſed, upon the incouragement given him by a great man at court, with a deſign to offer the King his ſervice in reducing Ireland. The commons were ſoon informed of his preſumption (3), and ſeveral members took notice of it (4); upon which they ordered their ſpeaker to preſent an addreſs to his Majeſty, deſiring him to iſſue out his proclamation for the apprehending him, he being attainted of high-treaſon by act of parliament; which his Majeſty, indeed, complied with, but it was not publiſhed 'till the 4th of November.

Makes his eſcape again.

Bill of pains and penalties.

The bill of indemnity being brought in, according to order, by the attorney-general, both he and the ſollicitor-general were ordered, by the houſe of commons, to prepare another, to lay penalties and fines on ſuch, as had been inſtrumental, in the late reigns, to the violation of the laws. The houſe afterwards declared, that thoſe, who had put ſome perſons to death, in the iſland of St. Hellen, under pretenſe of rebellion, were guilty of murder, and a committee was appointed to inquire, by what warrant they had proceeded. A bill was alſo ordered to be brought in to declare the late chancellor Jefferies's eſtate forfeited to the crown, and to

(1) This ſpeech met with univerſal applauſe; but what was moſt remarkable, concerning it, was, its being compoſed by the King himſelf, who, the day before the parliament met, produced it in council, written with his own hand, in French, ſaying. " I know moſt of my predeceſſors were uſed to commit the drawing of ſuch ſpeeches to their miniſters, who generally had " their private aims and intereſts in view: to prevent which I have thought fit to write it myſelf in French, becauſe I am not " ſo great a maſter of the Engliſh tongue: therefore I deſire you to look it over, and change what you find amiſs, that it " may be tranſlated into Engliſh."

The ſpeech being read, was highly applauded by the whole board, excepting that the earl of Monmouth objected to the expreſſion, " de laquelle, l'Egliſe Anglicane eſt le principal appuis" (of which, ſc. the Proteſtant religion, the church of England; is the principal ſupport) alleging it would not ſound well in Engliſh; upon which it was altered to, " of which the church of Eng- " land is one of the greateſt ſupports"; and ſir Thomas Clarges, is a member of the houſe of commons, was for adding, to the words, " church of England," thoſe of, " as by law eſtabliſhed," but his opinion did not prevail.

(2) Before this prorogation, the biſhop of Durham, contrary to the expectation of moſt people, took the oaths, and ſubſcribed the declaration appointed by law.

(3) His preſumption was eſteemed the greater, as multitudes of Independants and Fanaticks, were continually flocking to him, and, by openly converſing with them, he, as it were, avowed thoſe principles, for which he ſtood attainted; without which incidents, perhaps, he had not been ſo much taken notice of.

(4) Sir Edward Seymour, in particular, repreſented, and indeed, aptly enough, how highly it reflected on the honor of the nation, that one of the parricides of that King, whoſe death the church of England had dignified with the title of Martyrdom, ſhould not only be ſuffered to live here, but alſo entertained with hope of preferment: tho' private intereſt ſeems to have had ſome ſhare in moving ſir Edward to ſtir ſo much in this matter, the eſtate he then lived on having been Ludlow's, and being come to him by grant.

attaint his blood; but it met with ſo much oppoſition that no progreſs was made in it (1).

However, for a terror to all the late inſtruments of Popery and arbitrary power, they agreed, "that "the pecuniary penalties incured by all privy coun- "ſellors, lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, mili- "tia-officers, juſtices of the peace, and by any "perſons who had accepted and exerciſed any office "or place of profit, either military or civil (other "than ſuch as are new officers in their Majeſties "army or fleet) contrary to the laws againſt Popiſh "recuſants, ſhould be ſpeedily levied and applied "to the public ſervice."

They likewiſe appointed a committee to examine who were the adviſers and proſecuters of the murders of the lord Ruſſel, colonel Sidney, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, mr. Corniſh, and others; ſo that had they accompliſhed all they begun, they would juſtly have deſerved the thanks of the nation: but we ſhall ſee below, that the proceedings of this ſitting met with the ſame obſtructions as thoſe of the foregoing.

Proceedings concerning the lord Griffin;

The houſe of lords, had, in the mean time, the affairs of the lords Griffin and Preſton before them. The former had been often required to attend the ſervice of that houſe; but ſtill refuſing, they addreſſed his Majeſty to ſummon him, by his royal proclamation, to render himſelf, at a certain day, to that houſe, if ſiting, if not, to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. This being done, he ſurrendered himſelf accordingly to the lord Nottingham, and the day the parliament met appeared before the houſe of peers. The ſpeaker told him, he knew what he had to do previous to his ſiting in that houſe; upon which his lordſhip declared, he was not prepared to receive the oaths, and deſired time to conſider of it. This was readily granted him; but two days after, a packet was intercepted, which plainly ſhewed the lord Griffin had no deſign to reconcile himſelf to the government (2). Upon this, his houſe and papers were ſearched, and, he abſconding, his lady was ſent to the Tower. Several other ſuſpected perſons were taken up, and the cuſtom-houſe officers ordered to ſtop all unknown perſons, who offered to go out of the kingdom without paſſes. His lordſhip finding it, thereupon, difficult to eſcape, ſurendered himſelf, in a few days, to the earl of Shrewſbury, ſecretary of ſtate, who having examined him, commited him to the cuſtody of a meſſenger, from whence he was afterwards ſent to the Tower. The houſe of commons, hereupon, appointed a committee, to inquire how the lord Griffin knew a reſolution, with which the King had intruſted four perſons only. The lords being jealous of this proceeding of the commons, addreſſed the King, to let him know, that the lord Griffin being a member of their houſe, they only were his competent judges. His Majeſty having left the cognizance of this matter to the lords, they began to inſpect into the intercepted papers, which was all the evidence they had againſt the lord Griffin, who after the matter had been warmly debated, was inlarged upon bail (3).

William & Mary. An' 1689.

The lords had, at the ſame time, the affair of the lord Preſton under their conſideration. This lord, who was a Scotiſh viſcount, had preſented to the houſe of peers a patent from the late King James, dated Verſailles, the 21ſt of January, creating him a baron of England; upon which their lordſhips voted him guilty of high-treaſon; refering, however, the examination of the matter to the judges. His lordſhip's plea was, that the patent was dated the day before the meeting of that convention which had voted the throne vacant, and ought therefore, to be deemed valid: but to this he was anſwered, that the vacancy was ſuppoſed to begin from the moment the King left the kingdom. The judges bringing in the lord Preſton, the next day, guilty of a high miſdeamenor, he was commited to the Tower. His lordſhip, ſoon after, acknowleged his fault, and beged pardon for it, in a petition to the lords; but it was rejected, becauſe he ſubſcribed himſelf viſcount Preſton, without mentioning of what kingdom: this he remedied the next day, by another petition ſigned viſcount Preſton of Scotland, and was thereupon releaſed without bail (4).

And the lord Preſton.

As for public affairs before the two houſes, there were three in particular that gave occaſion to the ſame heats and animoſities, which had drawn the proceedings of the firſt ſeſſions into ſuch a length; theſe were the miſcarriages of Ireland; the ill ſucceſs of the fleet, and the bill of indemnity. As for the firſt, information having been given to the houſe of commons, that the army under duke Schomberg had been bare 14,000 men, tho' there were 23,000 upon the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, they deſired his Majeſty to appoint commiſſioners, to inquire into the condition of that army, which his Majeſty aſſur'd that houſe he would do (5). In theſe debates, ſome reflections were caſt on duke Schomberg, for not fighting King James's army; and tho', with thoſe who knew his capacity and affection to the eſtabliſh'd government, all apologies were ſuperfluous, yet his grace being inform'd, that his conduct, had been call'd in queſtion, even in parliament, he acquainted his Majeſty with the reaſons that had oblig'd him not to come out of his camp, when King James's army was ſo near him, moſt of which I have already hinted at. They were, in general, that his army never had exceeded 12,000 men, moſt of them new-rais'd levies, whereas the late King had double that number: that he waited above a month for artillery-horſes and carriages; that his army had always been in want of bread, both men and horſes of ſhoes, and the ſurgeons and apothecaries of proper medicines for the ſick. This account was confirm'd at all hands, and it appear'd, that the miſcarriages of Ireland were wholly chargeable

Miſcarriages of Ireland inquir'd into.

(1) The oppoſers of this bill argued, that it is contrary to the eſtabliſhed laws to proceed againſt a man after his death, whether natural or violent, and might be of very ill conſequence.

(2) The diſcovery was made in the following manner: his lordſhip had cauſed a large tin bottle to be made, with a double bottom, which he ſent by his cook to a pewterers, to have the falſe bottom ſoldered in, at an unſeaſonable time of night. The pewterer obſerving a packet between the two bottoms, and the cook not giving the beſt account of it, he opened it; when finding ſeveral letters directed to King James, the duke of Berwick, &c. he ſeized the fellow, and carried him before a ſecretary of ſtate. The ſervants refuſing the pewterer admitance, their maſter being in bed, delayed the time ſo long, that the lord Griffin, ſuſpecting what had befalen his cook, took this opportunity to get out of the way. There was found in the bottle, beſide the letters, an account of ſome private reſolutions of the council, and an exact liſt of all the land and ſea-forces of England.

(3) The caſe of colonel Algernon Sidney, having been examined not long before, and the lords having reſolved, that he was unjuſtly condemned, becauſe nothing but writings found in his cloſet had been produced in evidence againſt him, the earl of Rocheſter argued, from a parity of reaſon, in favor of the lord Griffin, which had great weight with the houſe; tho' it would puzzle a Jeſuit to aſſign the parity between theſe two caſes.

(4) It was alledg'd in his behalf, that he meant no affront to King William, by accepting of a patent from King James, but only to ſecure his own perſon from impriſonment, he being, at that time, proſecuted at law, by the lord Montague, for a conſiderable ſum.

(5) Notwithſtanding this aſſurance of the King's, ſome members were for carrying the matter farther, and mov'd that the commons ſhould ſend commiſſioners of their own appointing, as well to look into the expenſe, as to prevent falſe muſters; but this ſeem'd to be an incroachment on the King's prerogative, which his Majeſty was afterwards, however, pleas'd voluntarily to wave.

on mr. Shales, who was purveyor-general to the army: for had there not been a want of proviſions, and a train of artillery, at the duke's firſt coming to Dundalk, the conſternation of the Iriſh was then ſo general, that he might, in all probability, have march'd directly to Dublin, without oppoſition. The commons hereupon, voted an addreſs, the 19th of November, to deſire his Majeſty to cauſe Shales to be arreſted, and all his papers, accounts and proviſions to be ſeiz'd. The next day, major Wildman reported his Majeſty's anſwer, which was: "that having been inform'd "of Shales's miſdemeanors in his imploy, he had, "ſometime before, taken order therein, and writ-"ten to duke Schomberg, for that purpoſe; and "that he verily believed what was deſired, was al-"ready effectually done, tho', the wind being "contrary, he had not yet any account of it from "Ireland." The upſhot was, that duke Schomberg put Shales under arreſt, and thus the matter ended; for tho' the commons twice addreſs'd the King, to name thoſe who had recommended Shales into his ſervice, all the ſatisfaction they could get was, "that it was impoſſible for his Majeſty to "give an anſwer to that queſtion" (1).

The 30th of November, the King ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, by mr. comptroller Wharton, "that having declared his reſolution to "carry on the war in Ireland to the utmoſt of his "power, and to uſe the moſt effectual means for "that purpoſe, he was willing that the commons "ſhould recommend a certain number of perſons, "not exceeding ſeven, to whom he would give "commiſſions to overlook the neceſſary prepara-"tions for that war, and alſo that they ſhould "appoint ſome perſons to inſpect the condition of "the army in Ireland;" a laudable condeſcenſion hardly to be parallel'd in our hiſtory: and the houſe of commons received it with that univerſal applauſe it juſtly merited. They return'd his Majeſty thanks for it, and excus'd themſelves from naming any body, humbly leaving the choice to his Majeſty's great wiſdom. To this addreſs the King was pleas'd to anſwer:

"Gentlemen,

"I ſhall take all the care that may be, to carry "on the war in Ireland with vigor, and to im-"ploy ſuch perſons as may be moſt proper for the "ſervice: and I doubt not but I ſhall have the "aſſiſtance of the houſe of commons, to carry it "on in ſuch a manner, as may be according to "your deſires and my intentions."

Miſcarriages of the fleet examin'd into.

As for the miſcarriages of the fleet, it appear'd, that they proceeded chiefly from a raging ſickneſs among the ſeamen, occaſion'd by bad proviſions; and the houſe of commons having received information, that great quantities of corrupt and unwholeſome victuals had been furniſhed to the navy, this laſt ſummer, which had been the occaſion, as was conceived, of great ſickneſs and mortality in the fleet; and the ſame being atteſted by ſeveral members of the houſe, upon their own knowledge; it was reſolved, the 23d of November, "that ſir John Parſons, ſir Richard Haddock, "alderman Sturt, and mr. Nicholas Fenn, victual-"lers of the fleet, ſhould be ſent for in the cuſtody "of the ſerjeant at arms, to anſwer to the ſaid "complaint," and they were all turn'd out.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1689.

The bill of indemnity was again an amuſement to both houſes for a conſiderable time, but to as little purpoſe as in the foregoing ſeſſion. The lords acquainted the commons that they had appointed a committee to inquire who had adviſed the uſing of Quo warranto's, againſt corporations, and deſir'd that mr. Hamden, junior, and mr. Trenchard, two of their members might appear before the committee they had named to find out the authors and promoters of the execution of the lord Ruſſel, Algernon Sidney, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, and mr. Corniſh. They appeared accordingly, but as the matter came to nothing, I ſhall not detain the reader with any farther account of it.

Farther proceedings on the bill of indemnity;

I have already mentioned, that the bill to ſettle the rights of the ſubjects, and the ſucceſſion of the crown, paſſed the houſe of commons with great unanimity and diſpatch, when it came before the lords, they wiſely conſider'd how far King James had gone towards introducing the Popiſh religion into this kingdom, and, therefore, to prevent the like for the future, added the following clauſe to it: "That the Kings "and Queens of England ſhould be oblig'd, at their "coming to the crown, to take the teſt, in the "firſt parliament that ſhould be call'd at the be-"gining of their reign; and that if any King "or Queen of England ſhould imbrace the Ro-"man Catholic religion, or marry with a Roman "Catholic Prince or Princeſs, their ſubjects ſhould "be abſolv'd of their allegiance, and that the crown "and government of theſe realms ſhould from time "to time deſcend to, and be injoy'd by ſuch perſons, "being Proteſtants, as ſhould have inherited the "ſame, in caſe the ſaid perſons, ſo reconcil'd to "the church of Rome, or marrying a Papiſt, as "aforeſaid, were naturally dead." Some few days after, the lords made a farther progreſs in this bill; and the diſpenſing power, which was mention'd in it, as one of the chiefeſt grievances, being brought upon the carpet, ſome pretended to aver, that ſuch a power was a prerogative inſeparable from the crown, and that, in ſome caſes, the King may diſpenſe, if not with a law, yet with ſome part of it: but their opinion was rejected with ſome warmth.

And on that of rights.

About the begining of December, a queſtion was propos'd in the houſe of commons: "whether "a perſon having a place at court, or any depen-"dence upon the King, ſhould be a member of "that houſe?" This queſtion occaſion'd a very warm and obſtinate debate, but it was, however, at length, carried in the affirmative (2).

Queſtion concerning court and place-men.

The 14th of December, the houſe of commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, on which occaſion, ſome members who were diſſatisfied with the miniſtry, made heavy complaints of the late miſcarriages, which they caſt on them: this occaſioned very warm debates, and ended in a vote for an addreſs, humbly to repreſent to his Majeſty, the miſcarriages of Ireland, and of the fleet, and to deſire his Majeſty would be pleaſed to diſcover the authors of them, that they might be brought to puniſhment (3). The ſame day, ſir Thomas Clarges repreſented to the commons, that it was dangerous to bring ſo many

Miſcarriages again complain'd of

(1) This Shales had been purveyor to King James's army, when incamp'd on Hounſlow-heath, and he was ſhrewdly ſuſpected of treachery as well as knavery, and very probably was deeply guilty of both: but he had his patrons who ſcreen'd him from juſtice, and was one among the many who gave occaſion to the ſaying, that great kn——es are never puniſh'd.

(2) According to biſhop Kennet and others, it was rightly urg'd, "that if the negative prevail'd, the fitteſt perſons for pub-"lic imployments would remain excluded, and be debarr'd the opportunity of ſerving either the King or their country." And this has been the grand argument againſt the like queſtions ever ſince.

(3) Mr. Hampden, junior, who had been one of the loudeſt in theſe complaints, being named, among others, to draw up this addreſs, gave occaſion to a report, that it was levelled chiefly againſt the earl of Nottingham, and that he hoped, if he could get him removed, he ſhould ſtep into his office of ſecretary of ſtate.

foreign troops into the kingdom, and that it was both ſafer and more expeditious to imploy Engliſh-men, in the reduction of Ireland (1).

Bills paſs'd.

The 16th, the King gave the royal aſſent to two important bills; "one to grant an aid to their "Majeſties, of two ſhillings in the pound, for "one year: and the other to declare the rights and "liberties of the ſubjects, and to ſettle the ſucceſ-"ſion of the crown." In the latter was contained the whole declaration preſented to their Majeſties, on the 13th of February, with ſome additions concerning the limitation of the crown, particularly the clauſe mentioned above, to exclude all Papiſts from any hopes of the ſucceſſion.

Debates about the Princeſs Ann's revenue.

The next grand debate was upon a motion made, to ſettle a part of the public revenue on the Princeſs Ann of Denmark. The houſe was in general divided into thoſe who were for the motion, and thoſe who were for leaving that matter wholly to the King's diſcretion; but the former were again divided into two parties. The lord Eland, ſon to the marquis of Hallifax, mr. Finch and mr. Godolphin inſiſted upon 70,000 l. as the leaſt that could be allowed her Highneſs, whereas others were for reducing it to 50,000. The debate, growing warm, was adjourned to the next day; in the mean time, the King, being unwilling that ſo nice an affair ſhould be farther debated in parliament, ſent the earl of Shrewſbury and mr. Wharton to the Princeſs, to indeavor to perſuade her to rely upon his generoſity: but her anſwer was; "that ſince the affair was "before the commons, it muſt e'en take its courſe, "and be concluded by that wiſe body." The commons, therefore, reſumed the debate the next day, and at length agreed upon an addreſs to the King, that he would be pleaſed to ſettle 50,000 l. a year upon the Prince and Princeſs of Denmark; and it was ordered accordingly to be paid out of the exciſe (2).

More Bills paſs'd, and farther proceedings of the parliament.

The 23d of December, the King went again to the houſe of commons, and gave his aſſent to an act, "to prevent doubts and queſtions, concerning the "collection of the public revenue;" and to another, "for puniſhing officers and ſoldiers who "ſhould mutiny or deſert their Majeſties ſervice, "and for puniſhing falſe muſters." The ſame day mr. Hambden junior, preſented the addreſs concerning the miſcarriages of this year, againſt which ſeveral exceptions were made, by ſome, becauſe it contained a tedious relation of all the ill ſucceſſes both by ſea and land, and was therefore too long; and by others becauſe it was too ſhort, and did not particularize thoſe things enough; the latter, however carried their point, and the addreſs was returned for that purpoſe. The 16th of January, the King gave the royal ſanction to "an act for a grant to their Ma-"jeſties of an additional aid of twelve pence in the "pound for one year," and another, "for charging "and collecting the duties upon coffee, tea, and "chocolate, at the cuſtom-houſe;" which latter bill now paſſed, with a proviſo of a draw-back, in the ſame manner, as the lords would have had it in the foregoing ſeſſion. The 23d, the commons proceeded again upon the bill of indemnity, but with as little ſucceſs as before; and the jarings and animoſities breaking out a-new, in ſuch manner that there was little probability of puting an end to them, otherwiſe than by puting a final end to their proceedings, his Majeſty thought fit to come to the houſe the 27th, to paſs ſuch bills as were ready for the royal aſſent; among which the principal were: "an act for the review of the poll-bill, and "for an additional poll: an act to prevent vexati-"ous ſuits againſt ſuch as had acted in order to the "bringing in their Majeſties, or for their ſervice; "and an act for the better ſecurity and relief "of the Iriſh Proteſtants:" by which latter bill, the acts of the parliament of Ireland were annulled, and that aſſembly declared to be unlawful and rebellious. After which his Majeſty made the following ſpeech:

My lords and gentlemen,

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"I am ſo ſenſible of the readineſs you have "ſhewed, to ſupply me with mony for the car-"rying on the war I am ingaged in, that I am glad "of this occaſion to give you thanks for your "chearful diſpatch, which was abſolutely neceſ-"ſary for the common ſafety. The beſt return I "can make to your kindneſs is, to aſſure you, that "as far as it will go, it ſhall all be imployed to the "purpoſes it was given.

"It is a very ſenſible affliction to me, to ſee my "good people burdened with heavy taxes. But "ſince the ſpeedy recovering of Ireland is, in my "opinion, the only means to eaſe them, and to "preſerve the peace and honor of the nation, I am "reſolved to go thither in perſon, and with the "bleſſing of God Almighty, indeavor to re-"duce that kingdom, that it may no longer be a "charge to them.

"And as I have already ventured my life, for "the preſervation of the religion, laws and liber-"ties of this nation, ſo I am willing again to "expoſe it, to ſecure you the quiet and injoyment "of them.

"The ſpring draws on, and it being requiſite I "ſhould be early in the field, I muſt immediately "imploy my thoughts, to the giving orders for the "neceſſary preparations, which that I may have the "more leiſure to do, I have thought convenient "now to put an end to this ſeſſion."

The parliament diſſolved, and another called.

The parliament being then, by his Majeſty's command, prorogued, to the 2d of April, was, by proclamation, on the 6th of the next month, diſſolved, and, at the ſame time, another called, to meet on the 20th of March.

Proceedings of the convocation.

I ſhall now give a brief account of the proceedings of the convocation. At their firſt meeting, at St. Paul's, the begining of November, all they did was to read the commiſſion, by which they were ſummoned, and then to adjourn to the 21ſt of that month (3). Both houſes being aſſembled, that day, at Weſtminſter, they proceeded to the election of their reſpective prolocutors or ſpeakers. The choice fell upon the biſhop of London for the upper, and dr. Jane for the lower houſe (4). The latter being preſented to the biſhops, the 25th, and approved, they both made ſpeeches, in the Latin tongue, tho' in a very different ſtrain; one breathing nothing

(1) Sir Thomas was miſled to this motion, by a falſe rumor, that beſide the 7000 Danes, which were by this time landed in England and Scotland, the King had ſent for 8000 foreign troops more.

(2) To this addreſs his Majeſty anſwered, "Gentlemen, whatſoever comes from the houſe of commons is ſo agreable to me, "and particularly this addreſs, that I ſhall do what you deſire of me." Notwithſtanding which, tho' this ſum was leſs than the Princeſs expected, it was generally believed to be more than the King would have given had it been left to him.

(3) The commiſſioners appointed by his Majeſty to prepare matters, debated, in the mean time, an important point among themſelves, viz. the re-ordaining of Diſſenting miniſters, which had always been the greateſt obſtacle to the reconciling the Preſbyterians of England, to the national church, and they concluded, that to the common form, the following words might be added, by way of lenity, "in caſe the ordination you have already received, be any ways defective."

(4) Dr. Tillotſon, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, was ſet up in oppoſition to dr. Jane: moſt of the biſhops, and of the moderate part of the inferior clergy were for him, and it was generally believed, that if this great ornament of the church of England, and truly worthy divine, had ſat in the prolocutor's chair, his chriſtian moderation, and pious example, would have gone a great way towards ſoftning the rigid principles of ſome of the moſt bigoted and prejudiced of the inferior clergy.

but moderation and chriſtian charity, the other red-hot with pride and perſecution. Dr. Jane's conſiſted chiefly in encomiums on the church of England, eſtabliſhed by law, which he, indeed juſtly, extolled above all other chriſtian communities; but at the ſame time ended with a caution, "not to change the "laws and conſtitutions of England;" or, as he meant it, not to make any change in the ceremonies of the church; as if, with all its perfection, it had not ſome ſuperfluities, or at leaſt indifferent things, which it might have parted with, for the eaſe of tender conſciences, and to bring about the ſo much wiſhed for comprehenſion. The biſhop of London, on the contrary, told the aſſembly, "they ought to "indeavor a temper in thoſe things, that are not eſ-"ſential in religion, thereby to open the door of ſalva-"tion to abundance of ſtraying chriſtians; that it was "their duty to ſhew the ſame indulgence and charity "to the Diſſenters, under King William, which "ſome of the biſhops and clergy had promiſed "them in their addreſſes to King James;" and cloſed his diſcourſe with an exhortation to unanimity and concord. Nothing of moment paſſed the firſt day, but the next, the biſhop, plainly perceiving, that the majority of the lower houſe would oppoſe the intended union with the Diſſenters, in order to gain time to bring them, if poſſible, to another temper, told them; that having communicated the commiſſion, by which they were aſſembled, to an eminent civilian, he had found it defective, for want of the great ſeal, and therefore they muſt adjourn 'till another was procured (1). The new commiſſion being ready, was brought to both houſes aſſembled in King Henry VIIth's chapel, by the earl of Nottingham, together with a letter from his Majeſty, importing, "that he ſummoned them, not only "becauſe it was uſual upon holding of a parliament, "but out of a pure zeal to do every thing that "might tend to the beſt eſtabliſhment of the church "of England, which is ſo eminent a part of the "reformation, and is certainly the beſt ſuited to "the conſtitution of the government, &c. and "that he expected the things he propoſed ſhould be "calmly and impartially conſidered, he intending "to offer nothing but what ſhould be for the ho-"nor, peace and advantage, both of the Pro-"teſtant religion in general, and particularly of "the church of England." The earl of Nottingham accompanied this letter with an eloquent ſpeech, exhorting them to lay aſide all partial prepoſſeſſions and animoſities in their debates.

An addreſs of thanks, being immediately voted, was drawn up by the biſhops, but the latter part of it acknowleging his Majeſty's favor in aſſembling them to indeavor a reconciliation of the Diſſenters, the lower houſe diſagreed to it. Upon this another was drawn up by a committee of both houſes, and preſented by ſix or ſeven biſhops, and ſeveral doctors of divinity. It contained in ſubſtance, "that "they gratefully acknowleged his Majeſty's pious "zeal and care for the honor, peace, advantage "and eſtabliſhment of the church of England, "which, they doubted not, would tend to the "ſecurity and intereſt of the Proteſtant religion, in "all other Proteſtant churches, &c. and aſſured his "Majeſty they would conſider whatſoever ſhould "be offered them by his Majeſty, without preju-"dice, and with calmneſs and impartiality, &c." His Majeſty addreſſing himſelf to the biſhops, anſwered: "He took this addreſs very kindly "from the convocation, that they might depend "on it, he would do all he had promiſed, and all "he could do for the church of England, and he "gave them this aſſurance, that he would improve "all occaſions and opportunities for its ſervice." The King however, plainly perceived, that this addreſs was a meer compliment, and that by their expreſſion of tenderneſs for the Proteſtant religion, they had more an eye to the reformed churches abroad, than to the Diſſenters at home: His Majeſty therefore thought fit to adjourn them to the 24th of January (2).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

The King and Queen dine in the city.

This year the King and Queen, with the Prince and Princeſs of Denmark, and both houſes of parliament, having accepted of ſir Thomas Pilkington's invitation to dine with him at Guild-hall, on the nine and twentieth of October, the day of his being ſworn in Lord-mayor for the inſuing year, nothing was omited that could augment the ſplendor by which the city indeavored to teſtify the dutiful reſpect they owed their ſovereigns. And his Majeſty, on his ſide, to ſhew the value and love he had for his metropolis, about this time, allowed the company of Grocers to chuſe him their ſovereign maſter.

His Majeſty maſter of the Grocers company.

Indignity offer'd the King's picture.

Not many days after, ſome vile wretches offered an indignity to his Majeſty's picture in Guild-hall, by cuting away the crown and ſcepter. Upon which, the Lord-mayor and court of Aldermen offered a reward of 500 l. to whomever ſhould diſcover the author of this mean and audacious action.

Envoys ſent abroad.

Towards the latter end of this year, mr. Cox was ſent envoy to Switzerland, and mr. Stanhope, brother to the lord Cheſterfield, to Spain: about the ſame time, the lord Paget was ſent to the Imperial court, and the lord Durſley to Holland, to relieve the earl of Pembroke, who had been ſent thither in the begining of the year; he was now made privy-counſellor, and, ſoon after, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, upon the voluntary reſignation of the lord Torrington.

AN' 1690.

The Queen of Spain convoy'd to the Groyne.

The King of Spain, having married the Princeſs Mariana of Newbury (ſiſter to the Empreſs and the Queen of Portugal) by proxy, deſired of King William, an Engliſh convoy to ſee her ſafe to the Groyne. Vice admiral Herbert being appointed for that ſervice, ſet ſail for Holland, to take her Majeſty on board there, with a ſecond rate, four third rates, two fourth rates, and two yachts. He arrived at Fluſhing, the 12th of December of the foregoing year, and her Majeſty imbarking, about the middle of January, on board the duke, they arrived the 18th in the Downs. Her Majeſty and her retinue being there removed into more proper

(1) During this interval, all poſſible indeavors were uſed, and even preferments offered, to the moſt obſtinate of the inferior clergy, to bring them to a charitable condeſcenſion with the Preſbyterians, but to no purpoſe. Their chief objections were, againſt diſpenſing with their re-ordination, which they thought derogatory to the dignity of the church of England; and that ſo important a ſtep ought not to be made before they were aſſured of their ſincere deſire of a reconcilement.

(2) It is very difficult to determine which ſide contributed moſt to the loſing of this happy and favorable opportunity: the majority of the biſhops ſeemed ſincerely inclined to make very large ſteps towards meeting the Diſſenters, and receiving them as ſons of the church, upon terms not very wide from what many of them profeſſed only to deſire. The lower houſe of convocation ſeemed indeed pretty obſtinately bent not to loſe an inch of ground, the alterations, propoſed by the commiſſion, were not debated, and their pretenſe that they ought not to make advances till they were aſſured of a hearty deſire for a reconcilement, on the other ſide, ſavored more of pride, than of that charity and forbearance, ſo frequently and ſo forcibly recommended in ſcripture. Had they made the trial, and the Diſſenters had ſtood out, they would have had a good plea againſt them ever after: On the the other hand, it is aſſured, that the rigid Preſbyterians did not a little contribute to exaſperate the convocation againſt them, by giving, at the ſame time, orders to near fifty young ſtudents, and mr. Baxter, one of their heads; by publiſhing a book reflecting on the church of England. The Diſſenters made no advances; the court was believed to favor that ſide; and Epiſcopacy was aboliſhed in Scotland.

ſhips, they arrived the 24th at St. Hellens, where ſhe was complimented in the names of their Majeſties and of their royal highneſſes. The fleet put to ſea, and were drove back to Torbay twice, till, at length, being increaſed to 400 merchant ſhips, bound for the Streights, with about thirty men of war to convoy them, they ſet ſail again, on the 7th of March, and after a ſtormy paſſage arrived the 16th at the Groyne. The Queen and her retinue being landed, and the ſhips deſigned for the Mediteranean ſquadron diſpatched to Cadiz, the remainder of the fleet returned, and arrived, the 28th of April, at Portſmouth.

Affairs of Scotland.

Before I return to England, I ſhall juſt ſay a word or two of the affairs of Scotland. The greateſt part of the rebels having laid hold of the act of oblivion, and colonel Canon, with a handful of men under his command, being retired into the iſland of Mull, ſeveral of the regiments, which were in Scotland, were ſent into Ireland, to re-inforce duke Schomberg's army. This incouraged the Highlanders, to renew their excurſions, and to burn and plunder whereſoever they ſet footing. They marched out of Inverloghy, to the number of 800, headed by the laird of Lochelly, thinking to ſurprize Inverneſs, but in this they were timely prevented. There was at the ſame time, a general diſcontent, throughout the whole Scotiſh nation, on account of the prorogation of the late parliament, before their grievances were ſo fully redreſſed as they expected.

The rebels continuing ſtill in a body, and being preſſed by hunger and want, made frequent depredations in the low-lands, upon which the council of Scotland ordered general Mackay, and ſir Thomas Levingſton to march Northward, with a proper force, and the nobility, and other inhabitants, who were moſt expoſed, put themſelves into a poſture of defenſe. On the other hand, colonel Canon indeavored to ingage ſeveral perſons, in Edinburg, in his party; but his letters, with a pardon from King James, being intercepted, and his expectations thereby diſappointed, he retired to Ireland. The Highlanders, thereupon, choſe ſir Hugh Cameron, one of their country-men, for their leader, and continuing their excurſions under his command, King William thought fit to ſend duke Hamilton into Scotland, to have a watchful eye over them. Notwithſtanding this, having received a ſuccor of cloths, arms, ammunition and officers, from King James, from Ireland, they ventured ſoon after, to the number of 1500 men, to march as far as Strathſpag, in the county of Murray, where they expected to be joined by ſome malecontents of thoſe parts. To prevent this, ſir Thomas Levingſton marched with 800 foot, ſix troops of dragoons, and two troops of horſe, and fell ſo unexpectedly upon the rebels, that they fled, leaving near 500 men killed upon the place, and 100 priſoners, among whom were four captains, and other inferior officers. After this, ſir Thomas took the caſtle of Lethingdey, obliging the gariſon to ſurrender at diſcretion. Major Ferguſon, in the mean time, was as ſucceſsful, in the Iſland of Mull, where landing, he deſtroyed ſeveral places belonging to the rebels, drove them from the caſtle of Dewart, and obliged them to retire to their hills.

Not to paſs by the civil affairs of Scotland, the parliament meeting, the 15th of April, at Edinburg, the earl of Melvil, lord high commiſſioner, made a ſpeech, intimating "his Majeſty's grief, "that he could not be preſent with them, accord-"ing to their deſires, and his own wiſhes;" and after he had laid before them what his Majeſty had done, to deliver them from the yoke under which they groan'd, "he deſired an aſſiſtance of mony, "anſwerable to the expenſes his Majeſty had been, "and was ſtill obliged to be at, to ſecure their li-"berty and religion; and, laſtly, he exhorted "them to lay aſide all animoſities and private in-"tereſts, and jointly to labor the ſettlement of "public affairs." They ſhew'd, however, that their principal care was to eſtabliſh Preſbytery, and firſt paſſed an act for reſtoring the miniſters of that perſuaſion, who had been put out, ſince the firſt of January 1661, and afterwards another declaring all thoſe to be rebels who were actually in arms againſt King William and Queen Mary.

William & Mary. An' 1690.

Preparations for the expedition to Ireland.

To return to England, where, while the different parties were buſy in influencing the elections of parliament men, as uſual, his Majeſty was no leſs aſſiduous in forwarding the preparations for his expedition to Ireland, that both his ſubjects and his allies might ſee he was in earneſt. The old reigments were compleated, new ones were rais'd, the Daniſh forces were imbark'd for Ireland, and ſtrong draughts out of the guards were order'd to be in a readineſs, to attend his Majeſty thither.

The privy-ſeal and treaſury put in commiſſion.

In the mean time, to prevent ſuch heats as had ariſen in the late parliament, on account of the marquis of Hallifax being lord privy ſeal, his Majeſty reſolved to put that office into commiſſion, and, to that end, the 19th of February, appointed William Cheney, eſq; ſir John Knotchbull, baronet, and ſir William Pultney, his commiſſioners: and the ſame day of the inſuing month, a commiſſion for executing the office of lord high treaſurer, was given to ſir John Lowther, Richard Hambden, eſq; (who was alſo conſtituted chancellor of the exchequer) Thomas Pelham, eſq; and ſir Stephen Fox.

Proceedings of the parliament of England.

The parliament of England being met, the 20th of March, purſuant to ſummons, the King went to the houſe of peers, with the uſual ſolemnity, and the commons attending, ſir Robert Atkins, lord chief baron of the exchequer, and ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, ſignified his Majeſty's pleaſure to them, that they ſhould proceed immediately to the choice of a ſpeaker, and preſent him the next morning. The choice falling on ſir John Trevor, he was preſented and approved, the next day, accordingly, when his Majeſty, addreſſing himſelf to both houſes, told them:

His Majeſty's ſpeech to both houſes.

"That he was reſolved to leave nothing unat-"tempted, on his part, which might contribute to "the peace and proſperity of this nation; and find-"ing his preſenſe in Ireland would be abſolutely "neceſſary, for the more ſpeedy reducing of that "kingdom, he continued his reſolution of going "thither as ſoon as might be, and he had now "call'd them together, for their aſſiſtance, to ina-"ble him to proſecute the war, with ſpeed and "vigor; in which he aſſured himſelf of their "chearful concurrence, being a work ſo neceſſary "for their own ſafeties.

"That, in order to this, he deſired they would "forthwith make a ſettlement of the revenue, and "he could not doubt, but they would, therein, "have as much regard for the honor and dignity "of the Monarchy in his hands, as had been lately "ſhewn to others. That he had ſo great a confi-"dence in them, that if no quicker or more con-"venient way could be found for the raiſing of "ready mony (without which the ſervice could not "be perform'd) he ſhould be very well content, "for the preſent, to have it made ſuch a fund of "credit, as might be uſeful to them, as well as "himſelf, in this conjuncture; not having the leaſt "apprehenſions, but that they would provide for "the taking off all ſuch anticipations, as it ſhould "happen to fall under."

In the next place, he told them; "that it was "ſufficiently known, how earneſtly he had indea-"vor'd to extinguiſh (at leaſt to compoſe) all "differences amongſt his ſubjects, and, to that "end,

William & Mary. An' 1690.

" end, how often he had recommended an act of " indemnity to the laſt parliament. But ſince that " part of it which related to the preventing of pri- " vate ſuits was already inacted, and becauſe de- " bates of that nature muſt take up more of their " time, than could be now ſpared, from the diſ- " patch of other things, which were abſolutely ne- " ceſſary for the common ſafety, he intended to " ſend them an act of grace, with exceptions of " ſome few perſons only, but ſuch as might be ſuf- " ficient to ſhew his diſlike of their crimes, and, at " the ſame time, his readineſs to extend protection " to all his other ſubjects, who would thereby ſee, " that they could be recommended to him by no other " methods, than what the laws preſcrib'd, which " ſhould always be the only rules of his go- " vernment.

" That a farther reaſon which induced him to " ſend this act, at this time, was, becauſe he was " deſirous to leave no color of excuſe to any of " his ſubjects, for the raiſing of diſturbances in " the government, and eſpecially in the time " of his abſenſe; and that this he ſaid, both " to inform them, and to let ſome ill-affected men " ſee, that he was not unacquainted, how buſy " they were in their preſent indeavors to alter it.

" That amongſt other incouragements, which " his Majeſty found the diſaffected gave themſelves, " one of the ways by which they hoped to com- " paſs their deſigns was, by creating differences " and diſagreements in the counſels of both houſes, " which he hoped, they would be very careful to " prevent, ſince his and their greateſt enemies could " have no better inſtruments for their purpoſes, " than thoſe who ſhould any way indeavor, to " diſturb or delay their ſpeedy and unanimous pro- " ceeding, upon theſe neceſſary matters.

" His Majeſty, likewiſe, recommended to their " conſideration a union with Scotland, tho' he did " not mean it ſhould be now enter'd upon, but they " having propos'd this to him, ſome time ſince, " and the parliament there having nominated com- " miſſioners for that purpoſe, he ſhould be glad " that commiſſioners might be nominated here to " treat with them, and to ſee if ſuch terms could " be agreed on, as might be for the benefit of both " nations, ſo as to be ready to be preſented to him " in ſome future ſeſſion.

" He then acquainted them, he thought it moſt " convenient to leave the adminiſtration of the " government in the hands of the Queen, during " his abſenſe, and if it was judged neceſſary to " have an act of parliament for the better confir- " mation of it to her, he deſir'd they would pre- " pare ſuch a one; and concluded, that the ſea- " ſon of the year, and his journey into Ireland, " would admit of but a very ſhort ſeſſion; ſo " that he recommended to them the making ſuch " diſpatch that they might not be ingaged in de- " bates, when their enemies were in the field; " for the ſucceſs of war, and the more thrifty " management of it, would both principally de- " pend upon their ſpeedy reſolutions. But he " hoped it would not be long before they ſhould " meet again, to perfect what the time would not " now allow to be done (1).

William & Mary. An' 1690.

This ſpeech had all the good effect that could be wiſh'd: for the commons immediately proceeded to ſettle a revenue for the maintenance of the civil liſt (2). To this end, they granted to their Majeſties King William and Queen Mary, all the revenues that King James injoyed, the 20th of December, 1688, as rights of the crown, except chimny-mony. They then order'd a bill to be brought in againſt alienation of the crown-revenues, upon any pretenſe whatever; likewiſe that their Majeſties, ſhould be put into the poſſeſſion of ſuch additional exciſes, as had been granted to Charles II, and James II, and ordered that revenue to be a ſecurity, for the raiſing preſent mony: and farther, they granted them, for four years (to begin from Chriſtmas following) the cuſtoms, which Charles II and James II, had injoyed, and upon which their Majeſties might take up a ſum of money, ſuch as ſhould be regulated by parliament. Upon theſe votes, ſeveral private perſons were incouraged to advance the King large ſums for his intended expedition.

Crown. The revenue ſettled.

Soon after, the commons prepar'd two bills, " one to declare guilty of high-treaſon, all thoſe " who were actually in King James's ſervice in Ire- " land, with forfeiture of their eſtates to their Ma- " jeſties, unleſs their children were Proteſtants;" and the other, " to confirm all the acts of the " convention-parliament, by which King William " and Queen Mary were acknowledg'd to be law- " ful King and Queen of England."

At length, the act of oblivion or indemnity, which the King had ſo long deſired, paſſed both houſes, tho' it met with many difficulties, and with the excluſion of thirty one perſons only (3). All matters being thus brought to a happy concluſion in ſo ſhort a time, his Majeſty came to the houſe the 20th and 23d of May, and gave the royal aſſent to ſuch public and private bills, as were prepared for that purpoſe. Of theſe the principal, beſide the act of indemnity, were " an act for " puting the adminiſtration of the government " into the Queen's hands, not only during the " King's being in Ireland, but whenever his " affairs ſhould call him out of the kingdom, (4) " &c. and an act for reverſing the judgments in a " Quo warranto againſt the city of London, and " for reſtoring that great metropolis of this king- " dom to its ancient rights and privileges." This done, his Majeſty returned thanks to both houſes, " for the aſſurances of their affection to him, and " particularly for the ſupplies given him," and then recommending to them, " the diſcharge of " their duties, in their reſpective counties, that the " peace of the nation might be ſecured, by their " vigilance and care, in their ſeveral ſtations," he order'd the parliament to adjourn to the 7th of July.

Acts paſſed.

The parliament adjourn'd.

During this ſeſſion, and before his Majeſty's departure for Ireland, he was pleaſed to confer the following titles. The 17th of April, Richard lord

Titles and preferments.

(1) At the opening of this ſeſſion, the biſhop of Oxford took the oaths and ſubſcribed the declaration; upon which he was admited to his place in the houſe of lords.

(2) Upon this occaſion, ſir Charles Sidney made a very remarkable ſpeech againſt exorbitant penſions and ſalaries, which, tho' very much extolled by ſome, was not of ſufficient weight to influence the proceedings of a majority.

(3) The perſons excluded the benefit of this act, were William marquis of Powis; Theophilus earl of Huntington; Nathaniel biſhop of Durham; Thomas biſhop of St. David's; Robert earl of Sunderland; lord Thomas Howard; Henry lord Dover; John earl of Melfort; Roger earl of Caſtlemain; ſir Edward Hales; Thomas Tildeſley, eſq; Rowland Tempeſt, eſq; colonel Robert Lundee; mr. William Molineux; ſir Edward Herbert; ſir Francis Wythen's; ſir Edward Lutwyche; ſir Thomas Jenner; ſir Richard Holloway; ſir Richard Heath; colonel Townley; ſir Nicholas Butler; Edward Morgan, eſq; Robert Brent, eſq; mr. Richard Graham; mr. Philip Burton; dr. Obediah Walker; Edward Petre, jeſuit; Mattnew Crane; ſir Roger L'eſtrange; and George lord Jefferies. Oldmixon p. 41.

(4) There was one clauſe in this act, which was looked upon as ſomething ſingular; viz. " that the Queen might be " controuled, by an order from his Majeſty while he was abroad; " and was interpreted by ſome as a great diſtruſt of that Princeſs.

William & Mary. An' 1690.

William viſcount Lumley was created earl of Scarborough; Henry lord Delamere, earl of Warrington, and Henry lord Grey, of Ruthyn, viſcount de Longueville; and the lord Willoughby of Ereſby was, by his Majeſty's writ, introduced into the houſe of lords. About the ſame time his Majeſty appointed admiral Torrington, ſir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral, and mr. Rook, rear-admiral of the red; and mr. Ruſſel, admiral, ſir John Aſhby, vice-admiral, and ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, rear-admiral of the blue ſquadron of the fleet. The third of June, the day before the King's departure, his Majeſty was pleaſed to appoint, ſir John Trevor (ſpeaker of the houſe of commons) ſir William Rawlinſon, and ſir George Hutchins, commiſſioners of the great ſeal of England: and Richard Pyne, eſq; ſir Richard Reeves, and Robert Rochford, eſq; were nominated commiſſioners of the great ſeal in Ireland. A few days before, a proclamation was publiſhed for apprehending ſeveral diſaffected perſons; and the deputy-lieutenants were impowered to raiſe the militia, upon any exigency.

Affairs of Ireland.

I come now to the affairs of Ireland; but before I give an account of what paſſed in that kingdom under the immediate direction of the King in perſon, it will be neceſſary to ſay ſomething of the ſtate of it before his Majeſty's arrival. We have already ſeen the poor ſtate duke Schomberg's army was reduced to by ſickneſs: however, thoſe who ſurvived, being refreſhed by the good proviſions his grace had taken care to provide for them, about the begining of February, they began to take the field. The general had information, that the enemy were drawing ſome forces towards Dundalk, in order to diſturb his frontier-gariſons, he therefore ſent a conſiderable body of troops that way, and marched himſelf, the 11th of that month, towards Drummore: but their deſign was to fall upon Belturbat, a town which colonel Wooliey had taken from them not long before. The colonel having intelligence of their deſign, marched with 700 foot and 300 horſe from Belturbat, intending to ſurprize them; but he was himſelf ſurprized to find 9000 men, in a poſture to receive him. He was advanced too far to retreat, therefore, after having made a ſhort ſpeech to his men, to incourage them, they fell upon the enemy with great intrepedity, and had the good fortune to rout them, to their conſiderable loſs. They purſued them as far as Cavan, which they ſet on fire, and in their return, took the caſtle of Killiſhandry; with a great booty of cattle. In the mean time, ſir John Lanier, with 1000 horſe, foot and dragoons, made an attempt on Dundalk, and took Bedloe-caſtle, with about 1500 cows and oxen. But King James, ſoon after, ſuſtained a more ſenſible loſs, I mean that of the caſtle of Charlemont, which was obliged to capitulate the 13th of May (1); and ſurrendered the 14th. The ſame day, colonel Wooliey, who had been re-inforced by a party of Danes, took the ſtrong caſtle of Balingargy near Cavan; upon which the Iriſh quited and burnt ſeveral caſtles, on that ſide; and prepared to abandon Dundalk, Ardee-caſtle Blaney, and Carrickmarch-croſs. Thus ſtood affairs in Ireland, at the time of the King's departure from England.

State of that kingdom before King William's arrival.

The Iriſh routed at Belturbat.

William & Mary. An' 1690.

His Majeſty departed from London the 4th of June, and dined that day at Tring in Hertfordſhire, the ſeat of Henry Guy, eſq; (2). He lay that night at Northampton, the next at Litchfield, the third at Whitchurch, and the fourth at colonel Whitley's between Cheſter and Highlake. The next day, the King went to Gayton, the houſe of mr. Gleg, where ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, and the reſt of the ſea commanders met him. The 11th his Majeſty imbarked at Highlake, and ſet ſail, about noon, with a fair wind (3); and arrived in the bay of Carrickfergus, the 14th early. He landed immediately, and went the ſame evening, in duke Schomberg's coach, to Belfaſt, where he was met by his grace, with the Prince of Wirtemberg, major-general Kirk, and other general officers. His Majeſty, who upon a certain occaſion, was heard to ſay; "he was "not to come to Ireland to let graſs grow under his feet;" ordered the whole army, (4) to march immediately into the field. Two or three days after, the army marched to Liſburn, where the general kept his quarters; from thence to Hillſborough, where he publiſhed an order, ſtrictly forbiding any violence being commited on the country people. From thence his Majeſty ordered the whole army to march, and to incamp at Loughbritland, where he arrived himſelf the 22d. Here he took a particular view of the army, and finding it to be in good heart and condition, he marched to Newry, and from thence, the 27th, to Dundalk (5).

King William goes to Ireland.

His proceedings there.

The battle of the Boyne.

The 30th, the King being informed, that the enemy had repaſs'd the Boyne (6), His Majeſty order'd his whole army to move, by break of day, in three lines, towards that river, which was about three miles diſtant from them. While his Majeſty was viewing the enemy's army, he received a wound by a cannon-ball on the right ſhoulder (7); (the Iriſh having placed two field pieces, oppoſite to where they had diſcover'd the King, for that purpoſe) but this did not hinder him from conti-

(1) This place, which had been blocked up, for ſome time, by the French regiments of la Caillemote and Cambon, was reduced to great ſtreights for want of proviſions. King James, being informed of their condition, ſent a ſtrong detachment, under Mackmahon, with proviſions to relieve it: Upon which duke Schomberg, who had intelligence of the deſign, gave the blockade orders to let Machmahon paſs, with his convoy, after a ſlender reſiſtance, but not to ſuffer any to return from the caſtle. By this means the garriſon ſuffered by the relief intended them: for being obliged to feed their new gueſts, they were ſoon more ſtreightned than before.

(2) His Majeſty was accompanied by his royal highneſs Prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough and Mancheſter, the honorable Mr. Boyle, and many other perſons of diſtinction.

(3) The fleet conſiſted of ſix men of war, ſix yachts, and as many tranſport veſſels, as made together about three hundred ſail, under the command of ſir Cloudeſly Shovel. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 633.

(4) The army then conſiſted of 36000 men, Engliſh, Dutch, French-refugees, Danes and Germans.

(5) The country pleas'd his Majeſty ſo well, as he rode along, that he was heard to ſay, it was worth fighting for.

(6) The late King James was no ſooner informed of King William's landing, but he begun to move likewiſe, and on the 16th of June ſet out from Dublin, with about 6000 French-foot, old ſoldiers, lately arived from France, leaving that city to the care of 6000 country-militia, under the command of colonel Lutterel. Having joined the reſt of his forces, which were now almoſt equal in number with thoſe of King William, beſide 15000 which remained in gariſons, he reſolved to repaſs the Boyne, and to weary out the Engliſh by marches and countermarches, along that river, thinking it impoſſible for them to paſs it, while he had ſuch an army on the oppoſite banks. However, as he knew, there was nothing but what King William was capable of attempting, he miſtruſted the event, and gave orders for ſhips to be prepared at Waterford, that in caſe he was worſted, he might ſecure his retreat into France.

(7) The ball firſt graz'd on the bank of the River, and in its riſing ſlant upon the King's right ſhoulder, took out a piece of his coat, and tore the skin and fleſh. This accident ſtruck all who were about the King with an inexpreſſible conſternation, while his Majeſty remained calm and unmoved. The enemy ſeing ſome diſorder among thoſe who were about the King, immediately concluded he was kill'd, which falſe report flew preſently to Dublin, and from thence to Paris, where the unthinking vulgar expreſs'd their ungenerous ſatisfaction by bonfires and illuminations: But count Buſſy de Rabutin, as famous for his pen as his ſword, expreſs'd himſelf in a more polite manner on this occaſion. He was at that time in Holland, whither he had continuing to perform every part of a brave commander. He remained on horſe-back till four in the afterooon, tho' he had been up from one in the morning. He then dined in the field, and mounted again in the evening: at twelve at night, he rode thro' the whole army, and then retired to his tent, in eager expectation of the glorious approaching day, which was to decide his and King James's deſtiny: it having been reſolv'd in a council of war, held that evening at nine, to try the event of a battle.

The next day, the army paſs'd the Boyne, and our brave and glorious Monarch fought the memorable battle call'd by that name, where he gave inimitable proofs of his courage and conduct, at the great hazard of his royal perſon, having part of his boot ſhot away by a cannon-ball, and obtain'd a compleat victory, which determined King James's fate, and oblig'd him to return to France. But to give ſome particulars of this memorable battle:

Battle of the Boyne.

The two armies being thus in ſight of each other, continued cannonading till the cloſe of the evening, and then ceas'd. King William had given orders, that every ſoldier ſhould have a good ſtock of ammunition deliver'd him, and be ready to march by break of day, each with a green bough or ſprig in his hat, to diſtinguiſh them from the enemy, who wore pieces of white paper. (1)

The expected day being come, about ſix in the morning, lieutenant-general Douglas march'd towards the right with ſome foot, as did count Schomberg (the general's ſon) with the horſe, which being obſerv'd by the enemy, they drew out their army towards the left to oppoſe them. King William's right wing was order'd to paſs, ſome regiments at Slane, and others at different fords, between that place and the camp. A regiment of the enemy's dragoons made a ſhew of oppoſing the paſſage of the horſe, but being ſoon oblig'd to retire with loſs, the Engliſh got over, and advanc'd towards their main body, which they ſaw drawn up in two lines. Douglas's detachment conſiſted but of ſix battalions of foot, and twenty four ſquadrons of horſe; he therefore ſent for a re-inforcement of the former, and, in the mean time, drew up his troops in two lines, horſe and foot intermix'd, for their better ſecurity. More foot being come up, he drew all the horſe to the right, whilſt the foot mov'd towards a bog on the left, which lay between them and the enemy, and which it would have been impoſſible for the horſe to paſs. The Iriſh obſerving their motion, retreated in ſome confuſion towards Duleck, and were vigorouſly purſued by count Schomberg, with the horſe,

William & Mary. An' 1690.

King William, in the mean time, ſuppoſing this detachment to be got over the river, tho' he had no certain account what had paſs'd, order'd three attacks to be made. The firſt was at a good ford, before a ſmall village, where the Iriſh were advantageouſly placed. The Dutch foot-guards took the river firſt at old bridge, wading to the middle, and being got over, without halting, notwithſtanding the enemy's fire, drew up into two files, and then fir'd upon the Iriſh, who immediately abandon'd their intrenchments: but before the third battalion of that regiment had paſs'd the ford, five battalions of the enemy advanced within piſtol-ſhot of the Dutch, who received them ſo warmly, that they retreated with the loſs of colors, and ſome men: upon which the Dutch march'd beyond the village, and repuls'd a ſquadron of the enemy's horſe: ſir John Hanmore's and count Naſſau's regiments being, at the ſame time, paſſing the river, were oppos'd by lieutenant-general Hamilton's horſe; who, tho' they did not ſucceed in that attempt, part of them obtain'd ſome advantage over La Caillemote's and Cambon's regiments: but the Iriſh wheeling about thro' the village, to recover their own men, were intercepted by the Dutch and Iniſkillin foot, and moſt of them, after a valiant reſiſtance, cut in pieces.

The Dutch guards being, by this time, advanced as far as the hedges, into the open field, the Iriſh came down upon them again, in greater numbers, and with redoubled fury: but the Dutch withſtood them, with ſo much firmneſs, till other regiments came to their aſſiſtance, that the Iriſh were oblig'd to retreat; and tho' a freſh ſquadron of horſe advanced to ſupport them, they were vigorouſly repuls'd by the French Proteſtants, and the Iniſkillin men (2).

The Danes, in the mean time, came up to the left, as did the brigades of Hanmore and La Melloniere on the right. The firſt were ſo valiantly attack'd, in the front, by Hamilton's horſe, had been oblig'd to retire, on account of ſome ſatyrical pieces he had written on the gallantries of the French court. In a letter from thence, to the abbot de Choiſy, dated Auguſt, 17, 1690, he expreſſes himſelf in the follow manner: "The "Gazets aſſure us, that the Prince of Orange is not dead; if ſo, that Prince is at the height of glory, in having gain'd a "battle, in having been wounded, and in having known, by the extraordinary joys, at the report of his death, how much "his enemies fear'd him."

In anſwer to this, the abbot ſent him the following lines:

Qu'il ſoit mort, on qu'il ſoit en vie,
Il eſt toujours digne d'envie;
S'il eſt mort, il eſt glorieux,
S'il eſt vivant, il eſt heureux.

Engliſhed thus;

Be either life or death his fate,
Our envy will his worth expreſs:
If dead, his glory's now compleat,
If living, crown'd with happineſs.

(1) The importance of this battle was equally great, whether we conſider the quality of the leaders, or the ſubject of their quarrel. We behold here two Monarchs, nearly allied in blood, and nearer yet by marriage, going to contend for no leſs a prize than the Imperial crown of Great Britain, on the ſucceſs of whoſe arms, the fate of their reſpective allies, and in them of all Europe, ſeem'd in a great meaſure to depend: If we caſt an eye upon the two armies, we ſee them both animated by the preſenſe of their ſovereign, and both fighting for their religion; and thus far the advantages ſeem to be equal; but they will be no longer ſo if we look farther, either into the motives, or the circumſtances on both ſides. The Engliſh, beſide their religion, had their laws and liberties to contend for; whereas their adverſaries had nothing to hope for, by a victory, but to remain the ſame abject ſlaves they were before. The Iriſh had ſome advantage in the ſituation of their army; but the Engliſh were ſupported by Dutch and Daniſh veteran troops, ſtrangers to fear, familiar with victory, and fluſh'd with plenty; whereas, ſeting aſide the French auxiliaries I have mention'd above, King James's army conſiſted chiefly of an undiſciplined mob, diſheartened by ſeveral defeats, and depreſs'd by want. The difference between the chief officers on both ſides was much the ſame; ſo that notwithſtanding the advantage of ſituation was againſt him, and the number of troops pretty equal, King William was certainly in the right to attempt the paſſage of the Boyne.

(2) At the firſt of theſe Onſets, the brave monſieur La Caillemote, a conſtant companion of duke Schomberg's, in all his fortunes, receiv'd his death's wound; who when he was carrying off, by four ſoldiers, to the Engliſh camp, with his laſt breath, incourag'd thoſe who were croſſing the river, with theſe words, "à la gloire, mes enfans, à la gloire; (to glory, my dear children, "to glory.)

that

that they gave ground, and were oblig'd to croſs the river. Duke Schomberg, perceiving this diſorder, and ſeing the French Proteſtants were likewiſe left expoſed, without a commander, immediately paſs'd the river, in order to head them, nor would he be perſuaded to put on his armor, tho' mr. Foubert, one of his aids de camp, very much urged him to it. He was no ſooner on the other ſide, than he incourag'd the French Proteſtants, by this ſhort harangue: "Allons, meſſieurs, "voila vos perſecuteurs; (come on, gentlemen, ſee "there are your perſecutors,") pointing to the French Papiſts, in the enemy's army. Theſe words were hardly out of his mouth, when fifteen or ſixteen of King James's guards, who were returning full ſpeed to their main body, after the ſlaughter of their companions, and whom the French refugees had ſuffer'd to paſs, thinking them to be of their ſide, fell furiouſly on the duke, and gave him two wounds on the head, which however were not mortal.

Duke Schomberg kill'd.

This error was committed by the regiment of Cambon, and to amend it, they were guilty of a much greater; for firing raſhly on the enemy, they unfortunately ſhot the duke thro' the neck, of which wound he died immediately (1); and mr. Foubert, who alighted to relieve him, was ſhot in the arm.

And dr. Walker.

Not long before, the gallant dr. Walker, who had ſo bravely defended Londonderry, being near the King, received a wound in the belly, of which he died, quickly after, at Drogheda, whither he was carried.

During all theſe actions, King William might very well be ſaid to be every where, ſince every thing was carried on under his direction; but at length, his courage too had a ſhare in the honor of the day. His Majeſty, with the Prince of Denmark, croſſed the river, with the left wing of the horſe, not without ſome difficulty. As ſoon as the men had reached the other bank, and were put in order, the King drew his ſword, and marched at the head of them towards the enemy, who were coming on again in good order towards the Engliſh foot, which had now got over the paſs, and were advancing bravely towards the Iriſh, tho' twice their number. When theſe two bodies were got almoſt within muſket-ſhot of one another, the enemy ſaw the left wing of the Engliſh horſe marching towards them, upon which they made a ſudden halt, faced about, and retreated up the hill again to a little village called Dunmore, about half a mile from the paſs. There the Engliſh came up with them in very good order, when reſuming courage, they faced about, and made the Engliſh horſe give way in their turn, tho' the King was at their head. His Majeſty thereupon rode up to the Inniſkilliners, and aſked them what they would do for him? Excited by this invitation, they came boldly forwards, and at the head of them, the King received the enemy's fire, and then wheeling to the left, to fetch up his own men again, the Inniſkilliners, thro' a miſtake, retired after him above a hundred yards. This made the King move to the left, to put himſelf at the head of ſuch Dutch troops as were advancing; while the Inniſkilliners, ſeeing their error, went on again ſucceſsfully to the charge. William & Mary. An' 1690.

In this place, duke Schomberg's regiment of horſe, being all French Proteſtants, and ſtrengthned by treble the uſual number of officers, behaved with undaunted reſolution. At the ſame time, another party commanded by lieutenant-general Ginckel, charged in a lane to the left, but was ſoon over-powered by the Iriſh, and forced to give way. This being obſerved by a party of ſir Albert Cunningham's dragoons, and another of colonel Leviſon's, the officers ordered the men to alight and line a hedge, and a ruined houſe, which flanked the lane, from whence they poured in their fire upon the enemy. General Ginckel continued in the rear of his men, indeavoring to make them ſtand their ground, not without being in danger from the Engliſh dragoons; for the enemy being cloſe upon him they could not well diſtinguiſh. The dragoons did however a very ſingular piece of ſervice by ſtoping the enemy, who came up very boldly, and the Dutch horſe having an opportunity to rally here, as they did likewiſe to the right, after half an hours ſharp diſpute, the enemy were beat back again, with a conſiderable loſs.

Lieut. Gen. Hamilton

On the other hand, lieutenant-general Hamilton finding that his foot did not anſwer his expectation, put himſelf at the head of the horſe, which was likewiſe routed, and himſelf taken priſoner (2). While theſe things were doing on this ſide, count Schomberg, who was informed of his father's death, purſued the enemy, with that fury, which a noble and juſt reſentment inſpires, and drove them ſeveral miles beyond the village of Duleck, covering the ground, wherever he came, with ſlaughtered foes. Nor did he deſiſt, till the lord Portland, by his Majeſty's command, obliged him to return to a place where the foot halted, and remained on their arms all night.

K. William obtains the victory.

The battle was now at an end, and the victory obtained by King William's army: for no ſooner was general Hamilton taken, than the fight ceaſed on that ſide: and the count de Lauzun, making up to King James (who ſtood with ſome ſquadrons of horſe, upon the hill called Dunmore, during the whole action) told him how near he was being hemmed in by his enemies, adding, that he had nothing left to think off but a retreat, which he doubted not but to make good, with the many brave officers he had then about him, and the remains of his French and Swiſs troops. This advice was too wholeſome not to be followed: King James, therefore, being attended by the regiment of Sarsfied, marched off to Duleck, and from thence in great haſte, to Dublin, while the count de Lauzun, Sheldon, and ſome other officers made a tolerable good retreat. The Engliſh horſe purſued the fugi-

(1) Thus died the renown'd duke of Schomberg, one of the beſt generals France ever bred, a marſhal of that kingdom, and a grandee of Portugal, tho' by birth a Palatine. He was an officer of a firm and compos'd courage; had a great experience of the world, and as great a knowledge of men and things as ever man of his profeſſion had; he was equally great in council, or at the head of an army; and his judgment remain'd ſound to the laſt. To the laurels he gather'd in Catalonia and Flanders, he added the glory of having fixed the King of Portugal on his throne, and of having been inſtrumental to the ſettlement of King William. Never general ſerved under ſo many Kings, nor attained to the higheſt honors, in ſo many different places. He was upright, courteous, and affable to every body, and withal had an air of grandeur that commanded reſpect from all. He was of a middle ſtature, fair complexion, a hearty man of his age (which was 82 when he was killed) and ſat a horſe incomparably. He carried an air of youth and gaiety, as well in his addreſs as in his converſation, of which latter, the repartee I am going to mention is a pregnant inſtance: Being walking in St. James's park, ſome time before he went for Ireland, amidſt crouds of the young and gay, he was aſked, What a man of his age had to do with ſuch company? to which he anſwered; "A good general makes "his retreat as late as he can." He was not long ſurvived by his friend and companion, la Caillemote, who died of his wounds ſoon after.

(2) When Hamilton was brought to the King, his Majeſty aſked him; "whether the Iriſh would fight any more? Yes, "ſir "replied he, upon my honor I believe they will?" when he mentioned the word honor, the King looked ſtedfaſtly at him, and then turned about, repeating the words, "your honor", once or twice, intimating, that there was not much dependence on what he aſſured upon his honor, ſince he had forfeited that before, by his taking part with Tyrconnel, contrary to his promiſed allegiance to King William; and this was all the reproof his Majeſty gave him for his breach of truſt.

tives,

tives, and fired upon them from five ſmall field-pieces. The dragoons, ſupported by the horſe, attacked their rear. The foot purſued them four miles to Duleck, and the horſe four miles farther: but as the Iriſh are light of foot, and they moſtly leving their arms behind them, the ſlaughter was not great. King James's loſs in this battle is generally computed at 1500 men, among whom were the lords Dongan, and Carlingford, ſir Neal ONeal, the marquis d' Hocquincourt, and ſeveral priſoners, the chief of whom was lieutenant-general Hamilton. The loſs, on King William's ſide, was reckoned not to be above 500, a very inconſiderable number for a victory of this importance, and hardly worth naming had not the brave duke Schomberg been of the number (1).

Loſs on both ſides.

As for the King himſelf, he received no manner of hurt in the action, tho' he was in the heart of it, and expoſed to as much or more danger than any one perſon of the army, doing all that the greateſt general could do on this occaſion (2).

King James leaves Ireland.

King James, being arrived at Dublin, aſſembled the magiſtrates and council of the city, to whom he made a ſpeech, in which he complained, "that his "Engliſh army had deſerted him traiterouſly, and "his Iriſh army had baſely fled the field; ſo that "henceforward he never more determined to head "an Iriſh army, but did now reſolve to ſhift for "himſelf, as they muſt likewiſe do. That it had, "indeed, been often debated, whether upon de"ſerting the city of Dublin, it might not be ſet "fire to: but that he charged them upon their "allegiance, that they neither ſhould rifle it by "plunder, nor deſtroy it by fire, &c." He ſtaid at Dublin but one night, and the next morning, being attended by the dukes of Berwick and Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis, he poſted away for Waterford, where he arrived the ſame day. He there went on board a veſſel called the count de Lauzun, which lay ready to receive him, but meeting with a French ſquadron, commanded by the ſieur de Foran, at ſea, for greater expedition, he went on board a frigat, and by that means got once more into France. where, he fixed his abode at St. Germains. King James, was no ſooner gone, than all Roman Catholicks of note fled from Dublin, and the Proteſtants who were confined, being releaſed, poſſeſſed themſelves of the militia-arms. With the aſſiſtance of the biſhops of Meath and Limerick, they formed a committee to take care of affairs, and acquainted King William with what had paſſed, humbly praying his Majeſty to honor that city with his preſenſe (3).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN 1690.

Affairs of England.

I ſhall now leave his Majeſty for a while in Ireland, and return to England, where we ſhall find the Queen ſuſtaining the weight of affairs, and having a greater burden to labor under, than the King expected ſhe would have had: for tho' he was not unacquainted with the deſigns of his enemies in England, in concert with thoſe in France, yet he had reaſon to hope there would be a ſufficient ſtrength at ſea to prevent the execution of them. As ſoon as her Majeſty had news that the King was landed in Ireland, ſhe began to exerciſe the power veſted in her by parliament, and iſſued two proclamations; "one commanding all Papiſts, "and reputed Papiſts, forthwith to depart the cities "of London and Weſtminſter: the other for "confining them within five miles of their reſpective "dwellings." In the mean time, King James's adherents, who began now to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of Jacobites, laying hold of the opportunity of the King's abſenſe, to do ſomething in favor of the abdicated Monarch, had concerted timely meaſures with France to put their deſigns in execution. Their projects (4) ſeem to have been founded upon a preſumption, of the Engliſh fleet being firſt beaten by the French; of which, whether they had any foreſight, otherwiſe than from the inequality of ſtrength, which, at this time, was conſiderably to the advantage of France (5), we are yet in the dark. However it was, the con-

Deſigns of the Jacobites.

(1) The deſcription which father Orleans gives of this battle is ſhamefully partial. He makes King William's army to conſiſt of 45000 men, which is 9000 more than he had, and makes King James army 15,000 leſs than it was, by pretending it conſiſted but of 20,000 men, many of them half armed, and without artillery, excepting twelve field-pieces which were carried out of France, whereas King William, he ſays, had ſixty pieces of heavy cannon, which is equally falſe, and concludes, that their retreat was in good order, and very honorable, becauſe of the enemy's confuſion. (Very probable indeed, that victory, ſhould throw a ſuperior army into confuſion!) Echard's tranſlation of P. d' Orleans, p. 326. 327.

(2) The King, in this battle, choſe the field, diſpoſed the attacks, drew up his army, charged the enemy ſeveral times, ſupported his forces when they began to ſhrink, and in ſhort behaved himſelf the whole day with that conduct, gallantry, reſolution, and preſenſe of mind, and was ſuch a poize for the inclining victory to his own ſide, that the Iriſh themſelves confeſſed, That if the Engliſh changed Kings with them, they would fight the battle over again. Kennet.

Both Kings, however, have been equally blamed for not improving, one the advantage of his victory, and the other that of his retreat. Thoſe who have writ in favor of King James ſay, King William might have marched directly to Dublin, a place open and unfortified on every ſide; this might have prevented the Iriſh aſſembling any more, and ſecured Limerick, Galway, and ſeveral other important places; which protracted the war after King James had left the kingdom. On the contrary, thoſe who have written on King William's ſide blame as well King James, for leaving Ireland, with ſo much precipitation, as thoſe he left behind for not having carefully collected the remains of a defeat, that had coſt them but few men. Echard's tranſlation of P. d' Orleans, p. 327 and 328.

To the former of theſe charges, Oldmixon anſwers, in defenſe of King William, that beſide his certain information of an attempt intended from the French fleet, he had the war in Flanders at heart, and wanted to be in England, to have it nearer at hand, his Majeſty not doubting, but the buſineſs in Ireland, after King James's rout at the Boyne, might be as well done by his generals, as by himſelf in perſon. p. 45.

(3) How great the deliverance of the Proteſtants of Dublin was, by the victory at the Boyne, we cannot better conceive, than by remembring, that on the 18th of June, being four days after King William landed in Ireland, colonel Lutterel, governor of Dublin, iſſued out his order, "commanding all Proteſtants who were not houſe-keepers, to deliver up their arms, both "offenſive and defenſive, and likewiſe forbiding above five Proteſtants to meet any where, upon pain of death, or ſuch other "puniſhment as a court martial ſhould think fit." The governor being aſked, whether this was deſign'd to hinder meeting in churches? he anſwer'd, This was intended to prevent their aſſembling there, as well as in other places, and accordingly all the Proteſtant churches were ſhut up, throughout the whole kingdom. Hiſtory of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 76.

(4) It was agreed, that while part of the French fleet ſhould bear up the Thames to countenance the Jacobites in London, they ſhould make an inſurrection in ſeveral places at once. Certain perſons were to have taken upon them the adminiſtration of affairs, till the return of King James, who was to leave the command of his army in Ireland to his generals, and to haſten with all ſpeed into England. The other part of the French fleet, having joined their gallies, was to have landed 8000 men, at Torbay, with arms for a greater number, after which the gallies, and men of war, were to cruize in the Iriſh ſea, to hinder the return of King William and his forces: And the diſcontented Scots were to have revolted, at the ſame time, in ſeveral parts of that kingdom. Hiſt. of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 192.

(5) The Engliſh fleet was, this year, far inferior to the French, both in number of ſhips and forces. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 634.——This monſ. de Forbin, who was himſelf in the action, of which I ſhall preſently give an account, frankly allows, and aſſerts, that the number of the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips was but 58 of the line of battle, whereas, according to him, the French were 80. Memoires de Forbin: And with this, monſ. de Larrey (in his hiſtoire de France, ſous Louis XIV.) perfectly agrees. The marquis de Quincy, who (in his hiſtoire, mil de Louis XIV.) mentions every ſhip, and commander, by, name, makes them to be 78 men of war, from 100 to 40 guns, and 22 fire-ſhips, carrying together 4702 guns: and the ſame author allows the Engliſh and Dutch had but 57 men of war, great and ſmall, with about 30 ſmall veſſels, frigats and fireſhips.

ſpiracy being timely diſcovered, it prov'd abortive; tho' the grounds, upon which, as I have obſerved above, it ſeem'd to depend, were attended with ſucceſs, as I ſhall preſently ſhew. In the mean time, a report having been induſtriouſly ſpread, that a good number of the officers and ſeamen in the fleet, were diſaffected to the government, while they yet lay in the Downs, they thought the pereſt teſt they could give of their loyalty, would be an humble addreſs to their Majeſties, acknowledging their juſt and lawful title to the crown, and promiſing, with their lives, to defend them, againſt the late King James, his adherents, and all their enemies (1).

Addreſs of the officers of the fleet.

The French fleet comes into the channel.

The French fleet enter'd the channel, according to agreement, and hovered ſometime about the Engliſh coaſt, waiting the event of the conſpiracy, which was to have broken out the 18th of June. Queen Mary, who was ever vigilant for the ſafety of the kingdom, no ſooner got intelligence of it, than ſhe ſent orders to admiral Torrington to fight the enemy, wherever he ſhould meet them. The admiral, who, at that time, was, with the fleet, at St. Hellen's, was very much ſurpriz'd to hear the fleet was entered into our channel. For ſo little did he expect them, to be in ſuch a forwardneſs, that there were not, at that time, any ſcouts out weſtward, to obſerve, and bring an account of their motions (2). Upon this advice therefore, he got together what ſhips were within reach, both Engliſh and Dutch, and ſet ſail with them the 24th of June to meet the enemy's fleet, which had been diſcover'd, the day before, off of Freſh-water gate, on the back of the iſle of Wight: But the wind taking him ſhort, he came to an anchor, near Dungeneſs, within five leagues of the enemy. The next day, and the two following, his fleet being re-inforc'd by ſeveral, not only Engliſh but Dutch ſhips, under the command of admiral Evertzen,, and another flag-officer, and the two fleets being now pretty near, they remained in that poſture, looking at one another, till the 30th. In the mean time, notwithſtanding the great ſuperiority of the enemy (3), the admiral received poſitive orders (4) from court to give them battle: upon which, that morning, as ſoon as day-light appear'd, the ſignal was diſplay'd for the ſhips to draw into a line; and this being done, the whole fleet bore down upon the enemy, while they were under ſail, by a wind, with their heads northward, off of Beachy.

Sea-fight off of Beachy.

William & Mary. An' 1690.

About eight in the morning, another ſignal was given, which was for the battle, and then the French, bracing the head-ſails to the maſt, lay by. About an hour after this, the Dutch ſquadron, which led the van, under admiral Evertzen, begun the ingagement, with part of the van of the French, and half an hour after that, our blue ſquadron incounter'd their rear. The greateſt part of our red ſquadron, which was in the center, could not come up to the fight 'till it was near ten: and as they were at a conſiderable diſtance from the enemy, ſo was there a great opening between them and the Dutch (5).

It was remarkable, that as the Engliſh ſhips bore down upon the French, they laſked away; but that might probably be only to cloſe their line. After this, ſeveral of their ſhips towed round with their boats, till they were got out of ſhot, which gave the Engliſh reaſon to hope the advantage would have been on their ſide; but it was not long before they perceiv'd the Dutch had ſuffered very much, chiefly by their being (for want of a neceſſary precaution) weathered and ſurrounded by thoſe French ſhips, which they left a-head of them; when they began to ingage. The Engliſh admiral was no ſooner apprized of their condition, than he ſent them orders to come to an anchor, where they lay, at ſome diſtance from the French, without any ſail, and ranged in order of battle; (the only expedient, ſays monſ. Forbin, which could bring them off.) With his own ſhip, and ſeveral others, he drove between them and the enemy, and anchored about five in the afternoon, it being then calm, and the French fleet driving away with the tide. However, judging it not ſafe to renew the fight, at ſo great a diſadvantage, he weighed anchor, at nine in the evening, and retreated to the eaſtward, taking advantage of the flood-tide.

The confederate fleet retreats.

The firſt of July, in the afternoon, the admiral thought it neceſſary to call a council of war, in which it was reſolved: "To indeavor to preſerve "the fleet, by retreating, and rather to deſtroy "the diſabled ſhips, if they ſhould be preſs'd by "the enemy, than to hazard another ingagement, "by protecting them" (6). The French purſued

(1) The addreſs of the fleet to their Majeſties was as follows:

"We, the flag-officers, captains, and other officers of your Majeſty's navy, being now ready to enter upon action, "for the ſervice of your Majeſties, and the defenſe of our country, do moſt humbly beg leave to declare to God, your Ma- "jeſties, and the whole World, that we do acknowledge your Majeſties to be the undoubted rightful King and Queen of Eng- "land, and all the dominions thereto belonging: and we do hereby ſolemnly renounce all allegiance and obedience to the late "King James; and do faithfully promiſe, that we will, with our lives, defend and aſſiſt your Majeſties, againſt the late King "James, his adherents, and all your enemies whatſoever.

(2) The earl of Torrington, who had the chief command of the fleet, was a man of pleaſure, and did not make the haſte that was neceſſary, to join it; nor did the Dutch fleet come over ſo ſoon as was promiſed; ſo our main fleet lay long at Spithead. The French underſtood that our fleets lay thus divided, and ſaw the advantage of geting between them: ſo they came into the channel, with ſo fair a wind, that they were near the iſle of Wight, before our fleet had any advice of their being within the channel. The earl of Torrington had no advice-boat out to bring him news; and tho' notice thereof was ſent poſt over land, as ſoon as the French came within the channel, yet their fleet ſailed as faſt as the poſt could ride; but then the wind turned upon them; otherwiſe they would, in all probability, have ſurprized us. Burnet's hiſtory of his own times, Vol. I. There was a probability, that this would have been the caſe, if, as Oldmixon tells us, we had not then 20 ſhips together. It would have been very eaſy for them, to have deſtroy'd our diſpers'd ſquadrons one after another, and that done, it would have been as eaſy to have executed the reſt of their ſcheme.

(3) This ſuperiority was, according to the leaſt computation I have ſeen, upwards of ſeventy againſt fifty. But Kennet ſays the French fleet conſiſted of 82 ſail, and that their ſhips were generally larger than ours.

(4) If we may believe biſhop Burnet, theſe orders were not ſo poſitive, but that a great deal was left to a council of war. Hiſtory of his own times, Vol. I.

(5) In this manner, thoſe who would ſpeak favorably of the admiral's conduct, relate the matter: but Kennet, and the author of the hiſtory of King William, who ſpeak plainer, ſay; "The Dutch began the fight, as did alſo ſome of the Engliſh, "but not being ſeconded by the reſt of the Engliſh fleet, which unexpectedly ſtood away, ſeveral of the Dutch ſhips (after "they had fought moſt gallantly) were either burnt, ſunk or diſabled, and the Engliſh that ingaged were very much ſhattered.

Be this as it will, we ſee the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips began the attack, notwithſtanding their inferiority, and this monſ. de Forbin himſelf allows, in his memoirs: but F. Daniel and the marquis de Quincy, go yet farther, and to the honor of the Engliſh and Dutch, ſays, the French had the advantage both of wind and tide.

(6) On this occaſion, the French were guilty of too very great overſights; firſt, in neglecting to come to an anchor, when the Engliſh did, to prevent their driving at two great a diſtance, and thereby to improve the advantage they had obtain'd; and ſecondly by purſuing in a line of battle, whereas, if they had left every ſhip at their liberty to have done their utmoſt, they would undoubtedly have obtain'd a far greater advantage, eſpecially over thoſe ſhips, which were damaged in fight. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. II. p. 636.

the condederate fleet as far as Rye-bay, but with no great ſucceſs, and an Engliſh ſhip call'd the Ann, of 70 guns, commanded by captain Tyrrel, was run a ſhore near Winchelſea, after having loſt all her maſts. Two French ſhips attempted to burn her there; but the captain ſaved them the trouble, by precipitately ſeting fire to her himſelf (1).

The Engliſh and Dutch fleet being thus retreated, the greateſt part of the French ſtood in and out, off of Bourne and Pemſey, in Suſſex, while about fourteen of their ſhips lay at anchor, near the ſhoar. Two of their men of war and a fire-ſhip, commanded by meſſieurs de Ribaret and de Forbin, attempted to deſtroy a Dutch ſhip of ſixty-four guns, which, at low water, lay dry in Pemſey-bay; but in vain; after a brave defenſe ſhe got off, and in ſafety to Holland. Three other Dutch ſhips were burnt, by the French, on that coaſt; ſo that, with three they had before deſtroy'd in the action, the States loſt ſix ſhips of the line of battle (2). The eighth of July, the French fleet ſtood towards their own coaſt, but the 27th they were ſeen off the Berry-head, to the eaſtward of Dartmouth, and they continued on our coaſts, to the number of ſixty or ſeventy ſhips, 'till the fifth of Auguſt, when they ſtood weſtward, and were ſeen no more in the channel this ſeaſon (3).

The Engliſh ſhips return to the Thames.

The Engliſh fleet, in the mean time, retreated towards the Thames, where the admiral, going on ſhoar, left the command to ſir John Aſhby, with neceſſary orders how to behave himſelf, and to diſpoſe of his ſhips, in caſe the French ſhould attempt to come up the river; but upon their going over to their own coaſts theſe apprehenſions ceas'd, as we ſhall ſee below; and the main care was now how to put the fleet into a condition to put to ſea again. Various were the opinions of people concerning the earl's conduct, ſome excuſing and others condemning him: but the Dutch ſhewed a great uneaſineſs on account of the loſs they had ſuſtain'd: upon which the Queen, willing to give ſatisfaction to every one, ſent ſeveral perſons of diſtinction to Sheerneſs, to examine into all the circumſtances of the matter upon oath. The earl of Torrington, after having been confin'd ſome months in the Tower, was at length, on the 10th of December, brought to a trial, before a court-martial at Sheerneſs (ſir Ralph Delaval, who acted as vice-admiral of the blue, in this ingagement, being preſident) where, pleading the inequality of force, and the diſadvantage of the wind, he was unanimouſly acquitted (4).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

Apprehenſions of an invation.

No ſooner had the news of this misfortune at ſea reach'd London, than it cauſed a general conſternation, which quickly ſpread itſelf throughout the whole kingdom, and nothing leſs than an invaſion was apprehended. The Queen did all that a wiſe Princeſs could do, as well to remove theſe fears as the object of them. She cauſed a proclamation to be iſſued for apprehending ſeveral perſons who were known to be diſaffected. The army and the militia were put in condition to oppoſe the enemy, and all proper incouragement was given to ſea men, as well as to the officers who were to command them. The city of London gave, upon this occaſion, evident marks of their loyalty, not only by keeping their militia compleat, well arm'd and appointed, but by reſolving to raiſe ſix regiments of auxiliaries

The Queen's prudent conduct.

(1) Monſ. de Forbin, (in his memoirs) ſays two of the Engliſh ſhips run a-ground on their own coaſt, and were obliged to burn one another. He, likewiſe ſays, that the Engliſh loſt another ſhip, which having no anchors drove upon the French ſhips and was taken.

F. Daniel is not ſo modeſt, but, being reſolved to crown his countrymen with victory, at the expenſe of truth, ſays, ſeven, teen of the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, which were unmaſted, run aſhore upon the coaſt, and were burnt, to which he adds, "this was one of the ſea-fights, which left no room to doubt of the victory:" and monſ. de Larrey ſays much the ſame with regard to the certainty of the victory But the marquis de Quincy, tho' he gives the French the victory, allows the Engliſh had but three ſhips diſabled: and, in ſeveral parts of his relation gives broad hints of the Engliſh admiral's cowardice, in not daring to incounter with his maſter's ſhips, which (ſays he) was the occaſion they ſuffer'd ſo little.

A Dutch author of the hiſtory of King William, ſays, "in this action, the French gain'd the victory, the Dutch the honor, and the Engliſh the ſhame." So eaſily can the miſconduct (whether real or pretended) of one commanding officer bring a blemiſh on a whole nation. Biſhop Burnet thinks the two admirals equally deſerved blame: "If (ſays he) the French "had not loſt the night's tide, but had followed us cloſe, they might have deſtroyed many of our ſhips: both the admirals "were almoſt equally blamed, ours for not fighting, and the French for not purſuing the victory."

(2) F. Daniel mentions one of the chief of the Dutch veſſels being taken by the marquis de Neſmond; but of this our hiſtorians are ſilent. De Larrey reckons eight ſhips burnt or ſunk.

Among other officers whom they loſt in this unequal battle, were rear-admiral Jan Dick, rear-admiral Brackel, admirals of the Maeſe and North-Holland, and captain Norde: on the Engliſh ſide were loſt captain Botham, captain Pomroy, with two captains of the marine regiments. Monſieur de Larrey, ſpeaking of the two former, ſays, whatever was the behavior of the lord Torrington, it could not depreſs the valor of ſome of the Engliſh commanders. Among theſe were the captains Botham and Pomroy, who ſeconding the bravery of the duke of Grafton, and, with him, breaking looſe from the main body of the fleet, commanded by the motionleſs admiral, went to the aſſiſtance of the Dutch.

(3) During all this time, tho' they had ſo conſiderable a fleet at ſea, and we none to oppoſe them, they attempted nothing of moment: they, indeed rowed their gallies to Torbay, and then ſent their boats aſhoar at Tinmouth, and ſet the village, with two or three ſmall defenſeleſs colliers or coaſters, in that harbor, on fire. But at the approach of the militia, commanded by the lord Lanſdowne, lord lieutenant of Devon and Cornwall, they retired into their ſhips again, carrying off ſome ſheep, with other inconſiderable booty, and then returned to Breſt. And thus were the great deſigns both of the French, and of the diſcontented party intirely baffled by the vigilance of the Queen. It appeared, in the mean time, very ſtrange, in the eyes of all Chriſtendom, that the French were maſters at ſea, and the Engliſh obliged to turn their backs to that very enemy whom they had ſo often, and almoſt always beaten, and upon that very element which nature, and the poſſeſſion of many ages, has made properly their own: But their reign was ſhort, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel; F. Daniel adds to his narrative of this action, That, to leave no doubt of the greatneſs of this victory, monſieur de Tourville, returning to ſea, ſent a detachment of ſhips and gallies, with about fifteen hundred men on board, under the command of the count de Eſtrees, to make a deſcent upon England, and to burn twelve ſhips in Timmouth-Bay. Theſe troops (continues he) being landed, forced an intrenchment defended by three pieces of cannon, plundered ſeveral houſes, and burnt the veſſels in the bay, four of which were men of war, and the reſt merchant-men richly laden. This done, the troops were re-imbark'd without the loſs of a man, and carried off three pieces of cannon, with other booty. By comparing theſe two accounts, the reader will find with what allowance the French hiſtorians are to be read. To make of three ſmall veſſels, four men of war, and eight richly laden merchant-men, is taking a pretty large ſcope of liberty. The long and pompous account we have of this inconſiderable action, by the marquis de Quincy, amounts to much the ſame as that of F. Daniel, tho' of the two he carries the matter to a more ridiculous length than his brother hiſtorian.

(4) A Dutch author of a life of King William ſays, however, that the court-martial was far from being unanimous in their opinions, ſome thinking him guilty of treachery, and others of cowardice, tho' they all, at length agreed to acquit him. He adds, that the King was extreamly diſſatisfied with this ſentenſe, and for that reaſon diſcarded ſome of the members of that court from his ſervice, together with 42 officers of the navy, who were ſuſpected to have been influenc'd by the earl. Biſhop Burnet goes ſo far as to charge the court-martial with ſo groſs a partiality, as reflected much on the juſtice of the nation. Be it as it will, the action was in general thought to be ſo inglorious, that the earl ſuffered extreamly in his reputation among the people, who accuſed him of being but a bare ſpectator. His greateſt ſuffering was however in the opinion of his royal maſter, if we may be allowed to judge by his ſeting him aſide, than which there could be no more evident mark of his diſpleaſure.

auxiliaries for the ſervice, and the lord mayor, aldermen and common-council unanimouſly ingaged, by their own voluntary contribution, and that of other citizens, forthwith to ſet out a large regiment of horſe, and 1000 dragoons, for the ſervice of their Majeſties, and to maintain them at their own charge for a month, or longer, if there ſhould be occaſion. This loyal and generous conduct of the city of London, contributed not a little to put an end to all farther apprehenſions, and ſtopt all attempts of the malecontents.

Her Majeſty's generoſity to Theſe neceſſary precautions being taken, the Queen with her uſual vigilance, gave the neceſſary orders for the refiting of her fleet, with all poſſible expedition: nor was her care confined within her own dominions. She ſent mr. Harbord to the States-general, to let them know how much ſhe was concerned at the misfortune which had befallen their ſquadron: that ſhe had given orders for refiting the Dutch ſhips that were diſabled, at her own charge, had commanded all poſſible care to be taken of the ſick and wounded, and rewards to be given to the widows of thoſe who were killed. Mr. Harbord told the States, that her Majeſty had ordered twelve great ſhips to be forthwith fited out, and that ſhe hoped they would likewiſe do their utmoſt, to re-inforce their fleet, in this conjuncture: and laſtly he acquainted them with the King's happy ſucceſs in Ireland. The States expreſſed a great ſatisfaction at the receit of this meſſage, and unanimouſly reſolv'd to fit out immediately thirteen capital ſhips, and ſix frigats, to which reſolution probably nothing was more conducive, than the Queen's generous offer on her ſide.

Continuation of the affairs of Ireland.

But to return to Ireland, where we left King William going to reap the fruits of his ſucceſs at the Boyne: the very next day he ſent brigadier general La Meloniere with five battalions of foot, and four ſquadrons of horſe to inveſt Drogheda, in which there was a great magazine of ſtores. The governor at firſt received his ſummons with contempt; but upon the King's ſending him word, "that if "he oblig'd him to bring cannon before the place, "he muſt expect no quarter," he accepted the conditions offer'd him, and march'd out with the garriſon, conſiſting of ſomething more than three regiments, leaving their arms and ſtores behind their baggage only being allowed them.

Drogheda ſurrendered.

The third of July, the duke of Ormond and monſ. d' Auverquerque were detached with nine troops of horſe to ſecure Dublin; and the next day his Majeſty marched with the whole army, the ſame way, and incamped the fifth at Finglas, within two miles of that city (1).

King William enters Dublin.

The ſixth, being ſunday, his Majeſty made his public entry into Dublin, and going directly to St. Patrick's church, attended by the biſhops of Meath and Limerick, heard a ſermon preached by dr. King, late archbiſhop of that ſee. In the afternoon, he returned to the camp, where, the next day, he iſſued a proclamation, "in which he aſ- "ſured all ſuch of the Iriſh as ſubmited, and either "remained in their abode, or if already fled ſhould "return to them by the firſt of Auguſt, of his "protection, and threatning condign puniſhment, "to all who perſiſted in their rebellion."

William & Mary. An' 1690.

The 9th the King decamped from Finglas, and divided his army into two parts; with the greater he marched to Crumlin, three miles on the South of Dublin, and the other conſiſting of four regiments of horſe, two of dragoons, and ten of foot, was ſent, under the command of lieutenant-general Douglas, towards Athlone. The next day his Majeſty iſſued out a proclamation, "reducing the "braſs and other baſe mony to the ſtandard of the "like mony formerly current in Ireland". This done, his Majeſty, having left brigadier Trelawny, with five regiments of foot, and one of horſe, to command in Dublin, advanced in his way to Kilkenny, as far as Inchiquin, twenty-two miles beyond Dublin.

A fruitleſs attempt on Athlone.

The 17th lieutenant-general Douglas ſummoned Athlone; but the governor, colonel Grace, fired a piſtol at the drummer, and told him, "theſe were "the only terms he was for." Douglas, hereupon reſolved to attack the place in form, and had made ſome progreſs towards it, when he received advice, that Sarsfield, having gathered together a body of 15000 men, was marching to the relief of it, and his cavalry ſuffering very much for want of forrage, it was reſolved, in a council of war, to abandon the deſign, which he did the 25th, after having loſt near 400 men, chiefly by ſickneſs, before the town.

Kilkenny taken.

The King's army, continuing to march Weſtward, arrived the 11th of July, at Kill-bullen bridge, and thence continued his march to Commalin, Caſtledurmont and Carlow, from which latter his Majeſty detached the duke of Ormond, with a party of horſe, to take poſſeſſion of Kilkenny, where his grace entertained his Majeſty ſplendidly, on the 19th, in his own caſtle (2). The 21ſt the army marched to Carrick, from whence, major-general Kirk, with his own regiment, and that of colonel Brewer, as alſo a party of horſe, was ſent to Waterford, where two regiments who were in garriſon, ſurrendered on honorable terms, as did likewiſe the fort of Duncannon, which commands Waterford river. The 25th his Majeſty went to view the town, where he granted his particular protection to the lord Dover, who had before ſought it by major-general Kirk, when the King was at Hilſborough, deſiring a paſs for himſelf and family, to go to Flanders. Here likewiſe the lord George Howard accepted of his Majeſty's mercy.

Waterford and Duncannon-caſtle ſurrender.

King William leaves the army;

The 27th the King left the camp at Carrick, and went for Dublin, in order to imbark for England;

Notwithſtanding all this (ſays Kennet) in the year 1697, ſeveral French officers, who had been in the ingagement, coming over into England, after the peace, when they could not be ſuſpected of partiality, openly juſtified and commended the earl's conduct, and ſaid: "he deſerved rather to be rewarded than cenſured, ſince he had preſerved the beſt part of the fleet from being totally deſtroyed:" and indeed, if we conſider how large a ſhare this nobleman had in the revolution, and the affection he always profeſs'd to thoſe principles which happily brought it about, and that even after his diſgrace, which he outlived above twenty years: if, I ſay, we conſider theſe things, it is hard to believe, he can any ways have been influenced treacherouſly to deſert a cauſe he had been ſo heartily and ſo deeply ingag'd in. In ſhort, there are ſome circumſtances in this action, that cannot well be accounted for, among which one is, that of ſeveral Engliſh captains ſtanding away at the begining of the battle; and tho' it has been ſaid, that a calm took them, and hinder'd their keeping up with the Dutch, who ingag'd with too much precipitancy, yet the fact of the calm was very much queſtion'd, and the precipitancy of the Dutch, thought only to be founded on the tardineſs of the Engliſh. On the other hand, it is not eaſy to conceive that this negligence was a conſequence of any order from the admiral, and yet, had it been otherwiſe, it is reaſonable to believe the earl would have puniſh'd them, if it had but been to throw the odium from himſelf.

(1) Here his Majeſty had information, that the late King was imbarked at Waterford; that ſome French ſhips being arived at Kingſale, many that had fled from the battle poſted thither to get imbarkations: that the greateſt body of the Iriſh was gone towards Athlone; that there was none of the enemy in arms within twenty-ſix miles of Dublin; that there could not be any where above 5000 together; that the French might be ſuppoſed to be about 3500: That 300 of the Swiſs or Germans had deſerted the enemy; that the town of Wexford had declared for his Majeſty, and that Sligo was abandoned by the Iriſh. Hiſtory of King William III. Vol. 2. p. 202.

(2) This caſtle had been preſerved, with all the goods and furniture in it, and a cellar plentifully ſtored with all ſorts of wine, by the count de Lauzun, who had deſigned it for his own reſidence.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

WILLIAM (1) but, having ſoon after altered his mind, returned, and found the army, the 4th of Auguſt, encamped at Golden-bridge, whence by the 7th he reached Carrickeliſh, within five miles of Limerick, where lieutenant-general Douglas, joined him. The next morning, the earl of Portland, and brigadier Stewart, were detached with 900 horſe, and 1200 foot, towards the town, who advanced within cannon ſhot, with very little oppoſition. The ſame evening, the King himſelf, attended by Prince George, monſ. d'Auverquerque, lieutenant-general Ginckel, and ſeveral other general-officers, together with about 200 horſe, went to view the ſituation of the town, and the poſture of the enemy. The 9th the whole army decamped, at five in the morning, and approached the town, in exceeding good order, 200 horſe and dragoons, with 1000 choſen foot, leading the van; they drove the enemy before them, till they came to a narrow paſs between two bogs, within half a mile of the town, where the Iriſh horſe made a ſtand, and the hedges were lined with muſketeers: but colonel Erle led on his foot with incredible bravery, and preſſed the Iriſh ſo cloſe for two hours together, that he at length drove them to the very walls of the town, and made himſelf maſter of two advantageous poſts called Cromwell's-fort, and the Old-chappel. The army being thus poſted, the King ſent a ſummons to the town. A good part of the gariſon was for capitulating; but the French governor, monſ. Boiſſeleau, the duke of Berwick, and colonel Sarſfield ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, alleging; "that there "was by this time an actual inſurrection in England, "where the Dauphin was landed with a great army, "and that the Prince of Orange would be quickly "obliged to withdraw his forces." After which the trumpeter was ſent back with a letter, directed to ſir Robert Southwell, ſecretary of ſtate (to avoid giving the King his titles) importing, "that "he was ſurprized at the ſummons, but thought "the beſt way to gain the Prince of Orange's "good opinion would be, by a vigorous defenſe of "the town, which his maſter had intruſted him "with." The ſame evening about eight the King went to the camp, which was about a mile from the town, tho' he had been on horſeback from five that morning, accompanied by the Prince of Denmark.

Sarsfield ſurpriſes and blows up the Engliſh train.

A misfortune which happened the 12th retarded the opening of the trenches: for colonel Sarsfield having intelligence by deſerters, that the Engliſh train, with a large quantity of powder, was on the road from Kilkenny, under a ſmall guard, he found means to paſs the Shannon undiſcovered, with 5 or 600 men, and falling upon the convoy, unexpected, cut the guard in pieces, and blew up the train (2).

The trenches open'd.

Some cannon being, however, brought from Waterford, the trenches were opened the 17th, and a battery was raiſed below the fort, to the right of the trenches, which diſmounted ſome of the enemy's cannon. The Prince of Wirtemberg, lieutenant general, with the major-generals Kirk and Tetteau, brigadier Stewart, and ſeven battalions, entered the trenches that day, advanced 300 paces, and made themſelves maſters of two redoubts. They were relieved the next day, by lieutenant general Douglas, the lord Sidney, and count Naſſau, major-generals, and brigadier Stewart; and this day the King was near being killed by a cannon-ball. Thus were the trenches alternatively relieved, daily advanced, and ſeveral out-works taken or demoliſhed, till the 26th.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

The King in great danger.

Unſucceſsful attempt on the counterſcarp.

The ingineers having this day aſſured the King that the breach was wide enough, and beſide if it had not that it could be made no wider for want of bullets, that the trenches were advanced within thirty paces of the ditch, and that part of the paliſadoes on the counterſcarp were beaten down, his Majeſty commanded the covered way or counterſcarp, and two towers or forts which were on each ſide the breach, contiguous to the wall, to be attacked the next day, and that the men ſhould lodge themſelves there but go no farther. Accordingly lieutenant-general Douglas detached monſ. de la Barthe, an experienced French lieutenant colonel, with nine companies of grenadiers, ſtrengthned by 100 French officers and volunteers, to begin the attack, which was performed with ſuch bravery and ſucceſs, that the enemy were ſoon diſlodged from the covered way, and the two forts. The aſſailants, purſuing their good fortune, entered the breach pell-mell, with the fugitives, and monſ. de la Barthe, with ſome bold adventurers, and above half the earl of Drogheda's grenadiers, were actually on the rampart, and others ſtill more eager than the reſt, were got within the place. Captain Carliſle, who commanded the earl of Drogheda's grenadiers, diſtinguiſhed himſelf, in a very particular manner at this attack. He received two wounds between the trenches and the counterſcarp, but this did not hinder him from puſhing on, till he came thither, and there received his death's wound (3): and his lieutenant behaved as bravely after he was killed. If the ingineers had made a lodgment in time; or if count Solmes and count Naſſau, would have ſuffered the detachment that was to ſecond the grenadiers, to go farther than the counterſcarp, this action would have put an end to the ſiege: for the Iriſh were all runing from the walls, quite over the bridge, into the Engliſh town; but perceiving that not many of the Engliſh had entered the town, they rallied, and plied them ſo warmly, that ſeveral were killed, and many mortally wounded. Incouraged by this ſucceſs, they ventured upon the breach again, and the reſolution even of their women was ſo great, that they continually pelted the Engliſh with ſtones, broken bottles, and all ſuch other inſtruments of deſtruction as came to their hands. The men could not for ſhame do leſs, inſomuch that after three hours unequal fighting, the Engliſh were forced to retire to their trenches. During the heat of this action, a Brandenburg regiment being got, with great bravery, upon the enemy's black battery, the powder happened to take fire, which blew up a great many of them: and beſide this, tho' colonel Cutts, who was commanded by the duke of Wirtemberg to march towards the ſpur at the South-gate, beat in the Iriſh who appeared on that ſide, yet he loſt ſeveral of his men, and was himſelf wounded; for he advancing boldly, within half muſket-ſhot of

(1) The news of the defeat of our fleet in the channel by the French, and an apprehenſion of what might be the conſequence of it, were probably the reaſons that the King took this ſtep; and a farther account from England, that the deſigns of the malecontents were diſcovered and prevented, as probably induced his Majeſty to return. During this ſhort abſenſe, his Majeſty ſpent ſome time at Chappel-izzard, where he heard and redreſſed ſeveral grievances, gave orders for a weekly faſt, and iſſued a ſecond proclamation, much of the ſame tenor as the former.

(2) Timely notice was brought to the camp, of Sarsfield being out with a party on ſome deſign, by one Manus O Brian, an honeſt country gentleman; but little heed was given to his report: and tho' at length, he obtained the King's ear, and orders were thereupon given for a detachment to march time enough to prevent it, yet either thro' treachery or neglect it was ſo long delayed that they came too late.

(3) This brave officer had been a player, and had likewiſe written ſucceſsfully for the ſtage; but he was for nothing more known than for a ballad he wrote and ſet to muſick, which in thoſe times, was in the mouth of every one, begining: "King "James with his raſcally rabble of rogues, &c."

the gate, his men were all expoſed to the ſhot of their enemies, who lay ſecure within the ſpur and the walls. This whole action, which laſted from three till ſeven, was very briſk every where; the French Proteſtants, the Dutch and the Danes behaved all gallantly in their reſpective poſts; but the loſs of the beſiegers amounted to at leaſt 600 men killed on the ſpot, and as many mortally wounded.

The ſiege raiſed.

This diſappointment, and the approaching bad weather, made King William, who ſtood himſelf near Cromwel's-fort and ſaw the whole action (1), think of raiſing the ſiege. Accordingly, the 30th of Auguſt, the heavy baggage and cannon were ſent away, and the next day, the army decamped, and marched towards Clonmel. The King, having conſtituted the lord Sidney and Thomas Coningsby eſq; (afterwards made a lord) lords juſtices of Ireland, and having intruſted count Solmes with the command of the army (which he ſoon after conſigned into the hands of lieutenant-general Ginckel) his Majeſty imbarked at Duncannon-fort, with Prince George of Denmark, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, on the 5th of September, and arrived the next day, in King's road near Briſtol, with three yachts, two men of war, and ſome tenders. He came the 9th to Windſor, and the 10th to Kenſington, where he was received by the Queen, with inexpreſſible joy (2).

King William returns to England.

Notwithſtanding King William's ſucceſs, there were ſeveral towns, beſide Limerick, and particularly Cork and Kingſale, yet in poſſeſſion of the French and Iriſh, and their forces were ſtill very numerous. This gave the friends of King James ſome hopes of reducing that kingdom to his obedience; but they were not a little ſurprized to hear, that the Engliſh fleet arriv'd before Cork-harbour, the 21ſt of September, with ſome forces, under the command of the earl of Marlborough.

The earl of Marlborough arrives at Cork.

His lordſhip, being to act, in this expedition, in concert with ſome other troops, which were ſent before, towards that part of Ireland, immediately acquainted the Duke of Wirtemberg, and major general Scravenmore with his arrival.

The 23d, the greateſt part of the land-forces were ſent up the paſſages, ſix miles from Cork, headed by the duke of Grafton; and being come, the next day, within a mile of the town, they began to mount their cannon, and to begin a formal ſiege, having near 600 ſea-men, gunners, and carpenters, who were of great ſervice to them. Two troops of dragoons and a body of foot appeared without the town, in order to moleſt them in their works; but the Engliſh firing ſome field-pieces, they immediately retir'd.

Lays ſiege to the town.

A report being ſpread, that the duke of Berwick deſign'd to attempt raiſing the ſiege, major-general Scravenmore ſent a meſſenger to the duke of Wirtemberg, to preſs him to haſten his march, and on the 25th he order'd out a party of horſe, to cover the duke's foot.

Major-general Tetteau, with a detachment of 1000 men, having drawn ſome cannon to the Fair Hill, deſign'd, the ſame afternoon, to attack one or both of the new forts, and Shannon-caſtle: but the Iriſh no ſooner perceived, that he had poſted his men for that deſign, than they ſet fire to the ſuburbs, that were between them, quited both the forts and caſtle, and retired with great precipitation into the town: whereupon he poſſeſſed himſelf of Shannon-caſtle, and placed ſome guns there, with which he play'd briſkly on the town. Major-general Scravenmore came, about the ſame time, with 1200 horſe and dragoons, and took up his quarters at Kil-abby. The 26th, the duke of Wirtemberg, with the German and Daniſh forces under their command, and brigadier la Meloniere, with ſome French and Dutch foot, joined them, according to the orders they had received.

William & Mary. An' 1690.

The duke of Wirtemberg, and the earl of Marlborough, being both lieutenant-generals, a warm diſpute aroſe between them, concerning the chief command. The duke laid claim to it, with ſome heat, as a Prince; but the earl, with his uſual gentleman-like temper, inſiſted upon its being his right, not only as he was the elder officer, but as he commanded the troops of his own nation, which were principals in the quarrel, whereas the duke only commanded auxiliaries.

Diſpute between the duke of Wirtemberg and the earl of Marlboro'.

The prudent monſieur la Meloniere interpoſing, the earl of Marlborough, leſt this untimely diſpute ſhould retard the operations of the campain, was induced, among other inſtances of his wiſe and happy conduct, to ſhare the command with him, and, for the ſervice of his country, deſiſted from a part of his juſt right. Accordingly, the earl of Marlborough commanded the firſt day, and gave the word Wirtemberg; and the duke of that name, commanding, the next day, gave the word Marlborough.

By the earl's prudence made up.

This difference being thus adjuſted, and the enemy having, on the 27th, abandon'd their works at the Cat-fort, without a blow ſtruck, the beſiegers took poſſeſſion of it, and having rais'd a battery there, they threw their bombs into the city, and play'd their cannon on the fort, from Friar's garden, from two batteries, at the ſame time. Being, likewiſe, maſters of a church, Scravenmore order'd a party of men into it, who from thence galled the Iriſh within the fort: all which, together with another battery, erected by Red Abby, ſoon made a breach in the city-wall: and thus, by the united conduct and bravery of the commanders in chief, the beſieged were ſoon obliged to demand a parly, and to give hoſtages for a truce; but they not accepting of the terms offered them, the beſiegers began to play again, with their cannon, very furiouſly, and a conſiderable breach in the walls being made, they were ready to ſtorm the town. The Danes from the North, and four regiments of Engliſh, from the South, under brigadier Churchill, paſſed the river up to their armpits. The grenadiers, under the lord Colcheſter, afterwards earl of Rivers, led the van, and marched forward with incredible bravery, tho' expoſed, all the while, to the enemy's fire. They were greatly incouraged by the gallant behavior of the duke of Grafton, the lord Obrian, colonel Granville, and ſome other reſolute volunteers. In this approach, however, the duke of Grafton received a wound with a ſhot, in the ſhoulder, which likewiſe broke two of his ribs, and of which he died about ten days after.

The town of Cork capitulates.

The duke of Grafton receives his death's wound.

The van immediately poſted themſelves, under the bank of the marſh, which was, as it were, a counterſcarp to the city wall; and, at the ſame time, the Salamander, and another veſſel came up with the tide, and lay at the end of the marſh, directly before the city wall, play'd their cannon at the breach, and likewiſe, threw bombs into the city.

Cork ſurrenders.

All things being being now ready for a general aſſault, the beſieged thought fit to prevent it, by

(1) As this diſappointment was undoubtedly owing to the unhappy orders his Majeſty gave, that the aſſailants ſhould not advance beyond the counterſcarp, it was a wonder, that ſo wiſe a Prince, and ſo great a general, being himſelf an eye-witneſs of his miſtake, had not remedied it in time, by giving other orders.

(2) His Majeſty immediately ordered a commiſſion to be prepared for proroguing the parliament to the ſecond of October, and a proclamation to give notice, that on that day he expected a full attendance of the lords and commons.

beating beating a ſecond parly; and, at laſt, the earl of Tyrone, and colonel Rycaut, being ſent from colonel Macullicut, governor of the place, agreed to the earl of Marlborough's conditions, which, being ſign'd, the 28th of September, were as follows:

Articles of capitulation.

"That the garriſon, conſiſting of 4000 men, "ſhould be all priſoners of war, both officers and "ſoldiers.

"That no prejudice ſhould be done to them or "the inhabitants.

"That the general would uſe his indeavors to "obtain his Majeſty's clemency towards them.

"That all the arms, as well of the inhabitants, "as of the garriſon, ſhould be ſecured.

"That all the Proteſtant priſoners ſhould be ſet "at liberty.

"That the old fort ſhould be deliver'd up with- "in an hour, and the two gates of the city the next "morning.

"And that an exact account ſhould be given "of the warlike ammunition and proviſions in the "magazines."

The priſoners of note taken at Cork, were the earls of Clancarty and Tyrone, the governor of the place, colonel Ricaut, and ſeveral others.

This good ſucceſs gave ſuch incouragement, that the earl immediately ſent away a detachment of horſe and dragoons, under the command of brigadier Villiers, to ſummon the town and forts of Kingſale; and his lordſhip ſeting out himſelf, from Cork, the 1ſt of October, arrived the ſame day at Five-mile-bridge, and, the next, before the town; which the Iriſh, upon his approach had ſet fire to, and were retired into the old fort. He form'd his camp, the ſame evening, and gave directions to make his approaches towards the new-fort, while major-general Tetteau was ordered to attack the old-fort.

The earl prepares to beſiege Kingſale.

He found theſe two forts, which commanded the port, to be much ſtronger than the plans had repreſented them to be; and it was reported, that his lordſhip himſelf was heard to ſay, if he had known their true ſtrength, he had never undertaken the expedition, in a ſeaſon ſo far advanced. Being, however, there, this did not diſcourage him; he reſolv'd to puſh for it.

The old fort taken by a ſtratagem.

General Tetteau having paſs'd the river, with the troops appointed for that ſervice, in boats, the next morning, made a feint, according to the orders given him, of ſtorming the fort, in the weakeſt place, where moſt of the beſieged were got together, and in a readineſs to receive him. In the mean time, another detachment, made a bold aſſault, in another place, where they were leaſt expected, and, by that means, ſoon became maſters of a baſtion. While this was doing, ſeveral barrels of powder, accidentally taking fire, blew up near forty of the Iriſh; upon which the reſt retired into an old caſtle, in the midſt of the fort, and immediately ſubmited to be priſoners of war.

The new fort beſieged.

The earl of Marlborough, reſolv'd to improve this advantage; and the weather being now grown very bad, and proviſions ſcarce, the men withal begining to be ſickly, he ſent, hereupon, to ſummon the new-fort, which was much the ſtronger of the two; but the governor, ſir Edward Scot, haughtily anſwered, "it would be time enough to talk of that a month afterwards." Upon this, the trenches were open'd, the 5th of October, and, by the ninth, were advanced to the counterſcarp; but bad weather hinder'd the coming up of the cannon till the 11th, when part of it arrived. The 12th, in the morning, ſix pieces were mounted at the Daniſh attack, and two mortars at the Engliſh, which fired all that day. The 13th, two twenty-four pounders were placed on the ſame battery. The 14th, the reſt of the cannon arriv'd, three of which were mounted on the Engliſh battery: and the Danes, commanded by the Prince of Wirtemberg, having made a conſiderable breach, the night following, to diſturb the enemy, they made a falſe attack. The 15th, the cannon continued to play all the morning, and all things were prepar'd for a ſtorm, when the enemy beat a parly, and hoſtages being exchanged, the articles were agreed on, and ſign'd about midnight, by which the middle baſtion was to be deliver'd up the next morning, and the garriſon, conſiſting of about 1100 men, was to march out, the day after, with arms and baggage, and be conducted to Limerick. The loſs of the Engliſh, before this place was little leſs than 300 men kill'd or wounded, which yet was not worth notice, eſpecially conſidering the great advantage obtain'd by it (1). The Iriſh never attempted to raiſe the ſiege; they drew, indeed, their forces together, and, as they durſt not venture on raiſing it, in ſome meaſure to divert it, they put the country, the beſt built of any in Ireland, all around in a flame.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

And taken by capitulation.

The earl of Marlborough having perform'd this glorious expedition, with an inconſiderable loſs, and almoſt in as ſhort a time, as ſeem'd neceſſary, conſidering the ſeaſon of the year, for the voyage alone, imbark'd again for England, and arrived at Kenſington, the 28th of October, where he received ſuch a welcome from their Majeſties as his great ſervices required. He return'd ſoon after to Ireland, where, during the courſe of the whole winter, he prevented the excurſions of the Iriſh rebels, who attempted to commit great ravages in the conquer'd provinces; and raiſed ſeveral forts to put a ſtop to them (2).

The earl of Marlborough returns to England,

And goes back again to Ireland.

It may not be improper now to take a view what our maritime forces did farther this year. As ſoon as the fleet was tolerably refited, after the unfortunate action of Beachy, admiral Torrington being ſet aſide, it was put under the joint command of ſir Richard Haddock, Henry Killegrew, eſq; and ſir John Aſhby: but vice-admiral Killegrew, having been before on an expedition to the Mediterranean, order requires, that I firſt take notice what was done with the ſquadron under his command.

Maritime affairs.

Vice-admiral Killegrew had been appointed commander in chief of a ſquadron (3) deſign'd for the Mediterranean, the 28th of December of the foregoing year. Having receiv'd his inſtructions, which conſiſted in the manner he was to diſpoſe of the merchant-ſhips under his convoy, and how he was afterwards, in conjunction with a Dutch ſquadron, to watch the motions of the French fleet in thoſe parts, he ſet ſail from Torbay, the 7th of March, but meeting with bad weather, did not arrive at Cadiz, till the 8th of the next month, in a ſhatter'd condition. While he was refiting there, he received

Vice-admiral Killegrew's expedition to the Mediterranean.

(1) This ſea-port is called the key of Ireland, and by the ſubduing of this and that of Cork, a ſtop was put to the bringing of any farther ſupplies from France (at leaſt on this ſide of Ireland) and the Iriſh were almoſt wholly confined to the province of Ulſter, where they found it very difficult to ſubſiſt. Beſide, another advantage which accrued from this expedition was, that, upon the firſt news of the Engliſh fleet ſailing towards that kingdom, the count de Lauzun, fearing he ſhould be beſieged in Galloway, went off from thence, with ſeveral officers of diſtinction, and the miſerable remains of his French troops, leaving the general command of the Iriſh forces to the duke of Berwick, who ſoon afterwards gave it to monſ. St. Ruth.

(2) Ireland ſeem'd now to be as good as reduc'd to the obedience of King William, and, therefore, at the begining of December, his Majeſty eſtabliſh'd a privy council in that kingdom, appointed judges in the ſeveral courts of juſtice, and named ſeveral biſhops.

advice,

advice, from ſeveral parts, on the 9th of May, that the Toulon ſquadron, commanded by monſ. Chateau-Renaud, conſiſting of ten ſail, three of which were of eighty guns, had been ſeen off of Malaga, Alicant and Gibraltar. Upon which, it was reſolved in a council of war, to ſail, with as many ſhips as were in a condition, to join captain Shelton, who was, with ſome others, at Gibraltar. Being arrived there the 11th, he receiv'd advice from Ceuta, that fourteen ſhips had anchor'd the night before, in the bay of Tetuan. He therefore ſet ſail immediately, with the whole ſquadron (1) for Ceuta-point, and there lay by all night. The next morning he ſteer'd for the bay of Tetuan, where he found only two ſhips, one of which, being a French ſhip, bound for Antegoa, was taken by the Dutch admiral Allemonde. Standing, therefore, over again for the Spaniſh ſhore, they ſaw from their top-maſt-head, ten ſhips to the north of them, lying with their heads eaſtward. About 11 o' clock, the whole fleet being then ſtretching over for Gibraltar, the Montague, which had been ſent a-head to obſerve the motions of the enemy, diſcover'd four ſhips under her lee. Upon which all poſſible diligence was uſed to come up with them, and about one, they were not above two miles off, when, it being obſerved, that they ran for it, the Engliſh ſet their top-gallant-ſails, and crowded after them: but they proved to have the better heels, being but juſt clean'd, whereas ſeveral of the Engliſh had been ſeventeen months from the ground (2). The chaſe was continued all night, but, in the morning it appear'd that the enemy were four leagues a-head, and the Dutch with ſome of the Engliſh ſhips near hull to a-ſtern. As there was now no proſpect of coming up with them, the chaſe was given over, only one merchant-ſhip being run aſhore, and monſ. Chateau-Renaud, tho' he had thirteen ſhips under his command, kept on his way. The vice-admiral lay by till three, to give the reſt of the ſhips time to come up with him, and then bore away for Cadiz, which he did not, however, reach till the 21ſt. The Toulon ſquadron having thus paſs'd the Streights, the vice-admiral, purſuant to his inſtructions, made the beſt of his way for England, and arrived, in thirty-five days at Plymouth, where he was oblig'd to remain till farther orders, the French fleet riding then triumphant on our coaſts.

Proceedings of the main fleet.

I return now to the main fleet. Two of the three joint admirals, viz. ſir Richard Haddock and ſir John Aſhby, came into the Downs, the 21ſt of Auguſt, and ſailing from thence again the 25th were join'd off of Dover, by vice-admiral Killigrew, with the ſhips he had brought from the Streights. The fleet arrived at Spithead, the 28th, where the admirals received their orders and inſtructions. The whole fleet, without the Dutch, conſiſted then of forty-three ſhips great and ſmall (3), having the earl of Marlborough, with upwards of 5000 ſoldiers, deſign'd for Ireland, on board. Winter, however, approaching, they ſoon after, received orders to ſend their firſt and ſecond-rates to Chatham, and, at the ſame time, not only proviſions fell ſhort, but they were in great want of good ſeamen. Amidſt all theſe difficulties, the admirals, having received poſitive orders from the King for that purpoſe, put to ſea, and arrived before Cork-harbor, as I have ſaid above, the 21ſt of September, where they anchor'd; for, the tide of flood being done, the pilots would not venture in. The next day, they weigh'd, and, in a calm, towed in towards the harbor-mouth. Some ſhot were fired at them from a battery of eight guns, on the ſhoar; upon which the admirals ſent three boats, with ſome ſtout fellows in them, who drove the Iriſh from their guns, and diſmounting them, threw the carriages into the ſea, after which the fleet got in without any farther interruption.

William & Mary. An' 1690.

Cork being ſurrender'd, as we have ſeen above, the admirals, by orders from the King, return'd for the Downs (leaving only ſuch ſhips in Ireland as were needful for the ſervice) and arrived there the 8th of October (4). Part of the fleet was order'd to the Nore with ſir Ralph Delaval, another part to Portſmouth and Plymouth, and the reſt were left, with ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, in the Downs, whether likewiſe came, the 27th of October, the ſquadron they left in Ireland, which, when the ſervice was over at Kingſale, brought over the earl of Marlborough with the ſoldiers and priſoners, being under the command of captain John Crofts, as commadore. I muſt now give ſome account of ſir Cloudeſly Shovel's proceedings, with the ſquadron under his command, on the coaſt of Ireland.

Sir Cloudeſly Shovel's proceedings on the coaſt of Ireland.

Sir Cloudeſly who convoy'd his Majeſty from Highlake to Ireland, as we have ſeen above, was deſervedly honor'd with the commiſſion of rear-admiral of the blue. Returning from Ireland, the beginning of July, he was hinder'd from joining the main fleet, in like manner as vice-admiral Killegrew had been, by the French fleet, under monſ. de Tourville, being on our coaſt: he was, therefore, order'd to cruiſe off of Scilly, and in the ſoundings, to prevent a deſign the French had of burning our tranſports, in St. George's channel. Being cruiſing there the 21ſt, he was join'd by the Dover and the Experiment, coming from Ireland, with a ketch they had taken eſcaping with ſome paſſengers from Kingſale, bound for France (5). The ſame day, ſir Cloudeſly receiv'd orders to proceed himſelf with his fleet for Kingſale, to indeavor to intercept ſome French frigats, which were ſaid to be there; but before he could execute that commiſſion, he was imploy'd in aſſiſting major-general Kirk to take Duncannon-caſtle, in which they ſucceeded, the 27th of July. The remainder of the ſeaſon, the rear-admiral was employ'd ſome times on the coaſt of Ireland, and ſome times in the Soundings, but without any remarkable ſucceſs.

We had this year, likewiſe, a ſquadron in America, under the command of commodore Lawrence Wright, but like moſt of our Weſt-

(1) The ſquadron now conſiſted of one ſecond-rate, three third-rates, ſix fourth-rates, two fifth-rates, and two fire-ſhips of the Engliſh, and five ſhips belonging to the States-general. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. II. p. 632.

(2) French hiſtorians will by no means allow, that they run for it: and F. Daniel, in particular, in his uſual gaſconnading manner, tells us; that monſ. de Chateau-Renaud, being come out of the harbor of Toulon, with ſeven ſhips, to join monſ. de Tourville in the Ocean, met a ſquadron of 23 Engliſh and Dutch in the Streights of Gibraltar; that he immediately advanced towards them, and prepar'd to ingage, which piece of bravery and reſolution ſo aſtoniſh'd the Engliſh, that they would not attempt to intercept him; and that thus, having laid by, ſome time, for two ſhips, that were aſtern, he purſued his voyage to Breſt. His intrepidity and courage (continues my author) were ſo conſpicious on this occaſion, that they were the admiration even of the enemy: and yet theſe very enemies are ſo ill-natur'd to place all his mighty intrepidity and courage, in the virtue of a good pair of heels.

(3) One firſt-rate, eight ſecond-rates, twenty-eight third-rates, four fourth-rates, and two ſixth-rates, beſides ten fire-ſhips.

(4) They brought along with them, at the deſire of the earl of Marlborough, colonel Macullicot, who was governor of Cork, the earl of Tyrone and Clancarty, lord Carr, colonel Owen Macartney, lieutenant-colonel Rycaut, major Macartney, and captain Muffy, priſoners of war.

(5) On board this veſſel were colonel Hacket, captain John Hamilton, Archibald Cockburn, eſq; Anthony Thomſon eſq; captain Thomas Power, mr. William Sutton, and ſix ſervants, who were all following the late King James to France, in order to their attending him on his projected expedition to England. Indian

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

Indian expedition of thoſe times, this likewiſe came to little or nothing. Captain Wright left the ſquadron in Carliſle-bay, in Barbadoes, and returned to England ſick, or, as others will have it, was recall'd for his negligence and cowardice (1). Sir William Phips took this year Port-royal, in Nova Scotia (or Acadia) from the French; but miſcarried in the attempt he afterwards made upon Quebeck, on the river of Canada. I come now to the affairs of the continent of Europe; which did not prove this year the moſt ſucceſsful for the allies, nor had we any conſiderable immediate concern with them, for which reaſon, I ſhall be ſhort.

Affairs of Italy

In Italy, indeed, they had this advantage, that the duke of Savoy, who till now had been neuter, and was very much preſs'd by France, when the French thought they had reduc'd him to that fatal dilemma, that he muſt accept of what terms they ſhould vouchſafe to offer him, boldly declar'd, "that he was "ingaged with the Emperor and could not go "from his word; however, in regard of the alliance "he had made with his Imperial Majeſty which ex "tended no farther than to oppoſe the unjuſt de"ſigns of France, if his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty "would put Pignerol and Cazal into the hands of "the republic of Venice, till the end of the "war, he would lay down his arms, and for the "ſame purpoſe put into the Pope's hands one of his "own towns, as a pledge for the obſervation of "the neutrality." This was, at beſt, but a civil declaration of war, and a public avowal of the duke's treaties with the Emperor. And by a treaty he concluded, the 3d of June, with Spain, his Catholic Majeſty promis'd, to cauſe his royal highneſs, the duke of Savoy, to be comprehended, in the alliance with his Imperial Majeſty, his Britanic Majeſty King William, the States-general, and all his other allies. This advantage, I ſay, accrued to the allies; but the duke of Savoy made but a bad bargain of it, at leaſt, in the firſt campain of his new alliance; for being but faintly ſupported by the Emperor and Spain, he loſt the battle of Saluſſes, where the French general monſ. Catinat triumph'd, and as a conſequence thereof the towns of Sauſſes, Savillona, and Villa Franca, with ſeveral other places. Theſe loſſes were afterwards followed by that of the important town of Suza taken by monſ. Catinat, and of the whole duchy of Savoy, Montmelian only excepted, reduc'd by monſ. St. Ruth. Inſomuch that his royal highneſs ſeing himſelf, in a manner, depriv'd of his dominions, found it neceſſary to make his application to King William, for his powerful influence and aſſiſtance in the recovery of them, which he not only promis'd, but was in the ſequel as good as his word.

The campain in Flanders.

In Flanders, the grand action of this year was the battle of Flerus, fought between the duke of Luxemburg, general of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's forces in thoſe parts, and the Prince of Waldeck, commander in chief of the army of the States-general. In this famous battle, which was fought the firſt of July, the Dutch loſt the day, which was attributed, in part, to their being obliged to bear the ſhock alone, with about 25,000 men, the Spaniards and Brandenburghers, who ſhould have re-inforc'd them, not being yet come up, and partly to the cowardice of the Dutch horſe, who abandon'd their foot at the firſt charge. Be this as it will, never did infantry make a braver retreat, than theſe under Prince Waldeck; for tho' the battle was fought in a plain open country, and, after their horſe had forſaken them, they were attack'd by the enemy, in front and flank, they retreated in good order, and Luxemburg, with all his indeavors could not break them. This action was very bloody, on both ſides; the Dutch own'd the loſs of 4600 men, kill'd on the ſpot, with about 4000 priſoners, and almoſt all their artillery; yet ſeting aſide priſoners and the field of battle, the French had no great matter to boaſt of, for the number of their ſlain equal'd, if not exceeded that of the Dutch. Notwithſtanding this diſadvantage, Prince Waldeck was in a condition, before the end of the campain, his army being re-inforced to 55000 men, to offer the duke of Luxemburg battle again, but he declining it, and fortifying his camp, there was no farther action in Flanders (2).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

Affairs of Germany.

In Germany, as the campain produced little or nothing remarkable, the great event of this year, was the election of arch-duke Joſeph, the Emperor's eldeſt ſon (afterwards Emperor himſelf) but then King of Hungary, to the dignity of King of the Romans; he was choſen by the unanimous vote of the Electoral college, and crown'd accordingly at Augſburgh.

An inſurrection in Catalonia.

An inſurrection in Catalonia was, at firſt, of ſome advantage to the French; but it being ſoon ſuppreſs'd, and the conſequences of it not having been very material, I paſs by the circumſtances of this event, to return to England.

Congratulations on the ſucceſſes in Ireland.

King William, at his arrival at Kenſington, was congratulated upon his victory at the Boyne, and his other ſucceſſes in Ireland, by an addreſs from the city of London, which was followed by the like, from moſt of the towns and counties of England: and the nobility, clergy, Eaſt-India-company, and ſeveral other Corporations, were no leſs backward, on this occaſion.

Proceedings of parliament.

The parliament, having been prorogued, as I have ſaid above, by commiſſion, 'till the 2d of October, met accordingly that day, when his Majeſty, addreſſing himſelf to both houſes, told them:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"That ſince he laſt met them, he had uſed his "beſt indeavors to reduce Ireland into ſuch a "condition, as that it might be no longer a charge "to England: and it had pleaſed GOD to bleſs his "indeavors with ſuch ſucceſs, that he doubted not "but he ſhould have been fully poſſeſs'd of "that kingdom, by this time, had he been "inabled to have gone into the field as ſoon as he "ſhould have done, and as was more eſpecially ne"ceſſary in Ireland, where the rains are ſo great, "and begin ſo early.

"That he thought himſelf oblig'd to take notice, "how well the army there had behav'd themſelves, "on all occaſions, and born great hardſhips with "little pay, and with ſo much patience and wil"lingneſs, as could not proceed but from an af"fectionate duty to his ſervice, and a zeal for the "Proteſtant religion.

"That he had already made it evident, how much "he had preferr'd the ſatisfaction of his ſubjects, "before the ſolid advantages of the crown, by "parting with ſo conſiderable a branch of its in"heritance; and it was no leſs apparent, that he "had aſk'd no revenue for himſelf, but what he "had already ſubjected to be charged to the uſes of "the year.

"That he did, at his departure, give order for "all public accounts to be made ready againſt "his return, and he had commanded them to be

(2) Notwithſtanding this ſucceſs of the French, Lewis XIV was already ſo ſick of the war, that he made private overtures of peace, and would then have forſaken King James.

William & Mary. An' 1690.

" laid before the houſe of commons; by which " they would ſee, that the real want of what was " neceſſary beyond the funds given, and the not " geting, in due time, that for which funds were " aſſign'd, had been the principal cauſes why the " army was in ſo much arrear for their pay, and " the ſtores, both for the navy and the ordnance, " not ſupplied as they ought to be.

" That now, as he had neither ſpar'd his perſon " nor his pains, to do them all the good he could; " ſo he doubted not, but if they would as chear- " fully do their parts, it was in their power to " make both him and themſelves happy, and the " nation great; and, on the other hand, it was " too plain, by what the French had let them ſee " ſo lately, that if the preſent war was not proſe- " cuted with vigor, no nation in this world was " expos'd to greater danger."

Then directing his ſpeech to the commons, in particular, he told them: " that he hoped there " would need no more upon that ſubject, than to " lay before them the ſtate of what would be ne- " ceſſary for the ſupport of the fleet and armies, " which could not poſſibly admit of being leſſen'd " in the year inſuing; and to recommend to their " care the clearing of his revenue, ſo as to inable " him to ſubſiſt, and to maintain the charge of the " civil liſt, the revenue being ſo ingag'd, that it " muſt be wholly applied, after the firſt of Novem- " ber, to pay off the debts already charged upon " it, and, therefore, a preſent conſideration muſt be " had of the arrears of the army, which ſhould be " laid before them, and for all which he deſir'd a " ſufficient and timely ſupply.

" That it was farther neceſſary to inform them, " that the whole ſupport of the confederacy abroad, " would abſolutely depend upon the ſpeed and vi- " gor of their proceedings in this ſeſſion.

" That here he muſt take notice, with great " ſatisfaction, of the readineſs which his ſubjects, " of all degrees had ſhewn, both in this city, and " in their ſeveral countries, by giving their aſſi- " ſtances ſo chearfully, as they did in his abſenſe, " while the French fleet was upon our coaſts; " and beſide this ſo convincing a mark of the " good inclination of his people, he had found, " through all the country where he paſs'd, both " at his going into Ireland, and his return from " thence, ſuch demonſtrations of their affections, " that he had not the leaſt doubt, but he ſhould find " the ſame from their repreſentatives in parliament.

" That he muſt take notice alſo, how much " the honor of the nation had been expoſed, by " the ill conduct of his fleet, in the laſt ſummer's " ingagement againſt the French, and he thought " himſelf ſo much concern'd to ſee it vindicated, " that he could not reſt ſatisfied, till an example " had been made of ſuch as ſhould be found faulty " on their examination and trial, which was not " practicable while the whole fleet was abroad, " but was now put into the proper way of being " done, as ſoon as might be.

Then addreſſing himſelf again to both houſes, he clos'd his ſpeech by telling them; " that he " look'd upon the well-being of this kingdom, " to depend upon the reſult of their counſels and " determinations at this time; and the benefit " would be double, by the ſpeed of their reſolution, " in ſo much that he hop'd they would agree with " him in this concluſion; that whoever went about " to obſtruct or divert their application to theſe mat- " ters preferable to all others, could neither be " his friend nor the kingdom's."

Both houſes preſented their addreſſes of thanks to both their Majeſties, full of expreſſions of duty and affection; that of the lords to the King, was repreſented the ſixth, and theirs to the Queen the day following. The commons preſented theirs, both to the King and Queen, the 9th; they concluded that to the King with the following words:

William & Mary. An' 1690.

Addreſſes of both houſes.

" In the name of all the commons of England " they aſſured his Majeſty, that they would be " ever ready to aſſiſt him, to the utmoſt of their " power, and, as the beſt and trueſt way of expreſ- " ſing their gratitude, would indeavor effectually " to ſupport his government againſt all his enemies."

A ſupply voted.

The commons began, the very ſame day, to make good their aſſurances of affection to the government, by voting; " that a ſupply be given to " their Majeſties, for the intire reducing of Ire- " land, and ſecuring the peace of this kingdom, " and carrying on a vigorous war againſt France." The next day, they granted:

For the navy, and building new ſhips, 1,791,695 l.

And a few days afterwards;

For maintaining an army of 69,636 men, being the number his Majeſty thought neceſſary for the ſervice of the inſuing year, 2,294,560.

Together, 4,086,255 l.

Ways and means.

To raiſe this vaſt ſum, the commons reſolved, the 16th of October, to charge an aſſeſſment of 137,641 l. by the month for one year, upon all lands; being three-pence in the pound.

The eighteenth, that an additional duty be laid upon all wrought and raw ſilks, and all foreign linen.

The twentieth, that a duty of ſix-pence per gallon be laid upon all low-wines of the firſt extraction.

The twenty-firſt, that an additional duty of ten per cent. be laid upon all foreign timber and wood, and the like duty above what was already charg'd, upon all wrought ſilks, callico, and Indian linen.

And that ſeveral duties be laid upon foreign ſeed, oil, hops, pepper, and all grocery ware, except ſugar and tobacco.

The twenty-third, that the exciſe upon all beer, ale, and other liquors be doubled: and,

The twenty-fifth, that an additonal duty be laid upon foreign iron, yarn of flax or hemp, and all manufactures of glaſs.

In the mean time, as the ſeveral funds propoſed were like to fall ſhort of the ſums granted, it was reſolved the 17th, that " the ſum of one million of " pounds be raiſed upon the credit, or by the ſale " of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland:"

And the twentieth, that an addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, " that he would be pleaſed to com- " mand the commiſſioners in Ireland, to make a " return to his Majeſty, of the names of perſons in " rebellion, in that kingdom, and of their eſtates, " and value thereof, and that the ſame might be " tranſmited to the houſe of commons;" but upon the queſtion, the 22d, after it was drawn up, it paſs'd in the negative. The ſame day it was reſolved, that " a bill be brought in for attainting of the perſons, " that were or had been in rebellion in England or " Ireland, and for confiſcating their eſtates, and for " applying the ſame to bear the charge of the war."

As alſo another bill, " for the better diſcovering " the eſtates and truſts belonging to all Popiſh ſe- " minaries or Popiſh uſes, and converting the ſame " to the uſe of the public." Near ſix weeks paſs'd before any progreſs was made in the firſt bill, and when, after many difficulties, it did paſs the houſe of commons, and was ſent to the lords, it was there laid by, notwithſtanding ſeveral meſſages from the commons to put them in mind of it (1). The 10th of November, the King went to the houſe of lords, and the commons attending, his Majeſty gave the royal aſſent, to "an act for granting an aid to "their Majeſties of 1,661,702 l." and the 18th he gave the royal ſanction to another "act concerning "the commiſſioners of the admiralty," and to ſeveral private bills.

(1) There were two reaſons which obſtructed the paſſing of this bill. One was that the court privily oppoſed it, becauſe they imagined the King deſign'd to recompenſe the ſervices of ſeveral perſons, with part of the forfeitures; the other, becauſe it was believed this fund would not raiſe the ſum that was propos'd by it.

Ways and means.

The 24th of November the commons reſolved; "that the ſeveral duties laid upon goods imported "and to be imported, be granted to their Majeſties "for the term of five years, to commence from the "10th of November, and no longer. That the "duties impoſed by an act made in the firſt year of "the reign of the late King James; intitled, an "act for granting his Majeſty an impoſition upon "all wines and vinegars imported, from the 24th "day of June, 1685, to the 24th day of June, "1693. And by another act, in the ſame year, intitled, "an act for granting an aid to his Majeſty "by an impoſition on all French linen, and on all "Eaſt-India-linen, and ſeveral other manufactures "of India, and on all French wrought ſilks, and "all ſtuffs, and on all other wrought-ſilks, and on "all brandies imported after the firſt day of July "1685, and before the firſt day of July 1690, be continued till the 24th day of June 1696. And that "the duty impoſed upon tobacco, by an act made "in the firſt year of King James II, intitled an "act for granting to his Majeſty an impoſition "upon all tobacco and ſugar, imported after the "firſt day of July, 1685, and before the firſt day "of July, 1690, be continued till the 24th day "of June, 1696, and no longer:" "at the ſame time, it was ordered, that a bill or bills be brought in for granting to their Majeſties the ſeveral duties or impoſitions upon the ſeveral heads reſolved upon by that houſe.

Exciſe-bill paſſed.

The next day, the King went to the houſe, and, after having paſſed the bill for doubling the exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, told both houſes:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"That he took this opportunity to aſſure them, "he was extreamly ſenſible of the zeal and chear-"fulneſs in all their proceedings, and of the readi-"neſs which the commons had ſhewn in granting "ſuch large ſupplies, towards the preſſing occaſi-"ons of the navy and the army; and he farther "aſſured them, that he ſhould not be wanting, on "his part, to ſee them carefully applied to thoſe "uſes for which they intended them."

At the ſame time he obſerved to them; "that "the poſture of affairs abroad did neceſſarily re-"quire his preſenſe at the Hague, before the end "of this year, and conſequently, he deſired them "to loſe no time in diſpatching and perfecting ſuch "farther ſupplies as were ſtill neceſſary for the "navy and army; and not for them only, but it "was alſo high time to put them in mind of making "ſome proviſion for the expenſe of the civil go-"vernment, which had no funds for its ſupport "ſince the exciſe, which was deſigned for that "ſervice, and alſo the other branches of the revenue, "had been applied to other public uſes, and there-"fore, he earneſtly recommended it to their ſpeedy "conſideration."

All the houſe of commons had hitherto done, falling yet ſhort of the ſupplies that had been voted before, it was reſolved, the 19th of December, "that the remainder of a ſum not exceeding "4,086,255 l. for the ſupplies to be granted to their "Majeſties, be raiſed by doubling the additional "duties of exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors "mentioned in an act of the firſt year of their "Majeſties reign, intitled, an act for an additional "duty of exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, "to begin from the time the act for doubling the "duty of exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, "during the ſpace of one year, did expire." And a bill was ordered to be prepared in purſuance to the ſaid reſolution.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1690.

Acts paſſed.

The next day his Majeſty gave the royal ſanction to "an act for gtanting to their Majeſties certain "impoſitions upon all Eaſt-India goods and manu-"factures, and upon all wrought-ſilks, and ſeveral "other goods and merchandizes: to another act "for the continuance of ſeveral former acts there-"in mentioned; for the laying ſeveral duties upon "wines, vinegar, and tobacco; to another act "for puniſhing officers and ſoldiers, that ſhould "mutiny or deſert their Majeſties ſervice, and "for puniſhing falſe muſters;" together with ſeveral other public and private bills.

His Majeſty took this occaſion to repeat to both houſes:

His Majeſty's ſpeech on that occaſion.

"How ſenſible he was of their good affections "to him, and of their ſincere indeavors to promote "the true intereſt of their country, in continuing to "provide farther ſupplies towards defraying the "charges of the war, which he would take care to "ſee diligently and ſtrictly applied to the uſes for "which they gave them. He ſaid, he had lately ac-"quainted them, that the poſture of affairs abroad "would not admit of defering his journey to the "Hague much beyond that time, and that he "put them in mind of it now, in hopes that con-"ſideration would prevail with them to uſe all "poſſible diſpatch in what ſtill remained to be "done for the more vigorous proſecution of the "war:" and concluded, with mentioning to the houſe of commons; "that if ſome annual provi-"ſion could be made for the augmenting of the "navy, and building of ſome new ſhips of war, "it would be a very neceſſary care at this time, "both for the honor and ſafety of the nation."

A ſupply granted for the building of ſhips.

The commons having taken his Majeſty's ſpeech into conſideration, particularly the latter part of it, unanimouſly reſolved, the 24th of December, "that "a ſupply be given to their Majeſties for the "building of ſhips of war, not exceeding the ſum "of 570,000 l. and that the ſaid ſupply ſo to be "given to their Majeſties, be for the building of "ſeventeen third-rate ſhips, of ſixty guns each, to "be added to the ſhips in the eſtimate already pro-"vided to be built." Three days after, it was reſolved, "that this ſupply ſhould be raiſed by the "additional duties, upon beer, ale, and other "liquors, and ordered that an inacting clauſe be "prepared in purſuance of the ſaid reſolution."

Commiſſioners appointed for taking the public accounts.

The commons having paſſed a bill for appointing and inabling commiſſioners to take the public accounts, and ordered the ſeveral members to put into glaſſes, at the table, the ſeveral liſts of nine perſons names, to be commiſſioners in the ſaid bill, it appeared, on the 26th, that the majority was fallen on ſir Robert Rich, ſir Thomas Clarges, Paul Foley, eſq; colonel Robert Auſten, ſir Matthew Andrews, ſir Benjamin Newland, ſir Samuel Barnadiſton, ſir Peter Colleton, and Robert Harley, eſq;

Acts paſs'd.

The fifth of January, the King went to the houſe of peers, and the commons being preſent, his Majeſty gave the royal ſanction to "an act for granting to "their Majeſties ſeveral additional duties of exciſe; "an act for preventing vexatious ſuits againſt ſuch "as had acted for their Majeſties ſervice in defenſe "of the kingdom; an act for appointing commiſ-"ſioners to examine and ſtate the public accounts "of the kingdom; an act for the moſt effectual "puting in execution, an act for prohibiting all "trade and commerce with France; an act for "raiſing the militia, in the year 1691; an act for "the relief of poor priſoners for debt or damages; "an act for incouraging the diſtiling of brandy "and ſpirits from corn, and for laying ſeveral duties "on low-wines; and to four private bills."

WILLIAM & MARY. An' 1690.

This done, his Majesty, addressing himself to both houses, told them:

The King's speech to both houses

"He was very glad to find, that the success of "their indeavors, to bring this session to a happy "conclusion, had been such, that he was now at "liberty to go into Holland: and he returned "them his hearty thanks for the great dispatch "they had made in finishing the supplies they had "designed for carrying on the war, which it should "be his care to see duly and punctually applied to "that service for which they had given them. That "he should not make any grant of the forfeited "lands, in England and Ireland, till there was "another opportunity of setling that matter in "parliament, in such manner as should be thought "most expedient (1)."

He told them farther; "that as he had reason "to be very well satisfied with the proofs they had "given him of their good affection in this session "of parliament, so he promised himself the con-"tinuance of the same, at their return into their "several countries: and as every day produced still "fresh instances of the restlessness of his and their "enemies, both at home and abroad, in designing "against the prosperity of this nation, and the "government established; so he did not doubt, "but that the union and good correspondence be-"tween him and his parliament, and his earnest "and constant indeavors for their preservation, on "one hand, joined with the continuance of their "zeal and affection to support him on the other, "would, by the blessing of God, be, at all times, "too strong for the utmost malice and contrivance "of their common enemies."

The parliament adjourned.

The speaker of the house of lords, thereupon, declared to both houses his Majesty's pleasure, that they should adjourn themselves, 'till the 31st of March next insuing (2).

I come now to give an account of some transactions which happened during this session of parliament.

The 19th of October a thanksgiving was observed for the successes in Ireland, and particular prayers were ordered to be used, on every Wednesday and Friday, during the war with France.

The 15th the Princess of Denmark was delivered of a daughter, baptised by the name of Mary; but died soon after.

Titles and preferments.

The 15th of November, the King ordered a new commission to pass the great seal, constituting the lord Godolphin, sir John Lowther, Richard Hampden, esq; sir Stephen Fox, and Thomas Pelham, esq; commissioners of their Majesties treasury.

About the middle of December his Majesty disposed of the vacant bishoprics in Ireland, and appointed sir Charles Porter to be chancellor of that kingdom, and one of the lords-justices, in the room of the lord viscount Sidney, who was recalled to be made one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state. Colonel Cutts was made baron Cutts of Gowran, in the kingdom of Ireland, and sir John Trevor was admited into his Majesty's most honorable privy council.

During this session of parliament, happened likewise an incident, which made a great noise: captain James Campbell, brother to the earl of Argile, assisted by Archibald Montgomery, and sir John Johnston, on the 14th of November, forcibly seized on mrs. Mary Wharton, daughter and heiress of sir George Wharton, a fortune, as it was said of 50,000l. and about thirteen years of age. She was carried away from her relations in Great Queen-street, and married against her will. The next day his Majesty issued out his royal proclamation for apprehending mr. Campbel, and the abettors of this unwarrantable action, and sir John Johnston being apprehended, was tried, condemned and executed for it at Tyburn, notwithstanding great application was made to the King, and to the relations of the bride, to save his life: which was thought the harder, as it appeared upon his trial, miss Wharton had given evident proofs, that the violence captain Campbel used was not so much against her will, as her lawyers indeavored to make it. Not long before, there was a bill brought into the house of commons to prevent clandestine marriages, which it was thought this incident would have accelerated, but it dropped. However, another bill was brought into the house of commons, the 4th of December, to render void the marriage between mrs. Wharton, and mr. Campbel, which, notwithstanding the earl of Argile, petitioned against it, in behalf of his brother, passed both houses, by the 13th of December.

WILLIAM & MARY. An' 1690.

Miss Wharton an heiress carried away.

Sir John Johnston executed for it.

The last day of the year, his highness George William Duke of Zell, eldest Prince of the most serene house of Brumswick-Lunenburg, a Prince for whom King William always bore the greatest love and esteem, was elected a knight-companion of the most noble order of the garter, an honor, which just a year before, had been confered upon the duke of Brandenburg, afterwards King of Prussia.

The duke of Zell elected knight of the garter.

The parliament being adjourned, the 5th of January, King William, of whom it may justly be said, he never ceased from his labors, began the very next day his voyage for Holland, notwithstanding the rigor of the season: but when he came to Canterbury, finding the wind was set in easterly, with a hard frost, he returned to Kensington; where he staid a week. His Majesty went to Gravesend, on the 16th of January, and imbarked there, several of the nobility and other persons of distinction, attending him, under a convoy of twelve men of war, commanded by admiral Rooke. When, after not the best passage, they arrived on the coast of Holland, they found the frost had been so severe, and the ice near the shoar was so great, that they could not attempt to land without extream danger. The King, with whom the sea did not agree, and whose business beside, required haste, being informed by a fisherman, that they were within a league and a half, went into the shallop, and ordered the seamen to put off. The sailors themselves were apprehensive of danger, and all the persons of quality about him did what they could to dissuade him from exposing his royal person to so prodigious a hazard: But nothing being

The King goes for Holland.

Is in great danger.

(1) The occasion of this assurance was, because several members of the house of commons had shewed themselves dissatisfied, that the bill concerning forfeitures was laid aside, fearing the King's favorites would have the largest shares of the rebels estates.

(2) Tho' the parliament was very expeditious, this session, in voting and passing the bills for the supplies, yet the shortness of it was the occasion of several bills being left unfinished, beside that relating to the forfeited estates, particularly "a bill to regulate trials in cases of treason", which was much talked of in the house of commons, and yet put off from time to time; another "to oblige the lords commissioners of the treasury to take the like oaths as the lord treasurer"; another, "relating "to the African-trade"; another, "against robbers on the high-way"; another, "for the speedier determining elections of "members of parliaments"; another, "to charge the estate of the late lord Jefferies, in Leicestershire, with the sum of "14,160 l. and interest, to Edmund Prideaux, esq;" another, "for regulating and licensing Hackney-coaches"; and another, "for the inabling chirurgeons to administer inward medecines, in cases of surgery"; which last was petitioned against by the "physicians and apothecaries. A bill was also brought in for reducing the interest of mony, from six to four per cent. but was "rejected at the second reading.

able to move his Majesty's resolution, they put away from the fleet, with two shallops more, in which were the duke of Ormond, the earls of Devonshire, Dorset, Portland, and Monmouth, and some others, and soon got out of sight of it. Night came on, and the King remained for eighteen hours together, exposed to the injuries of the air and cold, to the mercy of the sea, where waves ran so high, that they dashed him all over, and he having nothing to shelter him from them but his cloak, being at the same time in danger of being taken by privateers. At last, by brake of day, the shallop came near the island of Goree, where his Majesty refreshed himself a little in a fisherman's cottage, and then going into his boat again, he happily landed at Orange-polder. From thence he went to his own palace of Hounslaerdike, where he was met by the deputies of the States, who conducted him to the Hague by six that evening (1).

Arrives in safety.

Now began the most glorious congress that ever yet appeared of Christian Princes, noblemen and ministers, the great design of which was for all the confederate Princes and States to concert measures with King William, in order to preserve the liberties of Europe. Lewis XIV, in all his glories and triumph, could never boast any thing like this. Such a congress as this, assembled in honor to him, as it was in honor to our Belgic and Brittanic hero, would have furnished his painters with a noble subject; they would have had no need to ransack the seasons or the elements for images to represent his greatness in the famous tapestry at Versailles. They might have shewn their grand Monarch imployed in numberless heroic actions, and constantly attended by a train of Princes, each striving how to give him the greatest marks of their respect and esteem (2).

Congress at the Hague.

At the first meeting of this illustrious congress, King William represented to them,

K. William's speech to the congress.

"That the imminent dangers in which they "found themselves, sufficiently discover'd the er- "rors that had been committed; so that he had no "need to use many arguments, to shew them the "necessity of taking juster and better measures; "that in the circumstances they were in, it was "not a time to deliberate, but to act. That the "enemy was master of all the chief fortresses, "which were the barrier of the common liberty; "and that he would quickly possess himself of all "the rest, if a spirit of division, slowness, and "particular interest continued amongst them. That "every one ought to remain persuaded, that their "respective particular interests were compris'd in "the general one. That the enemy's forces were "very strong, and would carry things like a tor- "rent before them; that it was in vain to oppose "with fruitless clamors and complaints, or unpro- "fitable protestations against injustices; that it was "neither the resolution of a barren diet, nor "the hopes of some men of fortune, arising "from frivolous foundations; but soldiers, "strong armies, and prompt and severe union "between all the forces of the allies, that must "do the work: and that these must be brought to "oppose the enemy without delay, if they would "put a stop to his conquests, and snatch out of his "hands the liberty of Europe, which he held already "under a heavy yoke; concluding, that as for "himself, he would neither spare his credit, forces, "nor person, to concur with them in so just and "necessary a design, and that he would come in the "spring, at the head of his troops, faithfully "to make good his royal word, which he had so "solemnly ingaged to them."

This pathetic, as well as severe speech, from a Prince to whom all the members that composed this illustrious body paid a respectful deference, and in whose judgment and experience they placed an intire confidence, could not but produce the desired effect, in the end, tho' for a while particular interests continued to reign in the hearts of many, and obstructed the salutary resolutions the King had so strenuously recommended to them. This occasioned their siting till the middle of March, in which time they came at least, to two weighty conclusions; viz. not to make peace with Lewis XIV till all their grievances were redressed, and to imploy 222,000 men against France (3); but it appeared afterwards, that this number would not do, and that the German Princes were always both backward and deficient in furnishing their quota's.

Resolutions taken thereupon.

(1) Beside the deputies of the States, he was met there by count Berka, the Emperor's envoy extraordinary, count Colona, the Spanish ambassador, the Prince of Nassau, Stadtholder of Friesland, the Prince of Nassau Saarburg, and count Hara. The States-General, the states of Holland, the council of state, the other colleges, the congress of foreign ministers, and all the persons of distinction, at the Hague, made their compliments to his Majesty upon his safe and happy arrival, and because he was come so suddenly as to prevent the solemn reception that was intended by the magistrates of that place, his Majesty was prevailed upon to make his public entry on the 26th, which was performed with great solemnity; several triumphal arches having been erected, to represent his Majesty's atchievements, and all the burghers appearing in arms with unusual magnificence; in the evening, the fire-works were played, the cannon discharged on the Viverberg, opposite to his Majesty's palace, and bone-fires lighted thro' the whole town.

(2) At this illustrious congress were present: The electors of Brandenburg and Bavaria: the dukes of Lunenburg, Zell, Wolfenbuttel, Courland, administrator of Wirtemberg, Saxe-eysenach, Sultsbach, and Holstein: the Landgraves of Hesse-Cassel, Darmstadt and Homburg: the Princes of Anhalt-Zerbst, Birkenfield, Waldeck, Wirtemberg-Nieustadt, two of Anspach, two of Wirtemberg, Christian Lewis of Brandenburg, Nassau-Friesland, Nassau-Dillemberg, Nassau-Saerburg, Nassau-Idstein, three of Holstein-beck, Philip of Palatine, Ferdinand of Courland, and the Prince of Commerci: Foreign ministers; Embassadors from the Emperor, counts Windischgratz and Berka, and the chevalier de Campecht. Embassador from Spain, Don Emanuel de Colonna. From the King of Denmark, count Reventklau and monsr. Centhe. From the King of Sweden, count Oxenstiern. From the King of Poland, monsr. Moreau. From the elector of Bavaria, the baron of Boomgarten and monsr. Prielmeyer. From the elector of Brandenburg, baron Schmettau and monsr. Von Dieft. From the elector of Saxony, monsr. Hachshausen. From the elector of Triers, the baron de Leyen and monsr. Champagne. From the elector of Mentz, messr. Talberg and Meyers. From the elector of Cologne, general Berusau and monsr. Soelmacher. From the elector Palatine, monsr. Hertermann. From the duke of Savoy, the counts Pielat and de la Tour. From the duke of Zell, monsr. Zieger. From the bishop of Munster, monsr. de Nort. From the landgrave of Hesse, baron Goertz and monsr. Keppelaer. From the duke of Wolsembuttel, baron Grosseck. From the duke of Hannover, monsr. Klekk. From the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, monsr. Tourken; and from the Prince of Liege, chancellor Mean. Other illustrious persons, not public ministers; the marquis de Castanaga, governor of the Spanish Netherlands; the marquis de Castlemonlayo; the counts of Horn, Erbach, Tirimont, de Brouay, Gryal, d' Arco, de Carelson, de Rivera, de Sanfra, de Lippe, d' Espense, de Fugger, de Denhof and Palfi; the barons of Pallant and Spaem. The Rhingrave and his brother: the generals Chauert, Elwycht, Barfusz and d'Antel. Subjects of the King of Great Britain, attending his Majesty; the dukes of Norfolk, Ormond and Schomberg; the earls of Devonshire, Dorset, Essex, Nottingham, Scarborough, Selkirk, Portland and Monmouth, count Meinard Schomberg: the bishop of London; the lords Dursley and Dramlanrig; mr. comptroller Wharton; and mr. baron Bradbury. There were, likewise, at that time, at the Hague, the Princesses of Nassau-Friesland, Radzevil and Saxe-Eysenach, and the countess of Soissons.

(3) Of these troops the Emperor was to furnish 20,000; the King of Spain, in Flanders, 20,000; the King of England 20,000; the States General 35,000; the duke of Savoy and the troops of Milan 20,000; the elector of Bavaria, 18,000; the elector of Saxony 12,000; the Landgrave of Hesse, 8,000; the circles of Suabia and Franconia 10,000; the duke of Wirtemberg 6,000; the elector of Brandenburg 20,000; the Prince of Liege 6,000; the bishop of Munster 7000; the elector Palatine 4,000; the Prince of Lunenburg, 16,000.

K. William returns to England.

The French King was, in the mean time, preparing to be early in the field, and to open the campain with the ſiege of Mons, at which he was in perſon preſent, accompanied by the duke of Orleans, and the duke of Chartres, his ſon: King William, perceiving it would be in vain to attempt the relief of that place (which, as he apprehended was obliged to ſurrender, tho' on honorable terms) and there being as yet no farther operations in the field, returned to England, and arrived at Whitehall the 13th of April.

Lord Preſton's plot.

The French King, and the Jacobites in England, were, in the mean time, deceiving one another, the latter by falſe accounts of their numbers and ſtrength, and the former by promiſes of aſſiſtance, which, tho' he never performed, ſerved however to keep up a ſpirit of diſaffection towards their Majeſties perſons and government, and as an incouragement to form plots and lay ſchemes for the deſtruction and ſubverſion of both. Towards the latter end of the year 1689, King James and his Popiſh council in Ireland, laid the foundation of the Lancaſhire plot, having ſent over commiſſions into that and other Northern counties, to raiſe an army, which he ingaged to head himſelf in perſon, in Auguſt 1690. But the plot being diſcovered, by ſome of the confederates, and ſoon after effectually baffled by that Monarch's defeat at the Boyne, another project was ſet on foot by the Jacobites in England for his Majeſty's reſtoration; and that was to gain aſſiſtance from France to invade England. To compaſs this end, the leading men of the party, in all counties, immediately repaired to London, and there conſulted what new meaſures were to be taken after this fatal and unexpected diſappointment by King William's victory in Ireland: and becauſe the conſpirators were then, generally ſpeaking, but of one faction, it was reſolved that the plot to reſtore the abdicated King ſhould be laid wider, extended farther, and more intereſts be united in private cabals of their moſt conſiderable friends, lords and gentlemen, both Whigs and Tories, and that, at every meeting, they ſhould propoſe and debate the moſt effectual ways to bring their deſign about; and, when come to a reſolution, they ſhould tranſmit their ſentimenrs to the royal club (as they called it) in Covent-garden, and they ſelect the moſt rational, among the various opinions, and digeſt them into ſuch methods for practiſe, as ſhould govern the whole party. The reſult of their ſeveral conſultations was, firſt; that the Jacobites being unable to re-inthrone the late King by their own ſtrength, they ſhould indeavor to obtain aſſiſtance from the King of France, who had formerly made them ſuch promiſes; and, ſecondly, ſince delays were dangerous, ſending letters into France hazardous, the court at St. Germain's factious and treacherous, that ſome men of quality and known ability ſhould go over into France, to tranſact that matter for the whole party. This project having the approbation of the leading club, in December 1690, the lord Preſton, mr. Aſhton, and mr. Elliot were pitched upon as proper perſons to be ſent into France. Some would have had their number increaſed; but they were over-ruled by this ſtanding maxim among them; Chuſe well, but have to do but with a few; for a multitude may give, but can never keep council.

Theſe gentlemen, thus appointed by the party, having hired a veſſel of mrs. Jane Prat of Barking, in Eſſex, for their tranſportation into France, went on board her near Battle-bridge; but the whole plot being diſcovered, the government ordered captain Billop to attend their motion, who accordingly ſuffered them to ſail below Graveſend, and then boarded and took them. In mr. Aſhton's boſom was found a packet of letters and papers (1), whereby it appeared that they were going to France, to "promote the treaſonable deſigns of that party "againſt the King and Queen, to invade the realm, "ſubvert the government, and reſtore the late "King by the aſſiſtance of French forces."

Lord Preſton and Mr. Aſhton condemn'd.

The 16th and 19th of January, of this year, the lord Preſton and mr. Aſhton were tried and found guilty of high-treaſon at the Old-Baily. They both received ſentenſe of death as traytors, and mr. Aſhton was executed the 28th of the ſame month (2); but the lord Preſton, having candidly confeſſed all he knew, and being ſupported by the interceſſion of his illuſtrious relations, obtained their Majeſties pardon. There being no poſitive proof againſt mr. Elliot he was not brought to his trial.

Lord Preſton pardon'd.

The 5th of February, the Queen cauſed a proclamation to be iſſued out for diſcovering and apprehending the late biſhop of Ely, William Penn, the famous quaker, and James Graham, eſq, as accomplices of the lord Preſton and John Aſhton, lately attainted for high-treaſon.

Preferments.

The 11th of March, the office of poſt-maſter-general was granted, by letters patent, to ſir Robert Cotton and Thomas Frankland, eſq; and the 25th of the ſame month, ſir Edward Villiers, maſter of the horſe to the Queen, was created baron and viſcount of England, by the ſtile of baron Villiers of Hoo, and viſcount Villiers of Hartford, in the county of Kent.

The parliament adjourned.

The parliament which had been adjourned to the 31ſt of March, then met, but were adjourned again from time to time, till the 22d of October (3).

The 11th of April, a fire happened at Whitehall at the end of the ſtone-gallery. It began at the lodgings of the Princeſs of Denmark's maids of honor, burnt for ſome time, with great violence, and conſumed the whole gallery, but did not reach the King's or Queen's apartments.

The firſt thing his Majeſty did after his arrival, was to give the neceſſary orders for the reduction of Ireland, and to equip and ſet out a numerous fleet, the chief command of which he conferr'd on ad-

She was ſoon imitated, not only by her maids of honor, but by all ladies of diſtinction throughout the kingdom, and ſo faſhionable was labor, of a ſudden grown, that not only the aſſemblies, and viſiting-rooms, but the ſtreets, the roads, nay the very play-houſes were witneſſes of their pretty induſtry: and it was even the wonder of many that the churches eſcaped. The King goes to Holland.

The King made but a ſhort ſtay in England; for ſeting out from Kenſington, the 30th of April, he arriv'd at Harwich, the 1ſt of May, and imbark'd on board the Mary yacht. The 2d, the wind being fair, he ſet ſail immediately, being attended by a ſquadron of men of war, under the command of rear-admiral Rook, and landed, the next day, near Maeſland-ſluis. He went from thence to Hounſlaerdyck, and arrived the ſame evening at the Hague. The 8th, he went to Loo, and from thence ſent the earl of Marlborough and the count de Solmes, before hand, to Flanders, to put all things in a readineſs for opening the campain, and to draw the army together againſt his arrival. The 31ſt of May N. S. his Majeſty left Loo, and, paſſing thro' Breda, headed the confederate-army, being accompanied by the duke of Ormond, the marquis of Wincheſter, and the earl of Eſſex (2). This campain prov'd a very inactive one, not worthy the preſenſe of ſo great a King, and ſo great a commander: but the backwardneſs of the allies, in furniſhing of their quota's, purſuant to their ſtipulations, made the French ſo far ſuperior in ſtrength, that it was impoſſible for him to attempt any thing of importance. All he could do was to diſappoint Bouflers in his attempt upon Liege, and to indeavour, tho' in vain, to bring the marſhal de Luxemburg to a battle, which he, on his part, by all poſſible means avoided: ſo that after ſeveral marches and countermarches, his Majeſty having taken and demoliſhed Beaumont, a town the French general had made himſelf maſter of, he left the command of the army, on the 17th of September, to the Prince of Waldeck, and went to Loo. Some days after the King left the army, Luxemburg, being informed of it, ventured to make an attempt on the rear of it, but with little ſucceſs, and thus ended the campain in Flanders. King William, after a month's ſtay at Loo and the Hague, imbarked the 18th of October on board the Mary yacht, and ſeting ſail from the Maeſe, under the convoy of ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, arrived the next day in England, and came, the ſame night, to Kenſington. And here I ſhall leave his Majeſty, preparing for the opening of the parliament, and take a view of the affairs of Ireland.

Affairs of Ireland.

The armies, on both ſides, in Ireland, having gone pretty late into winter-quarters, were not very early in the field. The Engliſh, had been not a little diſturbed, during the winter, by the Iriſh rapparees, or robbers, who when they had commited great cruelties and depredations, retreated into their bogs and holds, where no regular troops could reach them (3); they continued their maroding, till the Engliſh army took the field, about the middle of June, when they mixed themſelves, with the late King's troops. General Ginckel, commander in chief of King William's army, which was now conſiderably re-inforced, by the troops under Mackay, from Scotland, decamped, the 6th, of June, from Mullingar, and came the next day before Ballymore; the marquis de Ruſigny, major-general, being ſent before, with a detachment of horſe and dragoons, to poſſeſs himſelf of a paſs between that place and Athlone. As ſoon as the batteries were raiſed, general Ginckel ſent a meſſage to the governor, colonel Ulicke Bourke, "that if he and the gariſon ſurrendered within two "hours, he would ſpare their lives, and treat them "as priſoners of war, but otherwiſe that they had no "mercy to expect". The governor not readily accepting of this offer, the cannon and bombs began to play, the pontoons were put into the water, and every thing prepared for a ſtorm, the ſame evening; upon which he bethought himſelf, and ſurrendered at diſcretion. The gariſon conſiſted of 780 men, beſide four field-officers, and 259 rapparees.

Ballymore inveſted.

And taken.

The damage being repaired, and the place put into a better poſture of defenſe, the army marched from Ballymore the 18th, and being joined, the next day, by the Prince of Wirtemberg, incamped at Balimory's paſs, a ſtrong detachment of horſe, advancing in the mean time to Athlone. The 19th early, the van-guard marched from Balimony, and beat the enemy from ſeveral out-works of the Engliſh town of Athlone, on this ſide the Shannon, where they made a lodgment. A battery of ten eighteen-pounders having demoliſhed a baſtion, near the water-ſide, an aſſault was ordered to be made. This was accordingly performed by the Engliſh with ſo much bravery, that they ſoon drove the Iriſh out of the place, ſome eſcaping over the bridge of Connaught, and the reſt leaping into the Shannon, of which latter many were drowned. Batteries being now placed againſt the Iriſh town, Athlone beſieged.

(1) It was firſt offer'd to dr. Beveridge, rector of St. Peter's Cornhill, who declin'd accepting of it, for the ſame reaſon that the biſhop of London refuſed the offer of the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, viz. becauſe the incumbent was living; but how to reconcile theſe ſcruples with their having taken the oaths themſelves is not very eaſy.

(2) Biſhop Kennet obſerves, upon this occaſion, "that it was no credit to our nation, to have the example of theſe noble "lords, and Engliſhmen follow'd by no more of their quality.

(3) The lords-juſtices uſed their utmoſt indeavors to ſuppreſs theſe Banditti, as well by offers of mercy, to ſuch as would ſubmit to their Majeſties obedience, as by propoſing a reward for every head of a rapparee; but all to no purpoſe.

by the twenty-ſecond both the cannon and mortars began to play briskly againſt the North-Eaſt-ſide of the caſtle. The 25th, ſeveral other batteries were raiſed, particularly againſt the bridge, and the 27th, the Engliſh burnt the wooden breaſt-work which the enemy had raiſed, on the other ſide of a broken arch of the bridge; but were unſucceſsful in ſeveral attempts on the bridge, between that day and the 30th. A council of war being held that day, it was warmly debated, whether to hazard another attempt, or to draw off; and ſeveral reaſons were urged for the latter; but the principal officers arguing warmly for the former, they prevailed (1). The attack was made the ſame evening, at the uſual hour of relieving the guards (which prevented the enemy's ſuſpecting their deſign) and was begun by captain Sandys and two lieutenants, who led the firſt party of ſixty grenadiers, all in armor, twenty a-breaſt. They were ſeconded by another ſtrong detachment of grenadiers, commanded by colonel Guſtavus Hamilton, ſupported by ſix battalions of foot. Notwithſtanding the ſtream was very rapid, and the paſſage difficult, on account of ſome great ſtones that were in the river, they took the ford that was on the left of the bridge, againſt a baſtion of the enemy's, with unparallel'd reſolution, and with an amazing intrepidity ſurmounted all difficulties. They forced a paſſage, thro' the water, and, at the ſame time, thro' the enemy's bullets, fire and ſmoak, and gain'd the oppoſite bank; while ſome of the reſt laid planks over the broken part of the bridge, and others prepar'd the pontons. By theſe means, they paſs'd ſo faſt, that, in leſs than half an hour, they became maſters of the town, (the gariſon retreating with the utmoſt precipitation to the Iriſh camp) and immediately afterwards poſſeſs'd themſelves of all the works, that were on that ſide of it towards the enemy. The Engliſh had not above fifty men kill'd in this memorable action (2), the ſucceſs of which was, in a great meaſure owing to the conduct and bravery of the general officers, who animated the intrepid ſoldiers with their preſenſe and example (3).

And taken.

General Ginckel, having put Athlone into a poſture of defenſe, march'd with his army, the 10th of July, and, having reach'd Ballinaſloe, incamp'd along the river Suck, on the Roſcommon ſide, which was a very good paſs, and which the Iriſh, if they had not been blinded by their own fears, might likewiſe have ſecur'd, and thereby have given the Engliſh a great deal of trouble.

William & Mary. An' 1691.

But they ſoon retriev'd this error, by poſſeſſing themſelves of a far more advantageous poſt, on the other ſide of Aghrim-caſtle, three miles beyond Ballinaſloe, where they were extended from the church of Kilcomnodon, on their right, to a place call'd Gourtnapori, about two miles in length. On their left run a rivulet, having ſteep hills, and little bogs, on each ſide; next to which was a large red bog, almoſt a mile over, on the end whereof ſtood the caſtle of Aghrim, commanding the way that led to the camp, paſſable no where for horſe, but juſt at the caſtle, by reaſon of a ſmall river, which, running thro' a moiſt ground, made the whole a moraſs. This moraſs extended itſelf along to the right, where there was another paſs, at Urachree, having a riſing ground on either ſide thereof, and the Iriſh camp lay along the ridge of a hill, on the ſide of which ſtood two Daniſh forts, about half a mile's diſtance from the bog below, and this cut into many ſmall incloſures, which the Iriſh lined very thick with ſmall ſhot, and manag'd a communication between them. General Ginckel having view'd the enemy's camp, found it was very advantageous, but as he had advanc'd ſo far, that he muſt either fight his way thro', or ſhamefully retreat, he order'd the army to march towards the enemy the next day: and St. Ruth, on his ſide, perceiving, by the diſpoſitions of the Engliſh, that they were reſolved to attack him, made a ſolemn ſpeech to the Iriſh, to rouſe their courage (4).

The battle of Aghrim.

The 12th of July, being ſunday, the Engliſh army prepar'd, early in the morning, to advance towards the enemy; but the weather proving foggy, they did not move 'till about twelve o'clock, when they did it with all the order the ground would allow of.

The general having, at the ſame time, view'd the poſture of the Iriſh, and perceiving it would be neceſſary for him to be maſter of the paſs of Urachree, ſent a Daniſh captain, with ſome horſe, to force it; but they not ſucceeding, he order'd 200 of Cunningham's dragoons to march to certain ditches near the ford, to keep the enemy from coming over, and, in the mean time, the Engliſh army march'd forward. It being, by this time, two o'clock, and the general, ſeing himſelf under a neceſſity to gain that ford, and the other ways which

(1) They urged, "that no brave action could be performed without hazard; that the attempt was like to be ended with "ſucceſs, and proffered themſelves to be the firſt that ſhould paſs the river, and attack the enemy.

(2) This enterpriſe may juſtly be ſaid to be the moſt glorious as well as the moſt hazardous of this whole war; an enterpriſe ſo brave as can hardly be match'd in hiſtory; a place, proudly thought inacceſſible, reſolutely taken in leſs than an hour's time; a fortified town attack'd croſs a deep and wide river, by 3000 men only, in the face of a conſiderable army, who were maſters of all the fords, by the retrenchments they had caſt before them.

It is remarkable, that as ſoon as the Engliſh enter'd the river, advice being ſent of it to monſ. St. Ruth, who commanded the French anxiliaries, and the Iriſh army, he ſaid; "It is impoſſible for the Engliſh to pretend to take a town, while I am "ſo near, with an army to defend it; I would give a thouſand piſtols they durſt attempt it:" Colonel Sarsfield, who happen'd to be preſent, anſwer'd; "He knew the enterpriſe was not too difficult for Engliſh courage to attempt it:" and, therefore, preſs'd St. Ruth to ſend ſpeedy ſuccors to the town, but he ſtill perſiſted to turn the undertaking into a jeſt, upon which warm words paſs'd between them. St. Ruth was, however, ſoon convinc'd of his miſtake, and when he was inform'd, that the Engliſh were in actual poſſeſſion of the place, he order'd ſeveral detachments to beat them out again; but it was then too late, and he found he had been guilty of another overſight, in not levelling thoſe fortifications of Athlone, which were next his camp: for now the Engliſh us'd the enemy's own works againſt them, and ſtruck ſuch a terror into the whole army of French and Iriſh, that they decamp'd that very night.

(3) General Ginckel gain'd ſo much honor by this enterpriſe, that the title of earl of Athlone was juſtly intail'd on his family, on that account.

(4) This ſpeech is too remarkable to be omited in hiſtory: he put them in mind; "how ſucceſsful he had been in ſuppreſſing "Hereſy in France, and bringing over a vaſt number of deluded ſouls into the boſom of the mother-church; that for this rea-"ſon his maſter had choſen him, before others, to eſtabliſh the church in Ireland, on ſuch a foundation, that it ſhould not "henceforward be in the power of hell or heretics to diſturb it; and that all good Roman Catholics depended on their "courage to ſee theſe glorious things effected. He confeſs'd matters did not intirely anſwer his expectation ſince he came among "them; but that ſtill all might be recover'd. That he was inform'd the Prince of Orange's heretical army was reſolv'd to "give them battle: That now or never was the time for them to recover their loſt honors, and the privileges and eſtates of "their anceſtors; urging to them, that they were no mercenary ſoldiers, there all being at ſtake, and their deſign to reſtore a "pious King to his throne, to propogate the holy faith, and extirpate hereſy. And laſtly, to animate their courage more ef-"fectually, he aſſured them of King James's love and gratitude; of Lewis the great's protection; of himſelf to lead them on; "of the church to pray for them, and of ſaints and angels to carry their ſouls into Heaven," concluding with an order, "to give "quarter to none, eſpecially not to ſpare any of the French heretics, in the Prince of Orange's army.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1691.

led to the right of the Iriſh camp, as the moſt proper means to attack them, commanded Cunningham's dragoons, at the ditch, to advance towards a party of the enemy, who were poſted on the other ſide; but upon their approach, with another party that ſuſtained him, all retired behind a hill, nearer the camp, where a greater body were poſted. Theſe parties, being all continually re-inforced by others, obliged the Engliſh dragoons to retreat; upon which general Ginckel order'd Eppinger's dragoons to get between theſe bodies, and the enemy's camp. The enemy preſently diſcover'd this motion, and had the advantage in pouring ſo many men upon the Engliſh, that they would have been ſtill too hard for the dragoons, if the earl of Portland had not ſeconded them with his horſe, and behaved in the moſt courageous manner. This was at firſt a ſkirmiſh only, but a conſiderable body on both ſides were ſoon ingag'd; and the enemy quickly retiring, the generals took it into conſideration, whether it were not beſt to put off the continuation of the battle till the next morning.

This was at firſt reſolved on, and the tents were accordingly ordered to be ſent for; but afterwards, perceiving the enemy to be in ſome diſorder, by what had already happened, it was reſolved not to delay the attack, for fear they ſhould march off in the night, and they thereby loſe the opportunity of a deciſive battle. Major-general Mackay adviſed to begin the fight on the enemy's right, by which he propoſed to draw part of their force from Aghrim-caſtle, near which their main body was poſted, that ſo the right wing of the Engliſh might have the eaſier paſſage over to attack their left, and then the whole Engliſh army might ingage, which otherwiſe would be impoſſible. This advice was followed, and had its deſired effect.

Between four and five in the afternoon, theſe diſpoſitions being made, a party of the Engliſh left wing begun to move towards the enemy, and by five the battle was renew'd. The Iriſh muſkeeters had lined the ditches every where, and their horſe were advantageouſly poſted to ſuſtain them. They behaved with all the bravery imaginable, and defended their poſts with an incredible obſtinacy; they never offer'd to ſtir from one ſide, till the Engliſh put their pieces over at the other, and then having lines of communication from one ditch to the other, they could preſently poſt themſelves, and flank the Engliſh. This was the occaſion of a very hot fire, on both ſides, which continued, on the left, above an hour, before the center, and the right wing of the army, began to ingage. The main body of the Engliſh army advanced, in the mean time, and major-general Mackay, with other general officers, obſerving ſeveral bodies of the enemy's horſe and foot draw off from the left, and move towards their right, where they were preſs'd very hard by the Engliſh, they laid hold of that advantage, and made the foot march over the bog, which fronted the enemy's main battle. The regiments of Erle, Herbert, Creighton and Brewer, going over the narroweſt place, where the hedges on the enemy's ſide run fartheſt into the bog, they had orders to march to the loweſt of the ditches, adjoining to the ſide of the bog, and there to poſt themſelves, till the horſe could come about, by Aghrim-caſtle, and ſuſtain them, and 'till the other foot had march'd over the bog below, where it was broader, and were ſupported by Foulk's and brigadier Stewart's regiment.

Purſuant to theſe orders, the four regiments advanced over the bog, moſt of them to the middle in mud and water, and as they drew near the ditches, received the enemy's fire; notwithſtanding which they continued their march till they came to the loweſt hedge, from whence they beat the Iriſh, and purſued them from hedge to hedge, till they came pretty near their main body.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1691.

The Iriſh, on the other hand, had made ſuch diſpoſitions, that they had an eaſy paſſage for their horſe, among all thoſe hedges and ditches, by which means they poured in a-freſh, in great numbers, both of horſe and foot, upon the Engliſh. Colonel Erle, obſerving this, incouraged his men, by telling them, "that now their ſafety lay wholly in "their courage". However, being both flanked and fronted, and expoſed beſide to the enemy's fire from the adjacent hedges, the Engliſh were forced to quit their ground, and retreat to the bog again, with a conſiderable loſs, the colonels Erle and Herbert being taken priſoners (1).

While theſe things paſſed on this ſide, the regiments of colonel St. John, colonel Tiffin, the lord George Hamilton, and the French Proteſtants in Engliſh ſervice, with ſeveral other regiments, were marching over the bog below, while the Iriſh lay ſo cloſe in their ditches, that it was queſtioned by many, whether they had any men there or no; but no ſooner were the French Proteſtants, and the reſt of the troops, advanced within twenty yards of the ditches, than the enemy fired moſt furiouſly upon them, which the other ſuſtained with intrepidity, ſtill preſſing forwards, tho' they could hardly ſee one another for ſmoak, the wind blowing directly upon them. For ſome time the battle had remained doubtful, but now the victory ſeemed to incline on the ſide of the Iriſh; for they had driven the foot in the center ſo far back, that they were got almoſt into a line with the cannon that were planted near the bog, of which the Engliſh had then no benefit, the Iriſh being intermixed with their men.

While the infantry was thus ingaged, major-general Ruvigny's regiment of French horſe (which had before been duke Schomberg's) and ſir John Laniers, being both poſted on the right, the latter was afterwards drawn to the left, where they were ſerviceable, and the right wing of the Engliſh horſe were, in the mean time, making the beſt of their way to ſuccor the foot, ſeing in what danger they were in, and that all was at ſtake. This cavalry was obliged to preſs and tumble over a very dangerous paſs, and, at the ſame time, ſuſtain ſhowers of the enemy's bullets, from a body of their dragoons and foot, which were conveniently poſted under covert; but having ſurmounted all theſe difficulties, they at length lodged themſelves in a dry ditch, in the hotteſt of the enemy's fire from Aghrim-caſtle, and ſome old walls and hedges that were near it. In the center, the Engliſh infantry labored, all this while, under great diſadvantages, which major-general Talmaſh obſerving, he haſtened to their relief, with ſome freſh men, and gave orders to the broken regiments to halt and face about, which they immediately did, and bravely charged the Iriſh, who had advanced upon them to the center of the bog, killed above 300 of them, before they could retreat out of it, and then marched up boldly to their old ground again, from whence they had been juſt before beaten. In the mean time, major-general Mackay had fallen upon the enemy with a good body of horſe on their left, and among the reſt the French regiment of horſe had forc'd a regiment of Iriſh dragoons from an advantageous poſt, and put Tyrconnel's horſe to flight. Upon which, major-general Ruvigny, at the head of the Oxford regiment of horſe, ſupported by his own, went along the ſide of the bog, and bore all down before him. And now the horſe and foot of the Engliſh right, and the Iriſh left, being mixed, there was nothing but a continued fire, and a very warm diſpute all along the line, the Iriſh, with great reſolution, indeavoring to maintain their ditches, and the Engliſh, with no leſs bravery, to beat them out of them.

St. Ruth, when he ſaw the Engliſh foot in the centure repuls'd, told thoſe about him, in a bravado, that he would beat the Engliſh army to the gates of Dublin; yet ſeing, with great ſurprize, the regiments of Oxford, Ruvigny, Langſton and Bierly, together with Levingſton's dragoons preſſing over towards the caſtle, he order'd a brigade of his own horſe from the right wing to march up to the left, then riding to one of his batteries, and giving orders to the gunners where to fire, and afterwards leading on ſome horſe towards the place, where he ſaw the Engliſh indeavor to go over, he was killed by a cannon ball, as he rode down the hill of Kilcommondon, the place where the main ſtreſs of the battle was fought, being juſt under the Iriſh camp. His troops were immediately put to a ſtand, and his guards drawing off with his corps, many others took that opportunity to draw off likewiſe (1). The Engliſh, who obſerved their diſorder, preſs'd boldly on, and ſoon drove the enemy to the top of Kilcommondon-hill, where their camp had lain. Upon this, they began to commit their ſafety to their flight, the foot running full ſpeed towards a great bog behind them on their left, and the horſe on the highway towards Loughbreagh.

The troops, which ingag'd firſt towards the left, maintain'd their ground, in the mean time, bravely, and tho' the Iriſh did, once or twice make themſelves maſter of the Chevaux de Friſe, that cover'd the French foot, yet the French regain'd them with great valor. Little happen'd, however, on that ſide, for near two hours, neither did the Daniſh horſe and foot, that were on the left of all, diſturb the enemy as yet, but kept ſeveral bodies of horſe and foot, that forc'd them, on the other ſide of the rivulet, in awe: but when they perceiv'd Mackay's battalions in the center, to drive the enemy before them, leſt thoſe bodies that fac'd them, ſhould fall back to the relief of the flying party, they ingag'd them very briſkly, and were, at firſt, oppos'd with great bravery; but victory begining to declare againſt the Iriſh, on every ſide, they all fled out of the field, their foot being miſerably ſlaughter'd by the Engliſh horſe and dragoons, and their horſe purſued them three miles. Night coming on, with a thick miſty rain, prevented the Engliſh from geting between the runaways, and a very advantageous paſs, near Loughbreagh, which gave many of them an opportunity to eſcape. However, it was computed, that there were no leſs than 4000 of the Iriſh kill'd on the ſpot, whereas the Engliſh had not above 700 kill'd, and about as many wounded (2). General Ginckel had always the modeſty to confeſs, that the honor of the day was principally owing to the conduct and bravery of monſ. Ruvigny (afterwards earl of Galway) and to the Oxford and French regiments of horſe (3).

The Iriſh routed.

William & Mary. An' 1691.

After ſome days refreſhment, general Ginckel, reſolving his victorious army ſhould purſue their good fortune, ordered them to march towards Galway, the only place of any importance, excepting Limerick, now left in the hands of the Iriſh, and having poſted his forces before it, he ſent a ſummons to the garriſon. The lord Dillon, who was governor of the place, anſwer'd, "that monſ. "D' Uſſon, who commanded in chief, as well as "himſelf and the reſt of the officers, were reſolved "to defend the place to the laſt." However, the Engliſh had no ſooner croſs'd the river, with part of their army, and had taken the fort, which the Iriſh were building, than theſe reſolute officers beat a parly, and hoſtages were immediately exchang'd. The Iriſh ſtarting ſome difficulties about the ſurrender, general Ginckel grew impatient, and ſent once or twice to them for a reſolution. At length, lieutenant-general Bourk, one of the Iriſh hoſtages, was permited to go in, to whom, major-general Talmaſh, who, as it was believed, was rather inclin'd to lay the treaty aſide, and to take the town by ſtorm, ſaid; "When you are ready to "begin again, give us a ſign by firing a gun into "the air;" but Bourk replied, "we will not "fire a gun from within, 'till we are provoked "from without." Soon after the articles were agreed on, and the town delivered into the hands of the Engliſh (4).

Galway ſurrender'd to the Engliſh.

The 25th of Auguſt, the Engliſh army came, a ſecond time, before Limerick, and immediately poſſeſs'd themſelves of Ireton's and Cromwell's forts (5). The 27th, caſtle Connel, and caſtle Carruck-a-gunnell, three miles below the town, on the Shannon, were taken, and the gariſons of both made priſoners of war. At the ſame time, ſome Engliſh ſhips came unexpectedly up the river, which very much terified the Iriſh. Notwithſtanding this, and ſeveral ſucceſſes the Engliſh had, in a council of war, held the 17th of September, it was warmly debated, whether to proſecute the ſiege, or march over the river, to deſtroy all the enemy's forage in the county of Clare, and then turn the ſiege into a blockade however, it was, at length, carried for the former. The 22d, general Ginckel paſs'd the Shannon over a bridge of boats, with ſtrong detachments of horſe and dragoons, ten battalions of foot, and fourteen pieces of cannon, leaving the Prince of Wirtemberg, Mackay and Talmaſh, to command on this ſide. The enemy fired that morning continually from ſeveral batteries, but did no great harm. The ſame afternoon, a party of colonel Matthew's dragoons was vigorouſly attack'd by a ſtronger detachment of the enemy, 'till the Engliſh foot coming up, the Iriſh retreated under their cannon. Upon this, all the Engliſh grenadiers, ſupported by four regiments of foot, were order'd to Second ſiege of Limerick.

(1) Upon the death of monſ. St. Ruth, the command of the Iriſh army devolv'd upon colonel Sarsfield; but as, ſince the difference between him and monſ. St. Ruth, at Athlone, he had always been on the reſerve with him, he did not know the order of battle.

(2) This victory was as glorious, as it was conſiderable in its conſequences, and the more ſo, as beſide the vaſt advantages the Iriſh had in their ground, they exceeded the Engliſh in number of men, the latter having, at moſt, barely 18,000 men, whereas the former had 20,000 foot, and 5000 horſe and dragoons.

(3) Father Orleans, notwithſtanding he pretends his hiſtory was written under the inſpection of King James, is as evidently faulty in this part of it, as in many others. He pretends, "King William would never have made a conqueſt of Ireland had "not St. Ruth been kill'd by a cannon-ball, after he had broke all the enemy's foot, and as he was actually giving orders for pur-"ſuing that begining of victory, which was ſtopp'd by his death, and given to his enemy." Echard's tranſlation of F. Orleans, p. 328. The Jeſuit's relation is evidently falſe, becauſe the Engliſh had actually recovered the ground they had loſt, and were in purſuit of the Iriſh horſe and dragoons before St. Ruth was kill'd.

(4) The conſequence of this ſucceſs was the ſubmiſſion of Baldarick O Donnel, with a conſiderable number of men under his command; and it was thought to have been the death of Tyrconnel, who ended his days at Limerick, the fourteenth of Auguſt, as it was believed, with grief, to ſee his maſter's affairs in ſo bad a condition.

(5) They were afterwards call'd Mackay's and Naſſau's forts, becauſe they were taken by theſe two commanders.

attack the works which cover'd Thomond-bridge, conſiſting of two forts, one on each ſide of it, and ſeveral other fortifications, in which the enemy had poſted above 200 men. The diſpute was very obſtinate for ſome time, and the attack dangerous; becauſe the enemy plied the aſſailants very warmly, not only with their cannon, from the King's caſtle, and two or three other batteries, but with their ſmall ſhot from the wall. Nevertheleſs, the Engliſh grenadiers preſs'd the Iriſh ſo vigorouſly, that they abandon'd their poſts: a ſtrong detachment was, hereupon, ſent from the town to ſupport them; but the Engliſh purſued their advantage with ſo much fierceneſs, that they beat this detachment too, and purſued the enemy over the bridge, to the very gate of the town (1).

Limerick ſurrender'd.

Having gain'd this advantage, the Engliſh lodg'd themſelves within ten yards of the bridge, notwithſtanding a high tower, that ſtood near the end of the bridge, next to them. The Iriſh being now cut off from all communication with their horſe, and deſpairing of any ſuccor from the French, began to think of giving up the town; which, after ſeveral conferences between the principal officers on both ſides, and the lords-juſtices of Ireland, who came to the camp for that purpoſe, they, at length, did, by capitulation, ſign'd the 3d of October, not only for the city of Limerick, and the caſtles of Roſe and Clare, but all other places and caſtles which were ſtill in the hands of the Iriſh (2): and the ſame evening one of the gates was deliver'd up to the Engliſh. So many of the Iriſh as were willing to go were ſhip'd off for France, where, upon their arrival, King James wellcom'd them with a letter, directed to lieutenant-general Sheldon, the chief officer then with them, in which he expreſs'd himſelf intirely ſatisfied, with their conduct (3). Thus, by the taking of Limerick, all Ireland was reduced to the obedience of their lawful ſovereigns, King William and Queen Mary; the town of Sligo having ſurrender'd to the earl of Granard ſome time before (4).

Ireland intirely reduced.

The affairs of Scotland were this year ſo inconſiderable, that they are hardly worth our notice. The Highlanders kept very quiet in their holds, and in civil affairs, there happened nothing remarkable. I ſhall, therefore, proceed to give a brief account of the tranſactions of our fleets, which were likewiſe not very conſiderable.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1691.

Affairs of Scotland inconſiderable.

Maritime affairs.

I have already obſerved, that mr. Ruſſel was appointed admiral of the fleet, and the greateſt diligence was uſed in order to an early campaign. By his inſtructions he was, indeed, impowered to proceed from time to time, in ſuch manner as might beſt inable him to deſtroy the enemy, either by ſea or land, without expecting particular orders; it was however expreſly provided, that if bad weather rendered it unſafe for him to proceed to ſea, he ſhould repair to, and remain at Torbay, 'till farther orders, the conſequences of which reſtraint were not, perhaps, ſo thoroughly conſidered, as they might have been. With his inſtructions, the admiral likewiſe received a liſt of the ſhips of which the main fleet was appointed to conſiſt (5).

The admiral received orders to put to ſea, ſooner than he thought it proper to hazard the great ſhips, which he believed it neceſſary to remonſtrate, but withal declar'd his willingneſs to obey her Majeſty's commands. He was likewiſe againſt ſending any large fleet to Galloway; nor did he approve of leaving Dunkirk unguarded, 'till the uncertain arrival of other Dutch ſhips, both which had been propos'd. Her Majeſty, receiving, however, intelligence, from Holland, toward the latter end of April, that a fleet of men of war, with about 200 tranſports, were near upon ready to ſail from France for Ireland, gave the admiral poſitive orders, to ſail forthwith for the Soundings. Purſuant to which he appointed Cape Clear for the rendezvous; and the beſt part of the fleet, being got together, form'd them into a line of battle, to be ready for ſervice (6): but while he was doing this, he received orders, from her Majeſty, the 10th of May, to ſend the

(1) A French major, who commanded at the Thomond-gate, fearing the Engliſh might enter pell-mell with the fugitives, order'd the bridge of the gate to be drawn up, and thereby left the party expoſed to the fury of thoſe who purſued them, who kill'd 600 of them and made near 200 priſoners: and many of the Iriſh were beſide drowned.

(2) The articles conſiſted of two parts, civil and military: the firſt were ſign'd by the lords-juſtices as well as the generals; but the latter by the general only, on the Engliſh part. By the four firſt military articles, all the Iriſh who were willing to go to France, had liberty ſo to do: but, two days after they were ſign'd, the general received a letter, from a lieutenant-colonel in the Iriſh army, complaining, that he was under confinement for refuſing to go to France. This violence was ſo reſented by general Ginckel, that he immediately ordered four guns to be planted upon Boll's-bridge, and, with ſome warmth, ſaid he would teach the Iriſh to play tricks with him. Sarsfield came hereupon to the Engliſh camp, and ſeveral warm words paſs'd between him and the general, on this account: and Sarsfield ſaying, "that he was then in the general's power;" "not ſo (replied "Ginckel) but you ſhall go in again, and do the worſt you can." However, all things were, at length, accommodated, and the priſoners inlarg'd.

(3) The ſubſtance of this letter was as follows:

"That having been inform'd of the neceſſities, which forc'd the lords-juſtices, and the general-officers of his forces to ſurrender "Limerick and other places, that remain'd to him, in his kingdom of Ireland, he would not defer to let him, and the reſt of "the officers, come along with him, know, that he was extreamly ſatisfied with his and their conduct, and with the valor of the "ſoldiers, but moſt particularly with his and their declaration and reſolution to come and ſerve where he was; aſſuring both him, "and the other officers and ſoldiers, that he ſhould never forget this act of loyalty, nor fail, when in a capacity, to give them, "above others, particular marks of his favor. In the mean time, he charg'd Sheldon to inform them, that they were to ſerve un-"der his Majeſty's command, and by his commiſſions; and that his brother, the King of France, had already given orders to "cloath them, to furniſh them with all neceſſaries, and to give them quarters of refreſhment.

(4) Thus ended this famous Iriſh war, to the immortal honor of general Ginckel, and with ſo much the more glory to the Engliſh, becauſe the rebels were ſo powerfully ſupported by the French King; who had reaſon to think it his intereſt, to divert their arms that way; and it is remarkable, that a fleet of men of war and ſtore-ſhips, which he had ſent to the relief of Limerick, arrived in Dingle-bay, but a day or two after the articles, for the ſurrender of that place, were ſign'd. Father Orleans pretends, "the ſecond ſiege of Limerick was ſuſtain'd with ſuch reputation, that it might have been a means to reſtore that "King:" but the Engliſh, probably to ſave the effuſion of Chriſtian blood, did not give them ſo great opportunity to exerciſe their valour as at Athlone and Aghrim, and the Iriſh were in the more haſte to capitulate, that they might obtain good terms, as they did: and, indeed, as many thought better than they had reaſon to expect.

(5) According to this liſt, his fleet conſiſted of five firſt-rates; eleven ſecond-rates; two and thirty third-rates; nine fourth-rates; four fifth-rates; three ſixth-rates; twenty fire-ſhips; four hoſpital-ſhips; one ſloop; one brigantine; and one yacht; in all ninety-one ſail, ſeventy of which were of the line of battle; beſide the Dutch, which came over in good time, and whoſe quota was generally five to eight, or, as biſhop Burnet ſays, was this time agreed to be, three to five, of equal rates and ſtrength.

(6) Conſiſting of five firſt-rates; eleven ſecond-rates; two and thirty third-rates; nine fourth-rates; one fifth-rate; four ſixth-rates; four frigats; fifteen fire-ſhips; four hoſpital-ſhips; one bomb veſſel; and one yacht; making together eighty-ſeven ſail, of which ſeven and fifty were of the line of battle, Engliſh: and of the Dutch, ſeventeen ſhips, from ninety-two to fifty guns, and four of leſſer burden, together one and twenty ſail; in all, Engliſh and Dutch, one hundred and eight ſail. fleet to St. Hellen's or Spithead, and himſelf to come immediately to court (1).

When he returned to the fleet, he had orders, to ſend ſome ſhips into the Iriſh channel, to cruiſe upon the coaſt of Scotland, without Cantire, to prevent the French tranſporting any forces from Ireland to that kingdom: but the ſhips, which were expected from Dunkirk, not being come, and the Dutch admiral refuſing to ſend ſhips of his ſquadron to ſupply, in part, their place, theſe orders could not be complied with. The Queen being informed of this delay, renewed her order, that the fleet ſhould ſail as ſoon as poſſible, according to her former inſtructions, without ſtaying for the return of the Dunkirk-ſquadron.

The 20th of May, the fleet was ready, and the admiral intended to ſail, the next morning, from the Downs to Torbay, and to leave orders for mr. Churchill, to follow him thither, with the ſquadron under his command, off of Dunkirk; but a S. W. wind preventing him, he received the Queen's orders, the twenty-ſecond, to proceed before Breſt.

The twenty-third, in the morning, the fleet ſet ſail; but, being got as far Weſtward as Dungeneſſe, was forced back into the Downs, with a hard gale at S. W. and, ſoon after, advice came, that the French were arrived, with 100 tranſports, in the river Shannon, and that their convoy was cruiſing between that river and Galloway; upon which her Majeſty ordered the admiral to proceed off of Breſt, but to ſend a frigat to Kingſale, for intelligence, and, if there was any probability of deſtroying thoſe ſhips, to detach a ſquadron for that purpoſe, with orders to return to the fleet, as ſoon as the ſervice was perform'd (2).

At length, the weather proving favorable, the fleet put to ſea, and, on the 14th of June, being ſix leagues S. E. from the iſle of Wight, it was reſolv'd, by a council of the flag-officers, to fix the ſtation eight leagues W. from Uſhant, and that ſhips ſhould be detach'd from thence, to look into Breſt. The 19th they got off of Plymouth, but were forc'd, by bad weather, back to Torbay (3). The 22d the admiral got under ſail again, and, when he was off of Dartmouth, received advice, by an expreſs, that the French were at ſea, with twenty-eight ſhips. The 28th it was confirmed by ſome fiſhermen, who ſaid they had lain four days becalmed, off of Uſhant, which then bore E. S. E. from them, about nine leagues; upon which it was reſolved, by the flag-officers, to ſtretch over to Cape-Clear; and, when the admiral came off of Kingſale, he found the Smirna-fleet in ſafe harbor there.

The admiral having convoy'd this fleet off of Scilly, parted with them there, the 13th of July, and ſhaped his courſe towards the French coaſt, in ſearch of the French fleet; and no ſooner was Uſhant diſcover'd from the maſt-head, than ſir Cloudeſly Shovel was ſent to look into Breſt, while the admiral followed at a convenient diſtance. When he was about a league from St. Matthew's-point, he ſaw about forty ſail coming out of Breſt-harbor, which proved to be coaſting veſſels from Bretagne, with three men of war, of about forty guns each. Sir Cloudeſly, to decoy theſe ſhips, ſtood in, with part of his ſquadron, under French colors, and the reſt without any; which made them believe it was ſome prizes ſent home with part of their own fleet; ſo that they were coming out to meet them; but finding their miſtake, every one ſhifted for himſelf, as well as he could.

The ſeven and twentieth, the fleet being about thirty leagues from Uſhant, ſeveral veſſels were ſeen under convoy of a man of war, and two ſhips ſuppoſed to be fire-ſhips. The ſame ſtratagem was made uſe of as before, to deceive them, with white colors; but one of our captains being too forward in the chaſe, only three of the ſmall veſſels fell into our hands.

The admiral finding all methods for coming up with the enemy proved ineffectual (for as biſhop Burnet obſerves they had orders to avoid an ingagement) was deſirous of freſh orders, how to proceed with the fleet; when, on the nine and twentieth, the Queen ſent him directions, if the French fleet was not at ſea, or in ſuch a ſtation, that he could not prudently attack them, he ſhould forthwith repair to the coaſt of Ireland, for ſecurity of our merchant-ſhips; but left him at liberty to go to Kingſale, to refreſh his men, or to remain in ſuch ſtation, near that place, where he ſhould judge the fleet might be moſt ſafe, and in the greateſt readineſs to execute orders. He was, however, adviſed, not to leave the French coaſt immediately, becauſe he might probably ſoon, if it all, have an opportunity of fighting.

The 31ſt of July (the fleet having till then kept its ſtation, about ſixty leagues, W. S. W. from Uſhant) the admiral gave orders, once more, to ſtand for Uſhant; and three days after, the marquis of Carmarthen's ſloop, being upon the chaſe, off of Uſhant, ſaw upwards of a hundred ſail, in Broad-Sound, which, as they ſuppoſed, proved to be the French fleet going to Breſt. Upon this advice, it was reſolved, on the 5th of Auguſt, in a council of war, that it was neceſſary to return with the fleet to Torbay, to recruit. While the fleet was at Torbay, it was propos'd, from court, to attack the French fleet in Camaret-bay: but this project was diſapproved of in a council of war, and as it was only propoſed, and not abſolutely commanded, of courſe drop'd.

The 25th of Auguſt, the admiral received orders to put to ſea again, with the firſt fair wind, as well to meet the French fleet, ſhould they venture to come out again, as for ſecurity of the trade, and to intercept ſuccors from France to Ireland. Purſuant to theſe orders, he made the land of Uſhant the laſt of Auguſt; but nothing appearing there, that day or the next, he ſailed for the Lizard, from whence the appointed ſtation was ten leagues Weſt-South-Weſt (4).

The ſecond of September, our fleet being in the Soundings, ſo violent a ſtorm aroſe, that for their ſafety, they were obliged to bear up for ſo dangerous a part as Plymouth, where they arrived in a ſhattered condition, with the loſs of the Coronation,

(1) The occaſion of theſe orders was, becauſe there was reaſon to apprehend, that the French intended not only to ſend ammunition, and other inſtruments of war, to Ireland; but to tranſport a conſiderable number of Iriſh, from thence to Scotland: and, therefore, the Queen was deſirous to intercept them, in their paſſage, and to confer with him in perſon, that as well this, as all other affairs, relating to the expedition, might be mutually deliberated. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 649.

(2) The 1ſt of June, the admiral was acquainted, that the news of the duke of Berwick's being gone to Scotland was contradicted, and not many days after he received advice from court, that the French ſquadron was certainly gone back from Ireland, and the tranſports would probably be clear of that kingdom, before the fleet could arrive: his orders were therefore renewed, to ſail to Breſt, Belle-Iſle, or ſome ſtation thereabouts, to prevent the French from attempting our Smirna-fleet. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 650.

(3) There, the admiral received a letter from mr. Ailmer, dated off of Cape St. Vincent, by which he judg'd the Smirna-fleet was in Ireland, or, at leaſt, very near the Soundings. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. ib.

(4) If the French had been inclined to fight, they could not have wiſhed a fairer opportunity: for they might have had the weather-gage on their own coaſt; but they were ſatisfied to lie ſafe in port, rather than hazard blows tho' with this advantage. Lediard's naval hiſtory Vol. 2. p. 652.

a ſecond-

a ſecond-rate, which foundered off of the Ramhead, and the Harwich, a third-rate, which ran on ſhoar and was bulged. And thus ended the fruitleſs tranſactions of our fleet for this year: for tho' a ſquadron of Engliſh and Dutch ſhips was formed, and ordered, under the command of ſir Ralph Delaval to ſtation between twenty and thirty leagues South-weſt of Cape-Clear; yet he being four times beaten back by contrary winds, his expedition ended in as little as that of the great fleet.

Affairs in America.

We had this year, again, a ſquadron of men of war in America, under the command of captain Ralph Wren, as commadore. The only thing which happened remarkable in the expedition was, that on the 21ſt of February, he met a French ſquadron of eighteen men of war, from ſixty to forty guns; which the next morning, he bravely ingaged, tho' he had but ſeven men of war, under his command, and a fleet of merchant-ſhips to take care of. After a warm action of four hours, finding the French fleet too much his ſuperior, he made his retreat, with great conduct, and brought his whole ſquadron and convoy, without the loſs of a ſhip, into Carliſle-bay, in Barbadoes (1). Commadore Wren dying ſoon after, captain Boteler, the ſenior commander, ſailed, with part of the ſquadron, from Barbadoes, in June (leaving the reſt to attend the plantations) and arrived in England, in Auguſt.

Before I return to England, I ſhall juſt hint at the affairs on the continent. Thoſe of Flanders, I have already diſpatched; I come now to Spain.

Affairs of Spain.

The Spaniards had met with a ſenſible mortification in Flanders, by the loſs of Mons: but they met with a greater near home by their ill ſucceſs in Catalonia, where the French took Urgell, fortified Belver, and advanced to attack Prato Melo, the Spaniards every where flying before them: nor were they more ſucceſsful at ſea, ſince they could not prevent the marſhal d' Etrees from terrifying the city of Barcelona with a bombardment.

Affairs of Italy.

The French were no leſs proſperous in Italy; for monſ. Catinat, taking the field early, made himſelf maſter of Villa-Franca, the forts of St. Auſpice and Montalban; and ſoon after of the city and caſtle of Nice; he likewiſe made great progreſs in Piedmont, took Villana and Carmagnola, and detached the marquis de Feuquieres, with a ſtrong body, to inveſt Coni, and tho' Prince Eugene had the good fortune to raiſe that ſiege, and to retake Carmagnola, and the French were obliged to abandon Foſſano, Savillana and Saluſſes, and to retreat towards Pignerol, yet the duke of Savoy was a great ſufferer, by the ill ſucceſs of the former part of the campain. Monſ. Catinat, likewiſe, concluded the campain ſucceſsfully, by taking the caſtle of Montmelan, by which means, the French became intire maſters of all the duchy of Savoy. On the 1ſt of February this year, died Pope Alexander VIII, who was ſucceeded by Pope Innocent XII, of the family of Pignatelli.

Affairs of Germany.

On the Rhine, the campain was, this year, very inconſiderable, tho' the French had rather the advantage on that ſide too. Their firſt attempt was on the city of Mentz, which was to have been delivered to them by treachery, but their deſign being prevented by a timely diſcovery, they took the town of Algeſheim, about five or ſix German miles from that city, after ſome reſiſtance, and then retreated to Creutznach. On the other hand, the Germans, under the command of the elector of Saxony, having the generals Caprara and Schoning under him, croſſed the Rhine near Manheim; but they were rather loſers than gainers by it; for the French croſſing the Rhine, in their turn, at Philipſburg obliged the Germans to follow them; but not time enough to hinder their taking of Pfortzheim, in the marquaſite of Baden Durlach. With the taking of this place, and another of leſs importance, the French, after having likewiſe ravaged that of Juliers, which belonged to the elector Palatine, finiſhed their campain, on that ſide; the death of the elector of Saxony, on the 22d of September, having in a great meaſure, put an end to that of the Germans.

William & Mary. An' 1691.

But to return to England: (2) The parliament, which, as I have ſaid above, was prorogued to the 22d of October, being then met, the King opened the ſeſſion, as uſual, by a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them: "that he had appointed this "meeting as ſoon as ever the affairs abroad would "admit of his return to England that they might "have the more time to conſider of the beſt and "moſt effectual ways and means for the carrying on "the war againſt France. That he was willing to "hope, the good ſucceſs, with which it had pleaſed "God to bleſs his arms in Ireland that ſummer, "would not only be a great incouragement to them "to proceed the more chearfull in this work, but "would be looked upon by them as an earneſt of "future ſervice, which their timely aſſiſtance to "him might, by God's bleſſing, procure to them "all. And as he did not doubt, but they would take "care to pay the arrears of that army, which had "been ſo deſerving and ſo proſperous, in the redu-"cing of Ireland, to a peaceable cnndition; ſo he "aſſured them, there ſhould be no care wanting on "his part, to keep that kingdom, as far as was "poſſible, from being burdenſome to England, for "the future. He, moreover, acquainted them with "the neceſſity both of having a ſtrong fleet early at "ſea, next year, and of maintaining a conſidera-"ble army ready upon all occaſions, not only to "defend themſelves from any inſult, but alſo to "annoy the common enemy, where it might "be moſt ſenſible to them, which he did not ſee "could be done with leſs than 65,000 l. Adding, "that by the vigor and diſpatch of their counſels "and aſſiſtance to him, in this ſeſſion of parlia-"ment, they had now an opportunity in their "hands, which, if they neglected, they could never "reaſonably hope to ſee again, not only to eſtabliſh "the future quiet and proſperity in theſe king-"doms, but the peace and ſecurity of all "Europe."

King's ſpeech to both houſes of parliament.

Both houſes waited on his Majeſty with their congratulatory addreſſes "upon his ſafe and hap-"py return, after ſo many hazards, to which his "Majeſty had expoſed his perſon; and upon the "ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms in reducing "Ireland; and at the ſame time, aſſured his Ma-"jeſty, that they would aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of Addreſſes of both Houſes.

(1) The author of the Britiſh empire, in America, reckons this the braveſt action which was performed in that part of the world, during the whole war; we had not, indeed, many brave actions to boaſt of there, and tho' this produced but a negative advantage, all circumſtances conſidered, it very well deſerves the name of a brave and commendable action.

(2) I gave an account above of the King's departure from the army in Flanders to Loo, and return from thence to England; but omited to mention, that his Majeſty's enemies, unwilling to wait any longer, the uncertain fate of war, had formed a project for aſſaſſinating the King. This was to be perpetrated by a French captain of dragoons called de Granvale, and one Dumont who had been formerly retained for the ſame purpoſe. Their deſign, at firſt, was to do to the wicked deed at Loo, before he opened the campain: but miſſing their opportunity there, they followed his Majeſty to Flanders. Granvale returned to the French army; but Dumont, to be nearer at hand to execute his deſign, entered into the ſervice of the confederate army, where his intent was to ſhoot the King, when he went to viſit the grand guard or the lines, and then to eſcape to a party of horſe with which Granvale, and colonel Parker, upon previous intimation given, were to be in a readineſs to reſcue him: but whether Dumont's courage failed him, or ſome other cauſe prevented it, after ſome weeks attendance, he left the army, and laid aſide the accurſed project, for this year at leaſt. If the deſign had ſucceeded, Granvale was to be made a duke, and to have an eſtate proportionable, and Dumont was to be a knight of St. Lazarus, with a penſion of 20,000 livers a year.

" their power, in carrying on a vigorous war againſt " France, in order to procure an honorable and " laſting peace to his own dominions, and to ſecure " his neighbors from the injuries and invaſions of " the common oppreſſor; hoping, with his Majeſty, " that the victories of this laſt ſummer were hap- " py preſages of the proſperity of his future enter- " prizes."

Both houſes, likewiſe, preſented addreſſes to the Queen, to acknowledge her prudent care, in the adminiſtration of the government, during his Majeſty's abſenſe.

Bill to appoint the oaths in Ireland.

The 28th of October, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, " to abrogate the former " oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance in Ireland, and " inſtead thereof, to eſtabliſh the oaths of fidelity " and allegiance taken to their Majeſty's in Eng- " land." This bill being ſent up to the houſe of peers, their lordſhips made ſome amendments to it, which occaſioned two or three conferences between the lords and commons, but the former deſiſting from their amendments, the 10th of December, it paſſed that houſe, likewiſe.

A ſupply granted.

The 30th of October, a motion was made, that a ſupply be granted to their Majeſties, but it was not taken into conſideration, till the 6th of November, when it was unanimouſly reſolved, " that a " ſupply be granted to their Majeſties for the car- " rying on a vigorous war againſt France;" it was, at the ſame time, ordered, that his Majeſty be deſired, to cauſe the ſtate of the war, for the inſuing year, as well with regard to the fleet as the land forces, to be laid before the houſe. The 9th the eſtimate of the charge of the navy, for the year 1692, as delivered in by the commiſſioners of the admiralty, having been examined, the commons voted the ſum of 1,515,898 l. for that article, including the ordnance, and the charge of building one dry dock, and two wet docks at Portſmouth. The 19th, the lord Ranelagh having before, by his Majeſty's orders, laid a liſt of the land-forces before the commons, it was reſolved, " that an army of 64,924 men, excluſive of offi- " cers, was neceſſary for the ſervice of the year " 1692, in order to the ſecuring the peace of the " kingdom, and the carrying on a vigorous war " againſt France." Much time was ſpent in ſtating and examining the eſtimate of the charge of the army, general officers, hoſpitals, train of artillery and their tranſport-ſhips; as alſo in conſidering, what ſhare the kingdom of Ireland ſhould contribute towards the charge of the troops there; ſo that it was the 4th of January before they came to any reſolution; but then it was agreed; " that a ſum not exceeding 1,935,787 l. together with the ſum of " 165,000 l. to be anſwered out of the revenue of " Ireland, be the ſum for the land-forces, for the " ſervice of the year 1692"; ſo that the ſums granted this year, for the fleet and army, amounted together to the ſum of 3,411,677 l.

Ways and means.

To raiſe theſe large ſums, it was reſolved, on the 12th of November, " that the duties of exciſe " for beer, ale, and other liquors, which were pay- " able for a year, from the 17th of November, be " continued for another year: and on the 12th of " December, that the ſum of 1,651,702 l. be " granted upon lands; and that the ſalaries, fees, " and perquiſites of all offices under the crown, " ſhould be to the uſe of the war, except 500 l. " to be allowed ſuch reſpective officers, except " the lords commiſſioners of the great ſeal, the " judges, foreign miniſters, and to the commiſſion- " officers, ſerving in the fleet and army." As, after this, the farther conſideration of ways and means was poſtponed for near a month, it will not be amiſs to take a view of ſeveral other things, which were done in parliament, from the begining of the ſeſſion, to the time the conſideration of ways and means was reſumed.

I ſhall begin with that of the Eaſt-India-company, which took up a great deal of time. The 28th of October, ſeveral merchants, their Majeſty's ſubjects, preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, containing complaints againſt the Eaſt-India-company, and the company at the ſame time, put in another petition, in behalf of themſelves; the conſideration of both which, was refered to a committee of the whole houſe. About a fortnight after, the heads of the complaints againſt the Eaſt-India-company, were delivered to their governor; to which, they having put in their anſwer, that was communicated to the petitioners, and the Eaſt-India-company, was ordered to make their defenſe, the 20th of November. That and ſeveral more days were ſpent in examining the accounts, which ſir Joſeph Herne, their governor, gave in, as a ſtate of their ſtock and debts, at home and abroad; and in conſidering ſeveral other petitions relating to the Eaſt-India-trade, 'till at length, the commons came to ſeveral reſolutions, by which the charter of their company was to be confirmed on the following conditions:

Regulations for the Eaſt-India-company.

1. " That a ſum not leſs than 1,500,000 l. and " not exceeding 2,000,000 l. was a fund neceſſary " to carry on the Eaſt-India-trade, in a joint ſtock.

2. " That no perſon ſhould have any ſhare in a " joint ſtock, for the Eaſt-India-trade, exceeding " 5000 l. either in his own name, or any other in " truſt for him.

3. " That no one perſon ſhould have above one " vote in the ſaid company, and that each perſon " who had 5,000 l. ſtock therein, ſhould have " one vote.

4. " That the company to trade to the Eaſt- " Indies, ſhould be obliged to export, every year, " in their trade, goods, being the growth and ma- " nufacture of this nation, to the value of 200, 000 l. " at leaſt.

5. " That no private contracts ſhould be made, " but all goods ſold at public ſales, by inch of " candle, except ſalt-petre for the uſe of the " crown.

6. " That the Eaſt-India-company be obliged to " ſell to the King early, ſalt-petre refined (the re- " fraction not exceeding four or five per cent, out " of 112) 500 tons, at the rate of 30 l. per ton.

" That no lot ſhould be put up at any ſales in the " Eaſt-India-company, at one time, exceeding " 500 l.

8. " That no perſon ſhould be governor or deputy- " governor of the company, to trade to the Eaſt- " Indies, who had leſs ſhare in the ſtock, than " 2000 l. or committee-man, that had leſs than " 1000 l.

9. " That the election of governor, deputy- " governor, and committee, for the company to " trade to the Eaſt-Indies, be made every year.

10. " That all dividends be made in mony.

11. That no dividends be made, without leaving " a ſufficient fund to pay all debts and carry on " the trade.

12. " That a valuation of the ſtock be made " every five years, by the accomptant of the com- " pany upon oath, to be ſeen by all ſuch as are " concerned therein.

13. " That no ſhips, either with permiſſion or " without, for the future, be allowed to go to the " Eaſt-Indies, except only ſuch as ſhould be of " the company, or be eſtabliſhed by act of par- " liament.

14. " That no by-laws ſhould be binding to the " company, but ſuch as were approved by a gene- " ral court of adventurers, and were not repug- " nant to the laws of the land.

15. " That

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1691.

15. " That the joint-ſtock of a company to trade " to the Eaſt-Indies, be for twenty-one years and " no longer."

The day after theſe reſolutions were made, the three following were added to them:

16. " That all perſons now having above the " ſum of 5,000 l. in the ſtock of the preſent Eaſt- " India-company, in their own, or other perſons " names, be obliged to ſell ſo much thereof, as " ſhould exceed the ſaid ſum of 5,000 l. at the rate " of 100 l. for every hundred.

17. " That the members of the committee of " the Eaſt-India-company, be obliged to give ſe- " curity to be approved of by the houſe, that the " ſtock and eſtate they now had ſhould be made " good 749,000 l. all debts paid: and

" 18 That (ſecurity being firſt given) an humble " addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, to incorpo- " rate the preſent Eaſt-India-company, by charter, " according to the regulations agreed upon by the " houſe, that the ſame might paſs into an act."

The 23d of December, ſir Thomas Cook, ſir Thomas Rawlinſon, and ſir William Langhorn, and other committee-men of the company, delivered in propoſals concerning the ſecurity to be given, which being diſapproved, the committee was ordered to produce the perſons then propoſed to be ſecurity, and an account of the ſums for which each perſon would be ſecurity, which being done accordingly, the 29th of December, the commons, after a long examination of the whole matter, approved of the ſecurity propoſed, and on the 8th of January appointed a committee to prepare and bring in " a bill " to eſtabliſh an Eaſt-India-company, according " to the regulations and reſolutions agreed upon by " the houſe (1).

Bill to eſtabliſh an Eaſt-India company ordered.

State of the nation conſidered.

The commons having, on the 3d of November, conſidered the ſtate of the nation, they reſolved " that the paying of the army any otherwiſe, " than by muſters of effective men, was a great " waſting of their Majeſties treaſure"; and a bill was ordered to be brought in, " for paying off the " army accordingly, and for better paying of quar- " ters, and likewiſe for preventing of falſe muſ- " ters, and puniſhing mutineers and deſerters."

Proceedings of the fleet inquired into.

The commons reſolved, at the ſame time, " that " the miſcarriages of the fleet ſhould be inquired " into, by a committee of the whole houſe." The 10th, admiral Ruſſel and the lord Falkland preſented to the houſe, the inſtructions given by the commiſſioners for executing the office of lord-high-admiral of England; a liſt of the ſhips, and an extract of ſeveral letters and orders, touching the proceedings of the ſaid fleet, during the laſt ſummer's expedition, and a liſt of the ſhips that had been loſt and damaged ſince the year 1688, all which were examined into.

The 12th, the commons were acquainted, that mr. Bridges, a member of their houſe, could give an account of an information given him by a captain in their Majeſties fleet, that ſir Ralph Delavall had lately taken a French boat going for Ireland, with papers of dangerous conſequence to the government. Mr. Bridges was, thereupon, ordered to name the perſon, and he having named the lord Danby, ſon to the marquis of Caermarthen, a conference was deſired with the lords, upon matters relating to the ſafety of the kingdom: but this matter did not turn out as it was expected; for after a full and tedious examination of the whole matter, on the 2d of December, it was found, that there was not a copy of a letter from the earl of Nottingham to ſir Ralph Delaval, in the packet taken on board the ſaid French veſſel; but only a letter writen by his lordſhip to ſir Ralph, deſiring him to ſend up that packet; and ſo the ſtorm blew over (2).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1691.

Dr. Welwood cenſured.

About the ſame time, mr. Welwood, a doctor of phyſic, noted afterwards for his memoirs, employed his eloquent pen, in expoſing ſome ſiniſter deſigns of the enemies to their Majeſties government, in a weekly paper, intitled, Mercurius Reformatus, or the New Obſervator: but his zeal having carried him ſo far, as to caſt ſome reflections on the proceedings of the houſe of commons, they ordered both the author and printer to be ſent for in cuſtody of their ſerjeant at arms; from whence, after having been reprimanded by the ſpeaker, they were, at length, diſcharged, without any other puniſhment (3).

Bills paſſed.

The 24th of December, the King went to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent to " an " act for granting to their Majeſties certain impoſi- " tions upon beer, ale, and other liquors, for one " year, to another; for abrogating the oath of ſupre- " macy in Ireland, and appointing other oaths;" and to ſeveral private bills.

The 31ſt, his Majeſty came again to the houſe, and, in like manner, gave his aſſent to the land-tax-bill: after which he was pleaſed to make the following ſpeech to both houſes:

His Majeſty's ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I muſt not loſe this occaſion of returning you " my hearty thanks, for the great proofs you con- " tinue to give me of your zeal, and reſolution to " ſupport and aſſiſt me, in the vigorous proſecution " of the war againſt France next year; and I aſſure " you, it ſhall be my greateſt care, that the aſſiſ- " tances you give me may be ſo applied, as to ren- " der them more effectual for the aids you deſigned " them: but I muſt take notice to you at the ſame " time, with ſome trouble, that the new year is " already come, while our preparations for it are " not only more backward, but thoſe of our ene- " mies, as we have reaſon to think, in greater " forwardneſs, than they were laſt year. I find " myſelf, therefore, neceſſitated, from this con- " ſideration, moſt earneſtly to recommend to you, " gentlemen, of the houſe of commons the haſten- " ing ſuch farther ſupplies, as you deſign for the " proſecution of the war."

(1) This matter came however to nothing; on the contrary ſeveral petitions being preſented againſt that bill, to which the Eaſt-India-company did not give ſatisfactory anſwers, the commons addreſſed the King to diſſolve it, and grant a charter to a new company. His Majeſty's anſwer was: " It is a motion of very great importance to the trade of this kingdom, I will " conſider of it, and in a ſhort time, give the commons a poſitive anſwer." And there it ſtuck: however his Majeſty was pleaſed to confer the order of knighthood on ſir John Goldſborough who was going to India, in the quality of the company's commiſſary-general. Oldmixon, p. 66.

(2) Upon this occaſion, the commons took into their conſideration, the confeſſions and examinations of the lord Preſton and mr. Crone, which, according to their deſire, the King ordered to be laid before them.

(3) Dr. Welwood, was, however, fully recompenſed for the trouble and expenſes he was put to on this account, being ſoon after made one of the phyſicians in ordinary to his Majeſty.

There were ſeveral other affairs, about this time, which amuſed the houſe of commons to little purpoſe: a bill was brought in " for regulating abuſes in elections and returns to parliament", which was rejected after a third reading. A bill " for the better " improvement of the woollen manufactures of this kingdom", which was alſo thrown out, before a ſecond reading. A bill " for " the better repair of the harbor of Dover;" which was alſo rejected. A bill to regulate Hackney-coaches; a bill to diſcou- " rage the exportation of bullion, and incourage the importation of it, and converting the ſame into the coin of this land; another " to incourage privateers, in which no progreſs was made.

My

William & Mary. An' 1691

My lords and gentlemen,

" The ſeaſon being ſo far advanced, this preſent " ſeſſion cannot admit of a much longer continu- " ance, and therefore I muſt recommend to you, " the diſpatch of all ſuch other bills, that you ſhall " judge neceſſary for the public good."

Before I continue the proceedings of parliament, in the new year, I ſhall juſt mention two or three incidents out of parliament, which happened before the concluſion of the year.

Sundry tranſactions out of parliament.

The 10th of November, their Majeſties were near having a fatal accident, in their palace at Kenſington, which took fire and burnt down the ſtone-gallery, but was extinguiſhed before it reached their Majeſties appartment (1). The ſame day, William Harbord, eſq; one of their Majeſties privy-council, ſet out for Turkey, being appointed embaſſador-extraordinary, at the Ottoman-port, in the room of ſir William Huſſey deceaſed. The 25th, dr. Thomas Tenniſon was nominated biſhop of Lincoln, which ſee became vacant by the death of dr. Thomas Barlow. As it was neceſſary, after the intire reduction of Ireland, to tranſport many of the forces imploy'd in that ſervice to England, in order to be otherwiſe diſpos'd of; and leſt thoſe troops ſhould abandon themſelves to licentiouſneſs, the natural effect of victory, his Majeſty iſſued out a proclamation, " requiring all officers and ſoldiers, to obſerve " ſtrict diſcipline, and punctually to pay their quar- " ters."

Mr. Moleſworth complain'd of.

About the ſame time, the Daniſh miniſter made complaint of a book, intitled, An account of Denmark, written by mr. Moleſworth (afterwards lord viſcount Moleſworth) who had reſided there as envoy from England. The Dane, it ſeems, told the King, " If he had been a ſubject of Denmark, his " Majeſty would have ſtruck off his head for it:" But his Majeſty, who knew better, replied: " The " government of England is regulated by the laws, " which are the rule both for King and people to " go by: but, as for mr. Moleſworth, if you will " give yourſelf the trouble, to go and tell him " what you have ſaid, I do not doubt but he will " put your words into the next edition of his " book.

An' 1692.

Bill to regulate trials, in caſes of high-treaſon.

But to return to parliamentary affairs: his Majeſty's ſpeech, as far as regarded the diſpatch of buſineſs, had not the greateſt effect; for both houſes were now ingaged in a warm debate, raiſed by the bill " for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon." This bill had been laid aſide by the lords, in the preceeding ſeſſion; but being now again ſet on foot, by the commons, paſs'd, and ſent up to the lords, for their concurrence, their lordſhips, beſide other amendments, added a clauſe to it, whereby it was inacted; " That upon the trial of any peer or Clauſe added by the lords.

" peereſs, for any treaſon, or miſpriſion of treaſon, " all the peers, who have a right to ſit and vote in " parliament, ſhould be duly ſummon'd twenty days, " at leaſt, before every ſuch trial, to appear at " every ſuch trial, and that every peer ſo ſummon'd, " and appearing at ſuch trials, ſhould vote in the " trial of ſuch peer and peereſs ſo to be tried, he " and they firſt taking the oaths mention'd in " an act of parliament, made in the firſt year of " King William and Queen Mary, intitled, an act " for abrogating the oaths of ſupremacy and alle- " giance, and appointing other oaths; and ſubſcrib- " ing and audibly repeating the declaration men- " tion'd in an act of parliament made in the thirtieth " year of King Charles II, intitled, an act for the " more effectual preſerving the King's perſon and " government, by diſabling Papiſts from ſitting in " either houſe of parliament.

Diſagreed to by the commons.

The commons diſagreing to this clauſe, (2) it occaſion'd ſeveral conferences between the two houſes, in the firſt of which, Charles Montague, eſq; afterwards earl of Hallifax, one of the managers for the commons, diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in a particular manner. For the lords, were the duke of Bolton, the marquis of Hallifax, the earl of Mulgrave, the earl of Rocheſter, the earl of Nottingham, the earl of Monmouth, and the earl of Stamford. As this controverſy was of ſome importance, tho' it would take up too much of my time to relate the arguments made uſe of by both ſides, at large, I ſhall give a ſummary of them.

Arguments of the commons againſt the clauſe.

The commons alledg'd, " they could not " conſent to ſo great an alteration in the conſtitu- " tion, as this would introduce; nor did they in- " tend to diſable the crown, in one of its moſt ne- " ceſſary prerogatives, or to place a judicature in " other hands, than in thoſe to whom the laws " of England, and the cuſtom of the realm, " had committed it. That the clauſe now in diſ- " pute ſtruck at no leſs than this, and conſequently " at the alteration of the government of England. " That the King has the power of conſtituting courts " and officers for the adminiſtation of juſtice: " That the judges are conſtituted by his commiſ- " ſion; the ſheriffs are of his nomination, who " are to return the pannels of jurors, that are to " paſs on the lives of commoners; and, in like " manner, it is the prerogative of the crown, to " conſtitute a lord-high-ſteward, who, by his ſer- " jeant at arms, does ſummon a competent number " of peers to be triers of their lordſhips: but this " clauſe took away theſe powers from the high- " ſteward; and therefore took away ſo much from " the regal authority, and would render their lord- " ſhips independent of the crown in capital caſes, " wherein, above all other things, the peace and ſafety " of the government was concern'd: by this clauſe, " the court would no longer be conſtituted by the " high-ſteward, who receives his commiſſion from " the crown; but the whole order of peers would " have a right to make up the court, and all " the friends, relations, and accomplices of the " perſon accuſed, were to be his triers. That " the commons look'd upon the method of trials, " which the lords would alter, to have been " as ancient as the conſtitution of the government. " That it appear'd in the year books, to have been " practiſed in the firſt year of Henry IV, and " to have been well known at that time; that the " reaſon no older proceedings before the lord-high- " ſteward were to be found, was, that this very " Henry IV, when duke of Lancaſter, was the " laſt high-ſteward who had any fixed intereſt in " that office, and the office having ſo long ceaſed, " all the records were loſt, and the very nature and " power of the office, except in this inſtance of " trying of peers, and determining claims at " coronations, were likewiſe loſt: but, ſince that " time, the high-ſteward being only pro hac vice, " the proceedings are commonly tranſmited into " other courts, where they are to be found.

" That if there were any objections to the pre- " ſent method of trying of peers, it muſt be foun- " ded on a ſuppoſition of partiality and unfairneſs " of conſtituting a high ſteward, or in the high- " ſteward himſelf, and the peers ſummoned by

(1) At the firſt noiſe of fire, his Majeſty is ſaid to have aſked for his ſword, ſuppoſing there was treachery in it.

(2) 'Till then, it had been the cuſtom, for the lord-ſteward, for the time being, to ſummon, by his ſerjeant at arms, a competent number only of peers, to be triers of peers, and the lord-ſteward being appointed by the King's-commiſſion, the commons thought that clauſe an alteration in the conſtitution, and as ſuch diſagreed to it.

" him

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1692.

" him: and that the commons were unwilling to " enter into any ſuch kind of ſuppoſals: but as " to the partial conſtituting an high-ſteward, if " that might be ſuppoſed, it was an objection " to the conſtitution, which intruſts the crown " with the adminiſtration of juſtice; and that ſup- " poſal might as well extend to the appoint- " ment of judges and ſheriffs, and every other " part of the adminiſtration: and if, upon ſuch " ſuppoſal or diſtruſt, the remedy muſt be to take " away that part of the adminiſtration out of the " crown (as was done in this clauſe) the reader muſt " carry the thing ſo far, that the nature of the go- " vernment would be alter'd: and as to the parti- " ality of the lord-high-ſteward and the peers, the " commons were unwilling to ſuppoſe, that it was " poſſible that twelve peers ſhould be ever found (for " that number muſt agree, or the perſon accuſed is " ſafe) who could ſo far forget their honors, and " the noble order they are of, as for revenge or in- " tereſt to ſacrifice an innocent perſon: and if the " lords could ſuppoſe this, the commons thought " themſelves excus'd, if they ſuppos'd, that other " paſſions and motives might alſo prevail on the " peers; ſuch as pity in friends, partiality in re- " lations, and the conſideration of their ſafety, in " caſe of accomplices; that moſt men, and eſpecially " Engliſhmen, enter unwillingly into matters of " blood: that the moſt indifferent peers would be " the likelieſt to abſent themſelves, either from con- " ſideration of diſſatisfying the crown, on the one " hand, or drawing on themſelves the miſchiefs of " a breach with the ſamiiy of the perſon accuſed, " on the other: but the care of a friend would " not fail to bring friends to the trial; the concern " to preſerve the family from the ſtain of treaſon " would bring the relations; and if there were any " accomplices, they would be ready for their own " ſakes to acquit the accuſed, and probably " their number might be conſiderable in thoſe " caſes: and how far this alone might go towards " turning the ſcale of juſtice, eſpicially in times, " when there might be ſeveral titles ſet up to the " crown, and great parties formed, might deſerve " to be conſidered: that this was a law, that was " to have a perpetual continuance, and that the " ſame loyalty, wiſdom, and zeal, which appear'd " now in their lordſhips, ſhould be deriv'd down to " all to their poſterity, was a thing rather to be " wiſh'd than depended upon; if, therefore, this " clauſe had a tendency towards letting in an im- " punity for treaſon, the commons look'd upon " themſelves as juſtified in diſagreeing to it; for " they thought it obvious to every one, of what con- " ſequence it would be to the conſtitution, if ſuch " a body as the peers, who had already ſuch pri- " vileges, of all ſorts, ſhould have impunity for " treaſon added to them.

Arguments of the peers, in defenſe of their amend- ments.

" To this, the managers for the peers anſwered, " that the lords were ſorry to be of any opinion dif- " ferent from the commons, eſpecially in a clauſe of " ſo great importance, which did concern not only " their well-being, but their being; that they had not " diſagreed with the commons, in any thing they " had propoſed for their ſecurity, and hoped the " commons would have the ſame conſideration for " them: that tho' they were all ſecure, under their " preſent Majeſties, there might, hereafter, ariſe " Princes, who might indeavor to invade the li- " berties of the people, and then the commons " would be glad of the concurrence of the lords; " and deſir'd they would conſider, if in ſuch a caſe, " it would not be a great diſcouragement to the " lords to act, unleſs they were as ſecure, at leaſt, " as the commons. That if there might be ſuch " Princes, it was not proper that part of the govern- " ment, which was ſo neceſſary to their concur- " rence, ſhould be under ſuch terms for their lives, " that they dare not oppoſe them with vigor, nor act, becauſe they lie under ſhackles. That, in the caſe of impeachments, which are the groans of the people, and for the higheſt crimes, and carry with them a greater ſuppoſition of guilt than any other accuſation, there all the lords are judges; but here, in a proſecution which might proceed from the influence of particular men, the lord accuſed lies under the hardſhip of being tried by a few peers ſelected for that purpoſe: that this way of trial was not ancienter than Henry VIII, and was introduced by him to take off thoſe he did not like: that in his time, the duke of Bucks was taken off in this manner by cardinal Wolſey, and Ann of Bullen was condemn'd by her own father. That this clauſe did not alter the conſtitution any more, than as, in ſome ſenſe, every new law may be ſaid to alter the conſtitu- tion: and, if the commons ſaid it was alter'd, becauſe formerly the trial was by a ſelect num- ber, and now all muſt appear, that did not ſeem to alter the conſtitution: for the high-ſteward might ſummon them all already: that the lord- high-ſteward formerly ſummon'd the court, and was to ſummon it ſtill. The nature of the court was not alter'd by the magis or the minus, any more than the King's-bench ceas'd to be the ſame court, when there were more or fewer judges in it.

" That the commons were not ſatisfied when the " commiſſions of the judges ran durante bene placi- " to, and could it be thought reaſonable, that the " lords, who were the ſupreme judicature, ſhould " not remain judges, quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint: " that tho' the King did now appoint ſheriffs, it " was not always ſo; and, ſince the crown made " them, the commons had this ſecurity, that they " might challenge thirty-five of the pannel peremp- " torily, and all the reſt for cauſe; but that the " judges and ſheriffs are made before the crime com- " mitted, ſo that it is impoſſible for the judges or " ſheriffs to have prejudice againſt any man: but " the lord-high-ſtewards are appointed after they " know the priſoner. And in the trial of a peer, " he could make no challenges, how partial or " biaſs'd ſoever the high-ſteward, or the peers ſum- " mon'd by him, might happen to be; and that " ſeven were ſufficient to find him guilty: that " ſince the trial of a peer in parliament muſt be by " the whole houſe, where was the inconveniency, " that they ſhould, at all times be tried, as in " parliament; that it was implied in the commiſſion " of the lord-high-ſteward, that all the peers ſhould " be ſummon'd, all the peers in the realm being " therein order'd to attend him; ſo that the King " does not only grant liberty for this, but ſeems to " command it.

The reply of the commons.

" The managers for the commons, in reply, " ſaid, this clauſe would alter a very conſiderable " part of the conſtitution, and that for the worſe, " which could not be ſaid of other new laws, " which were uſually made to ſtrengthen, or re- " ſtore the conſtitution againſt abuſes, or to as " certain things that were left to a reaſonable diſ- " cretion; but the ſubſtance of the conſtitution re- " main'd ſtill the ſame.

" That if a like clauſe was brought in, that a " commoner ſhould be tried by all the free-holders " that would appear, or thoſe they ſhould depute, " this were to change the conſtitution. And " that it might as well be ſaid, that it was not " an alteration in the conſtitution to diveſt the " crown of a power of making judges in the courts " of law or equity: that tho' it was granted in par- " liament, in the twenty-eighth of Edward I, that " the people of every county ſhould chuſe their " ſheriffs, this created ſuch factions and confu- " ſions, that the people themſelves, in a parlia- " ment

William & Mary. An' 1692.

" ment held the firſt of Edward the II, deſired, " that the power of making ſheriffs might be " lodg'd again in the crown: that the commons " were ſurpris'd to hear it alledg'd, that this courſe " of trial was firſt introduced in the time of Henry " VIII, by cardinal Wolſey, in the caſe of the " duke of Bucks, and that all trials of peers " before were in parliament; for the ſtatute of " the 15th of Edward III, manifeſtly prov'd the " contrary. It ordain'd that peers ſhould be tried " by the peers in parliament, but provides, that if " any peers ſhould chuſe to be tried elſewhere, " than in parliament, he might. That, indeed, " the ſtatute was repeal'd, the ſeventeenth of " Edward III (becauſe it was ſo injurious to the " prerogative) but yet it ſhews there was ſuch a " court and courſe of trial as this, out of parlia- " ment; for they could not, in Edward III's time, " divine, that there ſhould be ſuch a new court, and " manner of trial, erected in Henry VIII's time. " That the contrary was likewiſe evident, by the " trial of the earl of H——— in the reign of " Henry IV, reported in the year books. That " the very clauſe in queſtion did affirm the legality " of this way of trial, as it diſtinguiſh'd treaſons, " which corrupted the blood, from others, and " left all other treaſons and felonies, to be tried " by peers, ſummon'd by the high-ſteward as uſual. " That the commons did not admit that a peer " could be convicted by ſeven peers, there muſt be " twelve at leaſt to concur in the verdict, as was " reſolved in the lord Dacre's caſe, the twenty-ſixth " of Henry VIII, which is found in Moor's re- " ports; nor can it be ſhewn, that ever any peer " was convicted by fewer than twelve: and as to " that clauſe which requires all peers to be atten- " ding, it is of the ſame nature with that in every " commiſſion of oyer and terminer; and imports " no more, than that all perſons ſhall attend, that " are required to do ſo by law: and it can no more " be infer'd from theſe words, that the high-ſteward " is to ſummon all the peers, than from the like " words in other commiſſions, that all free-holders " are to be ſummon'd: that the commons have liberty " of challenging, becauſe fear or corruption, or other " cauſe of partiality, may be ſuppoſed among them; " but the lords have no challenges, becauſe all peers " are eſteem'd unexceptionable, nothing ſo mean and " diſhonorable is to be preſum'd among them; and " that, in reality, this court had continued the moſt " unblemiſhed, in point of juſtice, of any court " whatever.

" Laſtly, the commons did not find reaſon to " paſs this clauſe, from that conſideration men- " tion'd by their lordſhips, viz. That the clauſe " did provide ſuch a defenſe for the peers, as would " incourage them to adventure to join boldly with " the commons, in aſſerting the public liberties; " for the commons did not find, by the preſent " conſtitution, the lives and fortunes of innocent " peers were, as their lordſhips intimated, expoſed " to the will of a great and malicious miniſter: and, " if they were, they did not ſee they would be pro- " tected by this proviſion, ſince it extended but to " ſome treaſons and to no felonies; and they might " ſay it did not deſerve the name of adventure for " their lordſhips to act only upon terms of perfect " ſafety. On the other hand, the commons appre- " hended, it would afford too great a proſpect of " ſafety to guilty peers, and might imbolden them " to make attempts againſt the crown and public " liberties.

William & Mary. An 1692.

" The commons acknowleged, that theſe were " good times, and if they were unquiet, or unſafe, " it was in relation to the crown, and not to the " peers, the peerage was in no danger; the peers " had power enough, and the crown had not too " much, nor ought not to be render'd leſs ſafe; " therefore the commons would inſiſt upon the " old ways, keep the ballance of the govern- " ment as they found it, and not change the laws " of England which had hitherto been uſed and " approved."

This conference occaſioned great debates in both houſes, and was followed by three other free conferences, the reſult of all which was, that the lords inſiſted upon their clauſe, and that the commons adhered to their diſagreement of it; ſo the bill was dropped (1). The bill dropped.

Beſide this diſpute between the two houſes of parliament, ſeveral other affairs contributed to draw this ſeſſion into a length, and to divert the attention of the commons, from the ſupplies. Among which the conſideration of the monies due to the orphans of the city of London, and the bill brought in for their relief was not the leaſt (2). Orphan's bill.

About this time, the commons ordered the lord Caſtleton, ſir Henry Goodric, and five more of their members, to attend upon general Ginckel, with the thanks of the houſe, both to him and the officers, who, under him, had contributed to the reduction of Ireland, for the great ſervices they had performed to their Majeſties and the kingdom. General Ginckel acknowleged this diſtinguiſh'd honor done him by the houſe of commons, " which (he " ſaid) he valued above a triumph," adding with as much modeſty as juſtice, " that the ſucceſs of their " Majeſties arms in Ireland, was owing chiefly to " the valor of the Engliſh, and that he would take " care to communicate the vote of that houſe, to " the officers that ſerved in Ireland; and always " indeavor the proſperity of their Majeſties and " the government." The commons give thanks to general Ginckel. His Anſwer.

The houſe of commons, however, reſumed the conſideration of the ſupply, the 6th of January, and ordered that a particular ſtate of the revenue, and a computation of the civil liſt be laid before them. This being done accordingly the next day, by his Majeſty's vice-chamberlain, a committee was appointed, on the 12th, to receive propoſals for raiſing a ſum of mony, towards carrying on the war againſt France, upon a fund of perpetual intereſt, and the 15th it was reſolved; " that towards the making " good the ſums of mony intended to be given by " an act made in the ſecond year of their Majeſties " reign, for granting ſeveral additional duties of " exciſe, upon beer, ale and other liquors, for four " years, (from the time that an act for doubling " the exciſe for one year did expire) the additional " duties granted by the ſaid act be continued 'till " the 17th day of May 1697, for the uſes in the " ſaid act mentioned." Ways and means.

Having likewiſe examined the papers relating to the revenue and civil liſt, the commons repeated the reſolution they had taken, the 12th of December, concerning the ſalaries, fees and perquiſites of all offices under the crown; and the 19th of January, they reſolved farther; " that all penſions granted " by the crown, except penſions payable to the " Queen Dowager, and the Princeſs Ann of Den-

(1) It paſſed however, with the ſame clauſe, in the 7th of William III.

(2) Another affair, which took up a great deal of their time, was " the additional bill for appointing and inabling the " commiſſioners to examine, take and ſtate the public accounts of the kingdom"; which having paſſed the houſe of commons, was ſent up to the lords, for their concurrence: but the peers having made ſome amendments to it, which the commons did not reliſh, the bill was thereupon loſt.

" ing on the war, and that towards raiſing the ſup-
" plies for the ſame purpoſe, a tax by a quarterly

Poll-tax granted.

Beſide the taxes already mentioned, the commons reſolved to veſt " the forfeited eſtates in England " and Ireland, in their Majeſties, to be applied to " the uſe of the war ; " but the two bills, which they paſſed for that purpoſe, the 12th of February, lay neglected in the houſe of lords, notwithſtanding the repeated meſſages ſent to their lordſhips to put them in mind of them.

Bill relating to the forfeitures,

Dropped.

The commons were, about this time, amuſed with William Fuller's pretended diſcoveries of a plot againſt the government, and the ſpurious birth of the pretended Prince of Wales, but failing to produce the perſons he named for witneſſes, viz. colonel Thomas Delaval, and mr. James Hayes, they voted him to be " a notorious impoſtor, a cheat, " a falſe accuſer, having ſcandalized their Majeſties, " and their government, abuſed the houſe, and " falſely accuſed ſeveral perſons of honor and qua- " lity : and reſolved, that an addreſs be preſented " to his Majeſty, to command his attorney-general " to proſecute the ſaid impoſtor." Fuller was, accordingly proſecuted, and ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory, which he ſuffered with an audacious unconcernedneſs.

Fuller pilloried for an impoſtor.

About the middle of January, many of the French proteſtants preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, praying the conſideration of that houſe for their relief ; but the multiplicity of affairs rendring their petition ineffectual, they applied themſelves to the King, with their caſe in print, to which they added their Majeſties declaration of the 25th of April, 1689, in their favor. Theſe his Majeſty ordered to be laid before the commons, the 17th of February. A week afterwards they took his Majeſty's meſſage into conſideration, and a motion was made for a ſupply to be given towards the relief of the petitioners ; but before they came to a reſolution, they were ordered to attend the King in the houſe of lords ; when his Majeſty gave the royal aſſent ;

Acts paſſed.

" for the year 1692. To an act for the better or" dering and collecting the duties upon low wines
" and ſtrong waters ; to an act againſt correſpond-
" ing with their Majeſties enemies ; an act for the " more effectual diſcovery and puniſhment of deer-
" ſtealers : an act for the better repairing of the " high-ways : an act for the incouragement of the " breeding and feeding of cattle : an act for the " relief of creditors againſt fraudulent devices : an " act for the better explanation, and ſupplying the " defects of the former laws, for the ſettlement of " the poor : to an act to take away clergy from
" ſome offenders, and to bring others to puniſh-
" ment ; and to the poll-act" ; beſide thirty-four private acts : after which his Majeſty addreſſed himſelf to both houſes in the following words.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1692.

His Majeſty's ſpeech to the parliament.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I return my hearty thanks to you all, for the " great demonſtrations you have given me of your " affections in this ſeſſion, and of your zeal for the " ſupport of the government.

" And I muſt thank you gentlemen of the houſe
" of commons, in particular, for the great ſupplies
" you have granted for the proſecution of the war.
" I aſſure you, I ſhall take care ſo to diſpoſe of the " mony you have given me, for the public occa-
" ſions, as that the whole nation may be intirely
" ſatisfied with the application of it.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I think it proper to acquaint you with my in" tentions of going beyond ſea very ſpeedily,
" which I am afraid have been retarded more than
" is convenient for the preſent poſture of affairs ;
" and, upon that account, I think it neceſſary to " put an end to this preſent meeting ; the ſeaſon of " the year being now ſo very far advanced, that it
" may prove of the laſt ill conſequence to continue
" it any longer."

Which done, both houſes, purſuant to his Majeſty's pleaſure, immediately adjourn'd themſelves, till the 12th of April, next inſuing (2). I return now to ſome other matters which happen'd during the latter part of this ſeſſion of parliament.

The parliament adjorned.

The 21ſt of January, his Majeſty iſſued out his royal proclamation, wherein he declar'd : " that " he could not but be deeply ſenſible of the great
" goodneſs and mercy of Almighty GOD, in " giving ſo happy ſucceſs to his indeavors for the " reſcuing theſe kingdoms from Popiſh tyranny and
" ſuperſtition, and in preſerving his royal perſon,
" ſupporting his government, and uniting the arms
" of moſt of the Princes and States, in Chriſtendom,
" againſt the common enemy ; ſo he was no leſs
" touch'd with a reſentment, that, notwithſtanding
" thoſe deliverances, impiety and vice did ſtill a-
" bound in theſe kingdoms ; and that the execu" tion of many good laws, which had been made " for the ſuppreſſing and puniſhing thereof, had been
" groſly neglected, to the great diſhonor of GOD,
" and his holy religion. Wherefore, and that he " could not expect increaſe or continuance of the " bleſſings he and his ſubjects injoy'd, without pro" viding remedies to prevent the like evils for the " future, he judg'd himſelf bound, by the duty he
" ow'd to GOD, and the care he had of the people
" committed to his charge, to proceed in taking
" ſome effectual courſe therein : and being there-
" unto moved by the pious addreſs of the archbi-
" ſhops and biſhops, he thought fit to declare his " intentions and reſolution to diſcountenance all " manner of vice and immorality, in all perſons,
" from the higheſt to the loweſt degree, in this
" realm. And, for that purpoſe, he ſtrictly

A proclamation againſt vice and prophaneneſs.

(1) By the bill which was brought in, according to this reſolution, all perſons (except ſuch as received alms of the pariſh, poor houſe-keepers and their children) were to pay twelve-pence quarterly for one year. All tradeſmen and artificers having an eſtate of the clear value of 300 l. and upwards, ten ſhillings ; all genlemen, or reputed gentlemen, having an eſtate of 300 l. or more, as alſo all clergymen and teachers, who had any eccleſiaſtical benefice or contribution, to the value of 80 l. per annum or upwards, twenty ſhillings. Every lord of parliament, either ſpiritual or temporal, the ſum of 10 l. and all perſons who ſhould refuſe to take the oaths to their Majeſties, double the ſums charged, by the reſpective heads.

(2) This unexpected adjournment of the parliament was the occaſion that ſeveral bills which were depending did not paſs : " 1. a bill for leſſening the intereſt of mony," which the commons had paſs'd and ſent up to the lords, for their concurrence. " 2. For diſabling minors to marry without the conſent of their guardians, and for preventing clandeſtine marriages," which the lords had ſent down to the commons. " 3 For the paying of the army according to the muſters of the effective men, puniſhing mu- " tineers and deſerters, and preventing falſe muſters," to which the lords had made ſome amendments that occaſion'd great diſputes. " 4. For aſcertaining the commiſſions and ſalaries of the judges," which tho' it had paſs'd both houſes, was not confirm'd by the royal aſſent. " 5. Againſt the buying and ſelling of offices. 6. To apprehend highway-men. 7. To prevent " frauds by clandeſtine mortgages. 8. Againſt duelling." As for the " bill to impower the courts of chancery and exchequer to " accept of the ſolemn anſwer, in evidence, of any of the people called Quakers ;" and another, " for confirming the charters of " the univerſity of Cambridge," the queſtion being put in the lower houſe, that they ſhould paſs, it was carried, for both, in the negative.

" charged

" charg'd and commanded all his magiſtrates and " officers, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, to execute " the laws againſt blaſphemy, prophane ſwearing " and curſing, drunkenneſs, prophanation of the " lords-day, or any other diſſolute, immoral " practiſes."

The head of the Scotiſh rebels ſubmits.

The 19th, ſir Evan Cameron, of Locheal, one of the leaders of the male-contents in the highlands of Scotland, was permited to kiſs their Majeſties hands, at Kenſington; when he gave them all poſſible aſſurances of his, and the reſt of the Highlanders, ſincerity, in ſubmiting to their Majeſties government.

Knights of the garter elected.

The 2d of February, a chapter of the moſt noble order of the garter was held at Kenſington, in which the elector of Saxony, and the earl of Dorſet, were elected knight-companions.

General Ginckel created earl of Athlone:

The 20th, general Ginckel was created earl of Athlone, and baron of Aghrim, in Ireland, as a reward for the memorable ſervices he had perform'd to their Majeſties, and this nation, in the reduction of the kingdom of Ireland, and particularly in the actions at thoſe two places. The 27th, that general, the duke of Wirtemberg, the lieutenant-generals Scravenmore, Lanier and Talmaſh, major-general Ruvigny, with other the general and field-officers in town, who had ſignaliz'd themſelves in Ireland, were ſplendidly entertain'd at Merchant-taylors hall,

And treated by the city.

by ſir Thomas Stamp the new lord-mayor, the aldermen, ſheriffs, and the moſt eminent merchants and citizens of London, who, on this occaſion, gave all poſſible demonſtrations of their affection and loyalty to the government, and of honor and reſpect to thoſe, whoſe courage and conduct had ſupported it.

Preferments.

The 1ſt of March, his Majeſty beſtowed ſome marks of his royal favor, on ſundry perſons. The earls of Rocheſter and Ranelagh, the lord Cornwallis, and ſir Edward Seymour, were admited to their Majeſties privy-council. The earl of Bedford was made lord-lieutenant of the county of Middleſex, and the earl of Pembroke lord-keeper of the privy-ſeal, who was ſucceeded in his place of commiſſioner of the admiralty, by the lord Cornwallis. Sir John Lowther, vice-chancellor of his Majeſty's houſhold, and Thomas Pelham, eſq; having reſign'd their places as commiſſioners of the treaſury, they were diſpoſed of, one to ſir Edward Seymour, and the other to Charles Montague, eſq. The 3d the lord viſcount Sidney was conſtituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and the ſame day his Majeſty confer'd the honor of knighthood on Godfrey Kneller, eſq; their Majeſties principal painter in ordinary. The 19th, Thomas Coningſby, eſq; one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, was created a baron of that kingdom, by the ſtile of lord Coningſby: and, about a month after, ſir Henry Capell, was made baron Capell of Tewkſbury, in the county of Glouceſter. The 2d of May, ſir George Treby was advanced to the place of lord-chief-juſtice of the common-pleas, and his office of attorny-general given to ſir John Sommers (1). At the ſame time Thomas Trevor, eſq; was made ſollicitor-general.

The King goes to Holland.

In the mean time, the King, having ſettled his affairs in England, imbark'd the 5th of March for Holland, arrived the next morning in the Maeſe, landed at Orange-polder, went the ſame day to the Hague, and ſoon after to Loo; where I ſhall leave his Majeſty, taking the diverſions of that agreable place, to give ſome farther account of tranſactions at home. Towards the latter end of the ſame month of March, the Queen Dowager, who, in all junctures had behaved herſelf very prudently, went from Somerſet-houſe, imbark'd at Dover for Calais, from whence ſhe continu'd her journey, by land, to Liſbon, where ſhe afterwards reſided, 'till her death.

The Queen Dowager leaves England.

Sr Rowland Gwyn turned out.

The 7th of April, ſir Rowland Gwin, treaſurer of their Majeſties chamber, was removed from his place, for words ſpoken againſt the lord Sidney, the ſubſtance of which he could not prove, when required to do it by the council.

A Jacobite' conſpiracy unſucceſsful.

His Majeſty had ſcarce reached Holland, before the Jacobites again begun to feed themſelves with fond hopes of their maſter's reſtoration. One Lunt, who had been before imployed, in bringing over, and diſperſing King James's commiſſions, for which he was impriſoned, but was ſo fortunate to be diſcharged, was again imployed in 1691, by the Lancaſhire Papiſts, privately to raiſe men, and buy arms, that they might be ready for an inſurrection in England, as ſoon as the blow was given, if his Majeſty had been aſſaſſinated in Flanders, by Dumont, as they expected: (2) but the campain being ended, without any news either of the aſſaſſination, or an invaſion, Lunt was ſent to France, in November, to acquaint the abdicated Monarch, that they were in a condition to receive him, and therefore, deſired to be informed, when he propoſed to make a deſcent into this kingdom. Lunt returned in December following with advice, that the late King James would certainly be in England, the next ſpring, and that colonel Parker, and others, would be ſent over, in the mean time, with full inſtructions for their government.

Parker and Johnſton, and ſome few others, landed accordingly about the latter end of January, of this year. An aſſaſſination was their favorite ſcheme, being the only means, as they thought, to make the invaſion practicable, and their conqueſt of England eaſy. It was communicated to as many as they could truſt, in hopes to have perpetrated it before the King went to Holland; but they were ſo long in contriving, by whom, how, when and where it ſhould be done, that the time paſſed before their conſultations came to maturity. They were then aſſured, by Parker, that the deſign of an aſſaſſination would be reſumed in Flanders, by the ſame perſons who were to have performed it the laſt campain, and this kept up the hopes of the Jacobites, and incouraged them to make preparations, and wait for the intended invaſion with patience. The project of it was firſt laid in France, and colonel Parker, with ſome others, were ſent over hither to communicate it to the party, that they might do, on their ſide, what was neceſſary, and in their power, to facilitate the matter. This Parker did, by calling their principal officers and others together,

(1) This great man, who began firſt to be taken notice of at the trial of the biſhops, at which he gain'd great reputation, very much increas'd it, in the houſe of commons, after their Majeſties acceſſion to the crown. He ſhew'd, upon all occaſions, that he was a perſon of great parts, deep learning, a manly eloquence, eaſy addreſs, and a bold ſtickler for the liberty of the nation.

(2) Mr. Wilſon of Redland ſwore before mr. ſecretary Trenchard, that he ſaw Lunt deliver the following commiſſions from King James: to mr. Sherbun of Stonyhurſt, mr. Townley of Townley, ſir Thomas Stanley of Alderſly, mr. Chumley of Vale-royal, ſir Rowland Stanley, ſir Robert Throgmorton, ſir Henry Titchburn, ſir —— Gifford of Chillington, ſir James Symmons of Aſhton in Staffordſhire, Thomas Tildeſly, eſq; and the lord Brudenel, each for a regiment of horſe: to mr. Weſtby of Mobrick, and —— Dalton of Thurnbury, eſq; each for a regiment of dragoons: to mr. Girlington of Girlington, and mr. ———— each for a regiment of foot; to the lord Molyneux, to be governor of Liverpool; to ſir Charles Neal, to be lieutenant colonel; to William Fowler, eſq; of St. Thomas's near Stafford, a captain's commiſſion; and to mr. Auguſtine Gyfford, captain Goure, and Baſil Brooks, eſq; to be captains of horſe. Oldmixon, p. 70.

and telling them, "That their abdicated ſovereign "had, at length, obtained of his moſt Chriſtian "Majeſty a ſuccor of 30,000 effective men, and "that when the ſpring was a little more advanced, "King James, who was already marching into "Normandy, would come over himſelf with them, "into England; with aſſurance, if that number was "not great enough to reduce his rebellious ſubjects, "France would ſpare them 30,000 more". He deſired, therefore, they would all be in readineſs, with the greateſt expedition and ſecrecy imaginable: and addreſſing himſelf, in particular to captain Blaire, (at the inſtance of Johnſton the prieſt) he told him, "he was going to command in Lancaſhire, but "intended to move ſouthward as ſoon as his Ma-"jeſty was landed, and therefore deſired the "captain to join him, in regard his own men were "raw, and the captain's, for the moſt part, were "all old officers and ſoldiers.

King James writes to his late council.

King James's Queen being, in this interval, big with child, and drawing near her time, the abdicated Monarch ſent a letter to ſeveral lords and others of his late privy-council, requiring them, or as many of them as poſſibly could, to attend him at St. Germains, and be witneſſes of his royal conſort's labor (1); but none of them anſwered the invitation. Soon after this, he ſent over a declaration, ſeting forth his right; inviting his ſubjects to join him at his landing; threatning thoſe who preſumed to oppoſe him, with the ſevereſt puniſhments, and promiſing his pardon to all perſons, how guilty ſoever they might have been, excepting thoſe therein named and deſcribed (2).

His declaration.

Preparations of the Jacobites in England.

Captain Parker took ſeveral good officers with him into Lancaſhire, ſome of whom ſtaid with him in that country, and others he diſpoſed of in Yorkſhire and the biſhopric of Durham. He himſelf had his head-quarters at mr. Walmſley's, at Dungan-hall, from whence he iſſued out his orders. He likewiſe cauſed their arms, which, for fear of a diſcovery, had been hid in woods and grounds, buried between walls, and concealed in cellars and out-houſes, to be taken out, and forthwith diſtributed among the officers and liſted men. In the mean time, mr. James Fountain, as lieutenant-colonel to the lord Montgomery, and colonel Holman, were each of them compleating a regiment of horſe in London, which were deſigned to join the late King (who, with his army of Engliſh, Scots, Iriſh, and French, was at la Hogue) when he ſhould land in England.

Intelligence ſent to France.

The Jacobites ſent, at the ſame time, captain Loyd, expreſs to the lord Melford, to acquaint him, that they had corrupted ſeveral of the Engliſh ſea-commanders, and particularly rear-admiral Carter (3). They likewiſe tranſmited to him a liſt of the number and rates of the Engliſh fleet, and how long it would be before it was poſſible they could be joined by the Dutch: this intelligence they deſired his lordſhip to lay before the French King, and procure his command to monſ. de Tourville, immediately to fight the Engliſh, before they could be re-inforced by the Dutch ſquadron. The lord Melford, upon the receit of this meſſage, made application accordingly to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, who thereupon gave his poſitive commands to Tourville, to ingage the Engliſh fleet, without waiting for the Toulon ſquadron, under the command of monſ. d'Eſtrees.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1692.

The Queen's vigilance.

The Queen, having intelligence of all theſe preparations for invading this kingdom, gave orders, with her uſual maſculine courage, and that noble preſenſe of mind which was conſpicuous in all her actions, that the fleet ſhould put to ſea, with all poſſible expedition, and the militia be in a readineſs to act, upon any imergency. She likewiſe ſent for three regiments of foot, from Holland, viz. Selwin's, Beveridge's, and Loyd's, under the command of lieutenant-general Talmaſh, and with them, together with ſome other troops which were then in the kingdom, formed a camp at Portſmouth, ſoon after. Her Majeſty's next royal care was to iſſue three neceſſary proclamations; one on the 3d of May, "commanding all Papiſts to depart im-"mediately from the cities of London and "Weſtminſter, and from within ten miles of "the ſame." Another, on the 5th, requiring the "attendance of both houſes of parliament at "Weſtminſter, on the 24th of the ſame month, "for the diſpatch of ſuch important affairs, as the "ſafety of the kingdom might require": And a third, on the 9th of May, "for the apprehending "the earls of Scarſdale and Litchfield, Newburg, "Middleton and Dunmore, the lords Griffin and "Forbes, James Griffin, eſq; ſir John Fenwick, "ſir Theophilus Oglethorp, ſir Andrew Foreſter, "colonel Slingſby, James Grahme, eſq; mr. Orby, colonel Sackvile, Oliver St. George, eſq; major Soaper, Charles Adderley, David Lloyd, George Porter, and Samuel Stafford, eſqrs;

The fleet order'd to ſea.

The main body of the fleet was under the command of mr. Ruſſel, who was conſtituted admiral, by commiſſion, bearing date the 3d of December of the preceding year (4); and all poſſible expedition was uſed to bring the fleet early to ſea. There were likewiſe two ſquadrons already at ſea; one under ſir Ralph Delaval, which arrived the beginning of March from Cadiz, in the Downs, and was ordered out again; and another under rear-admiral Carter, who had both orders to join one another; as the admiral on his ſide, had orders to ſail with the body of the fleet, both Dutch and Engliſh, and to place himſelf between Cape la Hogue, and the iſle of Wight, in order to join thoſe two ſquadrons, which had orders to cruize thereabouts for that purpoſe.

The 8th of May, the admiral arrived off of Rye, and immediately paſſed thro' the Downs. In the

(1) Beſide theſe noblemen, ſeveral ladies were invited, as the ducheſſes of Sommerſet and Beaufort, the marchioneſs of Hallifax, the counteſſes of Darby, Mulgrave, Rutland, Brooks, Nottingham, Lumley and Danby, the ladies Fitzharding and Fritchvile, as likewiſe the following ladies of commoners, viz. ſir John Trevor's, the ſpeaker's lady, ſir Edward Seymour's lady, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave's lady, ſir Thomas Pope Blount's lady, ſir John Guiſe's lady, Thomas Foley's, eſq; lady, lady Stamp, the lady Mayoreſs, lady Aſhurſt, lady Levet, and the ladies of the two Sheriffs. The famous dr. Hugh Chamberlain was likewiſe called; but of all theſe none anſwered the ſummons.

(2) The perſons excepted were, the duke of Ormond, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earls of Sunderland, Bath, Danby, and Nottingham, the lords Newport, Delamere, Wiltſhire, Colcheſter, Cornbury, Dunblain, and Churchil, the biſhops of London and St. Aſaph, ſir Robert Howard, ſir John Worden, ſir Samuel Grimſton, ſir Stephen Fox, ſir George Treby, ſir Baſil Dixwell, ſir James Oxendon, dr. Tillotſon, dean of Canterbury, dr. Gilbert Burnet, Francis Ruſſel, Richard Leviſon, and John Trenchard, eſq; Charles Duncomb, citizen of London, ſuch as had offered perſonal indignities to him at Feverſham; thoſe who as judges, jury-men, or otherwiſe, had had a hand in the barbarous murder (as he called it) of Aſhton, Croſs, &c. And all ſpies, and ſuch as had betrayed his council, during his late abſenſe from England.

(3) There was a report that rear-admiral Carter had ten thouſand pounds given him to bring his diviſion over to the French. What ground there was for this rumor is uncertain. True it is, rear-admiral Carter was not rich, yet it is plain, he never received ſuch a bribe, becauſe he died poor, tho' it was in the bed of honor (as we ſhall ſee below) at the ſame time that he was ſaid to have been ſuſpected. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 657.

(4) Burnet obſerves (in his hiſtory of his own times) that this command was given him tho' he had put himſelf in ill terms with the King, by preſſing to know the grounds of the earl of Marlborough's diſgrace; he almoſt upbraided the King with the earl's ſervices, who as he ſaid, had ſet the crown on his head.

William & Mary. An' 1692.

evening, he ſent to the Dutch flag-officer, who was there at anchor, to weigh and make ſail after him. The ninth, in the evening, the Dutch ſhips, from the Downs, joined the fleet, and one of their rear-admirals, with the reſt of their ſhips, under three decks, was at anchor, off of Dungeneſſe. The eleventh, the fleet ſailed from Rye-bay, and, on the 13th, was joined, at St. Helens, by the ſquadrons under ſir Ralph Delaval, and rear-admiral Carter (1).

Malicious aſperſions caſt on the officers.

About this time, a malicious and dangerous report was ſpread abroad, grounded probably upon the intelligence ſent to France, of which I have made mention above, as if ſome of the officers of their Majeſties fleet had given aſſurance, to the diſaffected perſons on ſhoar, of their readineſs to adhere to them, and that the Queen had, thereupon, ordered many of them to be diſcharged the ſervice. Her Majeſty, who was ſenſible, that nothing could more effectually prevent any evil conſequences ariſing from this rumor, than to declare how much ſhe was convinced of the falſhood of it, commanded the lord Nottingham to acquaint admiral Ruſſel; "that ſhe was ſatisfied this report was in-"duſtriouſly raiſed by the enemies of the govern"ment, and that ſhe repoſed ſo intire a confidence
"in their fidelity and zeal for their Majeſties ſer-
"vice, and the defenſe of their country, that ſhe
"had reſolved not to diſplace any one of them."

The Queen's politic meſſage.

This politic meſſage was immediately communicated, by the admiral, to the flag and other officers; who thereupon being touched with a lively ſenſe of honor, unanimouſly ſubſcribed an addreſs, expreſſing their ſteady zeal and loyalty; which the admiral, at their requeſt, tranſmited to the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty (2).

Addreſs of the fleet.

The parliament proro. gued.

The Queen, in the mean time, truſting to their fidelity and reſolution, and conſidering that her fleet was now join'd by that of her allies, and in a readineſs to repel the attempts of her enemies, her Majeſty, on the ſixteenth of May, thought fit to prorogue the parliament to the fourteenth of the inſuing month. I have already obſerv'd, that the French King had given poſitive orders to monſ. de Tourville to fight the Engliſh fleet, upon a ſuppoſition, that the Dutch ſquadron would not be able to join them ſo ſoon. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty was, for ſome time, intoxicated with this pleaſing dream (3), till, at length, expreſs upon expreſs arriving, and confirming their junction, he diſpatch'd one meſſenger after another to Tourville, to order him to decline fighting; but theſe counter-orders came to late, as we ſhall now ſoon ſee.

William & Mary. An' 1692.

The 18th of May, the admiral ſail'd, with his whole fleet, towards the coaſt of France, and the next day, while both France and England were in a dubious expectation of the important event, about three in the morning, Cape Barfleur bearing then S. W. by S. at about ſeven leagues diſtance, the ſcouts which were weſtward of the fleet, fired ſeveral guns. Theſe ſhips coming, ſoon after, within ſight, made the ſignal of diſcovering the enemy, and lay with their heads northward: upon this, the admiral cauſed the fleet to draw into a line of battle, and notice was given for the rear to tack, that in caſe the French ſtood northward, they might the ſooner come up and ingage. It was then a fog, but the ſun having diſperſed it ſoon after four, the enemy was ſeen, ſtanding ſouthward, forming their line, with the ſame tack, which the confederate fleet had on board.

The French and confederate fleets meet.

Monſ. de Larrey (in his hiſtory of France, under Lewis XIV) ſays, when the fog diſſipated, monſ. de Tourville was ſurprized to find it was the whole Engliſh and Dutch united fleet he was going to ingage, whereas before he imagined it had been but part of it: but, however, conſidering a haſty retreat would bring his fleet into ſuch a confuſion, as might prove more hazardous than a battle it ſelf, he continued his orders for the ingagement.

Admiral Ruſſel, obſerving the diſpoſition of the enemy, cauſed the ſignal for the rear-tack to be taken in, and bore away with his own ſhip ſo far to the leeward, that all the other ſhips might fetch his wake, and then bringing to lay by, with his fore-top-ſail to the maſt, to give the better opportunity to the whole fleet to place themſelves, according to their orders. About eight, the line of the confederate fleet was pretty well formed, and ſtretched from S. S. W. to N. N. E. the Dutch in the van, the admiral in the center, and the blue in the rear. By nine, the enemy's van had ſtretch'd almoſt as far ſouthward as they, their admiral and rear-admiral of the blue (who were in the rear) cloſing the line, and their vice-admiral of the ſame diviſion ſtanding towards the rear of the confederate fleet. Between ten and eleven, the French bore down upon them, with little wind, and admiral Ruſſel (who ſtill lay by with his fore-top-ſail to the maſt) obſerving that monſ. de Tourville had put out his ſignal for battle, commanded that his ſhould not be ſpread, until the French, who had the weather-gage, were advanc'd as far as they ſhould think fit (1).

Diſpoſition of the fleets.

(1) They had met four days before, when the former was ſtanding over to the iſle of Wight, from Cape la Hogue, and the other from St. Helens's, in ſearch of him.

(2) Their addreſs was as follows:

"We your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects and ſervants, flag-officers and captains in your Majeſty's fleet, out of "a deep and grateful ſenſe of your Majeſty's good and juſt opinion of our loyalty and fidelity, imparted to us by the right hono-"rable admiral Ruſſel, in a letter to him from the earl of Nottingham, principal ſecretary of ſtate, do, in behalf of ourſelves, "and all the other officers and ſeamen, humbly preſume to addreſs ourſelves to your Majeſty, at this juncture, to undeceive the "world, as to thoſe falſe and malicious reports, which have been lately ſpread in prejudice of your Majeſty's ſervice, by people "diſaffected to the government, and who have an averſion to the quiet and good of their country, that there are ſome among "us who are not truly zealous for and intirely devoted to the preſent happy eſtabliſhment. We do, therefore, moſt humbly beg "leave to add to our repeated oaths, this aſſurance of our fidelity; that we will, with all imaginable alacrity and reſolution, "venture our lives in the defenſe of the government, and of the religion and liberty of our country, againſt all Popiſh inva-"ders whatſoever. And that God Almighty may preſerve your Majeſty's moſt ſacred perſon, direct your councils, and proſper "your arms by ſea and land, againſt your enemies, may all people ſay Amen, with your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſub-"jects. Dated on board the Britannia, at St. Helens, the 15th day of May, 1692."

This addreſs was ſigned by ſir John Aſhby, admiral of the blue; ſir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral of the red; mr. Rook vice-admiral of the blue; ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, rear-admiral of the red; mr. Carter, rear-admiral of the blue, and by the other commanders of the fleet. It was preſented the day after its date, by the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, and her Majeſty was not only pleaſed to accept it very graciouſly, but to anſwer; "that ſhe always had this opinion of the commanders "but was very glad this was come to ſatisfy others:" and indeed it was not long before they performed their promiſe. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 658.

(3) While the Jacobites were pleaſing themſelves with hopes of approaching ſucceſs, the firſt thing, which put a damp upon them, was the various reports about the joining of the Engliſh and Dutch fleets. Once they had notice they were joined; but this being contradicted the next day, leaſt that report ſhould have any influence upon the French, they ſent over ſir Adam Blaire, to aſſure them that the Dutch were not yet come up: yet ſo it happened, that before the gentleman could reach Dover, they had certain news that the fleets were joined indeed; and therefore one mr. Clark was diſpatched into France, to acquaint them with this fatal junction. But mr. Clark was ſo far from gaining credit to his report (ſir Adam Blaire avering the contrary) that he was impriſoned as a ſpreader of falſe news, 'till ſeveral other expreſſes confirmed his account.

According to this liſt, the French fleet will appear to have been of greater force, than any of the accounts of the battle which I have ſeen, on either ſide, make it; but it is as the French publiſh'd it, at the time of monſ. de Tourville's going to ſea. Whether any alteration happen'd afterwards, or whether the French had any deſign in having it believed larger, before their misfortune, than they cared to have it afterwards, I ſhall not determine? The French continuator of (or rather deviator from) Rapin, pretends, that the count d' Eſtrees's ſquadron had ſuffer'd very much by bad weather, that ſeveral of the ſhips were ſeparated from the fleet in a ſtorm, ſome render'd incapable of ſervice, others periſh'd, and again others oblig'd to go into harbor to refit.

William & Mary. An' 1692.

The Sea-fight off of la Hogue.

I come now to give an account of this memorable sea-fight, and I think I cannot do it better, than by the copies of three letters, from three admirals who commanded in the ingagement, to which I shall, therefore, only add some observations, as well of our own as of some foreign authors.

The first is from admiral Russel the day after the battle.

A letter from admiral Russel.

Cape Barfleur, S. W. distance seven leagues.
May, 20th, 1692.

" Yesterday, about three in the morning, Cape " Barfleur bearing S. W. and by S. distance seven " leagues, my scouts made the signal for seing the " enemy. The wind westerly, the French bore " down to me, and at eleven ingaged me, but at " some distance. We continued fighting, till half " an hour past five in the evening, at which time " the enemy towed away with all their boats, and " we after them. It was calm all day. About " six there was a fresh ingagement to the westward " of me, which I supposed to be the blue. It " continued calm all night. I can give no parti- " cular account of things; but that the French " were beaten, and I am now steering away for " Conquet-road, having a fresh gale easterly, but " extreme foggy: I suppose that is the place they " design for. If it please God to send us a little " clear weather, I doubt not but we shall destroy " their whole fleet. I saw, in the night, three or " four ships blow up; but I know not what they " were. So soon as I am able to give you a more " particular relation, I will not be wanting.

The French fleet routed;

The ingagement with the blue squadron, which the admiral hints at above, lasted 'till ten at night (1), when the French, being worsted, stood away for Conquet-road (2). It was all that night very calm, and very foggy the next morning: but it begining to clear up a little, about eleven, the English saw the French fleet, about two leagues from them, but very much lessen'd in number, and not seeming to be above thirty-eight men of war. They made all the sail they could after them, but it soon grew calm again: about three in the afternoon both fleets came to an anchor, but weigh'd about eleven at night, and anchored again the next morning.

And pursued.

The 21st, the English again sail'd after the enemy, the admiral steering towards Barfleur, and the Dutch and blue squadron, towards the road of Alderney, thro' which part of the French fleet got safe to St. Malo, the English not thinking it safe to pursue them that way, for which, sir John Ashby was afterwards question'd in parliament. Sir Ralph Delaval had, however, better succes off of Cherbourg, of which his own letter will give us the best account.

This second letter, which was from sir Ralph Delaval, was dated two days after the foregoing letter.

A letter from sir Ralph Delaval to the lord Nottingham.

Sir Ralph Delaval's letter to the earl of Nottingham, on board the Royal Sovereign, near Cherbourg, May 22.

" I believe it my duty to acquaint you, that on " the one and twentieth instant, admiral Russel " having made the signal for the fleet to cut their " cables, I observed the French to be forced from " Alderney (where they anchored) to the east- " ward; and finding that some of them in- " deavored for the bay of Cherbourg, I stood in for " that place, where I found three three-deck'd " ships of the enemy's, but so close to the shore, " and within some rocks, that it was not safe for " me to attempt them, 'till I had informed my " self of the road, they being haled into shoal- " water. I immediately took my boats, and soun- " ded within gunshot of them; which they in- " deavored to prevent, by firing at us. And " that no time might be lost, I went immediately " on board the St. Albans, where, for the incourage- " ment of the seamen, I hoisted my flag, and " having ordered the Ruby, with two fireships, to " attend me, I stood in with them, leaving the " great ships without, as drawing too much water. " But coming very near, they galled us so extreme- " ly, and finding the fire-ships could not get in, " I judged it best to retreat without shot, " where I anchored; and immediately called all the " captains; when it was resolved to attempt them, " in the morning, with all the third and fourth- " rates, and fire-ships. But after having drawn " them into four fathom and a half water, I found " we could not do our busines, the water being " shoal. Upon which I ordered three fire-ships to " prepare themselves to attempt the burning them; " going myself with all the barges and tenders, to " take them up, if by the enemy's shot they should " miscarry. Indeed, I may say, and I hope " without vanity, the service was warm; yet, God " be praised, so effectually performed, that not- " withstanding all their shot, both from their ships " and forts, two of our fire-ships had good succes, " by burning two of them; the other, by an " unfortunate shot, was set on fire, being just " going on board the enemy. Indeed so brave was " the attempt, that I think they can hardly be suf- " ficiently rewarded; and doubt not but their Ma- " jesties will do them right. The third French " ship being run ashore, and observing the people " on board to go on shore by boats full, I ordered " the St. Alban's, the Reserve, and others, to fire " upon her; judging it might cause them to quit " her; and after having battered her for some " time, I observed she made no resistance. I took " all the boats armed, and went on board her. I " found abundance of men on board, and several " wounded, but no officers. And having caused " all the people, as well those that were wounded, " as others, to be taken out, I set her on fire; and " had I not had notice by my scouts, that thirty " ships were standing with us, had sent all the " French on shoar, who are now very troublesome " to me. The ships we saw proved to be sir John

Ashby,

(1) There was, however, before this ingagement with the blue, which did not begin till eight o' clock, another with sir Cloudesly Shovel, rear-admiral of the red, which began about six, and this probably was the firing the admiral heard. Sir Cloudesly had got to the windward of monsr. Tourville's own squadron, and between him, and their admiral of the blue. After the fire had continued sometime, the ships, on both sides, came to an anchor, but could not discover one another, by reason of the fog. During this ingagement, three ships were heard to blow up, which, as the English miss'd none, must have been the French. Lediard's naval history, vol. 2. p. 661.

(2) In this dispute, rear admiral Carter was killed, whose last words to his captain (William Wright) sufficiently shewed, there had been no grounds to suspect his zeal to the service; for he gave him a strict charge to fight the ship as long as she would swim. Lediard's naval history, vol. 2. p. 662.

Of this part of the action, monsr. de Forbin says; " The tide, the night, and a fog, coming on, oblig'd monsr. de Tourville " to come to anchor. The English who had wheeled about the French, not doing the like, suffered themselves te be driven by " the currents, and passing thro' the French lines, under favor of the fog, recovered the main body of their fleet. This " gave occasion to a new fight, which proved more bloody, than the former. My ship (continues this author,) was pierced " thro' and thro', with cannon-balls, and I was boarded by a fire-ship, from which I freed my self at last, but not without great " difficulty. I lost a great many of my men in the action; and was my self sorely wounded, in the knee. This violent " cannonading, which had so terribly galled me, lasted 'till eleven at night; and, wounded as I was, and in great pain, I " spent the whole night in refitting, that I might be in a condition to perform duty the next day. For I foresaw we should " come to blows again. Memoires de Forbin.

Admiral Ruſſel was no leſs ſucceſsful in the purſuit of thirteen French men of war, of which I ſhall give the reader an account, after having prefix'd the third of the letters mention'd above.

This third is the tranſlation of a letter from the Dutch admiral Allemonde, to the States-general.

From on board the Prince, near Cape-barfleur, June 3 (May 24th) 1692.

High and mighty lords,

Admiral Allemonde's letter to the States-general.

" Since my two laſt, of the thirty-firſt paſt, and " firſt inſtant, N. S. which gave your high mighti-
" neſſes advice of what had paſs'd in the defeat of " the French fleet, I came to anchor under this " Cape, where I have been ſince yeſterday in the " afternoon, with your highneſſes ſquadron, and " that of ſir John Aſhby, admiral of the blue
" ſquadron, and ſome other Britiſh ſhips. At " my arrival here, I was informed, by the " captain of a French fire-ſhip, who was taken
" priſoner; that about twelve of the veſſels which " had ingaged your highneſſes ſquadron, and to " which we had given chace, were got in among
" the rocks, upon which I prepared to go and
" deſtroy or burn them: but as I was ready to " put my deſign in execution, I found that ad" miral Ruſſel was giving orders to the ſame pur" poſe. I immediately offered him your high and " mightineſſes light frigats and fire-ſhips, to aſſiſt
" his ſhip; and immediately gave the neceſſary
" orders, in caſe he ſhould make uſe of them;
" but as yet I know not whether thoſe frigats and " fire-ſhips were imployed or not. All that I can " aſſure your high mightineſſes is, that the " ſame day they took a reſolution to deſtroy theſe
" ſhips, they burnt ſix of the largeſt, being ſhips
" of three decks; and this day the reſt which re" mained, the leaſt of which carried ſixty pieces of " cannon, indur'd the ſame fate, being burnt with " all their ammunition and proviſion, together with
" ſix other ſmaller veſſels, which they had light-
" ned of their guns, to try whether it were poſſible
" to ſave them, by towing them up higher; ſo
" that this expedition has compleated the irrepara-
" ble ruin of the enemy's fleet. I underſtand, this " day, from on board of admiral Ruſſel, that or" ders are given out to burn the tranſport-veſſels,
" which are in the bay of la Hogue, to the num" ber of 300, if it may be done with ſafety: but I " fear it will be very difficult, becauſe the water is " very ſhallow where thoſe veſſels ly; and great
" reſiſtance may be made from the land-ſide; I
" therefore leave the ſucceſs of the deſign to pro-
" vidence. On the other hand, it has been reſolved,
" in a grand council of war, to reduce our fleet to
" fifty or ſixty great ſhips, to ſail away to the iſle
" of Uſhant, and to indeavor to take all the enemy's " ſhips that ſhall come from, or deſign to go into
" Breſt, and to ſend the reſt of the men of war,
" with ſome fire-ſhips, to ſcour the coaſt of France,
" as far as Dunkirk, to ſeek out and deſtroy, if
" poſſible, the ſcattered remnants of the French
" fleet, that have ſteered their courſe to the " eaſt. (1).

I am,

Moſt high and mighty lords,

Yours &c. P. Allemonde.

French ſhips burnt at La Hogue.

The deſtruction of the French ſhips, in the bay of la Hogue, which admiral Allemonde juſt hints at, in the foregoing letter, was perform'd in the following manner: the 21ſt of May, about four in the afternoon, eighteen of the French ſhips, which were got eaſtward of Cape-barfleur, haled in for la Hogue, where the Engliſh admiral, with the body of the fleet, likewiſe, anchored the ſame night. The next afternoon about two, he plied cloſe in with la Hogue, where he found thirteen of the enemy's ſhips, very near under the ſhoar. The 23d, the ſent vice-admiral Rook, of the blue, with ſeveral men of war, frigats, fire-ſhips, and the boats of the fleet arm'd, to deſtroy them; none but theſe ſmall frigats could, however, advance near enough for ſervice, which was the reaſon that they could only burn ſix of them that night, with their boats. The next morning, about eight, they burnt the other ſeven, together with ſeveral tranſport-ſhips, and ſome ſmall veſſels with ammunition. They, likewiſe, drove the French, with their own guns, from their platforms and batteries on ſhoar; and all this in the ſight of the French and Iriſh camp, that lay ready to invade England. Many of the French ſeamen periſh'd with their ſhips, and a great number were taken priſoners. Thus at la Hogue and Cherbourg were burnt two ſhips of 104 guns; one of ninety; two of eighty; four of ſeventy-ſix; four of ſixty; and two of fifty-ſix; beſide another of fifty-ſix guns which was overſet, and loſt: ſo that, with what the French loſt in the fight, twenty-one of their largeſt ſhips were deſtroy'd, beſide frigats and ſmall craft; and had it not been for the foggy weather, hardly a ſhip would have eſcap'd. Of the Loſs on both ſides.

(1) The account F. Daniel gives of this ingagement is in ſubſtance, " that monſieur de Tourville attack'd the Engliſh Corps
" de Bataille with ſo much vigor, that all fled before him: that he maintained the fight the whole day, from morning to " night, without the loſs of a ſhip, tho' he did conſiderable damage to ſeveral of the Engliſh ſhips: and that he made a fine re" treat, which would have been as happy as glorious, had not the tide failed him. His conduct, however, was ſo much ap" proved, that the King his maſter honored him with a marſhall's ſtaff on that account." Monſieur de Forbin, who begins his relation with ſomewhat more modeſty, and muſt be ſuppoſed to know more of it than F. Daniel, as he was preſent himſelf in the action, ſays; " that the Engliſh expected them in very good order, and ſuffered them to come as near to them as they " thought fit. The battle was begun (continues he) with a great deal of vigor, and even with ſome advantage on the ſide
" of the French: but the wind, which, in the begining of the fight, was in their favor, changed in an inſtant, and was " favorable to the Engliſh. They took the advantage of it, and, with their van, wheeled round the French fleet, and by that " means made them be expoſed to two fires at once. As their fleet was far ſuperiour to the French (who had but four and forty
" ſhips) beyond all diſpute the whole French fleet would have been loſt, if they had managed as they might have done: but their
" ſlowneſs in attacking let the opportunity ſlip out of their hands."

confederates not a ſhip was loſt, but the fire-ſhips which were ſpent in the action; and the number of officers and men kill'd was inconſiderable (1). This ſervice being done, the admiral ſail'd again, the next day, and order'd ſir John Aſhby (who was return'd, without having done any execution on the other part of the French fleet) to run, with a ſquadron of Engliſh and Dutch, along the French coaſt, as far as Havre de Grace, and look out for the five ſhips, which he ſaid he had ſeen ſtanding eaſtward: but in this he had no better ſucceſs than before (2). The advantage already obtained was, however, very great and glorious, and the more as it effectually put a ſtop to the projected invaſion; and caſt ſuch a damp upon the late King James's expectations, that he never recover'd the impreſſion of it (3). All farther hopes of meeting the remainder of the French fleet being now groundleſs, the admiral return'd with his fleet to St. Helens.

The Queen's bounty.

Her Majeſty was no ſooner inform'd of this victory, than ſhe ſent a gratuity of 30,000 l. down to Portſmouth, to be diſtributed among the ſeamen and ſoldiers, order'd medals to be ſtruck for the officers, and cauſed colonel Haſtings, who was kill'd in the fight, to be magnificently buried. Her Majeſty, at the ſame time, conſidering, how this ſucceſs might be improved, by turning the cards upon the French, and making a deſcent upon their coaſts, before they could recover from their conſternation, order'd preparation, to be made for that end. All the forces deſign'd for this expedition were ſhip'd off at Portſmouth, the twenty-third of July, and on the twenty-fifth the duke of Lemſter, who commanded them in chief, imbark'd on board the Bredau. As they ſet ſail, with a fair wind, in the beſt ſeaſon of the year, the expectations of the ſucceſs of this enterpriſe were very great: but to the great ſurprize of every one, a few days after, intelligence came, that all the tranſports had put into St. Hellens road, with part of the fleet, that they met off of Torbay, which gave occaſion to various conjectures (4).

A deſcent on the coaſt of France projected;

The Queen was no ſooner inform'd of what had paſs'd, than ſhe ſent a committee of her privy-council to Torbay, to carry freſh orders to the fleet. The lord-preſident of the council, accompanied by the lord-ſteward, lord-chamberlain, the earls of Nottingham and Rocheſter, and the lords Sidney and Cornwallis, came thither, the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, and, after they had confer'd with the generals, return'd to London. The forces under the duke of Lemſter arrived in the Downs, the eight of the ſame month, from whence they ſailed again, on the 20th, and landed two days after at Oſtend; the French coaſts having been, all this time, under a continual alarm. The fleet lay a conſiderable time wind-bound at St. Helens, till the winter ſeaſon being far advanc'd, the great ſhips were order'd to Chatham, and the remainder of the fleet divided into ſquadrons, as was judged moſt for the advantage of the ſervice.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1692.

All fears of an invaſion being now diſpell'd, I ſhall leave the Queen and the three kingdoms in a happy ſecurity, and take a brief view of the affairs on the continent. We left King William at Loo, from whence he repair'd to Flanders, to head the army there. The duke of Bavaria, who, thro' King William's influence, was, this year, made governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, had put thoſe provinces in a much better ſtate, than they had before been in; this did not, however diſcourage Lewis XIV, from attempting the ſiege of Namur, one of the ſtrongeſt places in all thoſe parts, which, at one and at the ſame time, is the rampart of Brabant, the biſhopric of Liege, the United-provinces, and Lower-Germany; and is beſide, ſo ſituated at the confluence of the Maeſe and the Sambre, that it requires three ſeparate camps to beſiege it. He inveſted it in perſon, the 25th of May, N. S. open'd the trenches, the 29th, and puſh'd the ſiege with ſo much vigor and aſſiduity, that he made himſelf maſter of all the outworks next to St. Nicholas's-gate, within the ſpace of four days after; having, in that time, made three attacks, with 25,000 men each time; this ingaged the gariſon to ſurrender the town, the 5th of June, by capitulation, and to retire into the caſtle.

Namur beſieg'd by the French.

King William was no ſooner inform'd of this ſiege, than he decamp'd, with the confederate army under his command, from Anderlech, and march'd

King William marches towards Namur.

(1) It was believed (ſays biſhop Burnet) that if this ſucceſs had been purſued with vigor, conſidering the conſternation, with which the French were ſtruck, upon ſuch an unuſual and ſurprizing blow, that this victory might have been carried much farther than it was: but Ruſſel was provoked by ſome letters and orders, that the earl of Nottingham ſent him from the Queen, which he thought were the effects of ignorance; and upon that he fell into a croſſneſs of diſpoſition; he found fault with every order which was ſent him; but would offer no advice, on his part. Hiſtory of his own times.

(2) If ſir John Aſhby had purſued the twenty-ſix French ſhips, which afterwards got into St. Malo, in all appearance he might have deſtroyed every one of them. Burnet's hiſtory of his own times.

(3) King James now ſeem'd to recede from all hopes of his reſtoration, as we may ſee by the following melancholy letter, which he wrote to the French King.

Monſieur, my Brother,

"I have hitherto, with ſomething of conſtancy and reſolution, ſupported the weight of all the misfortunes, which it hath "pleaſed Heaven to lay upon me, ſo long as myſelf was the only ſufferer: but I muſt acknowledge this laſt diſaſter utterly "overwhelms me; and I am altogether comfortleſs, in reference to what concerns your Majeſty, thro' the great loſs that has "befallen your fleet. I know too well, that my unlucky ſtar it is, which has drawn down this misfortune upon your forces, "always victorious, but when they fought for my intereſt. And this is that which plainly tells me, that I no longer merit "the ſupport of ſo great a Monarch, who is always ſure to vanquiſh when he fights for himſelf. For which reaſon it is, "that I requeſt your Majeſty no longer to concern yourſelf for a Prince ſo unfortunate as myſelf; but permit me to retire with "my family, to ſome corner of the world, where I may ceaſe to obſtruct the uſual courſe of your proſperities and conqueſts, "which only my misfortune could interrupt. It is not juſt that the moſt potent Monarch in the world, and the moſt flouriſh-"ing, above all others, ſhould ſhare in my diſgrace, becauſe you are too generous... 'Tis better much, that I ſhall only retire, "'till it pleaſe omnipotent providence to be more propitious to my affairs. But howſoever it pleaſes over-ruling Heaven to diſ-"poſe of me and mine, or into whatſoever receſs I may be thrown, I can aſſure your Majeſty, that I ſhall always preſerve, to "the laſt gaſp of my aſpiring breath, that due acknowledgment which I ſtill retain of your favors and conſtant friendſhip. Nor "can any thing more contribute to my conſolation, than to hear, as I hope to do, when I have wholly quited your dominions, "of the quick return of all your wonted triumphs, both by ſea and land, over your enemies and mine, when my intereſt ſhall "be no longer intermixed with yours. I am, Monſieur, my Brother, yours, &c.

James Rex.

The King of France indeavored to alleviate King James affliction by a kind anſwer, wherein he promiſed never to forſake him in the worſt of his extremities.

(4) The orders for this expedition were not open'd till they were at a certain diſtance at ſea: and, in a council of war, of land and ſea officers, it was debated, whether the burning the French ſhips at St. Malo was practicable; The flag-officers were of opinion it was not, till the town itſelf was ſo far reduc'd, by the land-forces, that the ſhips might not be expos'd to the enemy's guns on ſhoar: and the land-officers were of opinion, that the troops could be of no ſervice, without the aſſiſtance of the fleet, ſo that deſign was laid aſide. It was next debated, whether any thing could be attempted at Breſt or Rochfort: but there again the flag-officers thought the ſeaſon of the year too far advanced to attempt any thing with ſafety, and the generals declar'd they ſhould not be able to do any ſervice with the troops, unleſs they were protected by the fleet. It was however, reſolved to ſtand over to the coaſt of France, off of la Hogue, but, in the paſſage from Torbay, the admiral received orders from the Queen, and, thereupon, returned with the tranſports to St. Helens. to Diegom: the 28th of May, he continued his march towards Louvain, and incamp'd near Beth-lem-abby, from whence, on the third of June, he purſued his march towards Namur (1). The duke of Luxemburg, who cover'd the ſiege of Namur, with an army of 70,000 men, upon the firſt advice, that the King of England was in motion towards the Mehaigne, march'd that way, likewiſe, and the eighth of June, the two armies, which were very near of equal force, came within ſight of one another, having the river only between them: both armies poſſeſs'd themſelves of the moſt advantageous poſts they could, on each ſide of the river; but the confederates had ſo much the advantage, by means of their batteries, that King William order'd his pontons to be laid over it, the ſame evening, in order to attack the French, the next day: however, tho' every thing was in a readineſs, there fell that night, and the ſucceeding days, ſo much rain, as ſwell'd the river to ſuch a degree, that the current over-ſet his bridges. This, with the continual fire of the enemy, from the other ſide of the river, oblig'd his Majeſty to lay aſide an enterpriſe, by which he might have obtain'd great glory.

A glorious deſign fruſtrated.

The caſtle of Namur beſieged.

The French, after the ſurrender of the town of Namur, laid cloſe ſiege to the caſtle, which, by its advantageous ſituation on a hill, and its excellent fortifications, was reckon'd almoſt impregnable. They had firſt a fortification called the Devil's-houſe, then Fort-William, and afterwards the New-caſtle to take, before they could come at the Old-caſtle. To give a particular account of all the tranſactions of this ſiege, would carry me too far, the moſt remarkable was the taking of Fort-William, an out-work erected by that incomparable ingineer, colonel de Cohorn, who defended it in perſon, with a gariſon of 1500 men. Lewis XIV reſolved to be maſter of it, at any rate, and, tho' he did gain his point, it coſt him dear. He cauſed it to be very vigorouſly attack'd, the 21ſt of June, but his men were obliged to retreat with a conſiderable loſs; not diſcouraged by this repulſe, they attempted it again the next day, but were twice beat off with great ſlaughter; at length, however, with redoubled numbers, they poſſeſſed themſelves of the cover'd way, and cut off the communication of the beſieged with the caſtle. Monſieur de Cohorn being, likewiſe, dangerouſly wounded, the gariſon deſired to capitulate, and the fort was, thereupon, deliver'd up to the French. This was ſoon follow'd by the loſs of the caſtle, which ſurrender'd the firſt of July. (2)

Fort William taken.

The caſtle of Namur ſurrendered.

King William was then incamp'd at Melle, where he had form'd a deſign to ſurprize Mons, but it prov'd abortive. His Majeſty march'd his army from Melle to Genap, from thence to Notre-Dame de Hall, and, on the firſt of Auguſt, over the Senne, where he was joined by the troops of Hannover, to the number of 8000 men. The French King, on the other hand, contented with the glory of having taken Namur, in the ſight of the confederate army, left the command of his troops to Luxemburg, who incamp'd them in an advantageous poſt, cover'd by a wood and thick hedges, between Enghien and Steenkirk, where his Britannick Majeſty took the reſolution to attack him.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1692.

The battle of Steenkirk.

The third of Auguſt, the confederate army march'd, early in the morning, the heavy baggage being order'd to repaſs the Senne at Hall. As they had ſeveral defilees to paſs, and ways to make, the duke of Wirtemberg, with the van-guard, conſiſting of four batallions of Engliſh foot, two of Danes, and a detachment of Churchill's brigade, did not come up to the enemy's camp till about ten. He then immediately fell upon them, with ſo much vigor, that he drove them from hedge to hedge, poſted himſelf in the wood, which fronted the right wing of their army, and erected two batteries of cannon, on little eminences, one on the right, and the other on the left of the wood. While theſe batterries were playing upon the enemy, the confederate army marched up to the head of the defilees (about half an Engliſh mile from the wood) where it opened into a little plain, not above half a league over, which terminated upon the right of the wood, and upon ſeveral rows of high trees, planted in great order. From the head of the defilee, on the left of the plain, there was a deep hollow way, with high trees and hedges upon the banks of it, which reached as far as the wood, where the vanguard was placed, and where it branched itſelf into two other deep ways, and going thro' the wood upon the left, to the Danes attack, and to that of the guards, and the other upon the right, going along the outſide of the wood: between theſe two laſt, were poſted the regiments of ſir Robert Douglas, colonel Fitz-patrick, and colonel O Farrel. When the confederate army was come up to the head of theſe defilees, and juſt entering into the ſmall plain, they were all ordered to halt, except the Engliſh life-guards, horſe and dragoons, and the lord Cutts's, lieutenant-general Mackay's, ſir Charles Graham's, and the earl of Angus's regiments, which being interlined with the horſe, were, at the ſame time, ordered to the right ſkirts of the wood; while the Prince of Heſſe's, colonel Lowther's, and the earl of Leven's regiments, were alſo intermixed with the left wing of horſe, and poſted upon the outſide of the wood.

All things being thus diſpoſed, and the army continuing in their halt, Prince Wirtemberg, after he had cannonaded for about two hours, began the attack with the Danes upon the right, which was immediately followed by the other four Engliſh regiments, which compoſed the van-guard, and ſeconded by Cutts's, Mackay's, Angus's, Graham's, Lowther's, the Prince of Heſſe's and Leven's regiments. The fire was very terrible for the ſpace of two hours, and withal very regular. The van-guard behaved with ſo much bravery and reſolution, that tho' they received the charge of ſeveral battalions of the enemy, one after another, they drove them beyond one of their batteries of ſeven pieces of cannon, of which the Danes, and the ſecond battalion of the regiment of Engliſh guards, poſſeſſed themſelves, and would have carried them away, had not the French prevented them, by cuting off the traces, and carrying away the horſes. Sir Robert Douglas, with his firſt battalion, charged ſeveral of

(1) Before his Majeſty removed, he gave the enemy notice of his laſt victory at ſea, by a triple diſcharge of 140 pieces of cannon, which were anſwer'd by as many vollies of ſmall ſhot, from the two lines of the army. It is ſaid, that the French King heard theſe tokens of joy, with a great deal of unconcernment, ſaying; "here's a mighty pudder, indeed, about the "burning of two or three ſhips." However, as light as he made of it, the conſequences ſhew'd, it was the unhappieſt blow he received, during the whole courſe of the war. Hiſtory of King William III. vol. 2. p. 332.

(2) The ſtrength of the place, and the ſhortneſs of the ſiege, occaſioned ſome reflections to be caſt on the Prince of Barbanſon, who was governor of it. It was ſaid that King William ſuſpected him before-hand, and had, therefore, deſired the elector of Bavaria to remove him: but the French having inveſted the place, before he could comply with his Majeſty's deſire, all the elector could do was to order the count de Thian, to accompany him in this ſiege, and to obſerve his conduct. There were, however, not wanting thoſe who maintain'd, that the Prince of Barbanſon acted like a man of honor and courage, and did all that could be expected from him.

the enemies, beat them from three ſeveral hedges, and made himſelf maſter of the fourth, when going thro' a gap, to get on the other ſide, he was unfortunately killed on the ſpot.

The other regiments all behaved with the like bravery, firing thro' the hedges, they on one ſide, and the enemy on the other, muzzle to muzzle. One of Prince Wirtemberg's aids de camp having informed the King, what difficulties the vanguard had to incounter with, and the Prince having, to no purpoſe, ſent two meſſengers to count Solmes, who commanded the main body, for a reinforcement, his Majeſty diſpatched count Paulin, one of his own aids de camp, with poſitive orders to count Solmes, to ſend more foot to the Prince's aſſiſtance; but inſtead of obeying the King's command, he did juſt the reverſe; ordering the foot to halt, and the horſe to march (1). This proved, in a great meaſure, if not wholly, the loſs of the day: for the ground was ſo ſtreight, and the enemy had ſo many hedges, copſes, and ditches, to cover them, that the horſe could do nothing; ſo that when the vanguard begun to ingage, they had none but part of the infantry, interlined with the left wing of the horſe, to ſecond them, the body of the foot being almoſt a mile in the rear. The King, however, made all poſſible diligence to get the infantry up, ordering a brigade to march to the wood, and forming a line of battle in the plain, with ſuch foot as could come up. The ſoldiers were ſo eager to follow their royal leader, and to ingage the enemy, that it occaſioned ſome diſorder, and made it the longer before the battalions could be formed: inſomuch, that before they could reach the wood, the vanguard and infantry of the left wing, having been continually charged by thirty battalions of the enemy, one after another, and by a freſh body of dragoons, brought up by Bouflers, were overpowered and obliged to retreat, in great confuſion, leaving the wood in the poſſeſſion of the enemy.

The Engliſh life-guards were indebted to the Daniſh foot-guards, for their ſafety; and baron Pibrack's regiment of Lunenburgers, being in diſorder, upon the ſkirt of the wood, and the colonel lying dangerouſly wounded on the place, ſir Bevil Granville, who commanded the earl of Bath's regiment, marched to his relief, and having lodged himſelf, in the hollow way, near the wood, ordered the wounded baron Pibrack to be carried off, and maintained his poſt, 'till count Naſſau commanded him to leave it. King William, inraged to ſee his vanguard thus diſappointed in their juſt expectations, for want of a timely relief, was often heard to repeat theſe words: "Oh my poor Engliſh how they are abandoned," (2)! and conſidering that the fight could not now be renewed, without a great hazard to the whole army, the enemy having been re-inforced by a conſiderable body of troops, under the command of Bouflers, together with the heavy artillery, and beſide night drawing on, his Majeſty thought a retreat moſt adviſeable, which was, accordingly, performed in excellent order, and without any moleſtation from the enemy, who, notwithſtanding the advantage they had obtained, wanted courage to attack the rear of the confederate army; tho' the continuator of Rapin ſays they followed them ſome time.

William & Mary. An' 1692.

The confederates loſt, in this battle, the brave lieutenant-general Mackay, ſir John Lanier, ſir Robert Douglas, the earl of Angus, and ſeveral other good officers, together with above 2,000 men killed, 3,000 wounded or made priſoners, and ſeveral pieces of cannon. The enemy, on the other hand, remained indeed maſters of the camp they were in poſſeſſion of before; but otherwiſe they had not much advantage to brag of: for they had the Prince de Turenne, the marquis de Bellefonds, the marquis de Tilladet, the brigadier Stoupa, the marquis de Firmacon, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, together with 2000 private ſoldiers killed, and near as many wounded. Loſs on both ſides.

This campain afforded little more of note, in Flanders: on the one ſide, a detachment from the troops of Liege, commanded by count de Tſerclaes de Tilly, defeated a French party from Namur; and on the other, monſ. de Bouflers bombarded Charleroy. The Engliſh forces under the duke of Lemſter, which, as I have mentioned above, landed at Oſtend towards the latter end of Auguſt, poſſeſſed themſelves of Furnes and Dixmuyde, which they began to fortify: but whatever was the reaſon of it, both theſe places were abandoned to Bouflers, by count Horn, the begining of the inſuing year (3). The Engliſh take Furnes and Dixmuyde.

Before I leave the Netherlands, I muſt not omit mentioning the deſerv'd fate of an infamous criminal, who fell into the hands of juſtice, I mean the chevalier de Granvale, who, the foregoing year, was principal in the deſign of aſſaſſinating King William. Returning this year from Paris, where he had ingaged one Leefdale, a perſon of a good family near Boiſleduc, to join with Dumont in the execrable deed, he appointed a meeting at Uden, whither Dumont was come from Hannover. It was there agreed, that when the King ſhould paſs along the lines, or when the army ſhould decamp, Dumont and Leefdale ſhould be in ambuſh, and ſhoot his Majeſty; but that, as ſoon as the murder was committed, to color the villany with the appearance of a ſtratagem of war, a party of 3,000 horſe, from the duke of Luxemburg's army, headed by monſ. Chamlays and colonel Parker, ſhould reſcue the aſſaſſins: but providence, ever watchful for his Majeſty's ſafety, ſuffered the black deſign to be diſcovered by Leefdale and Dumont. They related all the circumſtances of it, and who were the perſons that put Granvale upon this helliſh attempt (4). Granvale was thereupon taken at Eyndenhoven, and being tried by a court-martial, at Hay, after he had made a full and voluntary confeſſion of his crime, without being put to the torture, he was, according to his ſentenſe, drawn, hanged and quartered. A plot againſt the King's life. The author executed.

(1) This ill conduct of count Solmes was ſaid to be the effect of envy and jealouſy, in general, againſt the Engliſh, which had always been obſerved in him, and in particular againſt the Prince of Wirtemberg, becauſe he commanded the attack, an honor he himſelf was ambitious of.

(2) It is ſaid, that King William would not admit the count de Solmes to his royal preſenſe for many months after; and, indeed if he was deſignedly guilty of that miſtake, for the motives laid to his charge, a much more ſevere treatment would juſtly have been his due: but the misfortune of this day was, likewiſe, owing in part to a traytor, who made it his buſineſs to give intelligence of all the King's motions and deſigns, to monſ. de Luxemburg, I mean the chevalier de Millevoix, a domeſtic of the elector of Bavaria's, who, being convicted of it, was hanged on a tree, in the right wing of his Majeſty's army.

(3) King William had probably ſome great deſign in view, that way; for he highly reſented the treachery, or whatever it was, of count Horn, in delivering up theſe places, tho' till then he had always a great ſhare in his Majeſty's eſteem.

(4) At his execution he ſeemed very penitent, but could not forbear expreſſing ſome reſentment againſt thoſe that had brought him to ſo tragical an end; among whom, if credit may be given to the dying words of a criminal, and to depoſitions upon record, there were not only miniſters of ſtate and embaſſadors, but even an archbiſhop, nay, a crowned head, who, at leaſt, were privy to that deteſtable project; which, however, the continuator of Rapin, always a friend to the French, will by no means believe: and, to make it the more incredible, tells the ridiculous ſtory, that Dumont was pitched upon to ſtrike the firſt ſtroke, becauſe he pretended he had the art to render himſelf inviſible. Affairs of Germany.

The confederate army on the Upper Rhine was commanded this year, by the landgrave of Heſſe-caſſel, and the markgrave of Bareith, againſt the duke de Lorge, general of the French army. Nothing worth our notice happened, till the month of September, when the duke of Wirtemberg, with about 4,000 horſe, was ſurprized by a detachment of French troops, in his camp near Edeilſheim, by the favor of a great fog, and were charged ſo vigorouſly, that his men had not time to put themſelves in a poſture of defenſe. About 1,000 of the Germans were killed on the ſpot, and ſeveral made priſoners, among whom was the duke himſelf, who was carried to Paris, while the French lived at diſcretion in his country. The landgrave of Heſſe-caſſel, who was likewiſe obliged, by the French, to raiſe the ſiege of Eberemburg, was however ſoon after, even with them: for count Tallard, with a body of their troops, having beſieged Rhinefeld, the governor made ſo brave a defenſe, and the landgrave was ſo aſſiduous to come to his relief, that the French were obliged to abandon the enterprize, with a conſiderable loſs (1).

I muſt not quit the affairs of Germany, without taking notice, that this year the duke of Hannover, a Proteſtant Prince, and grand-father to his preſent moſt gracious Majeſty, was, thro' King William's intereſt, and by means of certain ſtipulations with the Emperor, advanced to be an Elector of the Empire, and thereby a ninth Electorate was conſtituted.

Affairs in Piedmont.

In Piedmont the allies were, this year, ſucceſsful, and had carried all before them, if a ſudden ſickneſs, which ſeized the duke of Savoy, had not put a ſtop to the career of his good fortune. The French, having brought the Pope to an accommodation, were very ſanguine in their hopes of drawing over the duke of Savoy from the confederacy, by means of the Holy-father; and this may have been one reaſon why they left monſ. Catinat expoſed to an army ſo very much ſuperior to that which was under his command: but the duke, being proof againſt all their temptations and remaining ſtaunch to the intereſt of the high allies, got his army into the field, and diſpoſed of ſeveral parties, in the vallies and other places, for the better ſecurity of the country, and then marched, in the month of July, at the head of 20,000 men, over the Alps, by ways 'till then thought impracticable, into the province of Dauphiny, where he pillaged and took ſeveral places from the French, and particularly the city of Ambrun, where he found a conſiderable booty in mony, and raiſed large contributions, not only in that city, but in all the neighbouring towns and villages. In this city, likewiſe, the duke of Schomberg, who commanded 4,000 French refugees, and Vaudois, publiſhed a declaration, in the name of his Britannic Majeſty, inviting the country to join him (2). Incouraged by this declaration, ſeveral French Proteſtants who had been obliged to abjure their religion, took this opportunity to make their voluntary recantation, in the preſenſe of monſ. Dubourdieu, the duke's chaplain, who did not fail to ſtrengthen them in their faith, by his excellent ſermons. From Ambrun, the army marched to Gap, a city on the frontiers of Provence, the inhabitants of which opened their gates to Prince Eugene of Savoy, upon his firſt appearance before it; and readily conſented to pay contribution, to preſerve their houſes from being burnt and pillaged. The city of Grenoble, the capital of Dauphiny, the neighbouring provinces, and even the wealthy city of Lions, began to be apprehenſive of their danger; and indeed the allies had now a very favorable opportunity of curbing the immenſe power of France, had not the duke of Savoy been taken with the ſmall-pox, from which he was no ſooner, recovered than he fell into an ague that indangered his life. This with a ſpirit of diviſion that crept in among the generals, put an end to the campain ſooner than was otherwiſe deſigned (3).

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1692.

Affairs of Catalonia.

I ſhould now go on to the campain in Catalonia; but the French having attempted nothing on that ſide, their forces being ſufficiently diverted another way, and the Spaniards having done as little, by reaſon of their uſual ſupinity and weakneſs, I ſhall return to England.

An earthquake in England.

The 8th of September, an earthquake, a thing very uncommon in England, was felt in London, and ſeveral other places (4). The 13th of the ſame month, the Queen iſſued out two proclamations, one "for the better diſcovery of ſeditious libellers," and the other, "for the diſcovery and apprehending of high-way-men, and for a reward of forty pounds for every ſuch offender, to the diſcoverers;" which incouragement occaſioned the taking of many of thoſe robbers, who, about this time, very much infeſted the roads of this kingdom.

A ſham-plot.

Some time before this, the earls of Malborough and Saliſbury, the biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſome others, were put in the Tower, upon a falſe accuſation of high-treaſon: this villany was tranſacted in the following manner: One Young was commited to Newgate for non-payment of a fine impoſed upon him; and one Henry Pearſon, a priſoner in the ſame place for debt, obſerving that Young was very dextrous in counterfeiting hands, told him, if he could contrive a ſham-plot, and father it on thoſe noblemen, he need not want mony to pay his fine. On the credit of this ſham-plot, Young and Pearſon found means to raiſe mony enough to get diſcharged from their confinement, and then Pearſon imployed one Stephen Blackhead to carry letters between himſelf and Young, who by a ſtratagem had found means to get a ſight of the earl of Marlborough's hand, which he counterfeited ſo artificially, that it was very difficult to diſcern the true from the falſe. He afterwards drew up a pretended aſſociation againſt the government, to which he affixed the hands of the earls of Marlborough and Saliſbury, ſir Baſil Firebraſs, the biſhop of Rocheſter, and the lord Cornbury, which two laſt were

(1) It was the more ſhame to the French, to be obliged to abandon this place, becauſe the court of France, not believing it would dare to ſtand a ſiege, ordered count Tallard, not to beſiege, but to take poſſeſſion of it.

The campain on the Rhine might probably have been more ſucceſsful, had it not been for want of the Saxon troops (upon which the Imperial troops in vain depended) notwithſtanding the elector's promiſes. Contin. of Rapin in French, B. 25. p. 163.

(2) He aſſured them, that his Majeſty had no other aim, in cauſing his forces to enter into France, but to reſtore the nobility and gentry to their ancient ſplendor, the parliaments to their priſtine authority, the people to their juſt privileges, and even to grant his protection to the clergy: and becauſe the Kings of England are guarantees of the edict of Nantes, made in favor of the Proteſtants, as well by the treaty concluded at Montpellier, as ſeveral other treaties, the duke of Schomberg declared, that it was his Britannic Majeſty's intention to cauſe that edict to be revived.

(3) Mr. Dubourdieu, after his return, prevailed upon the biſhop of St. Aſaph (afterwards of Litchfield and Coventry) to ſollicit her Majeſty's bounty in behalf of the poor perſecuted Vaudois, which he did ſo ſucceſsfully, that a fund was eſtabliſhed out of her Majeſty's privy-purſe, for the maintaining of ten preachers, and as many ſchool-maſters, in the vallies of Piedmont. A monument of that glorious Princeſs's unbounded charity, which will remain as long as there are Vaudois in the world.

(4) This earthquake was, likewiſe, felt in ſeveral places on the continent. King William being at that time in his camp at dinner, in an old decayed houſe, which ſhook ſo much that every one was apprehenſive it would fall, his Majeſty, with much ado, was prevailed upon to riſe from table, and go out of the houſe; but the ſurprize was ſoon over.

About three months before this, a more terrible accident of this kind happened at Jamaica, which almoſt intirely ruined the town of Port-royal, the beſt of all the Engliſh plantations, and the great mart of that part of the world; beſide the damages, which amounted to a very large ſum, no leſs than 1500 perſons, periſhed by this fatal accident.

were however written by another hand. To give the more credit to this pretended plot, Young forged ſeveral letters in the name of the duke of Marlborough, ſuppoſed to be directed to himſelf, which Blackhead uſed to bring to him. In the month of April, Blackhead went three times to the biſhop of Rocheſter's houſe at Bromley, on a ſham-errand, from a ſuppoſed doctor of divinity, but with no other intent but to convey the forged aſſociation into a ſecret place; where it was afterwards found by the King's meſſengers, who, upon information given by Young againſt that reverend prelate, came firſt to ſecure his perſon, and then to ſearch his houſe: but upon a ſtrict examination of the whole matter, before the council, and confronting Blackhead with Young, the forgery was evidently diſcovered, the innocence of the noblemen, and other perſons accuſed, made manifeſt, and the authors of this villany puniſhed (1).

The villany detected.

Affairs of Scotland and Ireland.

In Scotland and Ireland every thing was now in a perfect tranquillity, and the parliaments of both nations were very zealous and forward, in contributing new levies, for the ſupport of their Majeſties government. In Ireland, particularly, the lord Sidney, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, ſo managed affairs, that the parliament there made an act, the 5th of October, "not only of recognition "of their Majeſties undoubted title to that crown," and another, "for incouragement of Proteſtant "ſtrangers to ſettle in that kingdom"; but alſo one, "for granting to their Majeſties the ſum of "70,000 l. by an additional duty of exciſe upon "beer, ale, and other liquors."

The King returns from Holland.

But to return to the King: his Majeſty having ſettled his affairs in Holland, imbarked there, the 25th of October N. S. and landed ſafely, the 18th O. S. in Yarmouth. The Queen met him, the 20th, at Newhall, from whence their Majeſties came the ſame day thro' the city, to Kenſington. The 22d the lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder of London waited upon his Majeſty, as well to congratulate his happy return, as to expreſs their ſteady reſolution to ſupport his government, to the utmoſt of their power. The recorder, at the ſame time, beſought his Majeſty, in the name of the lord-mayor, aldermen and ſheriffs, to honor the city with his preſenſe at dinner at Guild-hall, upon the lord-mayor's-day. His Majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to accept of the invitation, and, as a mark of his favor, confered the honor of knighthood upon their recorder, Solathiel Lovel, ſerjeant at law. The ſame day a proclamation was iſſued out for a public thankſgiving to God-Almighty for the preſervation of their Majeſties and their government, againſt the deſigns of their open and ſecret enemies, particularly for the late ſignal victory at ſea againſt the French fleet, and for the diſappointment of the barbarous conſpiracy, for taking away his Majeſty's life by aſſaſſination.

Their Majeſty's dine in the city.

The 29th of the ſame month, their Majeſties, attended by the great officers of the court, a numerous train of nobility and gentry, the judges, and the ladies of the chiefeſt quality, were magnificently entertained at dinner, at Guild-hall, by ſir John Fleet, lord-mayor elect for the year inſuing, upon which occaſion his Majeſty confered the honor of knighthood on ſir John Wildman, ſir William Gore, ſir James Houblon, aldermen, ſir Leonard Robinſon, chamberlain, ſir Rowland Ainſworth, ſir William Scawen, ſir Joſiah Child, and ſir John Foach. The ſame honor having been confered, ſome days before, on Thomas Trevor eſq; their Majeſties ſolicitor-general.

The 4th of November, the parliament being met at Weſtminſter, his Majeſty went to the houſe of lords, and made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which "he firſt of all, thank'd them for the great ſupplies "they had given him for the proſecution of the "war; hoping, by their advice and aſſiſtance, "which had never failed him, to take ſuch meaſures "as might be moſt proper for ſupporting their com-"mon intereſt, againſt the exceſſive power of "France. He next told them, how great reaſon "they had to rejoice, in the happy victory they had "obtained at ſea, wiſhing the ſucceſs at land, had "been anſwerable to it: tho' he was ſure, his own "ſubjects had ſo remarkable a ſhare in both, that "their bravery and courage muſt ever be remem-"bred to their honor. He, afterwards, made them "ſenſible; that as the French were repairing their "loſſes at ſea, with great diligence, and did deſign "to augment their land-forces conſiderably, againſt "the next campain, ſo it was abſolutely neceſſary, "for this nation's ſafety, that, at leaſt, as great "a force be maintained at ſea and land, as they "had the laſt year, and therefore, he aſked a ſup-"ply, ſuitable to ſo great an occaſion, of the "gentlemen of the houſe of commons; expreſſing, "at the ſame time, his affliction, that ſo heavy a "charge upon his people could not be avoided, "without expoſing themſelves to inevitable ruin "and deſtruction. And becauſe the inconvenience "of ſending out of the kingdom great ſums of "mony, for the payment of the troops abroad, was "very conſiderable, and that he wiſhed it could "be remedied, he told them, that if they could "ſuggeſt to him any methods for the ſupport of "them, which might leſſen this inconvenience, he "ſhould be ready to receive them, with all the "ſatisfaction imaginable. He then acquainted "them, That none could deſire more than he did, "that a deſcent ſhould be made into France, and "therefore, notwithſtanding the diſappointment of "that deſign this laſt ſummer, he intended to at-"tempt it the next year, with a much more conſi-"derable force, and that as ſoon as he ſhould be in-"abled, all poſſible care and application ſhould be "uſed towards it. And, upon this occaſion, he "took notice of that ſignal deliverance, which, by "the providence of God, they received the laſt "ſpring, to the diſappointment and confuſion of "their enemy's deſigns and expectations. This "(ſaid he) has ſufficiently ſhewn us, how much "we are expoſed to the attempts of France, while "that King is in a condition to make them. Let "us therefore improve the advantage we have of "this time, of being joined with moſt of the Princes "and States of Europe, againſt ſo dangerous an

The King's ſpeech to the parliament.

(1) "Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that the parliament was, on this account, opened under great diſadvantages. The peers, "who had been falſely accuſed, were, indeed, diſcharged from their impriſonment, but it was upon bail only; ſo it was "ſaid to be contrary to the nature and freedom of parliaments, for priſoners to ſit in it. It was confeſſed that, in times of "danger, and ſuch was the foregoing ſummer, it muſt be truſted to the diſcretion of a government, to commit ſuch perſons as "were ſuſpected: but when the danger was over, by our victory at ſea, thoſe againſt whom there lay nothing beſide ſuſpici-"ons, ought to have been ſet at liberty, and this was thought reaſonable. The lords paſſed ſome votes, aſſerting their privileges, "and were offended with the judges, for detaining ſome in priſon, tho' there was no reaſon nor color for their diſpleaſure. But "where the privilege, or dignity, of peerage is in queſtion, it is not eaſy to keep the houſe within bounds.

"The debate went off in a bill, that indemnified the miniſtry for thoſe commitments, but limited them, for the future, by "ſeveral rules; all which rules were rejected by the commons. They thought thoſe limitations gave a legal power to commit "in caſes where they were obſerved; whereas they thought the ſafer way was to indemnify the miniſtry, when it was viſible "they did not commit any but upon a real danger, and not to ſet them any rules; ſince, as to the commiting of ſuſpected "perſons, where the danger is real and viſible, the public ſafety muſt be firſt looked to, and ſuperſede all particular laws. " enemy : in this ſurely, all men will agree who " have any love for their country, or any zeal for " religion: I cannot therefore doubt, but you will " continue to ſupport me in this war, againſt the " declared enemy of this nation, and that you " will give as ſpeedy diſpatch to the affairs before " you, as the nature and importance of them " will admit, that the preparations may be timely " and effectual, for the preſervation of all that is " valuable to us. I am ſure, added his Majeſty, " I can have no intereſt but what is yours : we have " the ſame religion to defend, and you cannot be " more concerned for the preſervation of your " liberties and properties, than I am, that you " ſhould always remain in the full poſſeſſion of " them; for I have no aim, but to make you a " happy people : hitherto, ſaid he, in the conclu- " ſion, I have never ſpared to expoſe my own per- " ſon, for the good and welfare of this nation; " and I am ſo ſenſible of your good affections to me, " that I ſhall continue to do ſo, with great chear- " fulneſs, upon all occaſions, wherein I may con- " tribute to the honor and advantage of Eng- " land.

This ſpeech was received with an univerſal applauſe, and made a deep impreſſion on the minds of both houſes of parliament. The commons in particular, by their addreſs, " acknowleged the great " affection his Majeſty ſhewed to his ſubjects, by " taking notice of their bravery and courage; by " that ſenſible concern he expreſſed for the charges " on his people, and by that tender regard for the " preſervation of their religion, liberties and pro- " perties, as muſt ever be remembered with grati- " tude by all his faithful ſubjects. They likewiſe " acknowleged the favor of GOD in reſtoring his " Majeſty in ſafety to his people, after ſo many " hazards and dangers, to which he had expoſed " his ſacred perſon; that there might be nothing " wanting on his part, to oppoſe the ambitious de- " ſigns of his enemies, and to maintain the honor " of England, and the liberties of Europe. They " alſo congratulated his deliverance from the ſecret " and open deſigns, which the malice of his ene- " mies had formed againſt him. And aſſured him, " that they would always adviſe and aſſiſt his Ma- " jeſty, in the ſupporting of his government againſt " all his enemies."

Addreſs of the houſe of commons.

At the ſame time, the commons preſented their thankful acknowlgements to the Queen, " for her " gracious and prudent adminiſtration of the go- " vernment, while his Majeſty was hazarding his " royal perſon abroad, and for the bleſſings of " peace they injoyed at home, under her auſpi- " cious reign, at a time when the greateſt part of " Europe was ſuffering the miſerable effects of war. " They alſo congratulated, not only the ſignal de- " liverance they received from a bold and cruel " deſign formed and proſecuted for their deſtruc- " tion, when it was juſt ready to be executed, but " likewiſe the return of her Majeſty's fleet with " ſo compleat and glorious a victory, as was not to " be equalled in any former age : aſſuring her Ma- " jeſty, that the grateful ſenſe they had of their " happineſs under her government, ſhould be al- " ways manifeſted in conſtant returns of duty and " obedience, and a firm reſolution to do all that " was in their power, to render her reign ſecure " and proſperous."

The firſt buſineſs of importance the commons went upon, was, on the 11th of November, the bill " for regulating trials, in caſes of high-treaſon," but this time it ſtuck in their own houſe; for tho', at the ſecond reading, on the 18th, it was refered to a committee of the whole houſe; yet a clauſe being preſented, on the 1ſt of December, to be added to the bill, a warm debate aroſe upon it, the reſult of which was, that the bill was ordered to ly upon the table, and the conſideration of it was not reſumed this ſeſſion.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1692.

Bill to regulate trials, &c.

Again loſt.

The 11th of November, the commons ordered their ſpeaker to thank admiral Ruſſel, one of their members, for his great courage and conduct, in the victory obtained at ſea. This, one would think, would have ſcreened him from farther reflections on his behavior, in that memorable action : but whether thro' envy, prejudice, or what other cauſe I ſhall not pretend to determine, it was the next day ſuggeſted, that the advantage gained upon the enemy might have been much better improved. Upon this, the houſe entered upon examining the ſeveral inſtructions, orders, and reſults of councils of war, touching the laſt ſummer's expedition, in relation to the proceedings of the fleet, and the deſcent intended to be made upon France, after the victory at ſea. On the 19th of November, ſir John Aſhby being examined, particularly in relation to the French men of war, that made their eſcape into St Malo's, he gave the commons an account of the proceedings of the ſhips under his command, in and after the ingagement; with which they were ſo well pleaſed, that the ſpeaker, by the direction of the houſe, acquainted him, " that the houſe took notice of his " ingenious behavior at the bar; and that he had " given an account to the ſatisfaction of the houſe, " and was diſmiſſed from farther attendance.

Thanks of the commons given to admiral Ruſſel.

Ill managements of the fleet inquired into.

Sir John Aſhby cleared.

The next thing the houſe took into conſideration, was, why a deſcent had not been made into France? admiral Ruſſel was queſtioned about it; but he excuſed himſelf, by ſaying, that twenty days had paſſed between his firſt letter to the earl of Nottingham, after the fight, and his lordſhip's anſwer: and, on the other hand, the earl made it appear, that he had acted according to the orders he had received, which was all he could do, as ſecretary of ſtate. While theſe things were in agitation, the lords, at a conference, communicated to the houſe of commons, ſome papers which their lordſhips had received from the King, relating to thoſe affairs; which papers being read, in the lower-houſe, it was reſolved, " that admiral Ruſſel, in his command " of the fleet during laſt ſummer's expedition, had " behaved himſelf with fidelity, courage and con- " duct." The admiral was however ſet aſide the next ſpring, as we ſhall ſee underneath (1).

Admiral Ruſſel cleared.

The 15th of November, a ſupply was moved for, and unanimouſly granted, the 22d. The 2d of December, after a conſideration of the ſtate of war, for the year 1693, it was reſolv'd, " that the " ſum of 1,926,516 l. be granted to their Majeſties " for the charge of the navy (including the charge " of the ordnance, and the finiſhing their Ma- " jeſties naval yard, at Hamoſe, near Plymouth, " and the building four bomb-veſſels, and eight " new ſhips of the fourth rate.") The 3d, it was reſolv'd, that for the making good the ſum of 1,341,000 l. intended to be raiſed by the act for a quarterly poll, the ſum of 750,000 l. be granted

A ſupply granted.

(1) Biſhop Burnet ſays, this affair occaſion'd much heat, in both houſes. The earl of Nottingham laid before the lords, upon an addreſs they had made to the King, all the letters that had paſs'd between himſelf and Ruſſel, with all the orders he had ſent him : and he aggravated Ruſſel's erors and neglects very ſeverely : but the houſe of commons juſtified Ruſſel, and gave him thanks over and over again, and remain'd ſo fix'd in this, that tho' the lords then communicated the papers the earl of Nottingham had laid before them, to the commons, they would not ſo much as read them, but renewed their votes, that juſtified Ruſſel's fidelity, courage and conduct.

to their Majeſties. And the 10th, "that the "ſum of 2,090,563 l. be granted to their Ma- "jeſties for the land-forces, including the ex- "traordinary charge of the office of ordnance, in "relation to the land-ſervice, and the charge of "the tranſports, hoſpitals, contingencies, and other "extraordinary charges of the war.

Ways and means.

To raiſe theſe vaſt ſums, it was reſolved, firſt, the 13th of December, "that there be a pound- "rate, of four ſhillings in the pound, for one "year, charg'd upon all lands, according to their "yearly value: and, the 15th, that the ſame rate "be charg'd upon all perſonal eſtates, and upon all "offices and imployments of profit, other than mi- "litary offices in the navy and army. Secondly, "That there be a fund of 70,000 l. per annum, "ſet apart out of the hereditary exciſe, till the 17th "of May, 1697. And afterwards by an additi- "onal exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, for "the payment of the intereſt of a million of mony, "to be raiſed by perſons voluntarily paying in that "ſum, the principal paid in to be ſunk, and the "perſons paying in the ſum to receive, during their "lives, their reſpective proportions, of the ſaid "70,000 l. according to the ſums paid by them, "with the advantage of ſurvivorſhip; and thirdly, "on the 3d of February following, that certain "additional impoſitions be laid upon merchan- "dizes.

Orphans bill left unfiniſh'd.

The 7th of November, a petition was preſented to the houſe of commons, by the ſheriffs, and ſeveral aldermen of the city of London, in favor of the orphans of that city; but the conſideration of it being put off, from time to time, William Goodwin, Henry Goodwin, and other diſtreſſed orphans, likewiſe, preſented a petition, on the 28th of January, to the ſame effect, both which being, at length, conſidered, the commons ordered, the 27th of February, a bill to be brought in "for "ſatisfying the debt due to the ſaid orphans." But, upon a debate which aroſe at the ſecond reading, the bill was commited to a committee of the whole houſe, where it remain'd unfiniſhed.

The affair of the East-India-company reſum'd.

The 14th of November, a meſſage from his Majeſty was deliver'd to the houſe of commons, by ſir Edward Seymour, in anſwer to their addreſs of the laſt ſeſſion, concerning the Eaſt-India-company. This brought that matter again into debate, and, after much time had been ſpent about it, a bill was brought in, the 14th of December, "for "preſerving, regulating, and eſtabliſhing the Eaſt- "India-trade." This bill was about two months in agitation, and occaſion'd ſeveral debates, the reſult of which was, that the commons preſented an addreſs to his Majeſty, on the 3d of March, "that he would pleaſe to diſſolve the Eaſt-India- "company, upon three years warning to the ſaid "company, according to the power reſerved in "their charter." To this the King gave almoſt the ſame anſwer he had done to that of the fore-going year, viz. "That he would always do all "the good in his power for this kingdom, and "that he would conſider of their addreſs."

Advice of the commons to the King.

The houſe of commons was long amus'd with that part of the King's ſpeech, wherein his Majeſty ſeem'd to deſire the advice of the commons. After ſeveral debates, a committee was appointed, the 12th of December, "to conſider how the army "abroad, in their Majeſties pay, might be ſup- "plied with bread, cloaths, and other proviſions, "of the growth of this kingdom, to prevent the "exportation of the coin thereof:" and as for the navy, a motion being made, on the 11th of January; "That his Majeſty be humbly addreſs'd, "to conſtiſtute a commiſſion of the admiralty of "ſuch perſons as were of known experience in "maritime affairs," it paſſed in the negative. It was however carried, that his Majeſty ſhould be advis'd, by the houſe, "that for the future all "orders for the management of the fleet, ſhould "paſs thro' the hands of the lords commiſſioners "for executing the office of lord-high-admiral of "England" (1).

Bill rejected.

The 13th of December, ſir Edward Huſſey preſented to the houſe of commons "a bill touching "free and impartial proceedings in parliament," which was received, and, being paſs'd that houſe, was, the 22d, ſent up to the lords for their concurrence (2). The courtiers, who ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this bill, being too numerous, the other party took occaſion (from an objection that was made, viz. "That this act might, by its conſequence, "prolong this parliament, which they allow'd would "be a very great grievance,") to bring in, and paſs, another bill, "for the frequent calling and "meeting of parliaments," which they ſent down, the 21ſt of January, to the commons, for their concurrence: but the King, being loth to part with this parliament, during the war, refus'd his aſſent to it, tho' the lords had agreed to the amendments made to it by the commons.

"A bill for the better preſervation of their "Majeſties perſons," was, by an unanimous vote of the houſe of commons, ordered to be brought in, the firſt day of December, but was, nevertherleſs, rejected, the 14th of the ſame month, at a ſecond reading, and the 17th of the ſame month, the ſame fate attended the "bill for aſcertaining the fees of "officers of juſtice."

An' 1693. Acts paſſed.

The 20th of January, the King went to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal ſanction to "an act, "for granting to their Majeſties four ſhillings in "the pound, for one year;" to another, "for ina- "bling the inhabitants of the province of York "to diſpoſe of their perſonal eſtates by wills, not- "withſtanding the cuſtom of that province," and to eleven private bills.

Pamphlets cenſured.

A complaint was made, the ſame day, to the houſe of a printed pamphlet, intitled, "King "William and Queen Mary conquerors," that it contain'd aſſertions of a dangerous tendency, as well with regard to their Majeſties, as to the liberties of the ſubject, and the peace of the kingdom. The houſe, upon examination of the matter, the next day, order'd the ſaid pamphlet to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman, and that his Majeſty be deſired to remove mr. Edward Bohun, who licens'd it for the preſs, from his imployment. It being, at the ſame time, ſuggeſted, that dr. Burnet, biſhop of Sarum, was the firſt broacher of this poſition, in a paſtoral letter, the houſe paſs'd a cenſure on that letter, and order'd it likewiſe to be publicly burnt by the common executioner. This matter did not ſtop here; for on the 24th, the houſe of peers paſs'd a reſolution; "That the aſſertion of King William and "Queen Mary's being King and Queen by con- "queſt, was highly injurious to their Majeſties, "inconſiſtent with the principles on which this "government is founded, and tending to the ſub- "verſion of the rights of the people." This vote being communicated to the commons, they, the next day, unanimouſly concured with the lords, but made a remarkable addition, viz. That ſuch an aſſertion was "injurious to their Majeſties right-"ful title to the crown of this realm."

(2) By this bill, ſeveral perſons in imployments, both military and civil, were incapacitated to ſit in the houſe of commons, for which reaſon it was very much oppoſed by thoſe lords who ſtood up for the court; tho' on the other hand, ſeveral peers ſpoke vehemently for it, and, among the reſt, the earl of Muſgrave, who, upon this occaſion, made a very memorable ſpeech.

More acts paſſed.

The 26th his Majeſty came again to the houſe, and gave the royal ſanction to "an act for granting to "their Majeſties certain duties of exciſe, for ſecuring "the recompences and advantages therein men-"tioned to ſuch perſons as ſhould advance a million "ſterling," and to another act, "for taking ſpecial "bail in the country upon actions and ſuits depen-"ding in the courts of King's-bench, common "pleas, and exchequer, at Weſtminſter.

Complaints againſt officers of the army.

Great complaints were about this time made againſt ſome of the officers of the army, for cauſing, with the help of the preſs-maſters of the navy, ſeveral hundreds of his Majeſty's ſubjects to be kidnapp'd, and forcibly carried away to Holland, where they were compell'd to take ſervice and help to compleat their regiments. Among others, a ſervant belonging to a member of the houſe of commons happen'd to be ſpirited away in this manner: whereupon that houſe ordered ſir Edward Seymour to repreſent this grievance to the King, who, on the 9th of February, let the houſe know, by the ſame gentleman: "How much he reſented, "that his ſubjects ſhould meet with ſuch uſage, and "that he would take all care poſſible, for the fu-"ture, to puniſh the authors of it: And that, "in the firſt place, his Majeſty had called before "him the officers of the army, and given them a "ſtrict charge that they ſhould receive no men "who were impreſs'd; for as they themſelves had "no power to preſs, they ſhould not receive any "man that was preſſed; and that, in the next "place, his Majeſty gave orders to the admiralty "to examine the preſs-maſters, who had commit-"ted theſe abuſes, and that there ſhould be ſuch "exemplary puniſhment inflicted on them, as "ſhould deter others from the like praictces."

Abuſes in Ireland examin'd into.

Hitherto a perfect harmony and good correſpondence had appear'd between the King and the parliament; but it was now near being diſturb'd, by certain informations given to the commons, of the ſtate of Ireland; whereupon, the houſe reſolved, on the 24th of February, that it did appear, there had "been great abuſes and miſmanagements in the "affairs of that kingdom." On the 19th of March, the commons, in a body, preſented to his Majeſty an addreſs, in which they particulariz'd thoſe abuſes and miſmanagements; which were comprized under ſeven general heads, as follows.

An addreſs concerning them.

"1. In expoſing his Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects to "the miſery of free quarter and the licentiouſneſs "of the ſoldiers, to the great oppreſſion of the peo-"ple there, which they concevied had been chiefly "occaſion'd, by the want of that pay, which they "hoped they had fully provided for.

"2. In recruiting his Majeſty's troops with Iriſh "Papiſts, and ſuch perſons as were in open rebellion "againſt his Majeſty, to the great indangering and "diſcouraging of his Majeſty's good and loyal "ſubjects in that kingdom.

"3. In granting protections to Iriſh Papiſts, "whereby Proteſtants were hindred from the legal "remedies, and the courſe of law was ſtopp'd.

"4. In reverſing outlawries for high-treaſon "againſt ſeveral rebels in that kingdom (notwith-"in the articles of Limerick) to the great diſcon-"tent of his Proteſtant ſubjects there.

5. "In leting the forfeited eſtates at under rates, "to the leſſening of his Majeſty's revenue.

6. "In the great imbezzlements of his Ma-"jeſty's ſtores, in the towns and gariſons of that "kingdom, left by the late King James, and in "the great imbezzlements that had been made in "the forfeited eſtates and goods, which might "have been imployed for the ſafety and better "preſervation of his Majeſty's ſaid kingdom; "and,

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1693.

7. "In the addition made to the articles of "Limerick, after the ſame were finally agreed to, "ſigned, and thereupon the town ſurrendered; "which had been a great incouragement to the "Iriſh Papiſts, and a weakening to the Engliſh "intereſt there.

"Theſe abuſes they moſt humbly beſought his "Majeſty to redreſs; particularly, that as the re-"ducing of Ireland had been of great expence to "this kingdom, that (according to the aſſurance his "Majeſty had given them) no grant might be "made of the forfeited lands in Ireland, 'till there "be an opportunity of ſetling that matter in par-"liament. And as to the additional article, "which opened ſo wide a paſſage to the Iriſh Pa-"piſts, to come in and re-poſſeſs themſelves of the "eſtates which they had forfeited by their rebellion, "they alſo beſought his Majeſty, that the articles "of Limerick, with the ſaid addition, be laid before "the houſe of commons, that the manner of ob-"taining the ſame might be inquired into." They cloſed this addreſs by ſaying; "that as his Ma-"jeſty had been pleaſed to give ſuch gracious aſ-"ſurances of his readineſs to comply with them, "in any thing that might tend to the peace and "ſecurity of this kingdom, ſo they doubted not of "his Majeſty's like grace and favor to that of Ire-"land, in the ſafety and preſervation whereof this "his Majeſty's kingdom was ſo much concerned."

The King's anſwer.

To this addreſs, the King anſwered; "that he "ſhould always have great conſideration for what "came from the houſe of commons; and that he "ſhould take great care, that what was amiſs ſhould "be remedied."

However, his Majeſty, being probably apprehenſive that ſome of the diſcontented in that houſe might take this occaſion, to raiſe clamors, went, the fourteenth, to the houſe of peers, where he gave his aſſent to the following bills: 1. "To an act for "granting to their Majeſties certain additional im-"poſitions upon goods and merchandizes. 2. For "the review of the quarterly poll, granted to "their Majeſties, in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament. "3. For continuing certain acts therein mentioned, "and for charging ſeveral joint-ſtocks. 4. For pre-"venting ſuits againſt ſuch as acted for their Ma-"jeſties ſervice in the defenſe of this kingdom. "5. For reviving two former acts for repairing "the highways in the county of Hertford. 6. For "incouraging the apprehending of highway-men. "7. To prevent abuſes commited by the traders "in butter and cheeſe. 8. For raiſing the militia of "this kingdom for the year 1693. 9. For examin-"ing, taking and ſtating the public accounts. "10. For prohibiting the importation of all foreign "hair-buttons. 11. For delivering declarations to "priſoners. 12. Againſt pochers. 13. For regain-"ing, incouraging and ſetling the Greenland-trade. "14. For puniſhing mutineers and deſerters, &c. "15. To prevent malicious informations in the "court of King's-bench, and for the more eaſy "reverſal of outlawries in the ſame court. 16. "To prevent frauds by clandeſtine mortgages. "17. For reviving, continuing and explaining "ſeveral laws therein mentioned. 18. To make "pariſhioners of the church united, contributors "to the repair and ornaments of the church to "whom the union is made. 19. For regulating "the proceedings in the crown-office of the court "of King's-bench at Weſtminſter. 20. For the "better diſcovery of judgments in the courts of "King's-bench, common-pleas, and exchequer at "Weſtminſter. 21. For continuing the acts for "prohibiting all trade and commerce with France":

and to twenty private bills. This done, his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein;

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"He thanked them for the large ſupplies they "had given him this ſeſſion, which he promiſed "them he would take care to ſee effectually ap- "plied to ſuch ſervices as might be moſt for the ho- "nor and intereſt of England. He then recom- "mended to their care, both the peace and quiet "of the ſeveral counties, to which they were re- "turning; and the effectual levying of the ſup- "ply, they had ſo freely given, with the "greateſt equality, and the leaſt uneaſineſs to "the people that was poſſible. He told them the "poſture of affairs did neceſſarily require his pre- "ſenſe abroad, but that he ſhould take care to leave "ſuch a number of troops here, as might be ſuffici- "ent for the the ſecurity of the kingdom; aſ- "ſuring them farther, that as he ſhould continue "to expoſe his own perſon, for the good and ad- "vantage of theſe kingdoms, ſo his hearty and "ſincere indeavors ſhould never be wanting, in "any other kind, to make this a great and "flouriſhing nation." After which the parliament was prorogued, by his Majeſty's command, till the ſecond of May, next inſuing (1).

The parliament prorogued.

I return now to other affairs which happened out of parliament; and firſt to thoſe of the navy; where we find, that notwithſtanding the houſe of commons had taken ſo much pains to juſtify the conduct of admiral Ruſſel, he had loſt ground in his royal maſter's favor; for, on the 24th of January, his Majeſty was pleaſed to ſet him aſide, and to put the chief command of the fleet, into the hands of Henry Killigrew, eſq; ſir Ralph Delaval, and ſir Cloudeſly Shovel; and conſtituted them to be admiral by a joint-commiſſion (2). The 8th of February, the King was pleaſed to appoint George Rooke eſq; to be vice-admiral of the red; the lord John Berkley, vice-admiral of the blue, colonel Matthew Aylmer, rear-admiral of the red, and David Mitchell, eſq; rear-admiral of the blue.

Admiral Ruſſel ſet aſide.

Admirals appointed.

The 16th the King came to Portſmouth, as well as to ſee the men of war, at Spithead, and going aboard of vice-admiral Rook confered the honor of knighthood upon him.

The King goes to Portſmouth.

The 30th of the preceding month, the lord Charles Mohun was indicted for the murder of William Mountford, a player, on account of the celebrated actreſs, mrs. Bracegirdle; and was tried for it before the peers in parliament. A court was erected for that purpoſe, in Weſtminſter-hall, the marquis of Caermarthen, lord preſident of his Majeſty's council, being conſtituted lord high-ſteward of England pro hac vice. The trial laſted from twelve till near ſix, when the lords adjourned, and aſſembling again, the 5th of February, declared their opinion ſeriatim, and by a great majority acquitted the lord Mohun.

The lord Mohun tried and acquited.

The 23d of March, his Majeſty, being preparing to go to Holland, diſpoſed of ſeveral places; ſir John Trenchard was ſworn one of their Majeſties principal ſecretaries of ſtate, in the room of the earl of Nottingham (3). The cuſtody of the great-ſeal of England was commited to ſir John Sommers, and Edward Ward, of the Inner-temple, eſq; ſucceeded him as attorny-general. His Majeſty ordered, at the ſame time, a new commiſſion to paſs under the great-ſeal, conſtituting ſir John Lowther, Henry Prieſtman, eſq; the lord viſcount Falkland, Robert Auſten, eſq; ſir Robert Rich, Henry Killigrew, eſq; and ſir Ralph Delaval to be commiſſioners for executing the office of lord-high-admiral of England.

Places diſpoſed of.

All domeſtic affairs being thus ended, the laſt day of March, the King ſet ſail from Graveſend with a fair wind for Holland, being attended by ſeveral yachts, and a ſquadron of men of war, under the command of rear-admiral Mitchell, and was accompanied by the duke of Ormond, the earl of Eſſex, and other perſons of quality. He arrived in the Maeſe, on the ſecond of April, and, after a ſhort ſtay at the Hague and Loo, repaired to the army in Flanders, where we ſhall leave his Majeſty exerciſing his martial genius, and return to the fleet, which, notwithſtanding both the Engliſh and Dutch were not only numerous but pretty early ready, yet was, this year, very unſucceſsful.

The King goes to Holland.

The joint-admirals I have mentioned above were at firſt not reſtrained by any particular inſtructions, but ordered in general only to uſe their utmoſt indeavors to annoy the enemy and protect the trade: (4). But afterwards they received her Majeſty's commands, more particularly, from the lords of the admiralty, chiefly regarding the ſecurity of a great fleet of merchant-men, of near 400 ſail; Engliſh, Dutch, Hamburghers, &c. Much time was however ſpent, ſeveral councils of war held, and diverſe repreſentations made, before they could come to a reſolution what number of ſhips to appoint for the ſpecial convoy, and how far to accompany them with the whole fleet (5).

Proceedings of the main fleet.

Sir

(1) As it had been uſual in former ſeſſions of parliament, ſo in this, ſeveral bills miſcarried. The commons had paſſed one, "to inable their Majeſties to make grants, leaſes, and copies of offices, lands and hereditaments, parcel of their duchy "of Cornwall, or annexed to the ſame, and for confirmation of leaſes and grants already made;" to which the lords made ſome amendments, that were diſagreed to by the commons. The "bill for prohibiting the uſe of all lotteries", which had likewiſe paſſed the lower houſe, was ſtoped by the intereſt of the patentees of the royal-oak-lottery in the houſe of peers. The "bill for the preventing of the prophanation of the Lord's-day" lay neglected after the firſt reading, as did alſo the "bill for removing doubts, and preventing controverſies, concerning royal mines", after it had been ingroſſed. Nor was any progreſs made in the "bill for preventing the exportation of gold and ſilver, and the melting down the coin of this realm." but what was the moſt taken notice of, in prejudice to the King, was his refuſing the royal aſſent to the "bill for a triennial "parliament, &c.

(2) Biſhop Burnet ſays the two firſt were thought ſo inclinable to King James's intereſts, that it made ſome inſinuate, that the King was in the hands of thoſe, who intended to betray him to his enemies; for tho' no exception lay againſt Shovel, yet it was ſaid he was only put with the other two, to give ſome reputation to the commiſſion, and that he was one againſt two, ſo that he could neither hinder nor do any thing. The chief blame of this nomination was thrown on the earl of Nottingham. Hiſt. of his own times.

(3) It was generally believed, that as well the earl of Nottingham, as admiral Ruſſel, were diſplaced on account of the warm debates, that had paſſed, on their account in parliament, after the victory at ſea: King William expreſſing himſelf in relation to his officers, as Julius Cæſar had formerly done with reſpect to his wife: "That it was not enough for them to be faith- "ful, but that they muſt alſo be free from ſuſpicion." Hiſt. of King William, Vol. 2. p. 360.

(4) The number of Engliſh ſhips appointed for the body of the fleet were, ſix firſt-rates; ten ſecond-rates; twenty-eight third-rates, ſix fourth-rates; four fifth-rates, beſide fire-ſhips, a bomb-veſſel, and four hoſpitals: but when afterwards joined by the Dutch-ſquadron, and formed into a line of battle at St. Helens, the united fleet appeared to conſiſt of 102 ſail (not reckoning brigantines, bomb-veſſels, and hoſpital-ſhips) ſeventy-five of which were of the line of battle. Lediard's naval Hiſt. Vol. 2. p. 674.

The continuator of Rapin in French, makes the body of the confederate fleet to conſiſt of ninety-two ſhips of the line, beſide ſmall-craft, and not reckoning the ſquadron under ſir George Rook. B. 25. p. 181.

(5) It was determined that the whole fleet, together with the Mediterranean ſquadron, ſhould proceed together thirty leagues W. S. W. from Uſhant, and that when the admirals ſpread a blue flag at the main top-maſt-head, and fired three guns, ſir George Rooke, as well as the other convoys, ſhould go forward, according to the orders they had received from the lords of the admiralty: but being come to the height limited, on the 4th of June, they reſolved, in another council of war, to proceed with Sir George Rooke with the Smyrna convoy leave the main fleet.

Sir George Rooke, with twenty-three men of war, and the Turkey-fleet, left the main body of the fleet, on the 6th of June, and, ſteering for the Streights (1), left by the way the veſſels bound for Bilboa, Liſbon, St. Ubes, and other parts, under the convoy of two men of war: being come, the 15th, within ſixty leagues of Cape Vincent, he diſcovered part of the French fleet, which made him call a council of war, wherein it was reſolved, that the wind being freſh weſterly, and giving a fair opportunity to haſten their paſſage to Cadiz, the merchant-ſhips ſhould make the beſt of their way.

They diſcover the enemy's whole fleet.

Upon the diſcovery of the enemy's whole fleet, conſiſting of eighty ſail, commanded by monſ. de Tourville, ſir George Rooke being of opinion that he was too far advanced to think of a retreat, reſolved to puſh for it: but the Dutch vice-admiral Vandergoes bringing to, and letting him know, he choſe to avoid fighting, which he thought too hazardous, he likewiſe, brought to, and ſtood off with an eaſy ſail, to give what time he could to the heavy ſailers to work away to the windward (2). In the mean time he ſent away the Sheerneſs, to order the ſmall ſhips which were under the ſhoar, to get, in the night, into Faro, St. Lucar and Cadiz. About ſix in the evening, the French admiral and vice-admiral of the blue, which had the whole afternoon gained upon the ſquadron, notwithſtanding all the ſail they could make, came up with the leeward, and ſternmoſt of the confederate fleet. Theſe were three Dutch men of war, whereof two were commanded by the captains Schryver and Vander Poel, who for five hours together, bravely fought firſt eleven and then ſeven of the enemy's men of war. They had the good fortune to get clear off the firſt eleven; but were at laſt forced to give way to the ſuperior force, and were taken; whereupon the Dutch merchant-ſhips tacked, and ſtood in for the ſhoar, as the enemy did after them (3).

A great part of the Smyrna fleet deſtroy'd.

The admiral ſtood off all night with a preſſed ſail, having a freſh gale at N.N.W. and, the next morning, fifty-four of the merchant-ſhips, with ſeveral men of war, were about him, five of the enemy's ſhips being to leeward, and two to windward, which laſt kept ſight of him, 'till it was night. The day following, the admiral called the officers of the men of war, and merchant-men, on board him, that they might give him what account they could of the reſt of the fleet, and to adviſe what was beſt to be done for their ſecurity (4).

But before I proceed, it may not be improper to give the reader a copy of a letter, written by captain Littleton, commander of the Smirna-factor man of war, from Cadiz, as it contains ſome farther particulars which I have not found elſewhere:

The 26th of June, N. S. (ſays the captain) at nine in the morning, we arrived in the height of Cape St. Vincent. About two in the afternoon the headmoſt ſailors diſcovered the French, and about four in the afternoon both ſides ingaged, for ſome time. After this the headmoſt retired, and gave notice the ſame evening to the officer in chief: the ſeven and twentieth, in the morning, we arrived near Lagos, and our ſhips took a fire-ſhip of the enemy's, which reported, that there were at Lagos eighteen French men of war, with ſome fire-ſhips and merchant-men. About four in the morning, two ſhips blew up, or elſe the enemy ſet them on fire themſelves, within cannon-ſhot of the convoy. The commander alſo gave the ſignal of drawing into a line of battle; for till then we deſcried no more than nine and twenty ſail of the enemies. There was no wind ſtiring till ten o'clock; at which time a freſh gale aroſe, and then we diſcovered a greater number of ſhips. The convoy alſo ſteering ſouthward, perceived, on the one ſide, forty ſail, under three flags, beſide another ſquadron which indeavored to get between us and the coaſts: which the admiral obſerving, gave notice to the merchant-men to make all the ſail they could for the port of Cadiz, while the men of war kept the enemy in play. This deſign was obſerved by the French, who made all the ſail they could to intercept us. But the convoy having the wind, kept the enemy in play, 'till the evening, and gave time to the nimbleſt ſailers to get hither. Towards five in the afternoon, the eighteen French men of war abovementioned ingaged the convoy, and the fight laſted ſome part of the begining of the night, the reſt of the fleet not being able to come up with them: The 28th in the morning, the fight began with greater fury, ſo that about ſeven o'clock, our veſſels ſaw four ſhips on fire, not knowing whether French or Engliſh, and the guns were heard 'till nine, tho' the event be not yet known. It is to be feared we have loſt ſome men of war, and ſeveral merchants. This ingagement happened about ſix miles from cape St. Mary.

Sir George Rooke returns to Ireland,

The admiral, having diſpatched the Lark to England, to give an account of the diſaſter, ſailed to the Maderas to water, and in hopes of finding ſome of the ſcattered ſhips there: but finding only the Monk, he departed thence, the 27th of June, O. S. and arrived, the 3d of Auguſt, at Cork, in Ireland, and ſoon after joined, according to the orders he there found from the joint-admirals, the main fleet, with a detachment of the ſquadron, leaving the reſt at Kingſale with captain Fairborn (5).

And the fleet.

The

with the Mediterranean ſquadron twenty leagues farther, and then to return to the former ſtation, to take up the cruiſers, from whence it was judged adviſeable, to proceed to the rendezvous ten leagues N.W of Uſhant. Accordingly they left the Streights ſquadron, the ſixth, in the evening, and arrived, at the ſaid rendezvous, two days after. Ib.

It was given out, in thoſe times, by ſome, that they were inſtructed to keep company with the Mediterranean fleet, till they had certain intelligence where the French fleet was; which made their orders diſcretionary. Hiſtory of King William, Vol. 2. p. 301.

(1) It has been ſaid, that ſir George left the fleet with ſome reluctance, as perhaps foreſeeing the dauger they were going to be expoſed to; and (as biſhop Burnet juſtly obſerves) he was unhappy in that which, on any other occaſion, would have been his greateſt happineſs, viz. a fair and ſtrong gale of wind; ſo that no advice ſent after him could overtake him; nor did he meet with any ſhips at ſea, that could give him notice of his danger.

(2) The French either were, or feigned to be, at firſt, in as great a ſurprize as the confederates; for they ſtood away with ſeveral of their ſhips, and abandoning others, ſet fire to them; and tho' it may have been a decoy to draw them on; yet the great number of ſhips might very well make them apprehend it to be the whole body of the Engliſh and Dutch fleets coming upon them. Happy had it been that the whole fleet had accompanied them ſo far: for (as biſhop Burnet obſerves) ſuch an occaſion offered here, of deſtroying the whole naval force of France, as may not perhaps be found again, in an age.

(3) This was a great overſight of the French, for they thereby gave an opportunity, to the ſhips which were to the windward and a-head, to make their eſcape; which ſaved a great part of their fleet.

(4) Had the enemy purſued their advantage, with as much conduct and reſolution, as their deſign was projected, in all probability, hardly a ſhip of the confederate fleet would have eſcaped: for their admiral and vice-admiral of the blue were within ſhot of ſir George Rooke, when they tacked and ſtood into the ſhoar, after the Dutch, which as I have ſaid above ſaved the reſt of the fleet.

(5) After having given an account of this misfortune from our writers, let us now hear what the French ſay to it: "the "Engliſh and Dutch, ſays F. Daniel, ſuſtaining every day great loſſes from the French privateers, and more particularly by "thoſe of St. Malo, had reſolved to ſecure their Smyrna-fleet, from any ſuch inſults, by puting it under a convoy of two

The French go up the Streights.

The French admiral, in the mean time, proceeded up the Streights, and coming to Malaga, the twentieth of July, aſſur'd the governor, his deſign was only upon the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, unleſs the city attempted to defend them, in which caſe he ſhould bombard it. The governor anſwered him, that he ſhould protect theſe ſhips to the utmoſt of his power, having his maſter's orders ſo to do; upon which, the next day, he lay'd his Broad-ſides againſt four Dutch and one Engliſh ſhip in the Mole. He twice attempted to burn the Union frigate; but was bravely repulſed; however he continued his fire, with ſo much fury, that the maſters themſelves ſeing there was no poſſibility of ſaving the ſhips, after having done their utmoſt to defend them, ſunk them (1).

Some Engliſh and Dutch ſhips ſunk at Malaga.

The French return to Cadiz.

The French, upon this, returned to Cadiz, from whence they ſent their prizes (being about eighteen) to Toulon, with two men of war; and detach'd about fourteen ſhips with two bomb-veſſels to Gibraltar, where they approach'd ſo near the fortifications, that they were fired upon, as well from them, as the Mole and ſhips, the whole day, but without any return on their ſide. They ſent in a frigate to attack four merchant-ſhips, which were bound for Turky; but ſhe met with ſo warm a reception, that they were obliged to reſcue her with their boats; and the maſters of the merchant-men, in the end, followed the example of thoſe at Malaga, and, boring holes in their ſhip's ſides, ſunk them. Upon which the French retired to Lagos-bay (2). Here

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1693.

Some ſhips ſunk at Gibraltar.

The fleet ordered to St. Hellens.

But to return home, the winter-ſeaſon advancing, the admirals received orders, the five and twentieth of Auguſt, to come with the fleet to St. Helens; the ſoldiers were put aſhore at Portſmouth, and the three-deck'd ſhips ſent to Blackſtakes, excepting four which were to be refited at Portſmouth. The nineteenth of September, fifteen of the large Dutch ſhips, with two frigats, were ordered by his Majeſty to Holland; and the body of the fleet being now ſeparated, it was ordered, that one ſecond-rate, ſeventeen third-rates; ſeven fourth-rates; one fifth-rate; ſeven fire-ſhips, and two hoſpital-ſhips ſhould be the winter-guard.

St. Maloes bombarded.

About the middle of November, captain Bembow, with a ſquadron of men of war, bombarded St. Malo, for four days together; but without any great ſucceſs, having only deſtroyed ſome few houſes, and thrown down part of the town-wall (3).

" and twenty men of war. Advice of this precaution being carried to the French King, his Majeſty ordered the marſhal " de Tourville, to ſail with ſixty ſhips, which had been got together in the ports of the Ocean, to ſail towards the " coaſt of Portugal, and there way-lay the Smyrna-fleet. Their ſcouts diſcovered it few days afterwards; but as they " had information that the Engliſh were at ſea, with a fleet of ninety men of war, which had been ſeen on the " coaſt of France, the marſhal, who was not yet joined with the Toulon-ſquadron, conſiſting of thirty ſhips under " the count d' Eſtree's, thought fit to detach twenty of his beſt ſailors to take a view of the Engliſh fleet, and to " begin the attack, if they did not find them much more numerous than themſelves, whilſt he would back them " with the body of his fleet. They executed the orders given them, and took, at the begining of the attack, two men of war, " after which they burnt, ſunk or run aground upon the coaſt, ſixty merchant ſhips, ſeven and twenty were taken, and the " remainder, which could not make their way for England, took refuge at St. Lucar, Cadiz, and Gibraltar. The marquis of " Coetlogon, commander of a ſquadron, burnt four ſhips, very richly laden at Gibraltar, and carried off thirteen, tho' they " were defended by the batteries of the place, and an eſtacade. If a greater number of men of war had taken the ſame courſe " by night, asthe Sieurs de Belliſle-errard, de Chaland and de Henri, the Engliſh and Dutch would have ſuſtained a far greater " loſs, tho', as it was, it was very conſiderable, and amounted to, according to the relation of the captains of ſhips who were " taken, above twenty, de Larrey ſays five and twenty millions of Livres (that is, ſomething above a million ſterling.) Monſ. de Fourbin, who was in the action, gives us the following account of it, in his memoirs; " The King's (that is the French " King's) fleet, which conſiſted of ſeventy-five men of war, commanded by the marſhal de Tourville, ſet ſail for the Streights " of Gibraltar, where the count d' Eſtrees, who was coming with twenty other ſhips from Provence, was to join them. They " came to anchor in the road of Lagos, on the coaſt of Portugal. I (ſays my author) was ſent out for intelligence, with or- " ders ſtrictly to examine whatever came to my view; and particularly, if I ſaw a great number of ſhips, I was to make it my " buſineſs to diſcover whither they were merchant-men or the enemy's ſhips of force. I was accompanied with three other " captains, who were ſent on the ſame errand. We ſet ſail together, and in a few days we diſcovered a fleet of the enemy's mer- " chant-men. We found they conſiſted of upwards of a hundred and fifty ſail; and being well aſſured of our fact we returned " with all poſſible haſte to the fleet, to give the admiral an account of it, with aſſurance that it was a fleet of merchant-men, " and not men of war. Upon this advice the admiral made ready for ſailing, and ſtretch'd out, for what reaſon I am at a loſs " to ſay, before the wind, to ten leagues diſtance. (The reaſon is explained above.) The next day our whole fleet diſcovered " the enemy. The general gave orders for the chaſe; but the enemy took the advantage of the wind, which our working, " the night before, had made us loſe, and fled: inſomuch that we did them very little damage. We took, nevertheleſs, two " of their men of war of ſixty guns, and about thirty of their merchant-ſhips, which run aground, on the coaſt of Portugal, " were burnt. I, for my part, burnt three of them, and took a fourth. It was happy for them that they came off ſo well, " for had it not been for the falſe ſtep, I juſt now hinted at, their whole fleet would have been loſt." Monſieur de Forbin was not, it ſeems, let into the ſecret, nor did not obſerve the real neglect, which our fleet took the advantage of, and thereby eſcaped. We find a very wide difference in theſe two accounts, as to our loſs. How monſieur de Forbin comes to leſſen it ſo very much, I cannot conceive. He does not uſe to diminiſh the glory of actions he was concerned in: but I am ſorry I muſt ſay it, and the reader will find it by an account below, that F. Daniel, for this time, comes much nearer the truth.

(1) F. Daniel pretends that the French took ſix ſhips here.

(2) F. Daniel again gives the French an advantage which I do not find mention'd elſewhere; and ſays, monſ. de Coetlogon burnt four ſhips richly laden, and took thirteen more. Of Engliſh he could take none, there being no more in that harbor than the four which ſunk themſelves. The one Dutch ſhip which was there, follow'd the example of the Engliſh; beſide theſe, there were none but ſeven Danes and Swedes, and two Genoeſes, who were ſuffered to come peaceably out of the bay, and to go unmoleſted whither they thought fit.

Having given an account above of the ſeparation of ſir George Rooke's ſquadron, and the merchant-ſhips under his convoy, after they fell in with the French fleet, under the command of monſ. de Tourville, as likewiſe what happened to ſome of the ſhips afterwards; it may not be amiſs, to give a brief account of the total loſs occaſioned by this unlucky accident, and with what eye that accident was looked upon by the public. Notwithſtanding the French, by following the Dutch towards the ſhoar, gave a fair opportunity, as I have obſerved before, for a great part of our fleet to get off, yet the loſs was very conſiderable: for, (according to Kennet, and the hiſtory of King William) beſides four of the greateſt Smirna-ſhips, and one Dutch man of war, which monſieur Coetlogon burnt or ſunk at Gibraltar, and ſeven which he took, monſ. de Tourville, and the count d' Eſtrees, took two Dutch men of war, burnt a rich pinnace, and an Engliſh man of war, took nine and twenty merchant-men, and deſtroyed about fifty more.

The misfortune lay heavy upon the hearts of the merchants, and, indeed, upon the minds of all the people of England. The Turky-company, in particular, complain'd that the departure of the fleet (ſome ſhips having lain twelve ſome eighteen months for a convoy) was deſignedly put off, till the French fleet was in a readineſs, to wait for them; that the admirals had advice of part of their fleet being at ſea when they left the Turky convoy: and that the whole tranſaction, as it happen'd, was publicly talk'd of ſix weeks before at Marſeilles.

(3) There is all the reaſon in the world to believe, this attempt might have been more ſucceſsful, had it been puſh'd with vigor; for the French were ſo little apprehenſive of the attack, that the Engliſh having put out daniſh colors, they were deceived by them, and ſuffered them peaceably, not only to approach them near enough, with their ſquadrons, to do execution, but to range themſelves in proper order, without ſo much as firing upon them, either from the town or fort-royal. French authors ſay, the Engliſh did not make great uſe of their bombs, having ſo intire a dependance on their infernal machine, (a ſort of fire-ſhip, made after the model of thoſe, which the engineer Jambelli contriv'd to blow up the bridge built by Alexander of Parma, over the Scheld, at the ſiege of Parma, in 1585,) But this machine miſcarrying, or, at leaſt, doing little execution, the Engliſh were ſo diſcourag'd, that they gave over the attempt. Proceedings of a ſquadron in the Weſt-Indies.

We had this year, likewiſe, a ſquadron in the Weſt-Indies, conſiſting of two third-rates, ſix fourth-rates, three fifth-rates, one ſixth-rate, three fire-ſhips, a ſtore-ſhip, an hoſpital, and a bomb-veſſel, under the command of ſir Francis Wheeler; about 1,500 ſoldiers were order'd for the ſervice, and neceſſary tranſports were provided. Colonel Codrington, general of the Leeward-iſlands, had likewiſe orders to be aſſiſtant, with all the forces he could get together in thoſe parts. From ſo great a force, and ſuch diſpoſitions, there was reaſon to expect the obtaining of ſome conſiderable advantages in that part of the world; but the ſucceſs was, by no means, anſwerable to the coſt.

This ſquadron arrived, the firſt of March, in Carliſle-bay, at Barbadoes, and it was there determined to make an attempt firſt upon Martinica: and the two regiments of Fowlkes and Goodwin were join'd to about 800 land-men, provided at Barbadoes, commanded by the captains Salter and Butler. The ſquadron being arrived, at Cul de Sac-Marine, in Martinica, the firſt of April, it was agreed to land, at or near fort St. Peter, and that the fleet ſhould ſail, the next morning, to favor this attempt.

At Cul de Sac-Marine, they burnt and ruined all the houſes, and all the plantations thereabouts, ſome of which were conſiderable, and then the troops were put on board again. Two days after, ſir Francis made another deſcent, with fifteen hundred men, and, after he had burnt and deſtroyed ſeveral houſes and plantations, the troops came again to their ſhips. The next day, lieutenant-colonel Lillingſton was ſent aſhore with a conſiderable party, to ruin the country on this ſide Diamond-bay, which he did and returned. The ninth and tenth, colonel Codrington, with the forces of the Leeward-iſlands, and colonel Floyd's regiment, joined the fleet, and then they weigh'd anchor, and came before Fort-royal, and St. Peter's fort. Soon after, the troops were landed, ravaged the country, and ſome ſkirmiſhes happened between them, and the enemy, with various ſucceſs, in the neighborhood of St. Peter's (1).

Nothing happen'd farther worthy our notice during this unſucceſsful expedition, from which ſir Francis returned to England, about the middle of October, and at Portſmouth found a commiſſion appointing him rear-admiral of the red.

Campain in Flanders.

I return now to the King, whom we left in Flanders, at the head of the confederate army, which, at the begining of the campain, was much inferior to that of the French. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty had form'd great deſigns upon Brabant; but they were intirely broke, by King William's vigilance, in poſſeſſing himſelf of the camp at Park; (2) whereupon the French King ſent a ſtrong detachment, under the command of the Dauphin and the marſhal de Boufflers, into Germany, and return'd himſelf to Verſailles, without making any attempt whatſoever. The French army, under the duke of Luxemburg, lay incamp'd at Meldert, till the thirteenth of July, and then march'd to Heiliſheim, in their way towards the Maeſe. This gave King William an opportunity of ſending a ſtrong detachment, under the Prince of Wirtemberg, to force the lines, which the French had made to cover their conquered countries, from the Scheld to the Lys, and ſo to Ipres, Berg St. Vinox, and to the very ſea by Dunkirk. This was effectually perform'd the 18th of July, and the conſequence of it was raiſing great contributions, in the enemy's country: but this did not hinder the duke of Luxemburg, from laying ſiege to Huy, the next day, upon which, King William advanced nearer the country of Liege. In the mean time, count Tilly, general of the troops of that country, marching with a reinforcement to join his Majeſty, was ſurpriz'd, by Luxemburg, and obliged to retreat with the loſs of 200 men, and all his baggage.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1693.

When King William came to Tongres, he heard the diſagreeable news, that the caſtle of Huy had capitulated, the 23d, and, upon advice, that monſ. Luxemburg was drawing nearer Liege, which had abſolutely rejected the neutrality offer'd by the French, his Majeſty ſent ten batallions thither, who, after having met with ſeveral difficulties, got, at length, into the place. The French general made, hereupon, a feint of beſieging Liege, tho', it afterwards appear'd, his real deſign was to attack the confederate army, which now lay incamp'd at Neerheſpen (3).

His Majeſty was no ſooner inform'd of the enemy's approach, on the 28th, than he, together with the elector of Bavaria, and other chief officers, got on horſe-back, and finding it to be the vangard of their whole army, coming to attack him, in his camp, the troops were immediately ordered to arms, and to draw in battle, to expect the enemy (4). About ſix in the evening, the marſhal de Joyeuſe came up,

(1) This is the account given by our hiſtorians: but F. Daniel pretends, that the Engliſh, attempting to make themſelves maſters of Martinica, with ſixty ſail of ſhips, ſeventeen whereof were men of war, ſix frigats, and three fireſhips, and four thouſand two hundred men on board, made a deſcent in two places, and landed two thouſand men in each: that they actually made an attempt with theſe forces, and that monſ. Gabaret, who commanded in the iſle, monſieur Augier, the King's lieutenant, and monſ. de Blenac lieutenant-general of America, killed, upon theſe two occaſions, three hundred of the Engliſh-men, wounded four hundred more, and obliged them to re-imbark with the greateſt precipitation, without having done any damage to the iſle, farther than the burning of a few ſugar-works. De Larrey ſays, the Engliſh appeared off of Martinica with ſix and forty ſhips, the ſecond of April, and, having anchored in a place proper for a deſcent, landed ſixteen hundred men, who began to burn the adjacent country. Three days after, they were re-inforced by fourteen barks with militia, notwithſtanding which the French oblig'd them to retire. The twelfth, they appeared before Fort-royal, from whence being likewiſe repulſed, the ſeventeenth, they landed four or five thouſand men, about a league from fort St. Peter, the chief of the iſland, and advanced with a deſign of attacking it. The governor, monſ. Gabaret went to meet them, with a thouſand men only, but was oblig'd to give way to the ſuperior force of the Engliſh; but having received a re-inforcement, under the command of the count de Blenac, governor of all the French iſlands (in ſix Brigantines, one Saick, one Galliot and ſeventy ſloops) he obliged the Engliſh to retire, in their turns, leaving two hundred dead on the ſpot, beſide wounded and priſoners. The eighteenth they were again driven from a riſing ground, where they had lodged ſix hundred men, and they were afterwards worſted in diverſe incounters: ſo that after having remained five days before fort St. Peter, and one and twenty on the iſland, they re-imbarked and ſet ſail, with the loſs of five hundred killed, two hundred wounded, and a hundred priſoners. The French pretend, that, on their ſide, there were only ſix killed and two wounded, in the laſt action, and, in all, but ten killed, eight and thirty wounded, and two taken priſoners. They, likewiſe, ſay, the Engliſh left behind them a hundred barrels of powder and bullets, with good ſtore of arms and appurtenances to artillery.

(2) The continuator of Rapin, in French, unwilling to allow King William the honor of it, conceals this circumſtance, and tho' he allows the French army, which he computes at 120,000 men, to be greatly ſuperior to that of the confederates, and is oblig'd to confeſs, that the French King ſaw all his great projects would be fruſtrated, by King William's ſkill and vigilance, yet makes a myſtery of this particular motive for Lewis XIV's leaving his army.

(3) Monſ. de Luxemburg was incourag'd to this attempt, by the ſuperiority of his army, which now was computed to exceed that of the confederates by 35,000 men, occaſion'd, in part, by the large detachments King William had ſent to re-inforce the gariſons of Liege and Maeſtricht.

(4) The continuator of Rapin, in French, ſays, King William deſign'd to have quited his camp, the very next day, and have retaken the poſſeſſion of Park, which (continues the ſame author) if he had done, he had been out of danger of the enemy.

William & Mary. An' 1693.

with the left wing of the French horſe, and about eight their body of infantry, in four columns, with a good part of the artillery: but as it was then too late to begin an ingagement, monſ. de Luxemburg put it off till the next morning, and ſpent the night in making the neceſſary diſpoſitions of his army, and particularly in taking poſſeſſion of the villages of Landen, St. Gertruydenland, and Overwinden (1).

King William, in the mean time, order'd brigadier Ramſey, with his brigade, to the right of all his army, to guard ſome hedges and hollow ways, upon the right of the village of Lare; to the left of this village were planted the Brandenburg battalions, and more to the left thoſe of Hanover, the former commanded by Prince Charles of Brandenburg, a major-general, and the latter, by lieutenant-general Dumont, who had orders to defend the village of Neer-winden, which cover'd part of their camp, between the right wing of horſe, and their main body; and they were, afterwards, re-inforced by the firſt battalion of the firſt regiment of Engliſh-guards, and the ſecond battalion of Scotiſh-guards. Upon the left, at Neer-landen, his Majeſty order'd the firſt battalion of the royal-regiment, Churchill's, Selwin's, Trelawny's, Prince Frederick's battalion of Danes, and Fagel's, to poſſeſs that village, which cover'd the left of their body of foot. The ground was open between the villages of Neer-winden and Neer-landen; his Majeſty, therefore, order'd, in the night, a retrenchment to be made from the one to the other, and placed what remained of the body of the foot, within it. The dragoons, on the left, were ordered to the village of Dormal, to guard that paſs, on the brook of Beck, and, from thence, the left wing of horſe reach'd to Neer-landen, where it was cover'd by this brook, and from thence, turn'd off to the right, behind the body of foot (2).

The battle of Landen.

The 29th of July, by ſun-riſing, the French were drawn up within reach of the confederate cannon, which play'd ſucceſsfully upon them 'till towards ſix, when they made a motion to advance nearer towards the King's retrenchments. About eight, a ſtrong body of their troops attack'd the villages of Lare and Neer-winden, but were ſeveral times repuls'd, with conſiderable loſs, and here the duke of Berwick was taken priſoner by brigadier Churchill. This did not diſcourage them from trying their fortune againſt the confederates left wing at Neer-landen; but tho', at firſt, the firſt battalion of the royal-regiment, was oblig'd to retire, after a hot diſpute, yet being, ſoon after, incouraged by the King's preſenſe, and ſuſtained by other troops, the enemy, after about two hours warm action, were intirely repuls'd, and purſued to the very plain. Thus far, the ſucceſs of the day was viſible on the ſide of the confederates; and the French once ſeem'd to deſign drawing off: but monſ. de Luxemburg, having ſeveral brigades of freſh men, reſolved to gain the village of Neer-winden, at any rate, and order'd the Prince of Conti to make the attack. This he did with the beſt foot of the French army, with ſo much vigor, that the confederates, being already ſpent by the former action, were oblig'd to give way to the ſuperior force, and yield the avenues of Neer-winden to the enemy. The marſhal de Villeroy, who, in the mean time, was coming up with a ſtrong body of horſe, that way, was charg'd by the count d' Arco, general of the Bavarian cuiraſſiers, who, notwithſtanding a brave reſiſtance, drove them quite within their own foot. This ſucceſs put the confederates upon indeavoring to recover their poſt; but the French rallying, and being conſiderably re-inforced, they found it impoſſible, the Dutch and Scotiſh guards having ſpent all their ammunition. The King himſelf twice led the Engliſh battalions to the charge, with great courage and conduct, up to the right of the retrenchment, which was now flank'd, and in the power of the enemy, where they fought with great bravery.

William & Mary. An' 1693.

The French general finding, in the mean time, a convenient paſſage for the horſe, came himſelf, with the Prince of Conti, and the count de Marſin, with the carabineers, and ſeveral other regiments, into the plain of the confederate camp, while the marſhal de Joyeuſe paſs'd, with three brigades, between Neer-winden and Lare. The Prince of Conti, with the firſt horſe that came in, join'd with the King's horſe, and falling upon the horſe of Hanover, broke them, while part of the enemy's ſecond line of horſe, and the reſerve, came in upon their left, along the hedges of Lare. The marquis of Harcourt, with his detachment of twenty-two ſquadrons, came time enough from Huy, to have his ſhare of the day. He join'd with the ſecond line of the enemy's horſe, and the reſerve, and made his dragoons alight, to force the confederate foot out of Lare. The duke de Villeroy, in the mean time, came in upon the right of the retrenchments, which was bravely defended by the Engliſh foot, 'till being over-power'd by numbers, they were oblig'd to give way, and the French levell'd that part of the retrenchment, to make way for a body of horſe. The Hanover-horſe being thus broken, the reſt of the confederates right wing of horſe, being cut off from the body of the foot, was likewiſe over-power'd by the enemy, who now could charge them both in front and flank. The elector of Bavaria did what he could to ſtem this torrent of the enemy's horſe, and King William, on his ſide, omited nothing that could be done to remedy this diſorder, riding, in perſon, to the left, to bring up the Engliſh horſe, for the relief of the right wing: but the French had, by this time, got another body of horſe, commanded by the duke d' Elboeuf, within the confederates camp, and the duke de Montmorency, Luxemburg's ſon, fell upon the right flank of the Dutch horſe, and brought them into confuſion (3), before the Engliſh horſe, led on by the King, could come up, and form their ſquadron, ſo that they were forced to charge in the ſame order they rode up, notwithſtanding which, they did very good ſervice (4).

(1) The right of the confederate camp was at Heyliſheim and Wangan, upon the river Geet, and reach'd as far as Neer-winden, being cover'd with a ſmall brook, ſeveral hedges, and hollow ways. The elector of Bavaria had his quarters at Wangen; the body of foot, and left wing of the horſe reach'd from thence as far as Dormal, upon the brook of Beck, where Lewe remain'd in their rear.

(2) His Majeſty, who continued on horſe-back 'till late in the evening, order'd his coach then to be brought to the rear of Stanley's regiment, where he repos'd himſelf about two hours, and, early in the morning, ſent for one of his chaplains to him, into the coach, to perform a ſuitable devotion; before he enter'd into action.

(3) Some hiſtorians have attributed the whole misfortune of this day to a want of courage and reſolution in the Dutch horſe; and one of our nation (Salmon) carries it yet farther, and ſays, "the Dutch-horſe, as uſual, gave way," &c. but this favors ſomething of partiality.

(4) The King himſelf charged at the head of the lord Galway's regiment, which diſtinguiſhed itſelf, in a particular manner, on this occaſion. Colonel Wyndham, at the head of his own regiment, charged ſeveral times thro' and thro' the enemy's ſquadrons, and colonel Langſton was made priſoner; count Solmes, general of the Dutch infantry, had his leg ſhot off in this battle, and died of the wound, and the duke of Ormond, having charged at the head of one of Lumley's ſquadrons, received ſeveral wounds, his horſe was ſhot under him, and he himſelf was reſcued, by a gentleman of the French King's guards, from the hands of a villain who was going to ſtab him, but remained priſoner.

His

The confederate army defeated.

His Majeſty ſeeing, however, the battle loſt, ordered the infantry to retreat to Dormal, upon the brook of Beck, which poſt the dragoons of the left-wing had kept, not having been in any action; and finding that the enemy was ſurrounding him on every ſide, he ordered the regiments of Wyndham, Lumley, and Galway, to cover his retreat, over the bridge at Neer-heſpen, which he gained, not without great difficulty. Having ſecured this poſt, his Majeſty gave his direction to almoſt every body of troops in particular, for their greater ſafety, in retreating, and having been an eye-witneſs of every thing, he retreated himſelf to the eminences of Tillemont, where he halted, till he was joined by the elector of Bavaria, with part of the right-wing, which he had rallied. Nothing was, however, now ſeen in the confederates camp but confuſion and diſorder, and all that could not reach the paſſes for a retreat, being preſſed by the enemy, were reduced to the neceſſity of flinging themſelves into the river, where many were drowned, and the earl of Athlone narrowly eſcaped the ſame fate. Lieutenant-general Talmaſh ſhewed a great deal of prudence, as well as bravery, in bringing off the Engliſh foot, and his indeavors were ſucceſsful.

Loſs on both ſides.

The confederates loſt ſixty pieces of cannon, and nine mortars; to which the continuator of Rapin, in French, adds ſixty ſtandards, twenty-two colors, and twelve pair of kettle-drums. And tho' their baggage, which had been ſent away to Lewe, the night before, eſcaped the enemy, it was moſtly plundered by their own fugitive ſoldiers. As for the number of men loſt in this action, the confederates owned but 6000 killed, wounded, or taken priſoners; and the French could not deny but that they had above 2000 officers killed and wounded, how great muſt then the number of their private ſoldiers have been. The confederates, indeed, pretended the French had loſt 18000 men in the battle, but this ſeems to be carrying the matter too far: however, it was the general opinion, that 24,000 were killed and wounded on both ſides, and that the loſs on each ſide was pretty equal. The French ſuffered moſt at firſt, and the confederates in the concluſion. That the loſs of the enemy muſt have been very conſiderable, is apparent, becauſe Luxemburg, did not purſue his victory, but lay, for above a fortnight at Waren, without attempting any thing (1).

Charleroy ſurrendered to the French.

After this delay, having been re-inforced with ſome troops from the ſea-coaſts, and a great detachment, under monſ. de Boufflers, from the Rhine, the French, at length, ſat down before Charleroy, which they attacked with great fury; but the gariſon made ſo ſtout a reſiſtance, that tho' they had little or no proſpect of relief, yet they held out twenty-ſix days, from the opening of the trenches, andthe n made an honorable capitulation.

Campain in Piedmont;

In Piedmont, the allies were yet more unfortunate, and were intirely defeated at Marſiglia, where duke Schomberg commanded the troops in Engliſh pay, and the duke of Savoy, and Prince Eugene, the reſt of the army. The French general, Catinat, obtained this victory chiefly by means of a new method never till then uſed in war, viz. by making his ſoldiers ſcrew their bayonets, over the barrels of their pieces, and charge with them loaded; for the confederate-generals obſerving them to advance, with their bayonets at the end of their muskets, concluded they were diſcharged; but ſoon after, a volley of ſhot being poured in upon their troops, unexpectedly, they were thrown into confuſion; and, at length, after a gallant reſiſtance, were forced to abandon the field of battle, and retire with the loſs of the greateſt part of their cannon, and ſeven or 8000 men; duke Schomberg himſelf being mortally wounded, and taken priſoner. In this manner were bayonets brought into uſe, and pikes laid aſide, by degrees, all over Europe. WILLIMM & MARY. AN' 1693.

In Catalonia;

In Catalonia, the French were not leſs ſucceſsful, where they begun the campain, the 29th of May, by inveſting Roſes, both by ſea and land, and carried the ſiege of it on, with ſuch diligence, that they made themſelves maſters of the place, within the ſpace of a week.

And in Germany.

The French were, likewiſe, too forward for the Germans, on the Rhine, which river they paſſed, about the middle of May, at Philipſburg, and without any oppoſition, inveſted the city of Heidelberg. The 21ſt of the ſame month, they made themſelves maſters of the ſuburbs, without any great reſiſtance, and their grenadiers drove the beſieg'd with ſo much fury to the gates of the caſtle, that they left above 600 of their ſoldiers without, who were all put to the ſword; and the 2d of June, the gariſon, conſiſting of 1200 men, ſurrendered the place to the French, who ſet fire both to the city and the caſtle. They commited ſeveral other barbarities in the Palatinate, not ſparing even the ſacred repoſitories of the aſhes of the deceaſed electors. They afterwards attempted to attack Prince Lewis of Baden; but tho' the Dauphin afterwards joined their army, which was then computed to conſiſt of near ſeventy thouſand men, they found the Imperial army ſo well poſted, that they repaſſed the Neckar, the firſt attempt of the paſſage of which river had coſt them 1,000 men. The Dauphin having put a gariſon into Stutgard, and ſent detachments into Flanders and Piedmont, returned, in the month of Auguſt, to Verſailles. Notwithſtanding the French had this ſucceſs, every where, they had ſo dangerous and terrible an enemy to incounter at home, I mean famine, that his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty found himſelf under a neceſſity of making overtures for a peace, by ſeveral channels, which however were all rejected. But to return to England.

Famine in France.

The French King ſues for a peace.

Juſtices of Ireland appointed.

The 10th of July, the lord Capel, ſir Cyril Wych, and William Duncomb, eſq; ſet out for Ireland, and being appointed lord-juſtices of that kingdom, in the room of the lord viſcount Sydney, who was recalled and made maſter-general of the ordnance. The ſame month, the lord Bellamont, and James Hamilton, eſq; petitioned her Majeſty, that a ſtop might be put to the paſſing of pardons to the lord Coningſby, and ſir Charles Porter, until the petitioners, and many others of their Majeſties ſubjects in Ireland, might be permited to produce their proofs againſt them, in which petition the ſaid lord Coningſby and ſir Charles Porter joined iſſue. The 17th of Auguſt, the petitioners exhibited ſeveral accuſations, but declining to be heard, to make good the ſame, and the accuſed offering to produce proof of their innocency, the Queen ordered the ſaid petitions and charge to be diſmiſſed.

A proclamation againſt the exportation of corn.

He narrowly eſcaped three wounds by muſket-balls, one of which paſſed thro' his peruke, another thro' the ſleeve of his coat, and a third carried off the knot of his ſcarf, and left a ſmall contuſion on his ſide. her enemies might be ſupplied, but her own ſubjects expoſed to want, her Majeſty, on the 19th of October, cauſed a proclamation to be iſſued, for preventing the ſaid exportation of corn abroad, and enhancing the price of it at home.

King William returns to England.

King William, having left the command of the confederate army in Flanders, to the elector of Bavaria (1), went firſt to Loo, and arrived at the Hague the 11th of October, N.S. He there repreſented to the States-general, the neceſſity of increaſing their forces both by ſea and land; upon which, on the 14th, they agreed to the raiſing of 15,000 men, for augmenting their land-forces; and likewiſe to the addition of a conſiderable number of ſhips to their navy, for which his Majeſty thanked them in their aſſembly. Having been long detained by contrary winds, his Majeſty, at length, imbarked the 28th of October, O. S. landed at Harwich the 29th, and arrived the next day at Kenſington.

Mr. Ruſſel made admiral again.

One of the firſt things, which the King did, after his return, was to ſhew his diſlike of the proceedings of the fleet, the laſt ſummer, by declaring in council, the 6th of November, that he had appointed the right honorable Edward Ruſſel, eſq; to be admiral of the fleet.

The parliament meets.

The 17th of November, the parliament met, purſuant to their prorogation, when the King told them:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"He was always glad to meet them there, and "he could heartily wiſh, that their common ſatiſ- "faction were not leſſened at preſent, by reflecting "upon the diſadvantage they had received, this "year, at land, and the miſcarriages in the affairs "at ſea: that he thought it evident, that the for- "mer was only occaſioned by the ſuperiority of the "enemy's number in all places: that for what re- "lated to the latter, which had brought ſo great a "diſgrace to the nation, he had reſented it extream- "ly; and as he would take care that thoſe who "had not done their duty ſhould be puniſhed, ſo "he was reſolved to uſe his indeavors, that the "power at ſea might be rightly managed for "the future: and, ſaid he, it well deſerves our "conſideration, whether we are not defective both "in the number of our ſhiping, and in proper "ports to the Weſtward, for the better annoying "our enemies, and protecting our trade, which is "ſo eſſential to the welfare of the nation.

"I am, added he, very ſenſible of the good "affection wherewith you have always aſſiſted me, "to ſupport the charges of this war, which have "been very great, and yet I am perſuaded, that "the experience of this ſummer is ſufficient to con- "vince us all, that to arrive to a good end of it, "there will be a neceſſity to increaſe our forces, "both by ſea and land, the next year. Our allies "have reſolved to add to theirs: and I will not "doubt, but you will have ſuch regard to the "preſent exigency, as that you will give me a ſuit- "able ſupply to inable me to do the like.

"He, therefore, earneſtly recommended to the "houſe of commons, to take ſuch timely reſoluti- "ons, as that their ſupplies might be effectual, and "his preparations ſo forward, as would be neceſſary "both for the ſecurity and honor of the nation."

Miſcarriages of the fleet inquired into.

The commons, in anſwer to this ſpeech, unanimouſly reſolved; "that they would ſupport their "Majeſties and their government:" but the firſt thing they did was to inquire into the miſcarriages of the fleet, the laſt ſummer, and to conſider how beſt to preſerve the trade of the nation. Some time was ſpent in examining the inſtructions and orders give to the fleet (which were thought weakly drawn, ambiguous and defective, but worſe executed) the number of the ſhips for the line of battle, and of the convoys and cruiſers, the admirals who commanded both, and the reſults of the ſeveral councils of war held by them; great exceptions were taken to the many delays, by which it ſeemed a train was laid, that they ſhould not get out of our ports, 'till the French were ready to lay wait for them. They were accuſed of not having uſed any zeal or diligence in geting information, concerning the French fleet; but had, in that important article, truſted too eaſily to general and uncertain reports. Againſt which they chiefly ſcreened themſelves, by alleging they had punctually obeyed their orders. After all which, on the 17th of November, the commons reſolved: "it was the opinion of that houſe, "that there had been a notorious and treacherous "miſmanagement in the miſcarriage of the Smyrna "fleet." their next inquiry was: why the Streights-fleet was ſtoped, till the main fleet went out? and then, why the main fleet did not convoy ſir George Rooke's ſquadron, and the merchant-ſhips, out of danger of the French fleet: and, it being alleged, That the main fleet was not ſufficiently victualled, the commons examined the ſtate of their ſtores at ſailing from Spithead, and thereupon reſolved, on the 27th of November, that there were ſufficient beer and other ſtores, on board the main fleet, when ſir George Rooke ſeparated, to have ſerved them, 'till they had convoyed his ſquadron and the merchant-ſhips, out of danger of the Breſt-fleet. But tho' the miſcarriage was very notorious, they knew not where to fix the particular blame: for, on the 29th, the queſtion being put, that it did appear to that houſe, that the admirals that commanded the fleet the laſt ſummer, had, on the 11th of May laſt, information that part of the Breſt-fleet was going out to ſea, it paſſed in the negative: and, on the 6th of December, another queſtion being put, that the admirals, by not ſending into Breſt, for intelligence, before they left the Streight's ſquadron, were guilty of a high breach of truſt that was repoſed in them, to the great loſs and diſhonor of the nation; it was likewiſe carried in the negative. Before this inquiry in parliament, the admirals had been examined before the council-board; but nothing could be made appear to the prejudice of their honor, only ſome flying reports, which gave occaſion to this order of council, on the 25th of October, "Whereas a report has been raiſed and ſpread "by Henry Killigrew, eſq; ſir Ralph Delaval, and "ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, knights, admirals of their "Majeſties fleet, that the honorable the lord viſ- "count Falkland, one of the lords of their Majeſties "moſt honorable privy-council, did, upon read- "ing a paper at the board, ſtifle ſomething that "was material to their juſtification. The lords of "the council having conſidered of, and examined "into the matter, are ſatisfied, and do declare, that "the ſaid report is falſe and ſcandalous; altho' "upon the ſaid examination it did alſo appear, that "ſomething happened which might miſlead the "admirals into that error; and it is ordered in coun- "cil, that this be printed and publiſhed in the "Gazet."

Bill for frequent parliaments.

The 28th of November, "a bill for the more fre- "quent election of parliaments" was rejected by the commons, after the third reading; whereupon another bill, to the ſame purpoſe, was ſent down to them by the lords, which being read, the third time, was likewiſe rejected.

(1) Before his Majeſty left the army, he thought it neceſſary to ſhew an example of ſeverity. Some of the troops having behaved ill at Neer-winden, matters were ſtrictly examined into by his orders. Three regiments of cavalry were found to have been wanting in their duty, and three troopers of each were ſhot, for an example to the reſt. Contin. of Rapin. in French, B. 25. p. 185.

A ſupply granted.

The commons having unanimouſly voted a ſupply for the vigorous proſecution of the war, reſolved, on the 25th of the ſame month; "that the ſum of "500,000 l. be raiſed towards the diſcharging the "wages due to the ſea-men; and that a farther "ſum of two millions be granted to their Majeſties "in full for the maintenance of the fleet, including "the ordnance, by reaſon of the revenue now "falling ſhort." With regard to the army, the commons, after having examined the offenſive treaties and alliances, which his Majeſty was under with the confederates, and the proportions of forces, which the confederates were obliged to make for the carrying on this preſent war, reſolved, on the 20th of November, unanimouſly; "that the number of "the land-forces, in their Majeſties pay, be in-"creaſed, by the raiſing of ſix new regiments of "Engliſh horſe, four new regiments of Engliſh "dragoons, and fifteen new regiments of Engliſh "foot, to be commanded by officers who were his "Majeſty's natural born ſubjects. That 83,121 "men, including commiſſion and non-commiſſion "officers, were neceſſary for the ſervice of the year "1694, to be imployed in England and beyond the "ſeas, and that the ſum of 2,530,590 l. be grant-"ed, to the maintenance of the land-forces, viz. "210,773 l. for the office of ordnance, 31,808 l. "for the pay of the general officers; 11,060 l. for "levy-mony; 40,808 l. for the tranſports; "147,000 l. for hoſpitals and contingences, and "1,990,781 l. for the pay of the horſe, dragoons and "foot:" ſo that the whole ſupply hitherto granted for the inſuing year, amounted to 4,530,590 l. excluſive of the 500,000 l. granted for payment of the arrears of ſea-mens wages.

Deficiencies;

Beſide theſe large ſupplies, it was found, that the ſum of 118,000 l. was wanting to compleat the ſum of one million granted to their Majeſties by an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of the preſent parliament, for ſecuring recompences to ſuch perſon as ſhould "voluntarily advance the ſaid million:" and likewiſe, that the ſum of 293,692 l. was wanting to compleat the ſum of 300,000 l. granted by a late act, "for the review of the quarterly-poll." So that with the ſum for arrears of ſeamen, and theſe deficiencies, the whole ſum, 'till now granted in this ſeſſion, was 4,942,182 l. The firſt of which defective funds, the commons reſolved, the 9th of December, to make good, "by inlarging the time for perſons "to pay in the reſt of the ſum of one million;" "and that towards the raiſing of mony for the "maintenance of the fleet, any perſons be at li-"berty to add a ſecond life to the life that was, "or ſhould be, nominated upon the act for ſecuring "the recompenſe before mentioned, upon paying "the ſum of 35 l. for every 100 l. paid in, or to be "paid in, upon the ſaid act, and for adding a third "life, the ſum of 20 l. for every the ſaid 100 l. and "ſo for any greater proportion."

Ways and means.

Towards raiſing the two millions granted for the fleet, it was reſolved, on the 21ſt of December; "that the ſum of one million be charged on land; "and that a duty of 3 d. per gallon be laid upon all "foreign ſalt imported; and a duty of one and an "half penny per gallon, upon all Engliſh ſalt, "except all ſalt imployed in the curing of fiſh and "fleſh to be exported."

The commons being pretty much at a loſs how to levy the reſt of the large ſums they had already granted, reſolved, on the 26th, "that a farther "ſum of one million be charged upon land"; and, on the 29th, "that an aid, not exceeding 4 s. in the "pound, be granted to their Majeſties, by charging "each reſpective county with double the ſum return-"ed, charged by an act made in the firſt year of "their Majeſties reign, for a grant of 2 s. in the "pound." But as the committee of the whole houſe, appointed to draw up the bill, met with great difficulties in framing it after that manner; the houſe gave them power to alter the ſame, and to frame it into a bill of 4 s. per pound, to which the King gave the royal aſſent, on the 25th of January.

Affairs of the Eaſt-India-compa-ny.

The Eaſt-India-company having obtained a new charter, on the 11th of November, whereby they were impowered to raiſe the ſum of 744,000 l. to be added to their general joint-ſtock, and ſubſcribed by their Majeſties natural-born ſubjects, naturalized or indenized, the ſubſcription of each perſon not exceeding 10,000 l. ſeveral merchants, and others, in and about the city of London, on the 7th of December, petitioned the commons for erecting a new Eaſt-India-company. The houſe, thereupon, examined the charters of the Eaſt-India-company, the book of the ſubſcriptions, the ſtate of their preſent ſtock, and the petition above mentioned; and, after mature deliberation, they reſolved "; That all "the ſubjects of England have equal right to trade "to the Eaſt-Indies, unleſs prohibited by act of "parliament;" which gave the firſt hint to the forming of a new Eaſt-India-company by ſtatute.

A blaſphe-mous pam-phlet cenſu-red.

The 16th of December, a complaint having been made to the commons, of a blaſphemous pamphlet, intitled; "a dialogue concerning the Deity; and a "brief, but clear, confutation of the doctrine of "the TRINITY", which had been diſperſed, and ſent incloſed, under covers, directed to ſeveral members of that houſe; it was thereupon reſolved, "that the ſaid pamphlet ſhould be burnt by the "hands of the common hang-man, and an inquiry "made after the author, printer, and publiſher "of it."

Lord Con-ingſby and ſir C. Porter im-peached.

The 29th of the ſame month, the earl of Bellamont preſented to the lower-houſe, articles of impeachment of high-treaſon, and other crimes and miſdeameanors, againſt the lord Coningſby and ſir Charles Porter, late lords-juſtices of Ireland, the conſideration of which, together with the examination of witneſſes, took up a great deal of their time. At length, on the 29th of January, the houſe agreed to this reſolution; "that conſider-"ing the ſtate of affairs in Ireland, at that time, "they did not think fit to ground an impeachment "againſt the ſaid lord Coningſby and ſir Charles "Porter, for the matters charged upon them."

I ſhall now leave the parliament for a while, to mention ſome few tranſactions out of parliament.

Places diſ-poſed of.

The 22d of November, the lord viſcount Sydney, maſter of the ordnance, was made colonel of the firſt regiment of foot-guards, in the room of the late duke of Schomberg, and, at the ſame time, the lord viſcount Galway was appointed to command their Majeſties forces in Piedmont, in the quality of lieutenant-general, being, likewiſe, conſtituted their Majeſties envoy extraordinary to the duke of Savoy. The 30th, the duke of St. Albans was made captain of their Majeſties band of penſioners, vacant by the death of the lord Lovelace.

William Sancroft born in this pariſh; afterwards by the providence of God, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and at laſt deprived of all that he could not keep with a good conſcience, returned hither, to end his life, where he began it, and profeſſeth here, at the foot of his tomb; "that as he naked came forth, "ſo he naked muſt return: the lord giveth, and "the Lord hath taken away: as the lord pleaſeth, "ſo things come to paſs: bleſſed be the name of the "Lord:" and over his effigies was written this text, St. Matthew, xxiv. 27. Mr. Germain proſecuted for adultery.

About this time the town was entertained by a remarkable trial, in Weſtminſter-hall. The duke of Norfolk, impatiently bearing the unlawful commerce, which, for many years paſt, mr. Germain had held with his ducheſs, had, in January before, lodged a bill of divorce, in the houſe of peers; but their lordſhips being unwilling to proceed in that affair, before there were ſome proofs of the fact in the common-law, his grace, thereupon, brought an action of adultery againſt mr. Germain, before the court of King's-bench, and upon a full hearing of many obſcene evidences, the jury found for the plaintiff, and allowed his grace 100 marks damages, with coſt of ſuit.

Prince Lewis of Baden in England.

The laſt day of the year, Prince Lewis of Baden came to England, and landing at Graveſend, went from thence to Whitehall, where an apartment was provided for his reception. During the time of his ſtay here, which was till the 14th of February, his Highneſs was ſplendidly entertained, and diverted not only by his Majeſty, but by ſeveral of the nobility, and, in a particular manner, by the duke of Ormond.

An' 1694. Acts paſſed.

The 25th of January, the King came to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to "an act for "raiſing 4 s. in the pound upon lands; to an act "for the importation of Italian thrown-ſilk, and "to ſome others of leſs moment.

"A bill concerning free and impartial proceedings "in parliament, by incapacitating the members "to have places in the government," paſſed both houſes; but the King refuſing to give it the royal ſanction, the commons took it ſo ill, that having, on the 26th of January, conſidered the ſtate of the nation, they reſolved, "that whoever "adviſed the King not to give the royal aſſent to "that act, was an enemy to their Majeſties and "the kingdom". They alſo appointed a committee to draw up a repreſentation, in which they laid before his Majeſty:

William & Mary. An' 1694.

Repreſentation of the commons to his Majeſty.

"That the uſage in parliament, in all times, had "been that what bills had been agreed to by both "houſes, for the redreſs of grievances, or other "public good, had, when tendered to the throne, "obtained the royal aſſent: and that there were "very few inſtances, in former reigns, where ſuch "aſſent, in ſuch caſes, had not been given; and "thoſe attended with great inconveniences to "the crown of England; eſpecially where the ſame "had been with-held by inſinuations of particular "perſons without the advice of the privy-council, "thereby creating great diſſatisfaction and jealouſies "in the minds of the people. That the commons, "therefore, out of their ſincere deſire of the welfare of his Majeſty and his government, could "not without grief of heart reflect, that ſince his "Majeſty's acceſſion to the crown, ſeveral public "bills, made by advice of both houſes of parliament, had not obtained the royal aſſent, and, "in particular, one bill, intitled, an act touching "free and impartial proceedings in parliament, "which was to redreſs a grievance, and take off a "ſcandal, relating to the proceedings of the commons in parliament, after they had freely voted "great ſupplies for the public occaſions, which they "could impute to no other cauſe than the inſinuations of particular perſons, who took upon them, for "their own particular ends, to adviſe his Majeſty, "contrary to the advice of parliament; and, therefore could not but look on ſuch as enemies to his "Majeſty and his kingdoms; upon which conſideration, they humbly prayed, that, for the future, his Majeſty would be pleaſed to hearken to "the advice of his parliament, and not to the "ſecret advices of particular perſons, who might "have private intereſts of their own, ſeparate "from the true intereſt of his Majeſty and his "people.

To this repreſentation, the King anſwered, the 29th of January:

The King's anſwer.

"That he was very ſenſible of the good affecti- "ons the commons had expreſſed towards him, "upon many occaſions, and of the zeal they had "ſhewn for the common intereſt: that no Prince "ever had a higher eſteem for the conſtitution of the "Engliſh government than himſelf: and that he "ſhould ever have a great regard to the advice of "parliaments; that he was perſuaded, nothing "could ſo much conduce to the happineſs and welfare of this kingdom, as an intire confidence, "between the King and people: and that he ſhould "look upon ſuch perſons to be his enemies, who "ſhould adviſe any thing that might leſſen "it."

The firſt of February, the commons took his Majeſty's anſwer into conſideration, and the queſtion being propounded, "that an humble addreſs be "made to his Majeſty for a farther anſwer", it paſſed in the negative.

The Million lottery.

At this time, the humor of the nation run very much upon lotteries; ſome members of the houſe of commons, therefore, to give into it, contrived a method to raiſe, in that manner, a million ſterling, for the government. This deſign having been propos'd to, and approved by the houſe, it was reſolved, on the 6th of February; firſt, "That a

He was a very wiſe, but withal a very plain and ſincere man; and uncapable of any politic arts "to curry favor with Princes. Laſtly, he wanted not tenderneſs toward the Diſſenters, but he had not that latitude of principle "to break down what he conſcienciouſly believed to be the mounds and fenſes of the church, in order to let in the ſtragling "ſheep; which, he thought, might, as well have entered at the right door. WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1694.

" fund of 140,000 l. per annum, be raiſed and veſted " in their Majeſties, for the term of ſixteen years, " for recompenſing ſuch perſons as ſhould advance " the ſum of one million. Secondly, That the impo- " ſitions lately reſolved by the houſe, to be laid up- " on ſalt, be part of the ſaid fund. Thirdly, That " towards the farther anſwering of the ſaid " 140,000 l. per annum, one moiety of the duties " of exciſe, granted to their Majeſties, by an act " made in the ſecond year of their Majeſties reign, " be granted and continued to their Majeſties, after " the mony charged upon the ſaid duties ſhould " be ſatisfied: and Fourthly, that a bill be brought " in upon the ſaid reſolutions."

Acts paſſed.

The 18th of February, the King came to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to an " act to " ſupply the deficiency of the mony raiſed by a " former annuity-act;" and to another, to " pre- " vent diſputes and controverſies concerning royal " mines."

The commiſſioners whom the commons had appointed to take the public accounts, being order'd to lay before the houſe, " an account of what " mony had been paid for ſecret ſervice, and to " members of parliament, out of the public " revenue," upon examination of the whole matter, it was reſolved, on the 17th of February; " That " the lord Falkland, being a member of that " houſe, by begging and receiving 2000 l. from " his Majeſty, contrary to the ordinary method of " iſſuing and beſtowing the King's mony, was " guilty of a high miſdemeanor and breach of " truſt; and that he be commited to the Tower " of London, during the pleaſure of the houſe."

Lord Falkland call'd to account for bribery.

The 19th, the lord Falkland preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, ſeting forth, " that " he was highly ſenſible of their diſpleaſure, and " that a longer continuance of his confinement " would be extremely prejudicial to him;" whereupon it was order'd that he ſhould be diſcharg'd from his impriſonment in the Tower.

More acts paſs'd.

The 23d of March, the King came again to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent, to an " act for granting to their Majeſties certain duties " upon ſalt, and upon beer, ale, and other liquors; " another for relief of the orphans, and other cre- " ditors of the city of London; another for the " more effectual relief of poor priſoners," and to ſeveral other, as well private as public bills; another act alſo paſs'd this ſeſſion, " for raiſing " 1,500,000l. by voluntary ſubſcriptions; the " ſubſcribers to be incorporated, and to erect a " Bank, and were to receive recompences out of " certain duties ariſing from tonage and poun- " dage, and from beer and ale, which was the " foundation of the Bank of England. After this his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which, " he earneſtly recommended to them the diſpatch " of thoſe important affairs, which they had under " their deliberation; and the diſcharging of the " debt for the tranſport-ſhips."

The Bank of England erected.

The King's ſpeech.

Notwithſtanding the funds I have already mention'd, the houſe of commons laid, the 22d of February, a " duty upon leather; the 28th, another " upon ſoap, and, on ſubſequent days, others on " wine, and the tonage of all ſhips and veſſels." All theſe impoſitions coming yet ſhort of anſwering the mony to be levied within this year, they reſolved to grant " a poll-tax to their Majeſties, as " alſo a duty upon all hackney-coaches and ſtage- " coaches, and laſtly upon paper and parchment."

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1694.

The ſixteenth of April, the King, being come to the houſe of lords, gave the royal ſanction, to an " act for raiſing mony by a poll-tax; another " for puniſhing mutineers in the army, &c. another " for the exportation of Iron, Copper, and Mundick- " metal; another for the importation of Salt-petre," and to five private acts. The 25th of the ſame month, the King gave his aſſent to an " act for inabling " their Majeſties to make grants and leaſes in the " du chy of Cornwal; another for raiſing the mili- " tia of this kingdom; another for granting to " their Majeſties ſeveral duties upon tonage of ſhips, " &c. and another for granting a tax upon vel- " lom, parchment and paper; another for licenſing " and regulating hackney and ſtage-coaches; ano- " ther for appointing commiſſioners to take and " ſtate the public accounts; another for building " good and defenſible ſhips; another for the better " diſciplining of their Majeſties navy," and to ſeveral private bills (1).

Other acts paſs'd.

After this, " his Majeſty thank'd both houſes, " for the great proofs they had given him of their " affections, this ſeſſion; and having acquainted " them with the neceſſity of his being abſent for " ſome time, out of the kingdom," he put an end to this long ſeſſion of parliament, by proroguing it the 18th of September.

The parliament prorogued.

During this winter, the French King again made ſeveral private overtures towards a peace, at different courts, by means of the miniſters of neutral Princes. Great diligence was, likewiſe, uſed to draw off ſeveral Princes from the grand-alliance, particularly the King of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the elector of Bavaria: but as all theſe private intrigues and efforts of France came to nothing, I ſhall not detain the reader by particularizing them.

France ſeeks a peace.

The 27th of January, mr. Charles Butler, brother of the duke of Ormond, was created a baron of England, and earl of Arran in Ireland. Three weeks after, Peregrine Bertie, eſq; was made vice-chamberlain to his Majeſty, in the place of ſir John Lowther, who reſigned the 4th of March. The earl of Shrewſbury was, once more, made one of the principal-ſecretaries of ſtate, and the 25th of April, the King confered the title of duke upon him. The ſame day, his Majeſty created the earl of Muſgrave, marquis of Normandy, and beſtowed a penſion on him of 3000 l. a year, in lieu of the place of lord-chamberlain, which he injoy'd in the former reign. About the ſame time, the lord viſcount Sydney was made earl of Romney, and Henry Herbert, eſq; baron Herbert of Cherbury. Edward Ruſſel, eſq; ſir John Lowther, Henry Prieſtman, eſq; Robert Auſten, eſq; ſir Robert Rich, ſir George Rooke, and ſir John Houblon, were appointed commiſſioners for executing the office of lord-high-admiral of England and Ireland (2): and the treaſury was given in commiſſion to the lord Godolphin, ſir Stephen Fox, Charles Montague, eſq; ſir William Trumbal, and John Smith, eſq;

Places diſpos'd of, and honors confer'd.

His Majeſty having thus ſettled his domeſtic affairs, and being again reſolved to command the confederate army in Flanders, imbarked the 6th of May at Margate, on board the Fubs-yacht, and ſailed the ſame day, about noon, with a fair wind, wind, for Holland, being attended by eight Dutch men of war. He arrived the next day in the Maeſe, and, landing in the evening, came about midnight to the Hague, from whence he went a few days after to Loo, to take the diverſions of that place, before he opened the campain. I ſhall here leave his Majeſty to give firſt an account of the maritime affairs of this year.

Misfortune of a ſquadron of ſhips under ſir Francis Wheeler.

Before I proceed to an account of the tranſactions of the grand fleet, I muſt juſt mention a misfortune which happened to a ſquadron, that was ſent, at the concluſion of the foregoing year, to the Mediterranean, under the command of ſir Francis Wheeler. This ſquadron having ſailed on the 17th of February from Gibraltar, towards the Streights, met, the next day, with a violent ſtorm, which continued all that day, and the following night; inſomuch that, on the 19th about five in the morning, ſir Francis Wheeler's own ſhip, the Suſſex, was foundered, and himſelf, with all his men, to the number of 550 drowned, two Moors only excepted, who eſcap'd by ſwiming (1).

Rear-admiral Nevil, with two Dutch men of war, had the good fortune to be blown out of the Streights, and put ſafe into Cadiz, as did the reſt of the fleet after the ſtorm, into Gibraltar.

Proceedings of the main fleet.

Tho' the confederate-fleet, under the command of admiral Ruſſel, was this year pretty early at ſea, they had, in the begining, no ſucceſs to boaſt of. As deſirous as they were to fight the French, they on the contrary were induſtrious to avoid an ingagement; and no ſooner was the Breſt-ſquadron out of harbor, than they made all the ſail they could towards the Mediterranean, the court of France having reſolved to act, this campain, offenſively againſt Spain, both by land and ſea. King William, in order to break their meaſures, and to prevent the intire loſs of Catalonia, thought fit to ſend his main fleet, this year, into thoſe ſeas. While the fleet was on the coaſt of France, the admiral received information, that there was a fleet of French merchant-ſhips, of forty or fifty ſail, lying in Bertheaume-bay, bound Eaſtward, and laden with corn, wine, brandy and other merchandize, under convoy of a man of war or two. He thereupon ordered the Monmouth and the Reſolution, with the Roebuck fire-ſhip, to go between the trade-way and the main, and indeavor to take or deſtroy them. Captain Pritchard, who commanded them, executed his orders with ſo good ſucceſs, that notwithſtanding the great fire of the enemy from their veſſels, and the forts of Conqueſt-bay, he burnt or ſunk thirty-five of them, beſide their convoy, which run among the rocks, and, ſoon after blew up, with her two ſloops of between ten and fifteen guns each, and brought a large fly-boat and a pink laden with ſalt, into the fleet. Some few days after, they likewiſe took or deſtroyed a good number of ſhips, laden with proviſions for the French fleet in the Mediteranean, and drove ſome others aſhoar, which were bound for Diep and Dunkirk, with ammunition and proviſions, for the uſe of the French army in Flanders.

French merchant ſhips deſtroyed.

It had been ſo ordered, that, at a proper ſtation, the ſquadron under the lord Berkley (2), appointed to act with the land-forces, which had been put on board, to the number of near 10,000 men, under the command of lieutenant-general Talmaſh, with deſign to deſtroy the harbor of Breſt, was to ſeparate and ſteer away for that place; and then, the admiral himſelf, with the body of the fleet, was to ſhape his courſe towards the Mediterranean. All things being ſettled for the ſeparation, at a council of war, of the flag and general officers, held the 31ſt of May, proper ſignals were diſtributed for that purpoſe.

The 5th of June, the two fleets ſeparated, and as that commanded by the lord Berkley came firſt

1. That the ſea-pay of flag-officers, commanders, lieutenants, maſters, and ſurgeons of his Majeſty's ſhips ſhould be "doubled.

2. "That all flag-officers, and captains of the firſt, ſecond, third, fourth and fifth rates, and of fire-ſhips; and the firſt lieute-"nant and maſters of firſt, ſecond, and third-rates, who have ſerved a year in the ſame poſts, in ſhips of thoſe rates, or been "in a general ingagement, ſhould have half-pay while on ſhoar, to be paid quarterly out of the general eſtimate of the navy.

3. "That only ſuch commiſſion-officers as have been put in by the admiral or admiralty, and warrant-officers, as have been "put in by the navy-board, ſhould receive the benefit of half-pay.

4. "That the ſame ſhould commence from the ſecond of January, then laſt paſt.

5. "That no officer, who leaves the ſervice, or is diſmiſſed for any miſdeamenor, injoy that benefit.

6. "That the number of ſervants allowed the commanders ſhould be no more than ten to the admiral of the whole fleet; "all other inferior flags one each; captains of firſt and ſecond-rates, ſix; of third and fourth-rates, five; of fifth and ſix-rates, "four each; and that the number of ſervants leſſened be deducted out of every ſhip's company.

7. "That half-pay officers be aſſiſting to the navy-board.

8. "That no convoy-mony be demanded or received, under the penalty of forfeiting and loſing imployment for ever.

9. "That the commanders tranſmit to the admiralty when and why they come into port.

10. That the commiſſioners of the navy at the ports, inquire why ſhips come in; and that all theſe articles and rules be ſtrictly obſerved.

But the fund for that eſtabiſhment ending with the war, and the King having no other means to afford it, except he had allowed it out of his revenne, the then lords of the admiralty formed another ſcheme. Lediard's Naval Hiſt. Vol. 2. p. 685.

A Dutch writer ſays, this was the moſt violent ſtorm, that ever had been known in thoſe ſeas, ſince the memory of man. The ſame author ſays, the body of admiral Wheeler was found on a ſand-bank, not far from Gibraltar, in his ſhirt and ſlippers, which made it believed, that ſeeing himſelf in great danger, he had ſtriped, with a deſign to indeavor the ſaving his life, by ſwiming.

to action, I ſhall begin with a relation of his proceedings, and then follow the admiral to the Streights.

The deſign, and the ſituation of the place.

But firſt, in order to obtain a better idea of the undertaking, it may not be amiſs to give a brief account of the deſign, and of the ſituation of the place. The deſign was, in general, to ruin the harbor of Breſt, or render it uſeleſs to the French. There is a promontory, which runs from Camaret to the entrance of the harbor of Breſt, which, whoever is maſter of, may command the ſhipping going in or out. This promontory is join'd to the continent by a narrow Iſthmus, which it was propos'd to get poſſeſſion of, and then, it was thought, four or five thouſand men might defend the promontory againſt any force that could have been brought before it. By this means, the confederates would not only have been maſters of the paſſage to Breſt, but have had it in their powers to have made incurſions into Bretagne at pleaſure. This was the deſign in 1692, after the victory at la Hogue, when ſeven or eight thouſand men were put on board the fleet, for that purpoſe, and had it then been executed, France would not have had one port upon the ocean, fit to receive their large men of war (1): but the French King being apprized of the deſign, and the conſequences it might be attended with, if ever ſuch an attempt ſhould be made again, order'd the Iſthmus, and all the avenues to it, to be ſo fortified as render'd it inacceſſible.

The lord Berkeley's proceedings.

The lord Berkley, arriving the 7th, came to an anchor between Camaret and Bertheaume-bay, tho' continually played upon by the enemy's bombs; firſt from Camaret-weſtern-point, then from a caſtle on a high rock, in Bertheaume-bay, and laſtly, from two forts on each ſide of the Iſthmus going into Breſt road. The ſame day the lord Cutts, and the marquis of Caermarthen, in his own gally, ſtood in, a conſiderable way, into the bay; and having taken a view of it, amidſt the enemy's fire, they returned and gave the lord Berkley an account of the poſture of the bay, and ſituation of the caſtle, which they found very advantageous to defend the landing places (2). It was at firſt ordered, that the Monk, a ſhip of ſixty guns, and the Diamond of equal force, ſhould go in; but the marquis repreſented, that thoſe two men of war would not be ſufficient to cover the boats at their landing, becauſe the enemy were better prepared, and more numerous than was expected, and ready to be ſeconded, on all occaſions, by fourteen ſquadrons of horſe.

Reſolutions taken to land near Breſt.

Hereupon, a council of war was called, on board the ſhip Queen, the 8th of June, at which were preſent, his lordſhip, lieutenant-general Talmaſh, and all the Engliſh and Dutch flag and general officers, by whom it was reſolved, that the lieutenant-general ſhould go on ſhoar with the troops, as ſoon as it was poſſible, and indeavor to make himſelf maſter of the fort at Camaret, and that ſix other men of war ſhould be added to the former to cover him in landing: viz. the Greenwich of four and fifty guns, the Charles-galley, of two and thirty, the Shoreham of two and thirty, the Darkenſtein of four and forty, the Weſep of thirty, and the Wolf of thirty, all which the marquis undertook ſo to poſt, that they ſhould bear upon the caſtle to the beſt advantage.

WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1694.

This was, nevertheleſs, a work of great difficulty and danger; for no ſooner was the Monk come within reach of the enemy's mortars, but they began to throw bombs at her from Point-des-Fillettes, and the weſtern point of Camaret-bay; and the reſt of the ſhips that followed were ſurpriſed with three batteries more, which they never perceived, till they felt their ſhot. But under all theſe difficulties the brave marquis made a ſhift to poſt the eight ſhips, in ſuch manner, as gave great ſuccor to the landing-forces, and did the French conſiderable miſchief; dropping their anchors, and firing with ſo much reſolution, that the French began twice to run out of Camaret-fort; but they could eaſily perceive the enemy very advantageouſly intrenched, at every place, where there was any poſſibility of landing, and great numbers of foot were drawn behind the trenches.

Eight ſhips enter the bay with great difficulty and danger.

Some forces land; but are repulſed with great loſs.

Amidſt theſe difficulties, there could be no proſecution of that regular landing which was propoſed by the lord Cutts, and had been agreed on. However, the undaunted general Talmaſh was reſolute in the enterpriſe, tho' unlikely to ſucceed; and therefore, with a ſmall number of well-boats, and about nine hundred men (Burnet ſays ſix hundred) went aſhoar, in a confuſed manner, under a little rock, on the ſouth-ſide of the ſmall bay; but immediately a detachment of the French marines, fell in upon them, with ſo much fury, that the Engliſh were forced to retire to their boats, in great diſorder; and, it happening at the ſame time to be an ebb-tide, moſt of the boats ſtuck faſt, ſo that the men on board them were either miſerably ſlaughtered, or forced to beg quarter; Burnet ſays, not above a hundred came back; ſo that in this action were ſlain, wounded, or taken priſoners, of the land-troops, at leaſt five hundred men, and the brave lieutenant-general Talmaſh himſelf, being wounded in the thigh, died ſoon after at Plymouth (3). The Monk, Charles-galley and Shoreham, three of the ſhips which were ſent to protect the landing, and to batter the French forts, were very much ſhattered, and in them, and the others, a good number of men were kill'd and wounded. A Dutch frigat of thirty guns, called the Weſep, was ſunk, and her captain kill'd: beſide ſeveral other damages; and it was with incredible labor and hazard, that the marquis of Caermarthen brought the ſhips off,

(1) The earl of Nottingham, then ſecretary of ſtate, reflected very ſeverely on admiral Ruſſel, on this account, and for returning to Spithead, when he had land-forces on board for that ſervice, without attempting it, there being then no French troops there, or fortifications to hinder ſuch a deſcent.

(2 Biſhop Burnet ſays, that when our fleet came ſo near to ſee what preparations they had made for their defenſe, the council of officers, were all againſt making the attempt; but Talmaſh had ſet his heart ſo much upon it, that he could not be diverted from it. He would not be perſuaded, but the number of people they ſaw were rabble, brought together to make a ſhew; but he was ſoon undeceived, to his coſt.

The famous engineer Vauban, whom the King of France had imployed to put Breſt, and the places in the harbor which was likely to be attack'd, in a poſture of defence, wrote to the King, before the Engliſh fleet arrived: "That his Majeſty need be under "no apprehenſions, that he had made all the ſubterraneous paſſages under the caſtle bomb-proof, that he had placed ninety "mortars, and three hundred pieces of cannon, in proper places; that all the ſhips were out of the reach of the enemy's "bombs, and all the troops in good order; that there were three hundred bombardeers in the place, three hundred gentlemen, "four thouſand men, regular troops; and a regiment of dragoons juſt arrived.

(3) Some have pretended to ſay that this gallant officer was deſtined to be a ſacrifice in this undertaking, by the envy of ſome of his pretended friends; it being certain, that the French had time to provide themſelves againſt a deſign, which was become a town-talk in London, ſome months before it was put in execution. Burnet gives him the character of a brave and generous man, and a good officer, very fit to animate and incourage inferior officers and ſoldiers; but, adds he, he was much too apt to be diſcontented, and turn mutinous; ſo that, upon the whole, he was one of thoſe dangerous men, who are capable of doing as much miſchief as good ſervice.

A little before his death he is reported to have ſaid, that as he loſt his life in the performance of his duty to ſo good a Prince, he was perfectly eaſy as to that; but it was a great trouble to him, that the government had been ſo baſely betrayed.

William & Mary. An' 1694.

with all their riging cut to pieces, and moſt of their ſails and yards diſabled. It was, indeed, no wonder that they far'd no better, for the whole extent of the bays of Camaret and Bertheaume, was, in a manner, one continued fortification: for where-ever there was a place, fit for landing of troops, there had the French raiſed batteries and intrenchments, and they threw bombs, at the ſhips, from five or ſix places (1).

The land-forces being imbarked, a general council of war was held, and as the attempt upon Breſt was found impracticable, the debate was what could be done with the fleet and army. The lieutenant-general informed them, he was not authorized to attempt any other place; it was therefore agreed to repair to Spithead, to land the troops, and refit the ſhips; and thus ended this fruitleſs expedition.

The ſquadron returns to St. Helens.

The 15th of June, the ſquadron arrived at St. Helens, and there found orders from the Queen, that a council of war, of the general and flag-officers, ſhould conſider how the ſhips and troops might be beſt imployed: and, purſuant to theſe orders, as ſoon as the fleet was refited, it was reſolved firſt to bombard Diep, and then to do what other prejudice they could, along the French coaſt. In the mean time, the lord Berkley having orders to ſtop all ſhips he ſhould meet with, in his paſſage, bound for France, took about ſeventy ſail, coming from the North, laden with corn, and ſea-ſtores (2).

The lord Berkley takes ſeveral prizes.

Diep bombarded.

Bad weather, and other diſappointments prevented the bombardment of Diep, till the 12th of July; but that day 1100 bombs and carcaſſes were thrown into it, with ſuch ſucceſs, that it ſoon appeared in flames in ſeveral places. The townſmen deſpairing to quench the raging conflagration, began to run away in the greateſt diſorder; whereupon two regiments of the militia of Bretagne were ſent to incourage them; but the confuſion was ſo great and the fire ſo dreadful, that the ſoldiers themſelves fled with the reſt. Had the Engliſh known what had paſſed, they might, in all probability, have poſſeſſed themſelves of the place: however, they ſo ruined it, that the greateſt part of the houſes (being then, as F. Daniel ſays all of wood) were reduced to aſhes, and ſcarce any left unſhattered (3). The night before, a machine-veſſel (or as father Daniel calls it, an infernal machine) was blown up at the Pier-head; but with little or no ſucceſs. It made a frightful noiſe, but did little execution, occaſioned, as it was ſuppoſed, by the head lying too low. Captain Dunbar, who commanded this veſſel, behaved himſelf with great bravery: for the fuſee going out, he went on board again in perſon and ſet fire to it; for which, both himſelf and the men he took with him, were deſervedly rewarded. The French did what they could to conceal the damages they ſuſtained: but they were, however, very conſiderable (4).

William & Mary. An' 1694.

Havre de Grace bombarded.

The 14th the fleet ſailed from Diep, moſt of the few houſes which were ſtanding being on fire. The 16th, they began to bombard the town of Havre-de Grace, under the direction of captain Bembow, which they continued till the next morning, when the wind blowing hard, they gave over: but had already ſo good ſucceſs, that the town was in flames in ſeveral places, and had burnt all the night. It continued, likewiſe burning, till the 18th. When the weather growing calm, towards evening, the following night was ſpent in throwing 250 bombs more into the town; ſo that, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, at leaſt, a third part of it was deſtroyed (5). The weather being very bad the 19th, all the bomb-veſſels were ordered off again: and, it was agreed, in a council of war, that it would be to no purpoſe to ſtay longer before Havre-de-Grace (6). It was

(1) Let us now ſee what account the French give of this matter. F. Daniel ſays; that the lord Berkley came into the bay of Camaret, with a ſquadron of ſix and fifty men of war, bombs, and other veſſels. General Talmaſh made a deſcent, at the head of a battalion of grenadiers, and between eight or nine hundred men, which were landed by a great number of Shalloops. A briſk fire inſued, as well from the Engliſh on one ſide, as from the French batteries and intrenchments on land, on the other. The Sieur de Benoiſe, captain of a French company of marines, obſerving that there was ſome confuſion among the Engliſh troops, ſalied out, ſword in hand, at the head of ſixty men, being immediately followed by another company. He defeated the enemy, killed a great number of their men, and purſued them to their ſhalloops, into which they threw themſelves in ſuch numbers, that they could by no means get them off. Upon this the count de Servon, marſhal de Camp, the ſieurs de Vaiſe, brigadier of foot, and du Pleſſis, brigadier of horſe, march'd a ſquadron of the regiment of de Pleſſis up to the ſhoar, which ſoon obliged the Engliſh, in the boats which were ſtranded, to demand quarter. The others, which had not yet made their deſcent, retreated, under favor of the cannon of their ſhips. A Dutch veſſel, which ventured too near the ſhoar, ran aground, and was obliged to ſurrender. The Engliſh loſt four hundred men in the deſcent, among whom was their general Talmaſh; and forty officers, with five ſoldiers made priſoners, many more were drowned; and a bomb happening to fall into a bomb-veſſel full of ſoldiers, it blew up, with all that were in it. This enterprize coſt the Engliſh and Dutch, two thouſand men; they burnt one of their veſſels in the night, and another of ſixty pieces of cannon was run a-ground. The French on the contrary, had no more than five and forty ſlain. Some particulars of this relation, hitherto, muſt be read with a ſmall allowance; but what follows ſeems to have pretty much the face of truth. Monſieur de Vauban (ſays the ſame author) who commanded at Breſt, had taken all his precautions with an admirable skill, as well with regard to the batteries as the intrenchments, in which was placed a battallion of marines, with ſome other ſoldiers, under the command of the marquis de Langeron.

(2) Theſe ſhips were all reclaimed by the Swediſh and Daniſh miniſters, as belonging to their reſpective Sovereigns; however, after a ſtrict examination of the matter, above twenty of them were condemned, and adjudged lawful prize. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 690.

(3) Biſhop Burnet, ſays it was burnt almoſt to the ground.

(4) The following letter from the marquis de Bevron to the King of France, was publiſhed at Paris, to ſooth the people, and extenuate the loſs at Diep.

" From yeſterday noon to this morning at four o'clock, the enemy continued throwing bombs in great number, and played " with the cannon upon the troops which appeared. About half an hour after eleven, that night, they ſent in a machine, with " a purpoſe to enter the port, which I had cauſed to be barred up, and inſtead of that, it ſtruck again the Gallot, but without " any effect. The city, the houſes of which are wood, ſtanding cloſe to one another, have ſuffered a little, in the quarter " where the fire began, which was only kindled by one bomb, in one only houſe, for the reſt never kindled in the other quar- " ters", &c. This deceitful account could not, however, gain credit long: private letters, full of complaints and lamentations " ſoon laid open the fallacy of it: I ſhall give the reader an inſtance of one:

" It was happy for you that you made your eſcape; I wiſh I had done ſo too. If you had ſtaid you would have ſaid the " D----l had been looſe: there was nothing to be ſeen in the air but fire and flame.

" The Engliſh are very D--ls with their fire. The houſes beat down and burnt are innumerable; thoſe next the ſea are " totally ruined. They have burnt ſeveral villages; and, as an addition to our miſery, have ſent us all the beggars in the pro- " vince to eat us up. The King's houſe has fared no better than the reſt. Country and city are gone to rack and ruin.

Another letter begins: " the city of Diep is utterly ruined, nor does there ſtand a houſe, that is not very much ſhattered; " all the churches are deſtroyed: the college of the fathers of the orarory, valued at a hundred thouſand crowns, is utterly " deſtroyed.

(5) Father Daniel will allow but twenty houſes to have been burnt.

(6) The author of the continuation of Rapin mentions a ſtratagem put in practiſe by the French, to leſſen the ſucceſs of the confederates in the bombardment of this town. In the ſuburb (ſays he) on the land-ſide, there is a large ſquare; thither they conveyed a great number of fagots, which they ſet fire to ſometime after the bombardment begun. The Engliſh, deceived by this artifice, directed moſt of their bombs that way, thinking to increaſe the flames, and prevent their being extinguiſhed, which in the mean time ſaved other places. Book 25. p. 208.

The fleet returns to St. Helens.

William therefore determined, to proceed to St. Helens, to repair damages; where they arrived the 26th, having firſt alarmed the French coaſt off of la Hogue and Cherburg. Having put ſix regiments aſhoar at St Helen's, they then, by the Queen's orders, ſailed to the Downs, where they arrived the 6th of Auguſt. Attempts were afterwards made, by detached ſquadrons, at Dunkirk and Calais, but with little or no ſucceſs (1).

Proceedings of the confederate fleet in the Mediterranean.

I have already obſerved above, that admiral Ruſſel parted with the lord Berkley, the 5th of June, and on the five and twentieth of that month, he arrived off of the rock of Liſbon. Captain John Jennings, with the Mary and Adventure, being ſent in to the ſhoar for intelligence, whether the enemy were or had been on that coaſt, and if they were, to ſend rear-admiral Nevil and the Dutch vice-admiral Callemberg, who were in the bay of Cadiz, inſtructions to join the fleet, with all the ſhips under their command; the admiral ſettled the proper places for rendezvous, in caſe of ſeparation (2). Rear-admiral Nevil, and the two Dutch vice-admirals, Callemberg and Evertzen, having joined the fleet, with eight Engliſh, and as many Dutch men of war, it conſiſted of ſixty-three ſhips of the line, beſide nine Spaniards, who ſailed from Cadiz, with Nevil, but were not yet come to the fleet: and they had advice, that the French were between Alſaques and Barcelona, whither it was reſolved, in a council of war, to proceed.

To follow admiral Ruſſel in the whole courſe of his proceedings with the confederate fleet, in the Mediterranean, this ſummer, and the whole inſuing winter (for it was found neceſſary to leave it there) would carry me too far. I ſhall therefore only ſay, that this expedition, tho' it afforded little or no action, was very glorious to the Engliſh nation. The admiral in the name of his maſter and country, now challenged the dominion of the Mediterranean, as he had, two years before, aſſerted that of the Narrow-ſeas: and as he revived the drooping ſpirits of the Spaniards, ſo he damped the towering projects of the French. The latter were now ſenſible of their error in ſending their grand fleet into thoſe ſeas, where they were cooped up in the harbor of Toulon, and tho' the marſhal de Tourville once adventured out to ſea, with a deſign to ſlip by the Engliſh admiral, yet he quickly found ſo watchful an eye upon him, that he was forced to return to his port again. Indeed nothing is more illuſtrious in the whole courſe of King William's reign, than his fleet riding thus triumphantly in the Mediterranean; for, by this means, I ſay, the Engliſh dominions of the Streights was added to that of the Narrow-ſeas; a ſtop was put to the conquering arms of France in Catalonia; all the French coaſts were expoſed to the inſults of the confederates; and even all the Italian Princes were kept in awe; and the Venetians began now to think of ſending a ſolemn embaſſy into England, to court the friendſhip of his Britannic Majeſty.

Having done with the affairs of our fleet, for this year, I ſhould now have a regard to thoſe on the continent; but ſhall previouſly mention a tranſaction or two at home.

William & Mary. An' 1694.

Knights of the Garter inſtall'd.

The 5th of June, his electoral highneſs, Frederic III, marquis of Brandenburg, his moſt ſerene highneſs George William, duke of Brumſwic and Lunenburg, and the duke of Shrewſbury, knights elect of the moſt noble Order of the Garter, were inſtalled in St. George's chapel at Windſor; the two former by their proxies, and his grace in perſon.

The Bank-charter granted.

The 8th, a draught of a commiſſion for taking ſubſcriptions for the Bank of England, together with a ſchedule containing the draught of a charter for the corporation of the ſaid bank, were firſt approv'd and ſign'd by her Majeſty; and the charter, which was to paſs under the great ſeal of England, after the firſt day of Auguſt, if the ſum of 1,200,000 l. or one moiety, or more thereof, ſhould be ſubſcribed by that time, or ſooner, if the whole ſhould be ſooner ſubſcribed, was accordingly granted towards the middle of July; the commiſſioners having taken ſubſcriptions amounting to that full ſum, by the 5th of that month.

Colonel Parker apprehended; but eſcapes.

While King William was abroad, colonel John Parker was apprehended and commited to the Tower, being charg'd with a deſign to aſſaſſinate his Majeſty ſome time before; but he was ſo fortunate to eſcape out of that priſon and get over to France. But to return to Flanders (3).

Campain in Flanders.

Little or nothing was done in theſe parts, the begining of this campain. The 9th of Auguſt, the confederate army, under King William's command, was incamp'd at Mont. St. André. It then conſiſted of 31,000 horſe and dragoons, and 51,000 foot, all as fine troops as ever had been ſeen in the field; and beſide theſe, there was a body of about 7,000 men, under the command of count Thian, near Ghent. The French were not much inferior in number; great deſigns were form'd on both ſides, and each ſide thought they had ſufficiently provided againſt thoſe of their enemies. Both armies, in the mean time, lay ſtill, watching one another's motions; and the Dauphin, who commanded the French army, in perſon, declared, he had orders from his father, not to ſtir from his camp near Huy, as long as the confederates continued in theirs at Mont St. André: and, as the eyes of all Europe were fix'd on theſe two formidable armies, it was generally believed, that which ever ſhould be oblig'd to decamp firſt, would have the diſadvantage of it. The Dauphin, however, at length, not being able to ſubſiſt, reſolved to decamp firſt, and tho' he thought to have concealed his deſign, by ſending out ſeveral detachments of horſe, under pretenſe of forraging, to re-inforce the marquis d' Harcourt's body (on the other ſide of the Meuſe) who was to ſeize the advantageous poſt of Pieton; yet King William, who ſuſpected his deſign, decamp'd before him, on the 18th of Auguſt, N. S. and ſoon gain'd that poſt, where he found forrage only for about four days: his Majeſty, being inform'd of the enemy's march, moved, on the 20th, from Sombref to Nivelle, on the 21ſt to Soignies, the 22d to Chevre, on the other ſide of Aeth, and the

(1) Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that tho' theſe bombardments ſeemed inhumane, the French had no right to complain, ſince they themſelves firſt began them, at Genoa, and other places: not to mention their cruelties in the Palatinate.

(2) As the chief deſign of this powerful fleet's being ſent to the Mediterranean, was by blocking up the French fleet in Toulon, not only to ſecure our own ports and trade, but likewiſe to ſecure the maritime towns of Spain from the inſults of the French, the arrival of it was matter of great joy to the King of Spain, who, in teſtimony of it, ſent the admiral a preſent of four and twenty thouſand crowns, and the vice-admiral twelve thouſand.

(3) The death of the biſhop and Prince of Liege, towards the begining of this year, gave the French ſome hopes of imbroiling the affairs of the confederates on that ſide: but the choice of the elector of Cologn, by the major part of the chapter, and of the grand maſter of the Teutonick order, brother of the Empreſs, by the reſt, in oppoſition to the cardinal de Bouillon, who was put up by France, broke all their meaſures. This double return to the Emperor and the Pope, for confirmation, had like to have been attended by fatal conſequences on the other ſide; one candidate being ſo nearly allied to the Imperial houſe, and the other being brother to the elector of Bavaria, whoſe intereſt was likewiſe ſupported by King William, and the States-general: but the grand maſter dying in the interim, the elector was ſoon after put in the peaceful poſſeſſion of that biſhopric and principality: which, together with the great power of the allies in Flanders, this campain, made things look with an ill aſpect on the affairs of France.

William & Mary. An' 1694.

23d to Grames, near Aeth. The 24th, the elector of Bavaria was detach'd, with a conſiderable body of horſe, and ſome pieces of cannon, to poſſeſs himſelf of a poſt upon the Scheld, and the reſt of the army followed, with the deſign to have paſs'd that river at Pont-Eſperies: but notwithſtanding all the diligence of the confederates to get thither, yet, it appear'd, that the French had taken more to prevent them: for, on the 25th, the elector being advanced towards Pont d'Eſchauffe, in order to force the paſſage of the river, he found the French, to the number of 30,000, ſo well intrench'd on the other ſide, that he did not think it prudence to purſue his enterprize. This haſty march coſt the French, indeed, a great number of men and horſes, but that loſs was very inconſiderable, in compariſon of the advantage they gain'd by hindering the allies from penetrating into French Flanders, where, conſidering their ſtrength, they might probably have made ſome important conqueſt, or, at leaſt, have ſecur'd good winter-quarters, in their dominions (1).

Huy town and caſtel taken by the allies.

King William, finding it impoſſible to attempt any thing on that ſide, ſince the French had deeply intrench'd themſelves near Courtray, and had ſent ſtrong detachments to cover Ipres, Menin, Berg St. Vinox, Furnes and Dunkirk, his Majeſty reſolved to lay hold on this occaſion, to diſpoſſeſs the enemy of the town and caſtle of Huy. In purſuance of this reſolution, Prince Tſerclaes de Tilly paſs'd the Meuſe, and inveſted that place, with all the horſe and dragoons of the biſhopric of Liege, a detachment of Brandenburg horſe, and ſome infantry. The duke of Holſtein-Ploen, who was appointed to command that ſiege, arriving, the next day, with ſixteen regiments of foot, the town, at his approach, immediately ſurrender'd.

The batteries were rais'd againſt the caſtle, by the 19th of September, N. S. and the 21ſt the trenches were open'd. The attacks were carried on with ſo much vigor, that all things being ready for an aſſault by the 27th, the governor beat a parly, and ſurrender'd that fortreſs the next day (2): and thus ended the campain in Flanders: upon which, the King return'd to the Hague, where he ſtaid till the 8th of November.

Campain in Piemont;

In Piemont very little was done this campain: for tho' the duke of Savoy openly rejected the offers made him by France, after his defeat at Marſiglia, and, at the inſtances of England, granted liberty of conſcience to his Proteſtant ſubjects the Vaudois; yet he was, at the ſame time, carrying on a ſecret negociation with the grand Monarch. This render'd him ſupinely inactive on his ſide, and the French as careleſs on theirs, and when every one expected, that the confederate army would have laid ſiege to Caſal, and the ſucceſs of that enterpriſe was not in the leaſt doubted of, they were ſatisfied with taking Fort St. George, which ſerved only to block up that place more cloſely. Nor did they do any thing farther, during this campain, worthy our notice.

William & Mary. An' 1694.

In Catalonia;

In Catalonia, the French, under the command of the marſhal de Noailles, were triumphant: for being 30,000 ſtrong, and much ſuperior to the Spaniards, they arrived, the 26th of May, on the banks of the river Ter, which they took a reſolution to paſs, notwithſtanding they found the Spaniards intrench'd on the other ſide. This they did, the ſame evening, forcing the Spaniards to abandon their intrenchments, with the loſs of their baggage. This advantage was followed by the ſiege of Palamos, which, after having held out a week, was taken by ſtorm, with great ſlaughter of the Spaniſh gariſon, the 7th of June, and ſoon after the gariſon of St. Felix, Quinola, and the caſtle of St. Elmo, withdrew their gariſons. Gironne, a well fortified town, pretended to make a ſtout reſiſtance; however, after about ten days ſiege, they ſurrender'd, on the 29th of the ſame month, on very ignominious terms. Oſtalrick and Caſtlefolet, falling, likewiſe, into the hands of the French, they were now ſo fluſh'd with ſucceſs, that they threatned nothing leſs than the ſiege of Barcelona, and they had probably ſucceeded there too, had not the arrival of the confederate fleet, under admiral Ruſſel, in the Mediterranean, as I have given an account above, put a ſtop to the career of their victories.

And Germany.

In Germany, nothing of moment happen'd; what advantage was gain'd, tho' ſmall, was on the ſide of the Imperialiſts, and it might probably have been greater had they purſued it, when fortune pointed out the way for them. Prince Lewis of Baden, who commanded them, lying incamp'd near Heilbrun, the marſhal de Lorge, with the French army under his command, croſs'd the Rhine, and march'd up towards him, in order of battle. The Prince, believing their intention was to fight him, march'd on to meet them; but the French finding him in earneſt, retreated toward Wieſelock, paſs'd the Neckar, burnt the town of Laudenburg, and ruin'd the flat country. Prince Lewis, tho' he was not yet join'd by the Saxons, was ſo inraged at this, that he advanced to Wieſelock, an advantageous poſt, which he took, after a ſharp rencounter, in which the French loſt 300 men, and the Germans about 150. Hereupon monſ. de Lorge repaſs'd the Rhine, and, for ſome time, the two armies only obſerved one another. At length, Prince Lewis croſs'd the Rhine, in his turn; of which the French general being adviſed, he march'd towards Landau. The Prince, on the other hand, advanced, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſmall places, and of all the paſſes, as far as Croon-Weiſſemburg. Here it was expected that the Germans would have purſued their good fortune, and have forced the French to a battle, or, at leaſt, have ſecured winter-quarters, on that ſide the Rhine: but they did neither; on the contrary, the Imperialiſts repaſs'd the Rhine, a few days after, and were contented with carrying away 14,000 head of cattle, and having deſtroy'd a vaſt quantity of forrage in the country, and ſome magazines belonging to the

(1) The French King was ſo ſenſible of this ſervice, that he writ a letter, which he order'd to be read at the head of the army, in which he return'd thanks, in the firſt place, to the Princes of the blood, next to the marſhal de Luxemburg, as having a principal ſhare in the conduct, then to the reſt of the marſhals of France, and all the general officers; and, laſtly, to all the French and Swiſs infantry, regiment by regiment, acknowledging how much he was beholden to their zeal and incredible diligence. Hiſtory of King William, vol. 2. p. 392.

If the account given us by the continuator of Rapin in French, of the marches of theſe two armies, be to be depended on, there muſt have been an impardonable neglect, if not ſome treachery, on the ſide of the confederates: for, according to him, the allies, who march'd firſt, had but eighteen leagues to go, in a plain even way; whereas the French, who did not ſtir, till they had notice of the march of the confederates, had forty-two leagues to march, in a way cut by ſeveral rivers and brooks, which could not but very much retard their march; notwithſtanding all which difficulties, they arrived firſt, at the important paſs, and had time to retrench themſelves there. And, indeed, it was but too common, for King William's well laid deſigns to be fruſtrated, by ſome ſuch unaccountable means or other. Our author here lays the blame, and ſeemingly with reaſon, on the ſupinity, and too great ſecurity of the officers of the confederate army; and particularly on the two generals who were order'd to ſecure the paſſage over the Scheld. Book 25. p. 200.

(2) By this conqueſt, the French were totally expelled out of the biſhopric of Liege: for St. Dinant was, at that time, a part of France. This ſiege was particularly remarkable for the fine and numerous artillery which was imploy'd at it; and the dexterity with which it was managed. It conſiſted of 120 cannon and mortars, and during this ſhort ſiege, 25,000 cannon-balls, and between ſeven and eight hundred bombs were thrown into the place.

French, with which they put an end to the campain: but to return to the King.

The King returns to England.

His Majeſty, as I have ſaid above, having finiſh'd the campain, in Flanders, imbark'd on the William and Mary-yacht, in the Maeſe, the 8th of November, being attended by a ſquadron of men of war, under the command of the lord-marquis of Caermarthen, and the next day, about noon, he landed at Margate, and lay that night at Canterbury. The Queen met him, the next day, at Rocheſter, and, the ſame night, between eleven and twelve their Majeſties came to Kenſington.

The parliament meets.

The 12th of November, the parliament being met, according to their laſt prorogation, the King went to the houſe of lords, and being attended by the commons, his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them:

The King's ſpeech to the parliament.

"That he was glad to meet them, when he could "ſay their affairs were in a better poſture, both by "ſea and land, than when they parted laſt. That "the enemy had not been in a condition to op-"poſe the confederate fleet, in theſe ſeas; that the "ſending ſo great a force into the Mediterranean "had diſappointed their deſigns, and left the na-"tion a proſpect of farther ſucceſs; and that with "reſpect to the war by land, he thought he might "ſay, that, this year, a ſtop had been put to the "progreſs of the French arms.

He then addreſs'd himſelf to the houſe of commons; "of whoſe good affection to him, and of "whoſe zeal for the public (he ſaid) he had ſo "much experience, that he could not doubt of "their aſſiſtance at this time; he earneſtly recom-"mended to them; firſt, to provide ſuch ſupplies "as might inable him to proſecute the war with "vigor, which was the only means to procure peace "to Chriſtendom, with the ſafety and honor of "England. Secondly, to continue the act of "tonage and poundage, which expired at Chriſt-"mas, and which was the more neceſſary at this "time, in regard the ſeveral branches of the re-"venue were under great anticipations; and laſt-"ly, the debt for the tranſport-ſhips, imploy'd in "the reducing of Ireland, which was a caſe of "compaſſion, and deſerv'd relief.

He cloſed his ſpeech, by telling both houſes; "that he ſhould be glad they would take into their "conſideration, the preparing ſome good bill for "the incouragement of Engliſh ſea-men, which "law, they were ſenſible, would tend to the ad-"vancement of trade, and of the naval ſtrength of "the kingdom, which was their common great in-"tereſt, and ought to be their greateſt care."

A bill for frequent parliaments.

The firſt common buſineſs of parliament being over, the commons adjourned to the 19th. When, the next thing they did, was to order mr. Harley to prepare and bring in "a bill for the frequent meeting "and calling of parliaments;" a bill they had been ſo earneſt upon in the foregoing ſeſſion, and which they ſeemed reſolved to ſtickle for in this. The bill was preſented accordingly, the 22d of November, the 13th of December, it was read the third time, paſſed, and ſent up to the lords, who, on the 18th, gave concurrence to it, without any amendment.

A ſupply voted.

The 21ſt of November, the commons unanimouſly voted a ſupply to their Majeſties; and having afterwards examined the eſtimate for the next year's ſervice for the war; the account of the mony paid to the fleet, to the army, to the allies, and for forage, and the quota's that the confederates were ſeverally to furniſh, they reſolved, the 30th, "that "the ſum of 2,382,712 l. be granted for the main-"tenance of the navy;" and, on the 4th of Decem-ber, "that the ſum of 2,500,000 l. be grant-"ed for the ſupport of the land-forces, for the "ſervice of the year 1695. WILLIAM & MARY. AN' 1694.

To raiſe theſe vaſt ſums, it was reſolved, firſt, "that an aid of 4 s. in the pound be granted to "their Majeſties, to be laid and levied, in the ſame "manner as formerly;" and, ſecondly, "that the "ſubſidies of tonage and poundage be continued, "for the term of five years longer, begining on "the 26th of that month of December." The King ſoon went to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal ſanction to the bill, that had been brought in and paſſed, according to this ſecond reſolution. At the ſame time his Majeſty, to the general ſatisfaction of the commons, gave likewiſe, his royal aſſent to the act for triennial parliaments (1).

Death of archbiſhop Tillotſon.

About this time died, at his palace at Lambeth, dr. John Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age. After the deprivation of archbiſhop Sancroft, he ſucceeded him, in that eminent ſtation, in May 1691. As his piety, learning, charity, and moderation, had gained him the eſteem of ſuch as looked upon the toleration of the Diſſenters, to be the beſt means to ſecure, and even to inlarge the church of England, and, on the other hand, as his conſtant care and ſtedfaſt zeal for the national church, of which he was ſo eminent a pillar, indeared him to all true ſons of that community, ſo his death was greatly lamented by all ſincere lovers of unity and peace among Chriſtians. The purity of his morals, which ſhined thro' all his ſermons, were no more than a copy of his life and converſation; and as the latter may juſtly be laid down as a model, for the imitation of all Proteſtant prelates, ſo the purity of his ſtile, in the former, will ever be a ſtanding pattern to all who aim at writing true Engliſh. He was ſucceeded by dr. Tenniſon biſhop of Lincoln.

His character.

Death of Queen Mary.

This truly worthy prelate was not long ſurvived by his royal miſtreſs, Queen Mary, whoſe character ſhone as bright, in every reſpect, among thoſe of her high ſtation, as his among thoſe of his eminent dignity. She was taken ill, at her palace at Kenſington, on Friday the 21ſt of December, and the diſtemper, which appeared to be the Small-pox, grew, in a few days, ſo violent, and was accompanied by ſuch mortal ſymptoms, that in ſpight of the moſt exquiſite care of her phyſicians, her Majeſty departed this life, on Friday, the 28th, about one in the morning, in the thirty-third year of her age, and the ſixth of her reign, leaving the King under an inexpreſſible grief and affliction, and the whole kingdom under the deepeſt and moſt ſenſible ſorrow, for the loſs of a Princeſs poſſeſſed of ſo much piety, clemency, goodneſs, and of every other great and exemplary royal virtue.

Oppoſition made to the validity of the King's title, after the Queen's death.

The death of Queen Mary, tho' it gave occaſion to what we may call a new reign; yet made no alteration but in the royal title, which now, inſtead of that of William and Mary, was changed to William III. There were not, indeed, wanting reſtleſs ſpirits, who, notwithſtanding the order of ſucceſſion, ſettled and eſtabliſhed at the revolution, pretended to inſinuate, that the Princeſs of Denmark ought immediately to ſucceed her ſiſter, who alone had a right to the throne, and as King William acceeded to it, in her right only, that right ceaſed by her death, and of courſe devolved to the next heir. Theſe pretenſes, being

(1) By this bill it was inacted, that a parliament ſhould be held once in three years at leaſt, and that no parliament ſhould continue longer than three years, from the day appointed by the writs for their meeting.

The ſame day this act paſſed the royal aſſent, mr. Dyer, a news-letter-writer, was reprimanded by the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, for preſuming to intermeddle with their proceedings.

Will'III. An' 1694.

directly oppoſite to an expreſs act of parliament, fell away of courſe: but the ſame party which made this oppoſition to King William's right, being defeated in their expectations, raiſed another objection, which, at firſt view, ſeemed to carry ſomething more of reaſon with it, viz. that the preſent parliament having been convened in the name of William and Mary, was of courſe diſſolved, by the death of this Princeſs. This poſition, had it taken place, might, at this time, have been of infinite prejudice to the King and nation. All public affairs muſt have been ſuſpended, at a time when every interruption would have been pernicious. New elections might have cauſed great diſorders throughout the whole kingdom, and a new parliament might have been of yet worſe conſequence: but it happily appeared, that the ſame act, which veſted King William and Queen Mary with the royal dignity, veſted King William with the ſole and whole adminiſtration of the government, which fully anſwered this objection, and put an end to that deſtructive project.

And to the eſſence of the ſaid parliament.

But in vain.

In the mean time, both houſes of parliament, to ſhew their deteſtation of theſe principles, attended his Majeſty, the laſt day of the year, with their addreſſes of condolance, on this melancholy occaſion.

The lords addreſs of condolance.

"The lords humbly aſſured his Majeſty, with "inexpreſſible grief, of the deep ſenſe they had of "the loſs his Majeſty and the whole kingdom "ſuſtained by the death of that excellent Princeſs, "the Queen: beſeeching his Majeſty, that he "would not indulge his grief, to the prejudice of "the health of his royal perſon; in whoſe preſervation, not only the welfare of his own ſubjects, but of all Chriſtendom, was ſo nearly concerned. They alſo begged leave to renew to his "Majeſty the hearty and ſincere aſſurances of "their utmoſt aſſiſtance, againſt all his enemies, "both at home and abroad, and of all other "demonſtrations of the greateſt duty and affection, "that could poſſibly be paid by the moſt faithful "ſubjects.

The King's anſwer.

To this addreſs his Majeſty anſwer'd: "That "he heartily thank'd them for their kindneſs to "him: but much more for the ſenſe they ſhew'd "of their great loſs, which was above what he "could expreſs.

The commons "condoled, with unſpeakable "grief of heart, the irreparable loſs of that moſt "excellent Princeſs, to enumerate whoſe virtues "(ſaid they) were to aggravate our ſorrow.

Addreſs of the commons.

"We cannot (added they) but bleſs God for the "preſervation of your Majeſty to us, on whoſe "life the welfare and happineſs of this kingdom, "and the liberties of Europe, do, in ſo great a "meaſure, depend; humbly beſeeching your "Majeſty, ſo to moderate your grief, under this "affliction, as not to prejudice or indanger your "health, and that your Majeſty would pleaſe to "take ſuch farther care of your royal perſon, that "we may all injoy the bleſſing of your Majeſty's "long life, and happy reign: we do alſo (ſaid they "in the concluſion) look upon it as a duty we "owe, to your Majeſty, to ourſelves, and to "thoſe we repreſent, to take this occaſion of "aſſuring your Majeſty, that we, your faithful "commons, will always, to the utmoſt of our "power, ſtand by, ſupport and defend your Majeſty, and your government, againſt all your "enemies, both at home and abroad."

To which, the King made anſwer; "that he "took very kindly their care of him, and the public: eſpecially at this time, when he was able "to think of nothing but their great loſs.

Will'III. An' 1694.

His Majeſty's anſwer.

Theſe addreſſes of condolance were, ſoon after, followed by the like from the city of London, and moſt corporations throughout his Majeſty dominions. But nothing gave greater ſatisfaction to the King, than a letter he received from her Royal Highneſs, the Princeſs Ann, of Denmark, in which, "ſhe deſired him to accept of her ſincere and hearty ſorrow, for his great affliction, in the loſs of "the Queen: and did aſſure his Majeſty, that ſhe "was as ſenſibly troubled with his misfortune, as "if ſhe had never been ſo unhappy to fall under "her diſpleaſure. She earneſtly deſired his Majeſty to give her leave to wait upon him, as ſoon "as it could be, with no inconveniency to him, "and without danger of increaſing his affliction, "that ſhe might have an opportunity, in perſon, "not only of repeating this, but aſſuring his Majeſty, of her real intention, to omit no occaſion "of giving him conſtant proofs of her ſincere reſpect and concern for his perſonal intereſt and "ſafety." By this all apprehenſions were removed of the Princeſs's forming a party againſt his Majeſty, and he took theſe offers of friendſhip ſo kindly, that he is ſaid to have immediately made her a preſent of the greater part of the late Queen's jewels (1).

An' 1695.

Princeſs Ann's letter to King William.

Having given a brief account of the univerſal ſorrow occaſioned by the death of this excellent Princeſs, it might be expected, that I ſhould draw a ſketch of her character: but as that has been ſo often done by others already, and it is ſo univerſally known, as well as admired, I ſhall only ſum it up, in theſe few words: "that ſhe was a tender and "reſpectful wife, a kind friend, a gentle miſtreſs, a "gracious Queen, a good Chriſtian, and the beſt "of women; and as ſhe was the glory and delight "of this happy iſland, ſo her memory will ever "be bleſſed, and live among us."

Character of the Queen.

The royal corps having lain in ſtate, at Whitehall, till the 5th of March, was that day inter'd, with great magnificence. Not only her Majeſty's houſhold ſervants, but all the judges, ſerjeants at law, lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and, what raiſed that mournful pomp to the higheſt pitch of ſplendor, both houſes of parliament, attended the remains of that incomparable Princeſs, from Whitehall to Weſtminſter-abby, the ducheſs of Somerſet being chief mourner. The archbiſhop of Canterbury having preach'd a funeral oration, in honor of her late Majeſty's bleſſed and pious memory, the royal corps was afterward depoſited in a vault in King Henry the VIIth's chapel.

Her funeral.

But to return to the proceedings in parliament. The bill I mentioned above, "for the frequent "meeting of parliaments," having happily received the royal aſſent, before the death, and even before the ſickneſs of the Queen, was a favorable incident for King William: for had he not given his aſſent to that bill, till after the Queen's death, people would have been apt to judge, that the neceſſity of his affairs had obliged him to it. But now, the commons, being ſatisfied in that point, went unanimouſly about the ſupply, and other affairs of importance.

Proceedings in parliament.

The 12th of January, it was ordered; that a "ſtate of the revenue, with the loans, debts, and "charges thereupon, and likewiſe an account of "the eſtabliſhment, charge and expenſe of the

Ways and means.

(1) It is ſaid that the new archbiſhop of Canterbury, dr. Tenniſon, laying hold of this favorable opportunity to reconcile the Royal family, repreſented to his Majeſty, both her Royal Highneſs's, and her Royal Conſort Prince George of Denmark's prudent and loyal conduct, during their receſs from court; urging, that by their intereſt, they might have given his Majeſty conſiderable diſturbance; but they were ſo far from any ſuch deſign, that thoſe members of either houſe of parliament, who had places under their Highneſſes, had always appeared foremoſt, in promoting his Majeſty's intereſt. WILL' III. AN' 1695.

" civil liſt, ſhould be laid before the houſe, by " the commiſſioners of the treaſury, and thoſe for " taking and ſtating the public accounts." The ſaid ſtate and account having been communicated accordingly, and examined in the houſe, " the bill " for granting to his Majeſty an aid of four ſhil- " lings in the pound" was brought into form, and another bill tacked to it ; " for applying the yearly " ſum of 30,000 l. for five years, out of the duties " ariſing by an act of this preſent ſeſſion of parlia- " ment, for granting to his Majeſty a ſubſidy of " tonage and poundage, &c." Theſe two bills, thus made into one, were read the third time, paſſed, and ſent up to the lords, on the 7th of February, and ſent back by their lordſhips, without any amendments, on the 11th. The King went, the ſame day, to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal ſanction to that, and two other acts, viz. " one for exempting of apothecaries ſerving " upon juries, and other pariſh and ward-offices ; " and another for rebuilding the town of Warwick, " and for determining differences touching houſes " burnt or demoliſhed, by reaſon of the late dread- " ful fire there.

Lancaſhire plot examin'd into.

The 6th of February, the houſe of commons, after ſeveral hearings, ſtrict examinations and long debates, which had continued, at the ſeveral appointed times, for the ſpace of eleven weeks, proceeded farther in reading ſeveral informations and papers, delivered in to the houſe, by mr. Aaron Smith, touching certain proceedings and trials in Lancaſhire and Cheſhire (1). After reading of theſe and ſeveral other, as well written as printed papers, the houſe came to the following reſolutions, viz. that it did appear to the houſe; firſt, " that there " was ſufficient grounds for the proſecution and " trials of the gentlemen at Mancheſter, " and " ſecondly, that there was a dangerous plot carried " on againſt the government."

The ſame complaints were afterwards laid before the houſe of peers, where, after examining ſome witneſſes, and many debates, the queſtion being put; " whether the government had ſufficient cauſe " to proſecute the Lancaſhire and Cheſhire gentle- " men ?" it was carried in the affirmative.

Proceedings againſt briberies.

Tho' this buſineſs occaſioned a great noiſe, yet that was nothing to what inſued upon the ſtrict inquiry made by the houſe of commons into bribery, and the timely check they gave to that ſcandalous and moſt dangerous corruption, which had tainted not only the agents of the army, and ſeveral members of the houſe of commons, but alſo the ſpeaker of that auguſt aſſembly, and was even crept into his Majeſty's privy-council : which inquiries, tho' they afterwards went a great length, were begun on a very trivial occaſion.

The 12th of January, the inhabitants of Royſton in Hertfordſhire, came by petition before the houſe of commons, ſeting forth, " that the officers and " ſoldiers exacted ſubſiſtence-mony of them, in " their quarters." The petitioners, and likewiſe mr. Tracy Pauncefort, agent of colonel Haſtings's regiment, and the officers complained of, being examined, it was unanimouſly reſolved, the twenty-third of that month, " that the officers and ſoldiers " of the army demanding and exacting ſubſiſtence- " mony, in their quarters, or upon their march, " is arbitrary and illegal, and a great violation of " the rights and liberties of the ſubject," and thereupon ordered, " that the commiſſioners for taking " and ſtating the public accounts do lay before the " houſe their obſervations of the abuſes and ill " practiſes commited by the agents of the regiments " of the army, and that the ſaid agent Pauncefort " ſhould forthwith lay before the houſe a particu- " lar account of all the monies received by him, " from the earl of Ranelaugh, and the times of " ſuch receipts, ſince the 28th of May laſt ; and " how he had paid the ſame, and when, and to " whom, and what remained in his hands.

WILL'III. AN' 1695.

The 25th, Mr. Harley, from the commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public accounts, preſented to the houſe, purſuant to the above orders, their obſervations of the ill practiſes commited by the agents ; which being taken into conſideration, and mr. Tracy Pauncefort, upon bringing in his account, the 29th, being, together with colonel Haſtings, major Montcal, and ſome other officers and agents examined, it was reſolved, by the houſe, " that agent Tracy Pauncefort, for neglecting to " pay the ſubſiſtence-mony, to the officers and ſol- " diers that quartered at Royſton, having monies " in his hands to do the ſame, be taken into the " cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms attending the " houſe." The 12th of February, mr. Tracy Pauncefort was again examined, but refuſing to anſwer to ſeveral queſtions, tho' required to do it, under the penalty of being proceeded againſt with the utmoſt rigor and ſeverity, it was unanimouſly reſolved : " that by his obſtinate refuſal, to an- " ſwer to a matter of fact demanded of him by the " houſe, he had violated the privileges, and con- " temned the authority of the houſe, and the fun- " damental conſtitution thereof. For which of- " fenſe he was immediately commited priſoner to the Tower. The 15th, he petitioned the commons for his diſcharge, but being thereupon again examined, and not given then ſuch anſwers as were ſatisfactory, he was remanded thither.

The next who was brought upon the ſtage, was mr. Edward Pauncefort, brother of mr. Tracy Pauncefort, who, being ſummon'd, was, on the 16th of February, examined by the houſe ; after which, it was reſolved ; " That he, for contriving " to cheat colonel Haſtings's regiment of five hun- " dred guineas, and for giving a bribe to obtain the " King's bounty, be taken into the cuſtody of the " ſerjeant at arms attending the houſe." He was immediately follow'd by mr. Henry Guy, a member of the houſe, in whoſe caſe, upon conſideration of the foremention'd obſervations, it was the ſame day reſolved, " That he, for taking a bribe of " two hundred guineas, be commited priſoner to " the Tower." Upon this, the houſe, on the 26th, in order to redreſs the notorious abuſes, ill practiſes, and intolerable exactions of the colonels and their agents, upon the inferior officers and common ſoldiers, agreed upon an humble repreſentation to the King, in which they laid before his Majeſty :

Repreſentation of the commons to the King.

1 " That ſome of the agents had detained the " mony due to the ſoldiers, in their hands, and " made uſe of it for their own advantage ; inſtead of " immediately applying it to the ſubſiſtence of the " officers and ſoldiers, for whom they were in- " truſted,

2. " That by their intolerable exactions, and great " extortions, upon the officers and ſoldiers, for " paying mony, by way of advance, and by their " charging more for the diſcount of tallies, than

(1) It will be neceſſary to obſerve, in order to give the reader an idea of this affair : that towards the begining of this ſeſſion, ſeveral gentlemen of Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, who had been tried at Mancheſter, for the Lancaſhire-plot, and acquited, inſtead of acknowledging their good fortune, and the lenity of the government, indeavored to repreſent thoſe proſecutions, as a ſtate-trick, and the contrivance of ſome courtiers to inrich themſelves by the ruin of others : They, therefore, ſubmited the whole matter to the examination of the houſe of commons ; and this was the occaſion of the debates I have mentioned, and the reſolutions which inſued.

they

" they actually paid, it appear'd; that thoſe who " ſerved in his Majeſty's armies, notwithſtanding " they had greater pay, than is given in any " other part of the world, were yet reduced to " inconveniencies and extremities, which ought not " to be put upon thoſe, who venture their lives for " the honor and ſafety of the nation.

3. " That, in particular, colonel Haſtings had " compell'd ſome officers of his regiment, to take " their cloaths from him, at extravagant rates, by " confining and threatning thoſe, who would not " comply therewith; by which the authority, that " might be neceſſary to be lodg'd in the colonel, " over the inferior officers, in ſome caſes, was miſ- " applied, and extended ſo as to promote a private " advantage of his own, without any regard to " his Majeſty's ſervice, or to the diſcipline of the " army.

4. " That colonel Haſtings's agent had preſumed " fraudulently to detain five hundred guineas out of " a bounty given by his Majeſty, to the officers " of that regiment, under pretenſe of giving them " as a bribe to obtain the ſame, to the diſhonor of " his Majeſty, and injury of the officers: and had " taken two pence per pound out of the mony due " to the officers and ſoldiers; for which deduction, " there being no warrant, the colonel, whoſe ſer- " vant the agent is, was anſwerable.

5. " That colonel Haſtings's agent had refus'd or " neglected to give an account of the pay due to " the captains of his regiment, and their compa- " nies, which tended, apparently, to the defraud- " ing the officers and ſoldiers.

6. " That ſome of the agents aſſumed to them- " ſelves, the liberty of making great deductions, " which ſince they knew not how to juſtify, they " indeavor'd to cover, by puting them under the " ſhelter of the uncertain head of contingencies, " which gave them the better opportunity of hid- " ing the frauds and abuſes, that would otherwiſe " be more liable to be detected.

7. " That colonel Haſtings had diſcharg'd an " enſign, by puting another into his room, con- " trary to the true diſcipline of an army; from " which the colonels have no right to exempt them- " ſelves, to inlarge their own authority, to the " prejudice of his Majeſty's ſervice, and of the " officers that ſerve under them."

8. " That colonel Haſtings had taken mony " for the recommending to commands in his regi- " ment, to the great diſcouragement of the officers " who were to ſerve in his Majeſty's armies, who " ought to be ſuch as deſerved their commands, " and not ſuch as paid for them: which things " they moſt humbly repreſented to his Majeſty, " in confidence of having them redreſs'd, by his " Majeſty's juſtice and wiſdom.

His Majeſty's anſwer.

This repreſentation being preſented to the King, the 4th of March, by the whole houſe, his Majeſty was pleas'd to anſwer; " that he would conſider it, " and take all care poſſible to have the grievances " redreſs'd."

In order thereto, colonel Haſtings, againſt whom the facts were notoriouſly proved, was immediately caſhier'd, and his regiment given to ſir John Jacob, his lieutenant-colonel. But I do not find, that any other offenders were puniſhed on this account: however, to prevent the like irregularities for the future, on the 13th of March, his Majeſty's declaration was publiſhed, for the ſtrict diſcipline of the army, in which, particularly, " all " officers and ſoldiers, were ſtrictly forbid, to exact " or demand ſubſiſtence-mony in their quarters, or " on their march" (1).

Proclamation for ſtrict diſcipline.

Will' III. An' 1695.

The commons did, indeed, proceed to call before them ſeveral of the contracters for cloathing of the army, in order to come at a farther knowledge of the male-practiſes of the colonels and their agents. Mr. James Craggs, in particular, was ſummoned to attend the houſe of commons, but upon refuſing to produce his books, or to be examined upon oath, and thereby obſtructing the inquiry of the houſe, into the diſpoſal of the public mony, it was reſolved, on the 7th of March, " that he be " commited priſoner to the Tower of London." The 26th, mr. Harley reported the farther examination of mr. Edward Pauncefort, and that mr. Richard Harnage, another of the contracters for cloathing the army, had refuſed to be examined upon oath, upon which it was ordered, " that " a bill be brought in, to oblige mr. Edward " Pauncefort, to diſcover how he diſpos'd the " monies paid into his hands, relating to the army, " and for puniſhing him in caſe he ſhould not make " ſuch diſcovery, and that mr. Tracy Pauncefort, " mr. James Craggs, and mr. Richard Harnage, " be included in the ſaid bill." The 1ſt of April, mr. Harnage was alſo order'd to be taken into cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms attending the houſe.

Contracters for cloathing commited.

Theſe inquiries came, however, to little or nothing; whether it was, that ſo many great perſons were concern'd in theſe frauds, as had influence to prevent any farther proceedings, or whether the offenders, who were very numerous (2), found means to bribe ſome leading men, or whether the diſcovery of more notorious corruptions (of which I ſhall quickly give an account) took off the attention of thoſe who were to proſecute the officers and agents, to purſue more noble game, I ſhall not determine: but certain it is, they were never puniſh'd according to their deſerts: and it is as certain, that ſuch like frauds, and other ill-managements of the revenue, contributed greatly to that heavy debt, which the nation yet ſtrugles under, and that two thirds of the vaſt ſupplies, which were yearly given, honeſtly and prudently manag'd, would have gone as far, as thoſe enormous ſums.

Theſe inquiries not duly purſued.

The commiſſioners for licenſing hackney-coaches, were, likewiſe, about this time, accuſed of bribery, and three of them, viz. Henry Killegrew, Henry Villers, and Richard Gee, eſqs; upon an addreſs of the houſe of commons to his Majeſty, for that purpoſe, remov'd from the commiſſion.

Commiſſioners for Hackney-coaches removed.

But I proceed to diſplay a ſcene of iniquity among perſons of a higher rank. The Eaſt-india-company had been ſeveral times ſtruck at. Great complaints were made of their patent, as an illegal monopoly. Another company was propos'd to be erected by parliament, or, at leaſt, the trade laid open to all his Majeſty's ſubjects; but they had always found means, when they were hardeſt purſued, to ſoften thoſe gentlemen, who appear'd moſt zealous againſt their patent. It was particularly obſerv'd, that thoſe, who, in former ſeſſions, had been their greateſt enemies, were, in this ſeſſion, become their advocates. The ſuſpicions, that great ſums had been diſtributed among ſome leading members, in behalf of the company, were at length, ſo great, that the houſe of commons, thought fit, on the Briberies in the caſe of the Eaſt-india-company inquir'd into.

WILL' III. AN' 1695.

A committee appointed for that purpose.

7th of March, to appoint Paul Foley, esq; sir Richard Onslow, John Pollexsen, esq; sir John Thomson, Foot Onslow, esq; Thomas Pelham, esq; Sir Samuel Bernadiston, Thomas Wharton, esq; and Francis Gwin, esq; to be a committee to inspect the books of the East-India-company, and impower'd them to send for persons and papers.

Report of the committee.

The 12th of March, mr. Foley, from that committee, reported; that as soon as they came to the East-India-house, they called for an account of all monies paid for the special service of the company; upon perusal of which observing, that the greatest payment was in the year 1693, they searched for the orders for issuing that mony, the chief of which were, one dated the 13th of April 1693, another dated the 24th of November 1693, and another the 22d of January 1693-4, in pursuance of which, the sums of 22,275, l. 24,983 l. and 30,000 l. were severally paid out of the cash, amounting in all to 77,258 l. beside several smaller sums, amounting in the whole to 10,144 l. which, with the former sum, makes 87,402 l. all issued in the year 1693, while sir Thomas Cooke was governor, and Francis Tyssen, esq; deputy-governor, for the special service of the house, and obtaining a new charter. That they found by examination of most of the persons present at the committee of the East-India-company, where the said orders were made: the governor, in the said committees, did only, in general, inform what sums he had disbursed without naming the particulars, to whom, or to what service, which several of them said was a new course, since sir Thomas Cooke came to be deputy-governor or governor. That in a state of the company's cash, dated at the East-India-house, the 7th of March 1694-5, and drawn up by several members of the company impowered for that purpose, near all the aforesaid sums were observed to be paid, and placed to the company's account of charges general, paid out of cash, viz. in 1688, and 1689, sir Benjamin Bathurst governor, and sir Josiah Child, deputy-governor, 2230 l. 14 s; in 1690 and 1691, sir Joseph Herne governor, and sir Thomas Cooke deputy-governor, 13,532 l. 9 s; in 1692 and 1693, sir Thomas Cooke, governor, and mr. Tyssen, deputy governor, 87,402 l. 12 s; in the whole 103,165 l. 15 s. That upon examination of the company's cash-book, having found the ballance, the 31st of October 1694, was 124,249 l. they demanded of mr. Portman, the cashier, if he had the same in cash? that he replied he had not, but instead thereof, laid before them in writing, that 90,000 l. were lent upon sir Thomas Cooke's notes, which he produced, with other particulars, that made up the above-mentioned balance. That, in his note, sir Thomas Cooke owned the receit of 90,000 l. which he had disbursed and paid for 99,197 l. stock in the East-India-company, for their account: tho' they did not find any warrant for the said sum, or any of that stock transferred in the company's books, for their account, exceeding 18,300 l. the 16th of January 1694-5. They reported farther, that they found a contract dated the 26th of February, 1693, for 200 ton of salt-petre, to be brought home in the ship Seymour, from India, to pay 12,000 l. for the same, and 25 l. freight, per ton, beside all charges here. That 2000 l. which was the sum sent out to purchase the said salt-petre, was actually paid out of the company's cash, and that a bond for the remaining 10,000 l. was given under the seal of the company, payable the 31st of March 1695, whether the ship arrived in safety or not, with this limitation only, that if 200 ton of salt-petre be not laden on the said ship, than to repay in proportion to the want thereof: so that the result of this contract was, that the company run the adventure of 12,000 l. for that which cost only 2000 l. and must consequently lose 12,000 l. if the ship miscarried. And, on the contrary, the seller got 10,000 l. clear, without disbursing, or running the hazard of one penny, and what is yet more, a certain loss of 9, or 10,000 l. would attend it, if the ship arriv'd in safety. That the committee having examin'd the members of the company concerning this contract, they own'd it to be true, that the 2000 l. was paid, and the 10,000 l. bond given to mr. Thomas Colston. That about the same time this contract was made, so many of the Interlopers as would sell their shares in the Interlopers to the East-India-company, were allow'd their first cost, and 25 per cent. advance; which was done by giving them credit for so much in the East-India-company's books. That the committee found sir Samuel Dashwood, sir John Fleet, John Perry, esq; sir Joseph Herne, and sir Thomas Cooke were present at the court of committees, when the orders above-mentioned were made; but they being all members of the house of commons, the committee did not think fit to examine them. That the rest of the committees, who were present at making those orders, and most of whom had been examined, could give no account of the disposal of the mony issued out during the time of sir Joseph Herne and sir Thomas Cooke's government; but only that the same was paid for special service, and that a great part thereof was put into the hands of sir Basil Firebrass. That one of them, viz. sir Benjamin Bathurst, said, sir Joseph Herne had the greatest part of the 13,932 l. 9 s. to dispose of, and sir Benjamin Bathurst would have call'd for an account thereof, but sir Thomas Cooke desir'd he would not. That the company's committee of nine had often call'd upon sir Thomas Cooke, to give an account to whom he had distributed the mony he received, which he had sometime promis'd, and afterwards declined it: so that the secret of that service, and the placing of that mony, lay principally with sir Thomas Cooke and sir Joseph Herne. That sir Benjamin Bathurst, finding so great a sum as 30,000 l. charged for secret services, he had some warm discourse with sir Thomas Cooke about it, to know how it was disburs'd: but Sir Thomas refus'd to give him any particulars, and told him, he should remember he was bound by his oath to the company, to keep their secrets. To which, sir Benjamin replied; he was under the same obligation, to be true to the interest of the company. Sir Benjamin Bathurst farther said, that about April 1694, understanding that they were in want of mony, he look'd into the cash-book, which casting up, he found a considerable sum in cash, and taking some persons with him, discoursed sir Thomas Cooke about it, who said the 90,000 l. he had received, was to gratify some persons, in case the bill should pass. As for the contract about salt-petre, sir Benjamin Bathurst said, it was made by sir Thomas Cooke and sir Basil Firebrass, but he knew nothing of it, 'till it came into court. The committee farther reported, that sir Basil Firebrass, being examined, owned he had received upwards of 16,000 l. which was for buying shares of stocks, and of which the company had allow'd: but said, he knew no ground the committee of nine had to say, that a great part of the other sums were put into his hands. He confessed he invited several persons to come into the company, and offered to lay down mony for several, and that if they liked it not, at the year's end, he would then take it off their hands, which offer he made to some members of parliament, among others, and gave an account to the company of his doing so, who promised to indemnify him. That concerning the accommodation with the Interlopers, the company had a letter from the lord Nottingham, that that it was the King's pleaſure, that they ſhould come to an agreement, with the Interlopers. That the propoſal to them was 25 per cent. for bringing in their ſtock to the company, and one half of the profit beſide, which one half of the Interlopers accepted; but mr. Godfrey, and ſome others, ſtanding upon 30 per cent, mr. Colſton went off with them, and did not come into the company. That mr. Ward ſaid, it was agreed by the Interlopers, that only 2000 l. ſhould be imploy'd in buying ſalt-petre; that mr. Colſton was to have the advantage of it, which he believed was not for mr. Colſton himſelf, but for ſome other gentlemen; and laſtly, that the original inducement, to the leave of the Interlopers going out, was that agreement with mr. Colſton.

Bribery in the caſe of the orphans bill examin'd into.

This committee being, likewiſe, appointed, to inſpect the books of the chamberlain of the city of London, to ſee what ſums had been diſtributed among the members of the houſe of commons, for facilitating the paſſing of the orphans bill; they reported, that they found an order made by the committee of the common-council of the city, dated the 12th of February 1693-4. directing the chamberlain to pay ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, 1000 guineas, ſo ſoon as a bill was paſs'd into an act of parliament, for ſatisfying the debts of the orphans, and other creditors of the ſaid city; which ſum was paid and deliver'd to ſir John Trevor, on the 22d of June 1694, in the preſenſe of ſir Robert Clayton and ſir James Houblon. That they found another order, dated the 26th of April 1694, for paying Paul Jodrel, eſq; clerk of the houſe, 100 guineas, for his pains and ſervice, in aſſiſting the orphans bill to paſs the parliament: that ſeveral other ſums were entered in the chamberlain's book, paid to mr. Barret, the city-ſolicitor, to defray the charge of drawing the bill, and making copies thereof, and of the petitions and orders relating to the ſame; among which payments were five guineas paid to mr. ſolicitor-general for his advice, five guineas to mr. Harcourt, twenty-three guineas, to mr. Hungerford, chairman of the committee, for his pains and ſervice, and ſixty pounds to mr. Jodrell; and they underſtood that the orphans had given bond to mr. Smith and to mr. Charles Nois, to allow them twelve pence in the pound, when the bill paſs'd: that the ſaid Nois and Smith produced to the committee of the common council, a bill of their charges, amounting to 3457 l. 16 s. and alledged that they were then 10000 l. out of purſe. Upon which report, the commons reſolved, "that their ſpeaker, ſir John Trevor, receiving a "gratuity of 1000 guineas, after paſſing the or-"phans bill, was guilty of a high crime and miſ-"demeanor;" and he was obliged, after having been forced to hear all that could be ſaid to his diſadvantage, to put the ungrateful queſtion himſelf. He did not, however, think fit to offer any thing in his defenſe, but ſending the mace, the next day, to the houſe, abſented himſelf, upon which, on the 14th, Paul Foley, eſq; was choſen ſpeaker in his room (1). The 16th, the commons reſolved, "that ſir John Trevor, being declar'd guilty of a "high crime and miſdemeanor, be expelled the "houſe." The 18th, they paſſed a vote; "that "whoever ſhould diſcover any mony, or other gra-"tuity, given to any member of the houſe, for "matters tranſacted in the houſe, relating to the "orphans bill, or the Eaſt-India-company, ſhould "have the indemnity of the houſe for ſuch gift." And ordered, that mr. Charles Nois, and ſeveral others, ſhould attend the houſe, the next day. Mr. Nois attended, accordingly, and being examined, it was reſolved, "that he having pretended, to "ſeveral perſons, that he was out of purſe, or in-"gaged to give great ſums of mony to ſeveral mem-"bers of the houſe, in order to paſs the orphans "bill, which, on his examination he denied to "have given or promiſed, had been an occaſion of "ſcandal to the houſe, and the members thereof:" and it was thereupon order'd, that the ſaid Nois be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms, attending the houſe. Mr. Bird, an attorney, was alſo brought upon his knees, at the bar of the houſe of commons, and reprimanded, for having offer'd bribes to ſeveral members. The 26th, the commons reſolved, "that mr. Hungerford, one of "their members, having received twenty guineas for "his pains and ſervice, as chairman of the com-"mittee of the houſe, to whom the orphans bill "was committed, was guilty of a high crime and "miſdeameanor, and that he be expell'd the houſe.

Will' III. An' 1695.

The ſame day, they ordered, "that ſir Thomas "Cooke, a member of that houſe, having refuſed "to give an account how the 87,402 l. mentioned "in the report of the committee, was diſtributed, "be commited priſoner to the Tower of London; "and that a bill be brought on to oblige him to "ſuch account." This bill was preſented and read the firſt time, the 28th; and, on the 6th of April, ſir Thomas having, according to his petition for that purpoſe, been previouſly heard by his counſel, againſt the bill, it was read the third time, paſſed, and ſent up to the houſe of peers, for their concurrence.

The firſt time this bill was read, in the houſe of lords, the duke of Leeds, (2) preſident of his Majeſty's privy-council, made a vehement ſpeech againſt it; making previouſly a ſolemn proteſtation of his own innocency and diſintereſtedneſs, which did but raiſe ſuſpicions, that otherwiſe might not have been thought of. The lords proceeded however, in the bill, and having, on the 13th of April, deſired and obtained an order from the commons, that ſir Thomas Cooke, a member of their houſe, but then a priſoner in the Tower, might attend that houſe, in order to be examined, ſir Thomas declared, at their bar, "that he was "ready and willing to make a full diſcovery, and "ſaid he would have done it before the houſe of "commons, if he could have obtained a vote to "indemnify him." He being, thereupon, aſked what he deſired to be indemnified from, he anſwered from Scandalum magnatum, and all actions and ſuits, except from the Eaſt-India-company, whom, if he had injured, he would willingly ſuffer for it, whatever the ſtricteſt rigor of the law could inflict upon him. Sir Thomas being withdrawn, the duke of Leeds ſtood up again, and declared: "he "was very glad that gentleman was come to ſuch "a temper, as to be willing to diſcover, whereby "that bill was prevented, which he eſteemed of "ſo pernicious a nature." His grace then minded their lordſhips, "how the commons had taken "care of the reputation of their own houſe, "in aſking ſir Thomas Cooke, whether he had "diſtributed any mony, among any of their mem-"bers? who purged them by a ſolemn proteſta-"tion, that he had not. His grace, therefore, "thought it ſeaſonable, that the lords ſhould have "ſome regard to themſelves, and moved, that "ſir Thomas Cooke might be called in, and "aſked, whether he were willing, upon oath, to "purge all that ſate there"? This motion being "rejected, the lords reſolved, "that the bill

(1) Sir Thomas Littleton was propoſed as a canditate againſt him, and the majority ſeem'd to favor him: but mr. comptroller Wharton having ſpoken in his behalf, it was immediately preſum'd that he was a ſtaunch courtier, and, thereupon, the majority fell on the other ſide.

(2) He was marquis of Caermarthen, and had been made a duke, with that title, the 30th of April 1694.

Acts paſs'd.

This bill paſſed both houſes by the 19th of April, and received the royal aſſent the 22d of the ſame month. His Majeſty, at the ſame time, gave the royal ſanction to ſeveral other acts, viz. 1. " To an act for inabling ſuch perſons as had " eſtates for life in annuities, payable by ſeveral " acts therein mentioned, to purchaſe and obtain " farther or more certain intereſts in ſuch annui- " ties; and in default thereof, for admiting other " perſons to purchaſe or obtain the ſame, for raiſing " mony to carry on the war (1). 2. To an act for " granting to his Majeſty certain rates and duties " upon marriages, births and burials, and upon " bachelors and widowers for five years. 3. An " act for granting to his Majeſty ſeveral additional " duties upon coffee, tea, chocolate and ſpi- " ces, towards ſatisfaction of the debts due for " tranſport ſervice, for the reduction of Ireland. " 4. An act for the more effectual ſuppreſſing pro- " phane curſing and ſwearing. 5. An act to con- " tinue two former acts for puniſhing officers and " ſoldiers, &c. 6. An act for explaining and " regulating ſeveral doubts, duties and penalties, " in the late act for granting ſeveral duties upon " vellom, parchment and paper; and for aſcertain- " ing the admeaſurement of the tonage of ſhips. " 7. An act for raiſing the militia of the king- " dom, for the year 1695, and for repealing the ſta- " tute of the ſecond and third years of K. Edw. VI, " intitled, an act for ſhooting in hail-ſhot. " 8. An act for continuing ſeveral laws therein " mentioned. 9. An act for the better admeaſure- " ment of keels and keel-boats, in the port of " New-caſtle, and the members thereunto belong- " ing: 10. An act for making ſalt-water freſh"; and to ſeveral private acts.

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

His Majeſty then laid hold of this occaſion to tell both houſes, " that the ſeaſon of the year was ſo far " advanced, and the circumſtances of affairs were " ſo preſſing, that he very earneſtly recommended " to them the ſpeedy diſpatch of ſuch buſineſs as " they thought of moſt importance for the public " good, becauſe he muſt put an end to this ſeſſion, " in a few days."

Two addreſſes from the commons.

The next day, two addreſſes were preſented by the houſe of commons, to his Majeſty; the firſt, " that he would be pleaſed to give directions to the " colonels and officers of the army imployed in " the reduction of Ireland, to ſatisfy their inferior " officers and ſoldiers, as far as they had received " mony from his Majeſty:" the ſecond, " to deſire " his Majeſty would take care for the future, that " this kingdom be put upon an equal foot and pro- " portion, with the allies, in bearing the charges " of the preſent war."

The King's anſwer.

To the firſt of thoſe addreſſes his Majeſty anſwered: " that he had already given orders as well " in Flanders as in England, to do what they " deſired."

To the ſecond, he anſwered only in general terms; " that in this, as well as every thing elſe, " he ſhould always indeavor to have a due regard " to the intereſt and honor of the nation."

The act to indemniſy ſir Thomas Cooke, being paſſed, the lords let the houſe of commons know, that they had reſolved to nominate twelve of their houſe, to be of the committee of lords and commons appointed by the ſaid act; upon which the commons reſolved, that twenty-four of their houſe ſhould be of that committee, and ordered that ſir Thomas Cooke ſhould attend the ſaid committee the next day.

WILL' III. AN' 1695.

Continuation of the Eaſt-India company's affairs.

The 23d of April, ſir Thomas Cooke appeared accordingly before the committee, and being ſworn, he delivered to them, in writing, his diſcovery of the diſpoſal and application of 67,000 l. and 90,000 l. In his account of the former, he mentioned 10,000 l. to be delivered to Francis Tyſſen, eſq; 12,000 l. to mr. Richard Acton; 338 l. to mr. Nathaniel Molyneux; 220 l. to ſir John Chardin; 350 l. to Paul Dominicque, eſq; 382 l. to captain John Germain; 1000 guineas to colonel Fitz-Patric; 545 l. to Charles Bates, eſq; and 40,000 l. to ſir Baſil Firebraſs, all which, were ſaid to be paid for ſpecial ſervice of the Eaſt-India-company, to defray the charges, and acknowledge the pains and ſervices of the afore-mentioned perſons, and their friends, on ſolliciting to prevent a new ſettlement of the Eaſt-India-company; or to indeavor the eſtabliſhment of the old, or in conſideration of loſſes they had by the Eaſt-India-ſtock. Beſide 500 guineas paid to the attorney-general, 200 to the ſolicitor-general, and 200 more to mr. Sambrock, for their trouble and charges in paſſing the charters, and other affairs relating to the company. As for the ſum of 90,000 l. mentioned in the bill, it was ſaid to be laid out in buying Eaſt-India-ſtock of ſeveral perſons, for account of the Eaſt-India-company.

The committee, conceiving this account to be imperfect, let ſir Thomas Cooke know, that a more particular account of theſe matters was required of him; upon which he ſaid farther; that as to the firſt ſum of 10,000 l. paid to mr. Tyſſen, in tallies in 1692, no directions were given him how he was to diſpoſe of it; but it was in expectation of having the charter of the Eaſt-India company confirmed: that it was intended for the ſervice of the King; tho' he could not ſay the King had it, he believed mr. Tyſſen told him, that he delivered it to ſir Joſiah Child, who preſented it to his Majeſty, as a cuſtomary preſent, for the like had been done in former reigns, as appeared by their books. That as to the 12,000 l. it was paid to mr. Richard Acton, who declared he had ſeveral friends capable of doing great ſervice to the company's affairs, and ſeveral of them would ſpeak to parliament-men. That he could not name them, but the end aimed at was to get an act of parliament; that this mony went no farther than the houſe of commons; and that he found no fruit of that diſtribution. That as to the 338 l. paid to mr. Molineux, he pretended this mony was to be diſpoſed of to the lord Rivers; but ſince his confinement, he owned that lord never had it, and that he kept it for his own uſe. That as to the 1000 guineas to the late mr. Fitz-patric, he pretended he had great intereſt with the lord Nottingham, and doubted not but he could do great ſervices, provided he had ſuch a ſum: but he believed Fitz-patric kept the mony himſelf. That the 545 l. was to be paid to Bates, when the charter was ſettled, and was paid accordingly in October 1693. That ſir Baſil Firebraſs had told him, Bates had acquaintance with ſeveral lords, and named the duke of Leeds, then marquis of Caermarthen. That as to the 40,000 l. paid to ſir Baſil Firebraſs, the firſt 10,000 l. which was paid him about November 1693, he believed he kept himſelf, to recompenſe his loſſes in the interloping trade, and for the other 30,000 l. he ſuppoſed he diſtributed it to several persons. That as to the sums paid to sir John Chardin and mr. Dominicque, he believed they were expended in the company's service, and as to the 382 l. to captain Germain, it was paid him to bring him off from the Interpolers, and to ingage him in the company's interest.

Farther examinations.

This examination being reported to the house of commons, by mr. Comptroler, on the 24th of April, some debates arose, thereupon, and one of the members acquainted the house, "that the earl "of Rivers protested, he never received a penny, "and that, according to his lordship's motion, the "lords had sent for mr. Molyneux, to be examined." Another member observed, "that as to "all the little sums, sir Thomas Cooke knew very "well to whom they were delivered, but he could "never learn to whom sir Basil Firebras distributed "the monies he received; for sir Basil would not "give an account of that matter, tho' often "asked by him to do it; but that, on the other "hand, Acton would have told sir Thomas, and he "would not hear him." A third member said, "sir Thomas Cooke's account contained nothing but "generals; not one date, not one time, &c. That as to the 10,000 l. to mr. Acton, "he offered to "tell him the particulars, and he was unwilling to "hear him, but did not doubt Acton would give "a particular and satisfactory account of all dis-"tributed by him;" and yet, in the same moment being asked where, and in what condition this Acton was, he declared; "that he was a dis-"tracted man, not able to give the house any ac-"count at all;" a fourth member said, "no man "is innocent, if every man be guilty; we can-"not be innocent, if we do not lay our hands "on these men, that have betrayed us, and the "company, and I hope themselves; let us go as "far as we can, and then we shall not be in fault:" he therefore, moved, "that Firebras and Acton "be ordered to attend the house the next day." This motion was seconded by another member, who moreover, moved, "that they forget not a "member of their own, who was accused for receiv-"ing a considerable sum."

It was agreed, between the two houses, the same day, that all future examinations of the persons mentioned in the report, relating to sir Thomas Cooke, should be before a committee of both houses. Accordingly, the 25th, sir Basil Firebras was examined before that committee, where he deposed; "that the 40,000 l. paid him by sir Thomas "Cooke, was for himself, and for no other person: "the first 10,000 l. as a gratuity for his losses, some "time before the charter for the East-India-com-"pany passed; 10,000 l. by virtue of a contract "with sir Thomas Cooke, for favors and services "done, and the rest for the difference of the value "of stock upon its falling 50 per cent." However he confessed, the next day; "that he gave two "notes for 5500 guineas, to mr. Atwell, payable "to mr. Bates, or bearer, he believing the said "mr. Bates might be serviceable, in geting the "charter passed, as he was acquainted with several "persons of honor and quality: that one of these "notes was for 3000 and the other for 2500 gui-"neas. That the latter was paid after the charter "for restoring the East-India-company passed, and "the other, after the charter for regulation passed. "That Bates did several times introduce him to "the lord president, now duke of Leeds, who "made some scruples in point of law, which were "removed by the attorney-general. That 4400 "guineas were brought back again by Bates, who "said that so large sum might make a noise (1), "and that the rest still remained in Bates's hands. "But that these sums were not to be accounted as "any part of the 40,000 l. above-mentioned, "which he always understood to be wholly for his "own use and benefit. That colonel Fitz-patric "pretended great interest in the lord Nottingham, "and received 1000 guineas, promising to prevail "on that lord to accept 5000 guineas, on passing "the charter, and 5000 more on geting an act of "parliament; but that the earl of Nottingham "absolutely refused to accept of them. That he "heard, a note, signed by sir Josiah Child and sir "Thomas Cooke for 50,000 l. was lodged in "mr. Tyssen's hands, about a year, to be paid in "case the act passed; but that, as he understood, "it was refused by the lord Portland, to whom "Tyssen had offered it."

Will'III. An' 1695.

Mr. Richard Acton, being examined, said, "he received of sir Thomas Cooke 12,000 l. "whereof 2000 were for his trouble in attend-"ing two sessions, but that, if the bill for the new "company had passed, he was to have had nothing. "That he had distributed the 10,000 l. to per-"sons who had interest with members, and par-"ticularly he had given part of it to be distributed "to mr. Craggs, mr. Wallis, mr. Ridley, mr. "Dominicque, and others, and that colonel Gold-"well and colonel Dean, who were since dead, "were the only persons to whom he had distributed "mony himself."

The 26th, mr. Bates being examined, "ac-"knowleged, that he had received the 5500 gui-"neas, and had offered them to the lord president "who refused them. That thereupon, because he "could not well tell the mony himself; he had "asked the duke to lend him his servant Robart, to "receive the mony for him, which he did, and "bringing it to him, he kept it in his possession, "'till he returned 4400 guineas of it to sir Basil, and "as to the remainder, he had spent part of it." However, upon a re-examination, soon after, "he "allowed, that the 4400 guineas, which he paid "back, where brought to him by mons. Robart.

Upon re-examination of sir Basil Firebras, "he "said, that 500 guineas were only designed for "Bates, and for the rest, he always said it was "for his friend at St. James's, without naming "any body, but insisted upon 5000 guineas for "that friend, when a lesser sum was offered, pre-"tending, more than the first sum proposed had "been offered him by the other side; that it was, "at length, agreed, that if the duke did act in favor "of the company, he should have 2000 and "3000 guineas, and Bates 500 for himself. That "from the time the notes were given, for the "5500 guineas, they had free access to the lord "president, and found him easy and willing to "give the company his assistance. That he in-"tended to have distributed the 30,000 l. afore-"mentioned, in the following manner, viz. 10,000 l. "to sir Edward Seymor, sir John Trevor, and "mr. Guy, in case the charters and the act of par-"liament passed; 10,000 l. to the merchants in-"terlopers, and to keep the remaining 1,0000 l. "himself: that he designed to divide 5000 l. more "between sir Edward Seymour, sir John Trevor "and mr. Guy: but that as sir Edward Seymour "refused to accept his share of it, he thought "himself in honor bound, to pay the two thirds to "sir John Trevor and mr. Guy, but intended to "keep what sir Edward refused for himself: and "that sir John Trevor gave him a hint of his ex-"pectations, some time afterwards."

Sir Josiah Child being examined, said, "he "never disposed of ten pounds of the East-India-"company's mony: that he did indeed, propose " to make a preſent of 50,000 l. to his Majeſty, " if he would ſo far wave his prerogative, that an " act of parliament might be made for the eſta- " bliſhment of the company; but that mr. Tyſſen " had told him, the King would not meddle in " that matter, as the lord Portland had informed " him."

Debates of the houſe of of commons thereupon.

The 27th, theſe examinations were reported to the houſe of commons, when a member ſtood up, and argued the neceſſity of ſearching this matter to the bottom, and of providing laws, to prevent, for the future, the members of that houſe taking mony. " Ten thouſand pound, he ſaid, had been pretend- " ed to be given to the King, and 50,000 offered " to buy an act of parliament." Another ſaid; " there never were greater, nor more general in- " ſtances of corruption, he therefore inſiſted on " the neceſſity of a ſpeedy remedy, and that it was " highly requiſite the houſe ſhould ſhew the world " they were in earneſt. That it was not to be " wondered, ſuch arts had been uſed to put a ſtop " to their diſcovery, ſince they found ſo great a " man at the bottom: but (added he) no perſon is " in ſo high a poſt, that this houſe cannot reach; no " man's practiſe or art ſo deep, that this houſe " cannot diſcover. Here have been all imaginable " indeavors uſed to obſtruct the inquiry: firſt, his " Majeſty's name was made uſe of at the committee, " with hopes, perhaps, that might put a ſtop to " any farther ſearch; and if it were made uſe of " there, there was reaſon to expect it had been " elſewhere. But that appeared to be ſo far from " being a matter of reflection on the King, that ſir " Joſiah Child often complained of it, as a rude- " neſs to his Majeſty, that what other Kings had " yearly as a preſent, they had not offered his Ma- " jeſty in three years: it was indeed, if not a " matter of right, a matter of cuſtom. As for " the earl of Portland, who may be named for his " honor, on this occaſion, when the great ſum of " 50,000 l. was preſſed upon him, he abſolutely " refuſed it, and told them", he would for ever, be their enemy and oppoſer, if they offered any ſuch thing to him. " Having thus mentioned the " innocent, I muſt, continued he, ſay ſomewhat " of the guilty; a ſtop having been put, the duke " of Leeds muſt be applied to: certainly, there " never was a more notorious bribery, and that in a " perſon, whom we might have expected to have " been free from ſuch a crime, if you reſpect either " the greatneſs of his place, or of his former ob- " ligation. It is fit to ſpeak plainly on ſuch occa- " ſions; the houſe ought to indeavor to remove " ſuch a perſon from the King's council and preſenſe. " What ſecurity can the nation have when we are " bought and ſold to one another? We have ſeen " our deſigns defeated, our attempts betrayed, " and what wonder is it? Can any man think it " more ſtrange that our counſels ſhould be ſold " abroad, than that charters ſhould be ſold at " home? Certainly, a man may reaſonably believe, " that he who will ſell the ſubjects, will ſell the king- " dom, if he can have a ſufficient bribe. What " Prince can be ſafe in ſuch counſels, which are " given for private advantage? Several propoſals " (ſaid he, to conclude) may here be offered for " remedy. One, that this houſe ſhould addreſs " his Majeſty, to remove the duke of Leeds; " but, with ſubmiſſion, an addreſs is too mean, " too low a thing for this houſe to do, at this time, " and upon ſuch an occaſion; I, therefore, move " that we may lodge an impeachment."

This remarkable ſpeech, tho' in the main, it was approved of, was thought, however, by ſome, to be too fraught with reflections: one member, in particular, ſtanding up, ſaid; " he wondered, " the gentleman, who ſpoke laſt, ſhould ſay what, " he hoped, he did not believe, that this great man " ſhould have ſold our counſels to France." The other, thereupon, roſe again, and ſaid; " It was " with ſome uneaſineſs he ſtood up, for he did not " take pleaſure to rake in a dunghill: that he was " far from ſaying the duke had betrayed our coun- " ſels; but argued only from a poſſibility; that " it was as reaſonable to believe one as the other; " and that when honor and juſtice were not the rule " of men's actions, there was nothing incredible " that might be for their diſadvantage." How- ever, ſeveral members ſeconded the motion for an impeachment, and ſome added; " that ſuch actions " as theſe were a blemiſh, if not a ſcandal, to the " revolution itſelf." And it being demanded, " by what law, it was a crime to take mony at " court?" it was anſwered; " that if there was " not a law, it was time there ſhould be one, to " prevent it; that the law of God was againſt the " duke, and that there were parliaments to puniſh " ſuch crimes." It was again ſuggeſted: that it ſeemed doubtful, whether there was matter in this report for an impeachment, and therefore, before the houſe went that length, they ought to put the queſtion upon the report, to know whether it be a crime? ſome of the duke's friends objected, hereupon; " that there was no law, and conſequent- " ly no tranſgreſſion", and therefore moved for excuſing him. However, the queſtion being put that " there did appear, in the report made from " the committee of both houſes, ſufficient matter " to impeach Thomas, duke of Leeds, of high " crimes and miſdemeanors," it was carried in the affirmative. Mr. Comptroler was, hereupon, order- ed to go up to the lords, and at their bar, in the name of the houſe, and of all the commons of England, to lodge the ſaid impeachment, which, in due time, they would make good.

The duke of Leeds's ſpeech to the lords.

The lord-privy-ſeal having, in the mean time, made the report to the lords, the duke of Leeds, to excuſe his conduct, ſaid, " That as he had for- " merly proteſted himſelf to be clear in this matter, " ſo he ſtill denied, upon his faith and honor, that " he was guilty of any ſuch corruptions, as were " ſuggeſted againſt him, and that, if the whole " truth were laid open, it would tend to his honor " and advantage. That he would be very free, in " telling their lordſhips now before-hand, all that " paſſed, in which he was any ways concerned. " That mr. Bates introduced ſir Baſil Firebraſs to " him, and that he had conferences with ſir Baſil, " upon the ſubject of the Eaſt-India-company, " which he was concerned for: that mr. Bates, " ſome time after, informed him, he was to have " a ſum of mony of ſir Baſil Firebraſs, and deſired " his lordſhip to lend him one of his ſervants (mr. " Bates keeping only a footman) to receive the " mony; and ſo he lent him monſ. Robart: that " he knew nothing of the ſum; but afterwards mr. " Bates came to him, and told him, he had receiv'd " 5000 guineas, and that in acknowledgment of " the many favors he had received from his lord- " ſhip's hands, he humbly deſired him to accept the " ſame; which he refuſing, Bates preſs'd him ear- " neſtly, to take one half, or a quarter; which he " ſtill refuſed, declaring he would not touch a " penny of them; that, however, he told him, " ſince he had taken them, he thought there was " no need of returning them; that they were his " own, and wiſh'd him good luck with them: and " thus (concluded the duke) I was but a ſhadow to " mr. Bates.

His ſpeech to the houſe of commons.

While the duke was thus indeavoring to clear himſelf in the houſe of lords, private notice was brought him, that the commons were preparing an impeachment againſt him. He, thereupon, went immediately to the door of that houſe, and deſired to be heard, which being granted, he was admited, and a chair was placed for him within the bar. His grace, being ſeated, put on his hat, then roſe, and uncovering himſelf, made a ſpeech to the houſe, in which, in the firſt place: "he thank'd them heartily "for this favor of hearing him; and then proceeded, "declaring his innocence, and that he had attended "ſooner had he known what the houſe was upon: "that the occaſion of his coming was from the two "votes, upon the report from the committee of both "houſes: that he had done all he could to be in-"formed of the particulars, but could not: that "hearing of a report, a monſtrous long report, "and finding himſelf concerned, he was earneſt "to be heard, to the end he might not ly under "the diſpleaſure, of either, or both houſes. He ſaid, "it is a bold word, but it is a truth," this houſe had not now been ſitting here, but for me. He added, "that he was formerly purſued by this "houſe, in two points; for being for the French "intereſt, and for Popery: that he had then juſti-"fied himſelf, if he might have been heard, hoped "he had ſince, and would by all the actions of his "life. That one Firebraſs, by the means of mr. "Bates, was introduced to him: that he had long "known mr. Bates, and if he was not much de-"ceived in him, he could not believe that gentle-"man would have tranſacted ſuch a matter, if put "upon it: that the evidence was but hear-ſay, and "he hop'd they would not condemn on hear-ſay: "that there was a treaty-part, as well as a mony-"part: that as to the mony-part, much of it was "falſe, and what was true he made no ſecret; "that he could, and did ſay, upon his faith and "honor, that neither directly nor indirectly, he "never touch'd one penny of the mony. That he "obſerved, a great deal of pains had been taken, "to hook in this matter by a ſide-wind; that this "Firebraſs thought his merit would deſerve 10,000l. "and 30,000 l. and that this 5500 guineas was no "part of the 40,000 l. That the witneſſes were call'd "in by the committee; but that Firebraſs, after "his firſt hearing, deſired of himſelf to be called "in again, contrary to all rules; which ſhewed "him, at leaſt, a very willing witneſs. That he "had a thread, which he hoped to ſpin finer, and "make it appear, that this was a deſign laid againſt "him long before the naming this committee. "That warning was given him, ſome time ſince." That this matter would be improved againſt him, and that Firebraſs had been told, he ſhould be excuſed, if he would charge the duke. His grace, to conclude, ſaid; "he ask'd no favor, but their "impartial juſtice; and that no ſevere ſenſe might "be put upon what would bear a candid one: that, "if it might be, the houſe would re-conſider what "was done; or, at leaſt, preſerve him from cruel-"ty, and not let him ly on the rack, and be blaſted, "till a parliament ſhould ſit again; and that, if "they would not re-conſider, that then he might "have ſpeedy juſtice; for he had rather want coun-"ſel, want time, or want any thing, than ly under "their, or the nation's diſpleaſure."

The duke of Leeds impeach'd.

Notwithſtanding this ſpeech, the duke was no ſooner withdrawn, than mr. Comptroller, accompanied by ſeveral members, carried up the impeachment againſt him to the houſe of lords; and the committee, which was joined with that of the lords, was ordered to withdraw immediately, and form the articles. The houſe of commons then took the duke's ſpeech into conſideration, and one of the members ſtood up, and ſaid; "the point was now, "whether the houſe would arraign the committee "of both houſes, or go on with their impeach-"ment? that the duke had made no excuſe as to "the facts; that his argument of a contrivance was, "that the 5000 guineas charged on him was no "part of the 40,000 l. Firebraſs was to account "for: that this was rather an aggravation of the "crime; for ſir Thomas Cooke had a double ac-"count, one with, and another without the 5000 "guineas; which was an indication, if there was "a contrivance, it was not by the committee, but "with ſir Thomas Cooke, to ſtifle the inquiry, "and conceal the corruption: that the ſpeedy "juſtice of the houſe was to be wiſh'd and deſir'd; "and that if there was ſuch a contrivance, "ſuch a thread as was mention'd by the noble "lord, the houſe where he was impeach'd would, "undoubtedly, clear him." Another member, among other things, obſerved; "that the duke's "friend, mr. Bates contradicting himſelf, was more "than the evidence of Firebraſs. That mr. Robart "was a ſervant of his grace's, and was fled; that "mr. Bates ſaid he kept the mony in his houſe; "that ſome times he had ſpent it, and ſome times "it was in his cloſet: that he owned the mony was "not in his houſe on Sunday, but that monſ. Robart "brought it to him, on Tueſday morning, tho' he "would never declare from whom he brought it.

Debates about the duke's ſpeech.

Will' III. An' 1695.

Bill for impriſonment of Cook and others.

Sir Thomas Cooke's diſcoveries being, in the mean time, voted, by both houſes, unſatisfactory, they paſſed "a bill for impriſoning ſir Thomas "Cooke, ſir Baſil Firebraſs, Charles Bates, eſq; "and James Craggs, eſq; and for reſtraining them "from alienating their eſtates."

Articles againſt the duke.

The 29th of April, the articles of impeachment againſt the duke of Leeds, being read and agreed to, in the houſe of commons, were ſent up to the lords, containing in ſubſtance; "that he had con-"tracted with the Eaſt-India-company, for 5500 "guineas, to procure them a charter of confirma-"tion, and a charter of regulation; which ſum "he had actually received, either by himſelf, or by "his agents and ſervants, with his privity and "conſent."

His vindication.

The articles being read, the duke again indea-vor'd to vindicate himſelf, repeating what he had before ſaid, and adding: "that this ſtorm, which "was now fallen upon him, had been long gather-"ing, and was now promoting by a faction, a "party who had only a pique againſt him, and that "the King's buſineſs had been delayed on purpoſe: "that he had an original letter, which gave him "an account of this, ſome time before it broke out, "and it appear'd only levell'd againſt him, becauſe "none elſe were proſecuted; that there appeared a "joy they could catch at this, for then they ſtopp'd; "and that ſir Baſil Firebraſs was treated with to "diſcover only this part, and then he ſhould be "excuſed from any farther diſcovery." He con-"cluded, "by praying a copy of the articles of "impeachment, and the report of the committee of "both houſes;" both which were immediately order'd him.

The duke complains of partiality.

The duke having, the very next day, given in his anſwer to theſe articles, a copy thereof was ſent to the commons, and the lords deſired "that "ſince the ſeſſion was probably drawing towards "a concluſion, they would proceed in the impeach-"ment againſt the duke:" and, the 2d of May, the duke complained to the lords of the delay of the houſe of commons, in not replying to his anſwer: he alledg'd, "that the impeachment was "only to load him with diſgrace, and that the com-"mons never intended to try him: that the party "uſed great partiality towards him, and did not "intend to inquire after others; and that they "ſhew'd their partiality and ſpleen, in their amend-"ment to the bill for impriſoning ſir Thomas Cooke, "&c. whereby they admited ſir Baſil Firebraſs "to bail, becauſe he was a witneſs againſt him."

Reſolution of the commons.

The ſame day, the commons reſolved; "that "the offer of any mony, or other advantage, to "any

Mr. Robart abſconds.

Mr. Comptroler then reported, from the committee of the houſe of commons, appointed to manage the impeachment againſt the duke, that monſ. Robart, the duke's ſervant, who was a material evidence for making good the articles, had been ſummon'd to attend the committee, but could not be found; and it not being yet known where he was, they were of opinion not to proceed any farther in the matter to them referr'd, till they had the farther direction of the houſe. This reſolution was agreed unto by the houſe, and an order made, that monſ. Robart ſhould attend the houſe forthwith, and that he be ſummon'd by the ſerjeant at arms.

Farther proceedings concerning the duke of Leeds

The 3d of May, a motion being made, in the houſe of lords, to read the bill for granting to the King a duty upon glaſs, &c. The duke of Leeds told their lordſhips; " it grieved him, that he " who was as much as any man, for the diſpatch of " the mony-bills, and never oppoſed any, ſhould " now do it; but he hoped the lords would conſider his caſe, not only as his, but as it might " be any of their own; for it was in the power of " a tinker, to accuſe, at the end of the ſeſſion, and " one might ly under it, without remedy: and " ſince the commons, by miſmanagement, had delay'd this mony-bill for ſix weeks, it would not " be of mighty ill conſequence, if it ſhould ly a " day or two longer; and his grace preſſed very " earneſtly, that if the houſe of commons did not " reply, the impeachment might be diſcharged: " for, if it were not, he might ly under the reproach thereof all his life: adding, he believed " the commons would do nothing in it; for tho' " they had appointed a committee to meet, yet they " met but once, and that for form." The ſame day the commons deſired a conference with the lords, in which their manager deliver'd a paper, importing; " that the commons would make good " their charge againſt the duke of Leeds, and were " deſirous that juſtice be done without any manner " of delay: but that in the preparation of the " evidence againſt the duke, their committee met " with an obſtruction: that monſ. Robart, who " appear'd, by the depoſitions before the committee of both houſes, to be a material witneſs, " was withdrawn ſince the impeachment was carried " up; which had been the reaſon the commons had " not yet acquainted their lordſhips, when they " could be ready to make good the ſaid impeachment." This paper being read in the houſe of peers, it was unanimouſly agreed, " to addreſs the " King, that he would be pleas'd to iſſue a proclamation for ſtopping the ports, and ſeizing monſ. " Robart (1)."

Monſ. Robart's flight having now given the duke a fair opportunity of triumphing over his accuſers, he did not ſtick to charge the houſe of commons, with doing a thing unprecedented, " to charge a " man with crimes, before they had all the evidence " to make it good; that it was ſtrange they ſhould " ſay they wanted a material witneſs, and lay it upon him to produce this witneſs: as if a perſon were more oblig'd to produce evidence to accuſe himſelf, than to anſwer ſuch queſtions by which he accuſes himſelf." his grace then acquainted their lordſhips; " that in truth, he had ſent monſ. Robart " to ſee his daughter Leiceſter, and order'd him to " call at Minns, to ſee his daughter Plimouth, where " the meſſenger of the houſe of commons might " have known he was gone, if he had ask'd. That " his grace ſent a meſſenger on purpoſe to Robart; " that Robart return'd about two o'clock on Sunday " morning; but being inform'd, that his lord was " impeached, and mr. Bates in priſon, he was thereupon frighted, and went towards Harwich, deſigning for his own country, Switzerland, thro' " Holland: that his grace knew, by the temper of " the man, and by a particular knowledge he had " of him, and of the thing, that he would not be " ſeen here again in haſte; ſo that, my lords (continued his grace) if this man be inſiſted upon, as " a material evidence, and that my trial is to be " delayed, 'till this perſon is forth coming, when " am I likely to be tried? I humbly move your " lordſhips, that you will come to ſome reſolution, " if this matter be not immediately proceeded upon, " ſo that I may be tried before the ending of this " ſeſſion, that the impeachment ſhall fall." Some lords, indeed, cried, hereupon, " well mov'd;" however, the houſe had no regard to it, but proceeded to read and paſs " the bill for the duty upon " glaſs-wares, ſtone and earthen bottles; &c. (2).

I have choſen to give an account of this remarkable affair, in one connection, tho' I have been thereby obliged to poſtpone ſeveral other proceedings, in parliament, which I ſhall now reſume.

Bad ſtate of the coin inquired into.

Next to theſe grievances, which ſo much required the application of parliament for their redreſs, and took up ſo great a part of their time, the bad ſtate of the coin was a heavy burden upon the nation, and call'd aloud for their help. The current ſilver coin of this nation had, for many years, been ſo clipp'd, debas'd and adulterated, that five pound in ſilver ſpecies, was ſcarce worth forty ſhillings according to the ſtandard; and ſcarce one piece in four but what was either iron, braſs or copper waſh'd over or plated (3). In ſhort, it was come to ſuch a paſs, that the remedy could be no longer delay'd, without the apparent and inevitable ruin of the nation. The houſe of commons, therefore, on the 8th of January, appointed a committee to receive propoſals to prevent clipping of the coin of this kingdom, for the future, and the exportation of ſilver. This committee having met ſeveral times, mr. Scobel reported their opinion: viz.

1. " That the beſt way to prevent clipping the " ſilver coin, was to new-coin the ſame into mill'd-" mony.

2. " That 1,000,000 l. was a ſufficient ſum to " to make good the deficiency of the preſent clipp'd " coin of this kingdom.

3. " That the mony, hereafter to be coined; " ſhould be of the preſent weight and fineneſs.

4. " That the crown-piece ſhould go for five " ſhillings and ſix-pence, and the half crown for two " ſhillings and nine pence.

(1) The duke of Leeds made no oppoſition to this addreſs, and the proclamation was publiſh'd accordingly, but it was not 'till nine days afterwards, when the duke had long before declar'd to the houſe of lords, he would not be ſeen here again in haſte. Hiſtory of King William III. vol. 3. p. 46.

(2) The above inſulting ſpeech, as I think it may, not improperly, be called, ſhews the duke thought himſelf now above the reach of the commons; and I have been the more particular in my relation of the whole matter, as I think it an inſtance of one of the moſt artful evaſions of an impeachment we ſhall meet with, eſpecially, where circumſtances were ſo glaring, and the duke did not ſeem to have a majority on his ſide, in the houſe of peers, no more than in the commons. The paſſing theſe matters over ſlightly, has given occaſion to a modern hiſtorian to accuſe biſhop Burnet of partiality.

(3) It was generally thought, that this miſchief had, of late, been induſtriouſly promoted, and ſecretly carried on by the enemies of the government, the dangerous conſequences of which were at firſt either not heeded, or wilfully neglected: and, indeed, the nation ſuffered unſpeakably by this evil, as well in carrying on the war as in trade.

5. " That

Will' III. An' 1695.

5. " That all mony to be coined, under the de" nomination of the half crown, ſhould have a

6. " That for as much of the preſent coin as any " weight for weight, and the overplus by a bill or " ticket, at per cent, on a fund to be appro-

" priated for that purpoſe.

7. " That the preſent laws againſt clipping be " inforced by ſome additions.

8. " That all perſons whoſe profeſſions require
" ſuch like tools or engines, as may be made uſe of
" for coining or clipping, be obliged to regiſter
" their names and places of abode; and that it
" ſhould be penal on ſuch as ſhould neglect to do
" the ſame.

9. " That it be penal on all ſuch perſons on " whom clippings are found.

10. " That it be penal on all ſuch perſons as give " more for any ſilver coin, than it ought to go for
" by law.

11. " That no preſſes, ſuch as are uſed for coin-
" ing, be in any other place, than his Majeſty's
" Mint.

12. " That it be penal in all ſuch perſons, as " ſhould import any clipp'd or counterfeit mony.

13. " That it be penal in any perſon to export
" Engliſh bullion, and the proof to ly upon the " exporter.

14. " That it be penal in any perſon, to counter" feit any foreign mark upon bullion."

Bill to prevent cliping and coining.

This report lay ſome time neglected in the houſe of commons, till the lords having paſs'd " an act " to prevent the counterfeiting and clipping the cur-" rent coin of the nation; " and ſent it down to the commons for their concurrence, they added ſeveral of theſe articles to it, by way of amendments, to which the lords agreed, and ſo the act received the royal ſanction.

Debates about the fleet.

I have already given the reader an account of the honor and advantages which accrued to the nation, by ſending the fleet to the Streights; however there were not wanting ſome members of the houſe of lords, who indeavored to ſhew the danger and inconvenience of it; but the major part of that auguſt aſſembly entertain'd far different ſentiments, as appeared by their addreſs of thanks, to his Majeſty, for ſo ordering it.

Addreſs of the commons about coals.

The price of coals being about this time, very exorbitant (1), which reduced the poorer ſort of people to a ſtarving condition, the commons unanimouſly voted, on the 6th of April, that an addreſs be preſented to the King, to deſire he would pleaſe to iſſue his royal proclamation, that the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London ſhould forthwith put in execution the laws for regulating the price and meaſures of coals, and that his Majeſty would order convoys for the coal-ſhips. At the ſame time, they ordered a bill to be brought in to inforce and make more effectual the ſaid laws relating to coals (2).

Will' III. An' 1695.

Addreſs of the commons concerning the allies.

The 18th, the commons took into conſideration the great expenſe the nation was at to carry on the war, and to ſupport the grand confederacy; on which occaſion, they reſolved, that an addreſs be preſented to the King, " that his Majeſty would be " pleas'd, in his great wiſdom, to take care, for the " future, that this kingdom be put upon an equal " foot and proportion with the allies, in bearing " the charge of the preſent war. " An addreſs, to that purpoſe, having been preſented accordingly, his Majeſty was pleas'd to anſwer. " That in this, " as in every thing elſe, he ſhould always indeavor " to have a due regard to the intereſt and honor of " this nation.

The King's anſwer.

The 3d of May, the houſe of commons having read the report from the committee of both houſes, appointed to inquire into bribery, &c. proceeded to impeach ſome other perſons, and in particular ſir John Trevor: but they were interrupted by the black-rod, and commanded to attend the King in the houſe of peers: where his Majeſty gave the royal aſſent to " an act for a duty on glaſs, &c; Acts paſs'd. " an act to prevent counterfeiting and clipping the " coin of this kingdom; an act for impriſoning ſir " Thomas Cooke, ſir Baſil Firebraſs, Bates, Craggs, " and others; an act for reverſing the attainder of " Jacob Leiſler and others; and an act for the " King's gracious and free pardon, but with the " exception, among others, of all perſons who had " been, or ſhould be impeach'd in parliament, " during the preſent ſeſſion.

After this, his Majeſty told both houſes:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

" That he was come to give them thanks, for " the ſupplies provided for carrying on the war, " and, at the ſame time, to conclude this ſeſſion, " which could not be continued longer, without " manifeſt prejudice to the ends for which thoſe " ſupplies were given, the ſeaſon of the year making " it ſo neceſſary for him to be abroad, that it were " to be wiſh'd the buſineſs at home would have " allowed him to have been there ſooner. That " he would take care to place the adminiſtration of " affairs, during his abſenſe, in ſuch perſons, on " whoſe care and fidelity he could intirely depend; " and that he doubted not but every one of the " lords, and the gentlemen of the houſe of com-" mons, in their ſeveral ſtations, would be aſſiſting " to them; which was what he required of them, " and that they ſhould be more than ordinarily " vigilant, in preſerving the public peace."

The parliament prorogued.

Then the lord-keeper, by his Majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to the 18th of June (3).

(1) This dearth was occaſioned by the length and rigor of the winter-ſeaſon, by the ſcarcity of ſeamen, on account of the fleet being in the Streights, and by a want of convoys for the coal-ſhips, to ſecure them from the French privateers, which took the advantage of the fleet being in the Mediterranean, and a neglect of keeping cruiſers conſtantly on our coaſts, to infeſt the narrow ſeas.

(2) His Majeſty's proclamation was, accordingly, iſſued out three days after; but as for the bill it lay neglected, after it had been read a ſecond time, and ſo was loſt.

(3) The parliament was, this ſeſſions, ſo taken up with the affairs of bribery, that a greater number than ordinary of bills lay neglected, or unfiniſh'd.

1. " A bill touching free and impartial proceedings in parliament; " which was begun in the houſe of commons, and there rejected after the third reading. 2. " A bill for regulating trials, in caſes of high-treaſon; " which, having paſſed the lower houſe, was amended by the lords, and occaſion'd ſeveral farther conferences and debates, between both houſes. 3. " A bill for " regiſtering memorials of deeds, conveyances and wills; " which was obſtructed by the lawyers in the houſe of commons, as tending to abridge law-ſuits, and, therefore leſſening their income. 4. " A bill for the incouragement of privateers. 5. A bill " for the incouragement of ſeamen. 6. A bill to diſable perſons from voting in elections of members to ſerve in parliament, " who ſhould refuſe to take the oaths to the government; " which never came to a ſecond reading. 7. " A bill for the better " diſcovering of Bankrupts eſtates; " which was only read twice. 8. " A bill to veſt the forfeited eſtates in Ireland in his " Majeſty; " wherein as little progreſs was made. 9. " A bill to regulate printing preſſes. 10. A bill requiring certain per-" ſons to take the oaths to his Majeſty; " which having paſs'd the houſe of peers, and been ſent down to the commons, was by them rejected, after the ſecond reading. 11. " A bill for naturalizing foreign ſeamen; " which was likewiſe ſent down by the lords, but refuſed by the commons. 12. " A bill to aſcertain the aſſize of bread. 13. A bill to oblige James Craggs and Richard " Harnage to diſcover how ſome of the mony for cloathing the army had been diſpoſed of; and 14. a bill for puniſhing Tracy " Pauncefort, and his brother Edward Pauncefort, for corrupt practices; " which having been read three times by the commons, was ordered to lie upon the table.

Lords juſtices appointed.

His Majeſty declared the ſame day in council, that he had appointed the archbiſhop of Canterbury; ſir John Sommers, lord-keeper of the great ſeal; the earl of Pembroke, lord-privy-ſeal; the duke of Devonſhire, lord ſteward of his Majeſty's houſhould; the duke of Shrewſbury, one of his Majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate; the earl of Dorſet, lord chamberlain of his houſhold; and the lord Godolphin, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; to be lords-juſtices, for the adminiſtration of the government, during his Majeſty's abſenſe.

Promotions.

About this time, his Majeſty, likewiſe, made the following promotions; viz. ſir William Trumbal was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of ſir John Trenchard, deceas'd; Henry, lord Capel, was conſtituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland; William de Naſſau, lord of Zuleſtein, was created baron of Enfield, viſcount Tunbridge, and earl of Rochford, and Ford lord Grey of Werk, was created viſcount Glendale, and earl of Tankerville.

The King goes to Holland.

The 12th of May, the King imbarked at Graveſend on board the William and Mary-yacht, attended by the duke of Ormond, the earls of Eſſex and Portland, and ſeveral others of quality. The next morning, they joined their convoy, under the command of ſir George Rooke, and on the 14th his Majeſty landed at Oranje-Polder, from whence he arrived, the ſame evening, at the Hague, where he was received with great acclamations of joy: and here I ſhall again leave his Majeſty for a while; and ſay a word or two of the affairs of Scotland.

Affairs of Scotland.

His Majeſty having thought fit to call a parliament in that kingdom, they met, according to their ſummons, on the 9th of May. The marquis of Tweedale being appointed his Majeſty's high commiſſioner, the ſeſſion was opened by reading his commiſſion. Then his Majeſty's letter to the lords-temporal, and commiſſioners of the ſhires and burghs, aſſembled in parliament, was read alſo; which letter was backed by the high commiſſioner's ſpeech; and after that the earl of Anandale, lord preſident of the parliament, made likewiſe a ſpeech. As I propoſe to be but brief in my relation of the affairs of Scotland and Ireland, I ſhall reduce the propoſitions recommended, by the miniſtry, to the parliament of Scotland, to three general heads.

1. "Supplies for the inſuing year.

2. "Moderation in eccleſiaſtical affairs; his Ma-
"jeſty, at the ſame time, giving them freſh aſ-
"ſurances of his reſolutions to maintain Preſ-
"bytery.

3. "The advancement of trade, and particularly "their eſtabliſhing plantations in Africa, America,
"and the Eaſt-Indies.

As to the firſt, it was unanimouſly reſolved, "to "grant 1,440,000 pounds Scots, or 140,000 l.
"ſterling, for the maintenance of the land-forces,
"and for the providing and maintaining cruiſers
"and convoys, for the defenſe of their coaſts and "trade." They alſo paſſed "an act in rela"tion to their kirk, in which, however, nothing
"was provided in favor of epiſcopacy, or that "looked like a toleration of the members of that "church." But the act which made the moſt noiſe in England, was that "for ſettling a trade and
"colonies in the Weſtern plantations (1)."

This parliament, likewiſe, made ſeveral other laws: viz. "An act againſt Popiſh parents making
"deeds or depoſitions, in prejudice of their heirs,
"who turn Proteſtants; an act in favor of the "linnen-manufactory; an act to obviate the "frauds of apparent heirs; an act for a manufac-
"tory of paper; an act for ſettling the poſt-
"ſtages within the kingdom of Scotland; an act
"for the ſale of bankrupts eſtates, for the uſe of "their creditors; an act for the regulation of
"the mint; an act againſt intruders into churches
"without a legal call and admiſſion; an act
"againſt blaſphemy, and another againſt pro-
"phaneneſs; an act againſt irregular baptiſm and
"marriages; an act to raiſe 1000 men yearly,
"to recruit the Scotiſh regiments abroad; an "act for burying in Scotiſh linnen; and laſtly, an "act for erecting a public bank in this kingdom.

WILL'III. AN' 1695.

The moſt remarkable tranſaction of this parliament was, however, their ſtrict inquiry into the ſlaughter of the Glencoe-men; of which, as it made a great noiſe, in thoſe times, I ſhall give a brief account. "In January 1694, the King ſent inſtru-
"ctions to the commander of his forces in Scotland,
"touching the Highland-rebels, who did not in "due time accept of the benefit of his Majeſty's
"indemnity; and which contained a warrant of "mercy to all, without exception, who ſhould
"offer to take the oath of allegiance, and come in "upon mercy; tho' the time prefixed by the pro-
"clamation of indemnity was paſſed; notwith-
"ſtanding which, contrary to his Majeſty's inten-
"tions, thirty-eight of the inhabitants of Glencoe,
"a town in the North of Scotland, after they had "laid down their arms, were inhumanly butcher'd
"in their beds, their houſes plundered, and their
"cattle carried away."

This was in ſhort the caſe, and this piece of barbarity having given the King's enemies a handle for reflecting on his government; his Majeſty had given commiſſion to ſeveral perſons, to make inquiry into this affair, which commiſſion being produced and read, in parliament, was there approved of. Theſe commiſſioners having ſpent ſome weeks in the examination of that affair, and having, on the 10th of June, laid ſeveral papers before the parliament, as alſo, on the 24th of the ſame month, made a farther report, to which was annexed the depoſitions of witneſſes, the King's inſtructions, and ſeveral letters from the maſter of Stairs, ſecretary of ſtate; it was, on the 26th, unanimouſly voted; "that his Majeſty's inſtructions to ſir
"Thomas Levingſtone and colonel Hill, contain"ed no warrant for the execution of the Glencoe-
"men; that the ſaid execution was a murder;
"that the maſter of Stairs's letters did exceed the "King's inſtructions; and, on the 28th, that ſir
"Thomas Levingſtone had reaſon to give the or"ders he had given." The 2d of July, colonel Hill and lieutenant-colonel Hamilton were called before the parliament, and the firſt appearing was examined and cleared; but the latter, not appearing, was ordered to be apprehended, and, on the 8th, was voted "guilty of the murder of the Glencoe-men." The houſe then proceeded againſt the other perſons who were actors therein, and agreed upon an addreſs to his Majeſty, that he would ſend them home to be "proſecuted, or not, as his Majeſty
"ſhould think fit, and that he would take into his "Princely conſideration the caſe of the Glencoe-
"men."

The 2d of July, the houſe paſſed ſentenſe againſt the earls of Middleton and Melfort, and ſir Adam Blair for high-treaſon, to forfeit their lives and eſtates, and ordered all others, who adhered to his Majeſty's enemies, and were then in France, to be prosecuted before the lords of the justiciary. The 15th, the earl of Broadalbine, being brought to the bar of the house, likewise on informations of high-treason, his lordship begged time to make his defense, which was granted him 'till the 25th. But all public affairs being concluded by the 17th, it was agreed, that the process of treason against him, should be continued 'till the next session of parliament, which was thereupon adjourned till the 7th of November next insuing. Let us now take a cursory view of the affairs of Ireland.

Affairs of Ireland.

The 27th of August, the parliament of Ireland was opened at Dublin, and the lord Capel, being attended with the usually ceremonies to the house, made a speech to the lords and commons; "In "which he first put them in mind of the great obli-"gations they owed to his Majesty, who had ap-"peared himself in their cause, fought their battles, "and, at the hazard of his own person, restored "them to their religion and estates, not doubting, "but they would make a suitable return of loyalty "and affection: he then recommended, to the house "of commons, an early care for the necessary "supplies; next, that they would find some method "for the rebuilding and repairing of churches in "the several parts of their country; and last, men-"tioned some necessary bills.

Both houses returned thanks, in their addresses to his excellency for his speech, and voted; "that "they would, to the utmost of their power, stand "by and assist his Majesty and his government, "against all his enemies, foreign and domestic:" after which they proceeded with great unanimity and dispatch, to the consideration of the matters before them. They granted the King a supply of 163,325 l. to be raised by a poll-tax, an additional excise, and certain duties on merchandizes. They also passed some acts for preventing the growth of Popery, and the disarming of Papists; which done, both houses adjourned themselves for some time.

Having thus given a brief account of the proceedings of the parliaments of Scotland and Ireland, I come now to our maritime affairs of the year 1695.

Maritime affairs.

We left admiral Russel, with the fleet under his command, in the bay of Cadiz, where, according to his orders, he was to pass the winter. The latter end of December, of the foregoing year, several ships arrived there from England, which brought the admiral a commission appointing him chief commander and captain-general of their Majesties navy, (the Queen being then living) and ships to be imployed in the Narrow-seas, and in the Mediterranean; and, together with naval stores, several officers and artificers, for refiting the fleet. Soon after, captain James Killigrew was detached from the fleet, with a small squadron, consisting of the Plymouth, Falmouth, Carlisle, Newcastle, Adventure, and Southampton, to cruise. Between cape Bona, on the coast of Barbary, and the island of Pantalarea, he met, the 18th of January, with two French men of war, the Content of seventy, and the Trident of sixty guns, with whom he ingaged and lost his life in the fight: but the ships were both taken and brought to the fleet (1).

Two French men of war taken.

Dilatoriness of the Spaniards.

The usual dilatoriness of the Spaniards having occasioned the fleet to remain in the bay of Cadiz till the begining of May, nothing happened worthy our notice during that time. Some land-forces, under the command of brigadier-general Stewart, arriving, about this time, out of England, the fleet thereupon sailed, and cruisers were sent on several stations for intelligence. The 18th, they arrived at Barcelona, having been first at Allicant, where they made no stay. They sailed again the 20th, and touching at several ports, cruised about in those seas, 'till the middle of July, without having an opportunity of doing any service, but strengthening and dispatching the Turkey-convoy.

The 19th of that month, the fleet returned to Barcelona, where the admiral ordered a survey of the condition of the ships to be made. The Spaniards, continuing to be dilatory, in all their proceedings, the admiral thought himself obliged to represent the whole matter to the court of Spain, and to let them know, how little they had complied with their promises to him at Cadiz, and how ill he thought the King his master was requited for the charges he had been at, and his readiness to serve Spain; declaring, that unless something was immediately undertaken, he would depart, and leave Spain to her own conduct and councils.

The admiral complains of it.

The viceroy of Catalonia, hereupon determined to march to Palamos, a sea-port belonging to Spain, then in the hands of France, and the admiral resolved to assist him in the siege of that place. The manner of it being concerted with brigadier-general Stewart, all the long-boats in the fleet were got ready, with a lieutenant and two gunner's mates to each, to attend sir Martin Beckman, upon the first signal that should be made, for bom-barding the place.

The siege of Palamos resolved on.

The 9th of August, the English and Dutch troops, to the number of about four thousand, the former commanded by brigadier-general Stewart, and the latter by count Nassau, were landed, without opposition, and incamped near the town; but were not furnished with the tents, and other necessaries, the Spaniards had promised. Notwithstanding which, the town and castle were bombarded, two or three days after, and with so much success, tho' the sea run high, that the better part of both was beaten down, and the remainder set on fire, in several places. But with this ended the attempt; for a vessel the admiral had sent to the coast of Provence, returning, brought two of the inhabitants of Toulon, who positively affirmed, that the French inhabitants had sixty men of war ready to put to sea, upon which the admiral thought proper to reimbark his troops, to go in search of the enemy, and advised the Spaniards to raise the siege.

English and Dutch forces landed.

The Town and castle bombarded:

But the siege raised.

The troops being re-imbarked, the fleet proceeded to the coast of Provence, where they met with such tempestuous weather, as rendered a continuance there very hazardous; upon which the admiral retired down the Streights to Cadiz, where arriving the latter end of September, he appointed sir David Mitchel, then rear-admiral of the Red, to take upon him the command of part of the fleet, and with the rest sailed for England, where he arrived the begining of November. Sir George Rooke arrived afterwards in those seas with a squadron from England, and taking the remaining part of the fleet, with sir David Mitchel, under his command, sailed for Cadiz, where he arrived the 16th of October, and lay 'till the month of March, of the insuing year, without doing any Part of it returns to England.

Sir George Rooke arrives at Cadiz.

(1) I have seen a long account of this ingagement, written in French, by the count de Chalard, commander of the Content, by which (if we may give credit to it) it appears that the French behaved bravely (and they do our ships the justice of having done the same) and did not surrender till they were ready to sink, especially the Content, which fought that whole afternoon, and the whole next day, till four in the afternoon. By this account, it likewise appears, that our squadron put into Messina, before it returned to the fleet. The count de Chalard says, the Content, was but of four and fifty guns, and three hundred and eighty men, and the Trident of two and forty guns, and three hundred men.

service, and then ſailed for England, where he arrived the latter end of April (1).

I come now nearer home, to give an account of the attempts made by a ſquadron of the royal navy, under the command of the lord Berkley, upon ſeveral of the French King's ports.

The lord Berkley bombards St. Malo.

The firſt of theſe attempts was on St. Malo, before which place, his lordſhip arrived, with the ſquadron under his command, on the fourth of July, in the morning, and anchored in twenty fathom water, the Quince-rock bearing S. E. by E. near five miles diſtant, cape Frehelle, W. S. W. three leagues and a half, and Cancale-point, E. by S. three leagues. About three in the afternoon, the bomb and ſmaller veſſels, ſtanding cloſe in, five of the former played on the Quince-rock (on which was a wooden fort, called La Conchee, that covered the place) till near eight, but with little ſucceſs.

The next morning, at four, the ſquadron ſtood in, and the frigats and bomb-veſſels were ordered as near the town as poſſible, upon which the gallies and guard-boats retreated. At half an hour paſt five, the ſquadron anchored in eighteen fathom water, the Quince-rock bearing S. by E. diſtant about a league, and at eight, the Charles fire-ſhips, commanded by captain Durley, and one of the Dutch, were ordered to run in againſt the rock. They placed themſelves to the windward of it, and ſo much annoyed the enemy, that they forebore fireing, their cannon, as it was believed, being moſtly diſmounted, and immediately, upon blowing up of thoſe ſhips, the fort took fire, and burnt two hours very violently. About nine, the ſquadron with the bomb-veſſels got in nearer; the former battered the town, and the latter played with ſuch ſucceſs, that about ten, the fire took in ſeveral parts of the Eaſt-end of the town, and at four in the afternoon, a great fire broke out, in the Weſt part of the town, which burnt very furiouſly 'till about ſeven, by which time nine hundred bombs and carcaſſes had been thrown in; tho' the French fired very furiouſly, from the Quince-rock, the Great and Little Bee, Fort-Royal, and Point de Ambour. Between ſeven and eight, the bomb-veſſels, having ſpent the ammunition they carried in with them, were called off, and one, called the Terrible, which had received much damage, ſunk, that ſhe might not fall into the enemy's hands.

This ſervice was performed by ſix Engliſh and four Dutch men of war, nine galliots, fourteen flat-bottom-boats, and two brigantines, which lying in the midſt of nine or ten batteries of the French, received the enemy's ſhot, and returned them as good as they gave: and the lord Berkley himſelf was the whole time in the hoteſt of the fire, incouraging the men, and giving the neceſſary orders.

The next place they reſolved to proceed to was Granville, which they deſtroyed without the loſs of a man. The lord Berkley being ſailed, with the fleet, for Jerſey, the care of this attempt was commited to colonel Richards, with eight bomb-veſſels and eight frigats, who came before it the 8th about nine in the morning, with five Engliſh and three Dutch bomb-veſſels, and ſeveral frigats, under the command of captain Bembow, who within an hour, ſet it all on fire, and after having continued the bombardment, 'till ſix in the evening, left it in flames. A feint was then made of going to Havre-de-Grace; but in the evening the ſquadron bore away to the fleet which was now at anchor in Guernſey-road; from whence they ſailed to Portſmouth, to refit the bomb-veſſels, and prepare for attacking Dunkirk.

Granville deſtroy'd.

WILL' III. AN' 1695.

The attack of Dunkirk reſolved upon.

The ſquadron being come to the Downs, his lordſhip received orders there, to take four hundred ſoldiers on board; and mr. Meeſters coming ſoon after, with his pilots, the manner how Dunkirk was to be attacked, was determined, in a council of war.

The ſquadron being arrived and joined, on the coaſt; after ſome difficulties, the 1ſt of Auguſt, early in the morning, the bomb-veſſels got under ſail, and ſtood in to bombard the wooden forts, and the Riſ-bank. About nine they began to play very briſkly, being protected by the frigats, againſt the enemy's ſmall-craft, which was very numerous, and lay partly under the cannon of the Riſ-bank. About one, the frigats, brigantines, well-boats, &c. with the fire-ſhips, and machines, weighed and went pretty near in, plying to and fro within ſhot of the enemy's forts and gallies; and about two, four ſmoak-ſhips were ſent in, but without any ſucceſs (2). The bomb-veſſels fired 'till five, at which time, they, with the brigantines, &c. were ordered off, having only ſunk three of the enemy's half gallies, and done very little damage; the enemy having made ſuch preparations, as rendered the attempt altogether impracticable.

The attack begun.

But with little ſucceſs.

A council of war having now determined to bombard Calais, the bombardment was begun, the ſeventeenth, in the morning, with ſuch ſucceſs, that it was on fire, in ſeveral places, by one; and it was continued till five, in the evening, during which time, the Engliſh throwed in about ſix hundred ſhells: but (ſays biſhop Burnet) the French did not ſuffer ſo much by theſe bombardments, as was expected. The country, indeed, was much alarmed by it; they had many troops diſperſed all along their coaſt; ſo that it put their affairs in great diſorder, and we were every where maſters of the ſea. F. Daniel, however, who makes light of theſe bombardments, ſays the damage ſuſtained by all the towns they bombarded, did not amount to one thouſandth part of the expenſe, they were at. I have ſeen ſeveral other, as well French as Dutch accounts of theſe bombardments, the former of which agree in leſſening their damages, tho' with more modeſty than father Daniel, and the latter agree intirely with ours.

Calais bombarded.

A ſquadron in the Weſt-Indies.

We had this year likewiſe, a ſquadron of men of war in the Weſt-Indies, under the command of captain Robert Wilmot, and a body of land-forces, under the command of captain Luke Lillinſton: but as this expedition was begun and ended like many others in thoſe parts, with ſquables and quarrels between the chief officers, and eſpecially between the ſea and land-officers, ever jealous of each others power and profit; and as this expedition, tho' it brought conſiderable loſs upon the enemy, was not, otherwiſe, of any great advantage to the nation, and was attended with very little action; and, beſide, as the accounts we have of it vary very much, even in the moſt eſſential parts; I ſhall not detain the reader with ſuch uncertain relations (1) but proceed and give an account of the affairs of the continent.

(1) Upon the whole of this expedition, biſhop Burnet however ſays, our fleet was, all the ſummer, maſter of the Mediterranean; the French were put under great diſorder, and ſeemed to apprehend a deſcent; for Ruſſel came before Marſeilles and Toulon oftner than once. He himſelf indeed told me (ſays the biſhop) he believed nothing could be done there; only the honor of commanding the ſea, and of ſhuting the French within their ports, gave a great reputation to our affairs.

(2) The deſign of theſe ſmoak-ſhips, as they were called, was, that being burnt againſt the forts, they might blind the people who were in them; but one of them run a-ground, and the others were ſet on fire, long before they came to the forts, and the ſmoak was ſo inconſiderable, that had they been carried nearer, they would have had very little effect. This afterwards occaſioned ſome examinations before the council, upon complaints exhibited againſt mr. Meeſters, the inventer of them, by the lord Berkley and by mr. Meeſters, againſt the conduct of the ſea-officers.

Campain in Flanders.

The reader has already ſeen, in the foregoing ſheets, the advantage King William obtained over France, by his early poſſeſſing himſelf of the camp of Park in 1693. That he thereby intirely diſſipated the golden dreams of that court, defeated their deſigns upon Brabant, and obliged the French King to a ſpeedy return to Verſailles: and tho' they obtained the victory of Landen, the ſame year, yet it coſt them ſo dear, that they loſt, in 1694, that ſuperiority over the allies, which they had in the preceding years. The laſt campain, as we have already ſeen, was wholly ſpent by the two armies, in obſerving one another, like enemies, whoſe forces being almoſt equal, indeavor to overmatch the oppoſite party by the advantage of the ground: It ended, however, to the honor of the confederates, by the retaking of Huy. King William being now ſenſible, that the power of France was in the decreaſe, and that, on the contrary, the allies gained ſtrength daily, reſolved to form ſome conſiderable enterprize, the following year, either in Flanders, or on the Maeſe, as opportunity ſhould beſt offer. In order to this, before he returned to England, he gave directions for the forming of large magazines, in ſeveral places, and ordered two armies to be early in the field, to keep the French in awe, on both ſides, and draw their whole ſtrength on that ſide, for which their apprehenſions ſhould be greateſt, and afterwards fall on the other, with more probability of ſucceſs. A ſiege in Flanders ſeemed to be attended with leſs difficulty than on the Maeſe, where the only place that could be attempted was Namur, and as that undertaking was looked upon as impoſſible, the French themſelves turned their greateſt precautions towards Flanders, where they drew a new line from the Lys to the Scheld, before the allies could draw a body of troops together to oppoſe them; by which, and all their other motions, it was plain, they only deſigned, this ſummer, to act on the defenſive.

The allies, who were however ſuperior to them, by near 20,000 men, formed, in the mean time, two great armies in Flanders and Brabant; one conſiſting of ſeventy battalions of foot, and eighty-two ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, which were to be commanded by the King in perſon, and under him by the old Prince of Vandemont; the other of thirty-ſix battalions of foot, and 130 ſquadrons of horſe, to be commanded by the elector of Bavaria, and under him by the duke of Holſtein-Ploen. Beſide theſe, there was another little army, called the body of the Maeſe, conſiſting of twenty-five battalions, and thirty-two ſquadrons, commanded by the baron de Heyden and count de Berlo; who were to be joined by ſome more horſe, that were coming along the Rhine.

On the other hand, the marſhal de Villeroy, who commanded the French forces in chief (the duke of Luxemburg dying, the begining of this year) had drawn his army together, between Condé, Tournay and Aeth: the marſhal de Bouflers and count Guiſcard lay incamped with a body of about 12,000 horſe and foot, about the Sambre; and monſ. Montal, with another ſmall body, lay between Ipres, and the fort la Knocque, to obſerve major-general Ellemburg. Will' III. An' 1695.

This was the ſtate of the armies, on both ſides, when King William left Loo, and came to Breda, in his way to Ghent, where his Majeſty arrived, the 5th of June, N. S. and was received by the elector of Bavaria and the Prince of Holſtein-Ploen. To follow the armies, and the ſeveral bodies of them, on each ſide, in their various marches and counter-marches, to amuſe one another, before they came to action, would but be tedious to the reader, and carry me too great a length: I ſhall, therefore only in general obſerve, that King William's real deſign, which was, however, a ſecret to every one elſe, being to undertake the ſiege of Namur, he amuſed the French, firſt by a feint of attacking their lines, and then by the motion of his troops, in ſuch manner, that they apprehended his intention was upon Charleroy; 'till every thing being ripe to open this deſign, he communicated it, together with the whole plan of the ſiege, to the elector of Bavaria, by whom it was highly approved.

Siege of Namur.

Purſuant to this plan, the city and caſtle of Namur were inveſted the 3d of July, N. S. the King being come to the caſtle of Faliſe, the day before. However, notwithſtanding all poſſible diligence had been uſed to prevent it, the difficulty of the ground, and the vaſt extent of the circumvalation, gave the marſhal de Bouflers, who had likewiſe uſed an incredible diligence, an opportunity to throw himſelf into the place, with ſeveral regiments of dragoons, a great many volunteers, and monſ. Megrigny, at the head of ſeveral ingineers, miners and gunners; ſo that, with this re-inforcement, the gariſon conſiſted of near 15,000 men, and moſt of them the beſt troops of France. Both the city and caſtle being intirely inveſted, his Majeſty diſpoſed the troops into their reſpective quarters (2): and all other neceſſary preparations being made, it was reſolved, the 10th, at a council of all the general officers, held in the preſenſe of the King, in the baron de Heyden's quarters; that the attack upon the town ought to be made againſt St. Nicholas's gate: and to this end, that the trenches ſhould be opened on the hill de Bouge and below along the hermitage, as alſo on the Condroz-ſide, between the hills St. Barbe and the river, and that to favor the opening of the trenches, the baron de Heyden ſhould raiſe a battery of ten pieces of cannon, to batter in reverſe the covered way and detached baſtion before St. Nicholas's-gate, which faced the attack. The heavy cannon being come up, the trenches were opened accordingly the next day, without any great oppoſition by the enemy, and the 12th the batteries begun to play.

(1) The accounts we have of this expedition are; 1. A relation by mr. ſecretary Burchet, in his hiſtory of maritime tranſactions, printed in 1720; being a repetition with very little alteration, of what he publiſhed, ſeveral years before, in his memoirs of the navy. 2. A relation by colonel Lillingſton, in anſwer, and very contradictory to the former, in which he treats mr. Burchet very ſeverely, and accuſes him of great partialities. 3. A rejoinder by mr. Burchet, in anſwer to colonel Lillingſton, containing ſeveral letters and vouchers, to defend his firſt relation, and overthrow that of the colonel's. 4. The two former of theſe the reader will find in Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. 2. p. 700, and ſequel; the firſt at length, in the text, the latter abridged in the notes, that they may be both ſeen in one view: but the author not having then ſeen mr. Burchet's rejoinder, it was omited, tho' not deſignedly, as has been imputed to him, of which he may probably, very ſoon, have an opportunity of convincing, as well mr. Burchet, as the public. In the mean time, the reader, who is deſirous of being informed in the circumſtances of this expedition, may have recourſe to the pieces above-mentioned.

(2) The Sambre and the Maeſe naturally divided the army into three general quarters, which were ſubdivided into ſeveral others. The King's quarters reached from the Sambre to the Maeſe towards Brabant, and here incamped twenty-three battalions, and 120 ſquadrons, under the command of the duke of Holſtein-Ploen, with ſeveral other general officers under him. His electoral highneſs was poſted between the Sambre and the Maeſe, with twenty-four battalions, twenty-ſquadrons, the Spaniſh and Bavarian generals, general Cohorn, and a major-general of Brandenburg: and in the Condroz, along the Maeſe, both above and below the town, were incamped, the baron de Heyden, with the other Brandenburg-generals, and count de Berlo, general of the cavalry of Liege, having ten battalions, and ſixty ſquadrons under them. For the communication of theſe quarters three bridges were immediately laid, one on the Sambre, and two on the Maeſe, one of which latter was above, and the other below Namur. WILL' III. AN' 1695.

The extraordinary ſtrength of this place (1), which was beſide provided with all neceſſaries, for many months, with a good ſtore of ammunition, 100 pieces of cannon, twelve mortars, and 10,000 ſpare muſkets (2), together with ſo numerous a gariſon, reſolutely bent to diſpute every foot of ground, made the French and their friends in England, look upon this enterprize, as an unparallel'd temerity; and doubted not but Namur would be the rock, on which the grand confederacy ſhould ſplit: but all theſe great, and in appearance invincible obſtacles, were not able to ſhake King William's reſolution; on the contrary, they only ſerved to keep his fortitude, prudence and vigilance upon the bent, and to make him concert effectual meaſures to ſurmount all difficulties, which he did, to his immortal glory, the aſtoniſhment of his enemies, and the admiration of all Europe.

The town of Namur ſurrenders.

Not to detain the reader with a journal of the tranſactions of this ſiege, I ſhall only in general obſerve, that the attacks againſt the town were regularly carried on with great application, and various ſucceſs, the enemy, as I obſerved above, vigorouſly diſputing every inch of ground, 'till the 2d of Auguſt, when the cannon having, by that time, widened the breach, and all things being ready for a general aſſault, count Guiſcard, the governor, demanded to capitulate for the town. This being readily granted, the articles were agreed upon, and ſigned, on the fourth of Auguſt, by the elector of Bavaria, for the allies, and by count Guiſcard for the beſieged. The iron-gate was delivered, the ſame day to the beſiegers, and on the 6th the French evacuated the town, and retired into the caſtle.

Prince Vaudemont's retreat.

During this ſiege, the marſhal de Villeroy attempted to cut off Prince Vaudemont, who commanded a ſeparate army of the allies, for the ſecurity of the open towns in the Netherlands, and miſſed very narrowly the ſurprizing him in his camp at Arſele; but the Prince made the fineſt retreat that ever was performed, in the very face of the enemy, and with a very inconſiderable loſs, ſome accounts even ſay without the loſs of a man (3).

WILL' III. AN' 1695.

Dixmuyde and Deynſe ſurrender'd to the French.

The marſhal de Villeroy, having failed in his deſign upon Prince Vaudemont, as alſo in an attempt he made to ſurprize Niewport, marched towards Dixmuyde, and ordered monſ. Montal to lay ſiege to it. The town was indeed but weak: however, conſidering the ſtrength of the gariſon, it might have held out a fortnight, or at leaſt have ſurrendered upon good terms: but major-general Ellemberg, the governor, being a ſoldier of fortune, who had merited his preferment meerly by his blunt courage in open field, was ſoon diſpirited, and knew not how to behave, when he ſaw himſelf cooped up in a place ſurrounded by a royal army: ſo that after a ſlight reſiſtance, of thirty-ſix hours only, he ſurrendered himſelf, and his whole gariſon, priſoners of war. Deynſe followed the example of Dixmuyde, and ſurrendered to the French at diſcretion, without firing a gun, tho' colonel O'Farrel, the governor, was thought more excuſable than Ellemburg, becauſe Deynſe was ſo far leſs defenſible. Among the gariſons of theſe two places, which conſiſted of near 7000 men, were two regiments of Engliſh (4).

Bruſſels bombarded.

The next ſtratagem the marſhal de Villeroy made uſe of, to draw off the allies from the ſiege of Namur, was the bombarding of Bruſſels, which was executed with ſo much fury, from twenty-five mortar-pieces, eighteen pieces of cannon firing, at the ſame time, with red-hot-bullets, that within the ſpace of forty-eight hours, above 2000 houſes, in the heart of the town, were reduced to aſhes, the town-houſe, the great church, and ſeveral other public edifices, demoliſhed, and an incredible conſternation ſpread thro' the whole place (5).

(1) The town of Namur, when the French took it, was quite over-looked by a ſteep hill, from the Porte Defer, to the Porte St. Nicholas; ſo that the French having the liberty to bring down their batteries, at firſt to the deſcent of that hill, and to open their trenches at the foot of it, near the Maeſe, they made themſelves maſters of it in five or ſix days: but now, to add a very conſiderable ſtrength, to this weak part of the town, the French had made a detached baſtion, on the aſcent of the hill, before St. Nicholas's gate, all of ſtone-work, with a caſemate upon it bomb-proof, the counterſcarp of frize-ſtone, as alſo the covered-way, which pointed juſt upon the top of the hill; ſo that no cannon from the plain could bear upon this work; and the allies were neceſſitated, to batter it in reverſe, from the other ſide of the Maeſe. This however, was not all; for upon the right, towards the iron-gate, the beſieged had made three detached baſtions, of the ſame work, juſt upon the brow of the hill, and at the foot of the ſame, before the gate, and between the hill and the book of Werderen, they had a fourth, which hindered the avenues, between the hills, to this gate. The plain upon theſe hills was fortified with a double covered way, both palliſſaded, to defend theſe detached baſtions, towards the village of Bouge: and when the allies began to inveſt the place, the French were working at a third, nearer to the brow of the hill, juſt before theſe works; ſo that the town, which before was but weak, was now, by the new fortifications, rendered ſo ſtrong, that it held longer than the caſtle. Hiſt. of King William III, vol. 3. p. 68.

(2) According to the continuator of Rapin, in French, there were in the place, 120 pieces of cannon, eight mortars, 1200 grenadoes, 130,000 pound of powder, ball and bombs in proportion, 1600 ſpare muſkets, a large quantity of other arms, 100,000 crowns in ready mony, and proviſions for ſix months, B. 25, p. 231.

(3) This retreat, which, conſidered in all its circumſtances is ſcarce to be paralleled in hiſtory, gave ſuch ſatisfaction to King William, that in his letter to Prince Vaudemont, he "owned himſelf obliged to his Highneſs, adding, that he had given "greater marks of a general conſummate in the art of war, than if he had won a battle." And what made this retreat the more extraordinary was, that the enemy's army conſiſted of 80,000 men, and that of Prince Vandemont, not above 30,000.

(4) What added to this misfortune was, that the French detained theſe gariſons priſoners, refuſing to ranſom or exchange them, according to Cartel, ſo that many of them, by the hardſhips they ſuffered, were forced into the French ſervice, or ſent quite croſs France into Catalonia, and other remote parts.

The ſurrender of Dixmuyde was the more extraordinary as the governor had, in the place, a gariſon of 4046 ſoldiers, 254 officers, 1000 or 1100 horſes, 150,000 l. of powder, ſeveral pontons, and a large quantity of meal and biſcuit. Cont. of Rapin, in French. Book 25, p. 234.

(5) The continuator of Rapin, in French, makes the damage done to Bruſſels amount to 3820 houſes and 11 churches burnt to the ground, ſeven churches near deſtroyed, ſeveral palaces and public edifices reduced to aſhes, amongſt which was the town-houſe, with all the records, books, edicts, and privileges of Brabant, and that this damage was computed to be, in all, twenty-three million (of livres I preſume he means) B. 25. p. 236.

The electreſs of Bavaria, who was, at that time, in Bruſſels, was removed to a diſtant part of the town, out of the reach of the bombs; notwithſtanding which, the fright, which was heighten'd, by the continual roaring of the cannon and mortars, had ſuch an effect upon her, that ſhe miſcarried. Her mother, the Queen of Poland, reproach'd France for this barbarity: but was anſwer'd it was by way of reprizals, for the Engliſh bombarding St. Malo, and other places on their coaſts; To which ſhe replied, if that were the caſe, they ought to have ſought their revenge by bombarding London, and not an inland capital, as Bruſſels, which was contrary to the Cartel; and beſide, they themſelves were the aggreſſors in bombarding, having exerciſed that cruelty on ſeveral places even in time of peace.

Will' III. An' 1695.

All theſe attempts of the marſhal de Villeroy had not, however, the effect aimed at; the ſiege of the caſtle of Namur, one of the moſt remarkable in hiſtory, was carried on with great vigor, and many gallant actions were performed as well by the beſieged, as the beſiegers; but they being too numerous to be all related in this place, I ſhall only obſerve, that, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, the capitulation for the caſtle (the town having ſurrendered, as I ſaid above, the 4th) was ſigned, and part of the outworks given up immediately, three days being allowed for the total evacuation of it. What redounded moſt to the honor of the confederate arms in the taking of this almoſt impregnable place, was, that it was defended by one marſhal of France (the marſhal de Boufflers, the firſt whoever ſigned a capitulation) and in the ſight of another, (the marſhal de Villeroy) who was advanced to its relief, with a hundred thouſand men, but was only a ſpectator of the bravery of the former; and of the conſummate prudence of the King of Great Britain, under whoſe conduct and direction all was happily atchieved: and it was allowed, at all hands, that no ſiege was ever carried on with greater regularity.

The caſtle of Namur ſurrenders.

The marſhal de Boufflers arreſted:

When the gariſon of the caſtle of Namur march'd out, King William, who ſate incognito in the Prince of Heſſe's coach, cauſed the marſhal de Boufflers to be arreſted, by way of reprizals, for the gariſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, which were detain'd, and ill-uſed by the French, contrary to the Cartel. He was conducted to Maeſtricht, where he was treated with all the civility and reſpect due to his quality: but his confinement was not long; for upon the return of the captain of his guards, whom he ſent to give the King notice of what had happen'd, and the marſhal's ingaging his word, that the gariſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe ſhould be ſent back, as ſoon as he himſelf ſhould be ſet at liberty, his Majeſty gave orders for his releaſment.

But releas'd again.

The gariſon of Namur, which, at firſt, conſiſted of near 15,000 men, was, during the ſiege, reduced to 5538 men. So that the beſieged loſt near as many men as the beſiegers.

The important conqueſt of Namur (1) being thus made, and the ſeaſon being too far advanced to attempt any thing farther of conſequence, King William left the command of the army to the elector of Bavaria, and retired to Loo, his uſual receſs after the fatigues of a campain; while both armies continued in the field, without any farther action, till the 25th of September, when they began to ſeparate; and thus ended the campain in Flanders.

Major-general Ellemberg beheaded.

I muſt not, however, quit the Netherlands, without taking notice, that major-general Ellemberg, who ſo ſhamefully gave up Dixmuyde, coming, about the begining of October, to Ghent, he, with the other chief officers of the gariſons both of that place and Deynſe, were there ſecured, and a court-martial was appointed for their trial. By ſentenſe of this court, which was afterwards tranſmited to his Majeſty, and by him confirmed, major-general Ellemberg was condemned to be beheaded; brigadier O Farrell to be caſhier'd with infamy, and impriſon'd during the King's pleaſure; three other colonels to be likewiſe broke, and ſome ſuſpended. Accordingly Ellemberg had his head ſtruck off at Ghent, the 30th of November, and, tho' the court-marſhal judg'd his crime to be cowardice, and not treachery, he look'd death in the face with great reſolution.

Will' III. An' 1695.

The campain on the Rhine.

On the Rhine the campain was ſo inconſiderable, that it is ſcarce worth our notice: the French were, at the begining of it, ſuperior to the Prince of Baden, and ſo long they indeavor'd to draw him to an unequal battle: but his Highneſs, being, at length, re-inforced, quited his retrenchments, and then, in his turn, did what he could to bring the French to an ingagement, but with as little ſucceſs; and ſo the campain ended, without any thing material being done on either ſide.

In Catalonia.

In Catalonia, the Spaniards had almoſt always been on the loſing ſide: but now they ſeem'd to ride triumphant at leaſt for a time. For four ſquadrons of Miquelets receiving intelligence, that a detachment of the enemy were upon the march from Bagnoles to Gironne, they incounter'd them by the way, and gave them a total defeat. Fluſh'd with this ſucceſs, upon information that monſ. St. Sylveſtre was marching with eight thouſand men, and between three and four hundred mules, laden with all ſorts of proviſions for Caſtle-Folet, they join'd themſelves to a body of Spaniards, and attack'd the French with ſo much vigor, that they kill'd about 2000 of them on the ſpot, and took near 500 priſoners, and almoſt all the mules. Soon after this, the Catalans and Miquelets routed another body of French, of about 2000 men, who were on their march, to join the 3000 which were before defeated: but here we may put a ſtop to their ſucceſs; for tho' they afterwards block'd up Caſtle-Folet more cloſely, with a deſign to ſtarve it, they could not hinder the duke of Vendome, from puting relief into the place, and they were forc'd to retire from before it with loſs. How little ſucceſs they had before Palamos, the reader has already ſeen: tho' had not admiral Ruſſel thought it neceſſary to re-imbark his troops, and bear away with the fleet, as he did, it was generally believed the place could not have held out above a day or two longer (2).

And in Italy.

In Italy, the French were, likewiſe, the ſufferers, by the loſs of the important place of Caſal. This fortreſs had been long block'd up by the confederate forces, to little purpoſe: but, at length, it was reſolved to beſiege it in form. The trenches before the citadel were accordingly open'd, the latter end of June, as they were, ſoon after, before the town. By the 5th of July, the confederates began to play, with their bombs, upon the citadel and outworks, and the 8th they carried the palliſadoes, the counterſcarp, and the half-moon, by ſtorm. Upon which, the next day, the beſieged, finding the beſiegers ready to ſtorm the cover'd way, thought fit to beat a parly, and ſurrender the place, after about thirteen-days of open trenches: and this was all that happen'd, worthy our notice, in theſe parts (3).

(1) The conqueſt of Namur was certainly very conſiderable; yet there were not wanting thoſe, who, to rob King William of part of the glory of it, pretend it coſt too dear: for (ſay they) not only ten or twelve thouſand men were loſt before the place, but this ſiege was the occaſion of the loſs of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, with their intire gariſons, and to this they add the bombardment of Bruſſels, the fineſt town in the Netherlands, which was deſtroyed, with all its rich moveables and effects, while the allies lay before Namur. Salmon's modern hiſtory, vol. 24. p. 184.

(2) The occaſion of the admiral's ſudden departure was, intelligence brought him, that monſ. Tourville, with the French fleet, was ready to ſail, from Toulon, for the ocean: but it afterwards appear'd to be only a ſtratagem of the French, by whom this report was induſtriouſly raiſed, to ingage the admiral to abandon the ſiege; and, in this, they ſucceeded.

(3) The confederates would not have ſo eaſily made themſelves maſters of this place, had not the marſhal de Catinat been oblig'd to ſend the greateſt part of his forces to ſecure the coaſt of Provence, againſt any invaſion from the Engliſh fleet, which at this time alarmed the ſouthern parts of France.

King

Will' III. An' 1695.

King William returns to England.

King William, whom we left at Loo, arrived, from thence, at the Hague, the 7th of October, N. S. where having ſettled, with the States-general, the plan of the war, for the next year, he imbark'd, on the ninth, O. S. on board the William and Mary-yacht, and the next day landed ſafely at Margate, having been attended in his paſſage, by a ſquadron of Engliſh and Dutch men of war, commanded by ſir Cloudeſly Shovel. His Majeſty lay that night at Canterbury, and, on the 11th, came thro' London and Weſtminſter, to Kenſington.

The parliament diſſolved, and another called.

The firſt thing the King did, after his arrival, was to call a council, in which he propoſed diſſolving the preſent parliament, and, it being reſolved upon, after ſome debate, a proclamation was ordered for that purpoſe, and for the ſpeedy calling of another, to be holden at Weſtminſter, the 22d of November next inſuing (1).

The King goes on a progreſs to the north.

It having been repreſented to the King, that it might very much conduce to his intereſt, in the inſuing elections, to ſhew himſelf to the people, and to converſe more familiarly with the nobility and gentry, than he uſed to do, his Majeſty thought fit to take a progreſs northward: but the better to cover his deſign, he went firſt of all to New-market, where he ſeem'd to be invited by the uſual diverſions of the place, at this time of the year. He was there met and complimented by the vice-chancelor and heads of the univerſity of Cambridge. From thence his Majeſty made a tour thro' Northamptonſhire, Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Warwickſhire, and ſeveral other countries, viſiting the nobility, and other perſons of diſtinction, till he came back again to Oxford, where, on the 10th of November, he was received by the duke of Ormond, their chancellor, dr. Adams, their vice-chancelor, and the reſt of the univerſity, in their academical habits: His Majeſty was conducted to the Theatre, where an elegant entertainment was provided; he could not, however, be prevailed upon to eat a morſel; but immediately took coach and went to Windſor (2).

The parliament meets.

The parliament being met, on the 22d of November, according to his Majeſty's writs of ſummons, the King being ſeated on the throne, and the commons ſent for up, the lord-keeper ſignified his Majeſty's pleaſure to them, that they ſhould forthwith proceed to the choice of a ſpeaker. The commons, thereupon, return'd to their houſe, and unanimouſly made choice of Paul Foley, eſq; who being, the next day, preſented to the King, and approved by him, his Majeſty then made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he told them:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"That it was with great ſatisfaction he met "them, being aſſured of a good diſpoſition of his "parliament, when he had ſuch proofs of the af- "fection of his people, by their behavior during "his abſenſe, and at his return.

"That he was ingaged in the preſent war by the "advice of his firſt parliament, who thought it "neceſſary for the defenſe of the Proteſtant reli- "gion, and for the preſervation of the liberties of "Europe. That the laſt parliament, with great "chearfulneſs, aſſiſted him to carry it on. That "he could not doubt but that their concern for the "common ſafety would oblige them to be unani- "mouſly zealous, for the proſecution of it; and Will' III. An' 1695.
"he was glad that the advantages, they had had, "this year, gave them a reaſonable ground of hop- "ing for farther ſucceſs hereafter. That, upon "this occaſion, he could not but take notice of the "courage and bravery the Engliſh troops had ſhewn, "this laſt ſummer, which, he might ſay, had an- "ſwered their higheſt character in any age; and "that it would not be denied, that without the con- "currence of the valor and power of England, it "were impoſſible to put a ſtop to the ambition "and greatneſs of France."

Then addreſſing himſelf to the commons, he told them: "That he thought it a great misfortune, "that from the begining of his reign, he had "been forced to ask ſo many, and ſuch large "aids of his people; and yet, he was confident, "they would agree with him in opinion, that there "would be, at leaſt, as great ſupplies requiſite, for "carrying on the war, by ſea and land, this year, "as was granted in the laſt ſeſſion; the rather, be- "cauſe the enemy augmented their troops, and "that the neceſſity of augmenting the ſhiping did "plainly appear. That the funds, which had been "given, proved very deficient. That the con- "dition of the civil liſt was ſuch, that it would not "be poſſible for him to ſubſiſt, unleſs that matter "was taken into their care. That compaſſion ob- "liged him to mention the miſerable circumſtances "of the French Proteſtants, who ſuffered for their "religion, and, therefore, he earneſtly recommend- "ed to them, to provide a ſupply ſuitable to their "occaſions.

"That he muſt, likewiſe, take notice of a "great difficulty they lay under, at this time, by "reaſon of the ill ſtate of the coin, the redreſs of "which might, perhaps, prove a farther charge to "the nation; but that this was a matter of ſo "general concern, and of ſo very great impor- "tance; that he had thought fit to leave it in- "tirely to the conſideration of his parliament.

"That he did recommend to the laſt parliament, "the forming ſome good bills, for the incourage- "ment and increaſe of ſeamen: That, he hop'd, "they would not let this ſeſſion paſs, without doing "ſomething in it, and that they would conſider of "ſuch laws as might be proper for the advancement "of trade, and would have a particular regard to "that of the Eaſt-Indies, leſt it ſhould be loſt "to the nation: and that, while the war made it ne- "ceſſary, to have an army abroad, he could wiſh "ſome way might be thought of to raiſe neceſſary "recruits, without giving occaſion of complaint.

"That his deſign to meet his people in a new "parliament, had made the opening of this ſeſſion "very late; which he hoped, they would have ſuch "regard to, as to make all poſſible diſpatch of the "great buſineſs before them, and would call to "mind, that by the long continuance of the laſt "ſeſſion, the allies did not only loſe advantages, "which they might have had at the begining of the "campain, but gave the enemy ſuch an opportunity, "as might have proved very fatal to them: and that "he was the more concerned to preſs this, becauſe "of the great preparations the French made, to "be early in the field, the next year.

(1) The chief reaſon which induced his Majeſty to diſſolve this parliament, was, probably, the proſecution of the duke of Leeds, which, in the whole courſe of it, had made him uneaſy, being thought, by many to have more ſpleen than juſtice in it: Now as, on the one hand, his Majeſty could never have ſacrificed a miniſter, to whom he not only owed his match with the late Queen, but who had, likewiſe, been ſo greatly inſtrumental in bringing about the revolution; ſo, on the other hand, there was no ſafer way to put a ſtop to an impeachment, which was ſtill depending, than the calling a new parliament.

(2) The duke of Ormond having communicated to his Majeſty a letter directed to his grace, by a nameleſs perſon, and dropped in the ſtreet, the day before, wherein information was given of a pretended deſign to poiſon the King at this entertainment, his Majeſty, without reflecting on the groundleſſneſs of the report, which was, undoubtedly raiſed by ſome enemy to him, or the univerſity, took this haſty reſolution: but as it was not thought proper, to expoſe his Majeſty's ſuſpicion, he declared, "that this was a viſit of kindneſs, not of curioſity, he having ſeen the univerſity before; and, therefore, did not propoſe to "make any ſtay at this time.

In

Will'III. An' 1695.

In the close of this speech his Majesty told the lords, "that he had had such experience of their "good affections;" and to the commons; "that he "had such an intire satisfaction in the choice which "his people had made of them, that he promis'd "himself a happy conclusion of this session, unless "they suffered themselves to be misled into heats "and divisions, which being the only hope, the "common enemy now had left, he made no doubt, "but they would intirely disappoint them, by their "prudence and love to their country.

Addresses of both houses.

Both lords and commons address'd his Majesty, with great zeal and unanimity, and to the same effect, "congratulating him on his success, this "campain, and on his safe return, and assuring "him, that they would support his government, "and stand by him, in the prosecution of the war, "in which he was ingaged for the safety of Eng-"land, and the liberties of Europe." To the commons address, his Majesty was pleas'd to answer: "that he thank'd them heartily for the marks they "gave him of their affection: adding; that his and "their interest were inseparable, and that there "was nothing he wish'd so much, as the hap-"piness of this country, where God had placed "him."

His Majesty's answer.

The first and main thing the parliament had to do, and which they undertook with great alacrity, was to find out ways and means to provide for the expense of the war, and to carry it on with vigor: however, to shew, at the same time, their zeal to the people who chose them, by securing their lives and estates, the commons, previous to all public business, on the 26th of November, brought again into the house the so much desir'd "bill for regu-"lating trials, in cases of high treason and mispri-"son of treason," which had been several times lost, in former sessions of parliaments. It was read three times, pass'd, and sent up to the lords, for their concurrence, on the 8th of December. The lords added to it the clause they had always insisted on, viz. "that upon the trial of any peer or peeress, "for treason, or misprison of treason, all the peers "who have a right to sit and vote in parliament "shall be duly summoned twenty days at least before "such trial, and vote at the same, having first "taken the oaths appointed by the act of parlia-"ment made, in the first year of William and "Mary, and subscribed and repeated the declara-"tion, mention'd in the act made, 30 of Charles II," which clause was agreed to by the commons, the 17th of January (1).

A supply voted.

The second of December, the house of commons voted a supply for carrying on the war; the 6th they began to proportion it, and allotted 2,500,000 l. for the navy, and 16,972 l. for the officers of the two marine regiments. The 14th they voted 2,007,832 l. for the pay of 87,440 men, including commission and non-commission officers, making up the horse, dragoons and foot, which, according to the list of the land-forces deliver'd into the house, they had voted necessary, for the service of the year 1696. And lastly 500,000 l. for the office of ordnance, the pay of the general officers, transports, hospitals, contingencies, and other extraordinary charge of the war; in all 5,024,853 l.

Ways and means.

Having again granted this vast supply, the next thing was to find out means to raise it, which could not but be very difficult, as so many funds were already so largely anticipated. And tho' the landed interest had all along born so great a share of the public charge, the commons did not aim at sparing themselves, but again laid 4 s. in the pound upon land, as likewise upon all personal estates, and upon all offices and imployments of profit, other than military offices in the army, navy and ordnance. This tax, however, falling very short of answering the supplies they had voted, the house resolved, first to inlarge the times for persons to come in and purchase certain annuities, mention'd in a former act. Second, to continue the duties formerly charged on low wines, and spirits of the first extraction. Third, to continue the duties upon all wines, vinegar, and tobacco, from the 24th of June 1698, to the 29th of September 1701. Fourth, To continue the duties upon all East-India goods and manufactures, and upon all wrought silks, and several other goods, from the 10th of November, 1697, to the 29th of September, 1701. Fifth, to settle a fund, by continuing the duties upon salt, for the payment of interest, not exceeding seven pound per cent, redeemable by parliament: and, Sixth, that the duties of twenty-five l. per ton, be laid upon all French wine, thirty l. per ton upon all French brandy; fifteen l. per ton, upon all French vinegar, and twenty-five pound per cent. ad valorem, upon all other goods of the growth, product or manufacture of France, imported after the 12th day of March 1697, for the term of twenty-one years, and from thence to the end of the next session of parliament, over and above the duties already charg'd thereupon, without any deduction, and after that rate, for any greater or lesser quantity. And several bills were prepared and brought in pursuant to these resolutions.

Debates about re-coining the mony.

The next important matter, which required the consideration of parliament, was their coining of the silver-mony of this kingdom; which, as it was one of the most remarkable events of this reign, I shall be particular in my relation of. The lords having consider'd that part of the King's speech, which related to the ill state of the coin, and having drawn up an address, to which, in a conference, they desir'd the concurrence of the lower house, the latter in a committee of the whole house, enter'd upon that grand affair: and the first question was, whether it was necessary or expedient, to re-coin the silver-mony? the affirmative was held by the court-party; but it met with a strong opposition: for which the following reasons were alledged:

Reasons against it.

"That this was no fit conjuncture for it; that "the nation was ingaged in a doubtful and burden-"som war: by which the kingdom had already "greatly suffer'd, and of which it grew every day "more sensible: that, therefore, the people, on "whose good affection, the government so much "depended, should not be provoked by new griev-"ances, greater than any they had yet felt, as "those would certainly be, that must arise from the "calling in the silver-coin: that if this was done, "however things might be managed, and accom-"modated at home, it were impossible to maintain, "either the commerce or the war abroad: for nei-"ther the merchant could be paid his bills of ex-"change, nor the soldier receive the subsistence. "That this was to lay the axe to the root, and "to dig up the foundations of the government. "That if this design was prosecuted, trade must "stand still, for want of mutual payments, whence "such disorder and confusion would certainly fol-

(1) A remarkable turn of wit is related, on this occasion, of the young lord Shaftsbury; who perceiving, while the bill was yet depending in the house of commons, that some opposition was made to it, rose up, in order to speak for it, and having begun his speech, he industriously feign'd to be surpriz'd, that, for a while he could not go on: but having recover'd himself, he took occasion from his very surprise, to inforce the necessity of allowing counsel to prisoners, who were to appear before their judges, since he, who not only was unaccused and innocent, but one of their members, was so dash'd, when he was to speak before that august assembly. " low, as would diſcourage and diſhearten the peo" ple, in the higheſt meaſure, if not drive them to
" a perfect deſpair, as deſpair would to the moſt
" terrible extremities: that, therefore, the re-coin-
" ing the mony at this time was by no means to be " attempted, without hazarding all."

Reaſons for it.

Thoſe of the contrary opinion, at the head of whom was mr. Charles Montague, chancellor of the exchequer, alledged: " that the miſchief would be " fatal, if a preſent remedy was not found out and " applied: that by reaſon of the ill ſtate of the coin,
" the exchange abroad was infinitely to the nation's
" prejudice: that the ſupplies, which were raiſed
" to maintain the army, would never attain their " end, being ſo much diminiſh'd and devour'd by
" the unequal change, and exorbitant premiums,
" before they reach'd the camp: that this was the " unhappy cauſe, that guineas were advanced to thir" ty ſhillings, and forein gold in proportion: that,
" therefore, to the nation's great loſs, not only the " Dutch, but, indeed, all Europe, ſent that com-
" modity to this market; and would continue ſo to " do, till the nation ſhould be impoveriſh'd and " undone, by too much gold: that we muſt ex-
" change for their gold our goods or our ſilver, 'till,
" at laſt, we ſhould have only guineas to trade
" withal; which no body could think our neigh" bors would be ſo kind to receive back at the " value they were at here: that, therefore, this
" diſeaſe would, every day, take deeper root, in-
" fect the very vitals of the nation, and, if not " remedied, would ſoon become incurable: that
" our enemies muſt be mightily intimidated by ſo
" great an action, and would ſooner be induced to " agree to honorable terms of peace, in caſe they
" ſaw us able to ſurmount this difficulty, by the " retrieving the ill ſtate of the coin, on which their " hopes of the nation's ſpeedy ruin ſo much de" pended; and that it would juſtly create an
" eſteem abroad, of the greatneſs and wiſdom of " the parliament of England, which was able to " conquer ſuch an obſtinate and almoſt inſuperable
" evil, in ſuch a juncture of affairs."

Reſolution to re-coin the mony.

It was at length, reſolved, after a long debate, and mature conſideration of the circumſtances, to call in and re-coin the ſilver mony. This done, the

" would prevent its being melted down, and that,

Theſe arguments were contradicted by the court-party, who urged;

Reaſons againſt it.

" That the worth of mony was relative, and to
" be rated by the meaſure of ſuch goods, labor,
" advice, ſkill, or other aſſiſtances, as could be
" purchaſed from another by our parting with it.
" That the value of mony, among people who " lived under different municipal laws, was in-
" trinſick, and conſiſted in its weight and fine-
" neſs: that common conſent had given it this " value, for the common conveniency of ſupplying
" one another's wants. That the weight and fine-
" neſs was the only worth, which other nations re" garded in our coin, as we in theirs; all mony
" being, between ſubjects of different governments,
" of no greater value, excepting the workmanſhip,
" than ſo many pieces of uncoin'd bullion: that,
" therefore, ſhould our ſtandard be alter'd, we
" ſhould ſtill be upon the ſame foot with our neigh" bors, for if we were to pay them for their goods,
" or exchange our mony with theirs, whatever de-
" nomination we gave our mony, they would, in " their exchange, ever reduce it to an equality
" with theirs, and proportion the quantity and " goodneſs of their commodities, to the weight and
" fineneſs of the mony they were to receive for " them; ſo that, in reſpect of our forein com-
" merce, there was no reaſon to alter our ſtandard.
" If the ſtandard was raiſed, at home, they ſaid,
" great confuſion would attend it, the landlord
" would be defrauded of a great part of his rents,
" and the creditor of his debts: that the ſeaman
" and the ſoldier would be wrong'd in their pay,
" and many the like injuries and inconveniencies
" would happen. That it was no anſwer to ſay,
" they might buy as much goods and conveniences
" of life with this coin, raiſed above its ſtandard,
" as they could before: becauſe, by degrees, the
" ſeller would infallibly raiſe the price of his goods,
" in proportion to the new-raiſed ſtandard, and
" that, of this, there was an inſtance before them;
" all commodities being greatly raiſed in their
" price, while guineas were paid for thirty ſhil-
" lings. That, whereas it was alledged, that the " price of bullion was riſen to ſix ſhillings and
" three pence, and, therefore, the ſtandard of the " ſilver coin ought to be raiſed likewiſe: It was re" plied, that it was a thing impoſſible for the price
" of ſilver to riſe and fall in reſpect of itſelf: that it
" was an unchangeable truth, than which no mathe-
" matical demonſtration could be clearer, that an " ounce of ſilver would ever be worth another ounce
" of the ſame fineneſs, and no more: allowing
" ſome inconſiderable diſparity upon the account
" of the coin, if one ounce be in mony, and the " other in bullion: that it was true, indeed, the " people commonly gave ſix ſhillings and three " pence for an ounce of bullion, but that they " only gave clipp'd pieces, that had no more than " the ſound of ſhillings and pence; but were by " no means the things themſelves; that is, they " were not the ſtandard-ſhillings of due weight and
" fineneſs, and were no more ſo, in the juſt ſenſe
" the word, than an ell is an ell, when the third
" part of it is cut off: that the caſe was ſo plain,
" that when they demanded of thoſe, who affirmed
" an ounce of bullion was worth ſix ſhillings and
" three pence, whether they meant ſix mill'd ſhil-
" lings and three pence, they knew not what to " reply: for this alteration of the value of bullion
" was meerly in relation to diminiſh'd mony: and,
" to make it yet more evident, they urg'd, it was
" then matter of fact, that with five ſhillings and
" two pence, of new mill'd mony, they could buy
" as much bullion as they pleas'd; while thoſe who " bought it with clipp'd pieces, paid ſix ſhillings
" and three pence. That whereas it was urg'd,
" that the raiſing the ſtandard would prevent the " exportation of our mony; it was anſwer'd, that " there was no other way poſſible to keep our mony
" at home, than by out-trading our neighbours,
" that is, by ſending them more commodities, or
" of greater value, than thoſe we received from " them: for if, upon the ballance, we were found
" in their debt, there was no way left, but to pay
" it in coin or bullion; and that, therefore, what" ever denomination we gave our coin, we muſt
" be neceſſitated to ſend it abroad, if the commodi-
" ties we exported could not pay our debts; and " that all the other arguments, for raiſing the ſtan-
" dard, would ſink to the ground, in caſe theſe two,
" on which the reſt were built, had no reaſonable
" foundation.

Resolutions thereupon.

These debates being at an end, the commons resolved, on the 10th of December, "to recoin the "clipped mony, according to the established standard of the mint, both as to weight and fineness;" and to make it more easy to the people, they voted "a recompense for the deficiency of "the clipped mony; and that the loss of such clipped mony should be born by the public; and a "fund of 1,200,000 l. settled for that purpose."

The commons were not, in the mean time, insensible of the inconveniencies that must necessarily attend the calling in and re-coining the clipped mony, the chief of which would be a cessation of payments, and as a consequence thereof, an interruption of commerce. It was evident, England could not subsist, unless some expedient was found out to support its trade, 'till the new mony returned from the Mint, since gold alone could not do it. They therefore, agreed, "to call in the mony by degrees, that "while some denominations of coin were suppressed others might be current:" Hoping, that before the last old mony should come in to be re-coined, so much of the new might circulate from the Mint, as might sufficiently answer the necessities of the nation.

They thereupon resolved; first, "that a day be "appointed, after which no clipped crowns or "half-crowns be taken, as also any mony clipped "within the ring, be allowed in payment, or to "pass, except only to the collectors of his Majesty's revenues and taxes, and upon loans and "payments into the exchequer: secondly, that a "day be appointed after which no clipped mony "should pass in any payment whatsoever: thirdly, "that a day be appointed, for all persons to bring "in their clipped mony, to be re-coined into milled "mony; after which no recompense should be made "for the same." The 11th of December, an address was ordered to be prepared to desire his Majesty to regulate the currency of clipped mony, (1) according to the foregoing resolutions, and the same being presented accordingly, his Majesty, on the 19th, caused his royal proclamation to be issued for that end.

While these things were transacting, the commons, considering that the maintenance of an army abroad occasioned the exportation of the coin, which could be no ways prevented but by supplying the army with necessaries out of this kingdom, on the 13th of December, ordered an address to be presented to his Majesty: "that he would please to "procure, that all commodities and provisions, "that should be transported from England, for "the use of the forces in his Majesty's pay abroad, "might be exempted from any duty or excise, "throughout the Spanish and united Netherlands:" To which the King answered: "that what the "commons desired, had been done, in a good "measure, for several years, and that he would see "what could be farther done in it."

The 17th of December, the chancellor of the exchequer presented to the house, a bill, which he had prepared, "for regulating the coinage of the "silver mony" which having been considered by the commons, they ordered, the 23d, a clause of loan to be inserted into it, in favor of such as would advance mony on credit of the exchequer, in general, transferable to such funds, as should be settled by parliament, towards making good the deficiencies of the clipped mony; and likewise ordered the committee to take care, that all persons who should bring in clipped mony (above what was for taxes) should have a recompense for the same: the bill being amended accordingly, passed the 27th, and was sent up to the lords for their concurrence.

Will' III. An' 1695.

For supplying the deficiency of the clipped mony, the commons resolved, the last day of the year, to raise 1,200,000 l. by a duty upon all dwelling houses except cottages (2); which duty was to be paid by the inhabitants of the said houses, and to be continued for seven years, and no longer.

A public fast.

Before I enter on the transactions of the year 1696, I must mention, that at the begining of this session, the commons addressed his Majesty to appoint a fast, for the success of the parliament, and accordingly, the 11th of December was appointed, for London, and the 18th, for the rest of the kingdom.

Written protections declared void.

Great complaints being likewise made to the house, of the abuse of written protections given by the members, such protections were called in, and made void in law: It was, however, at the same time, declared, that their menial servants should injoy the same privileges as before; but no person should be taken into custody, upon complaint of a breach of privilege, 'till the matter should be examined, which order was not to extend to any breach of privilege upon the person of a member.

An' 1696. Inconveniencies occasion'd by calling in the clipped mony.

But to return to the case of the clipped mony: the terms appointed by the King's proclamation, to put a stop to the currency of it, were so short, that notwithstanding all the precaution which had been used, an immediate stop was thereby put to trade (3). The inconveniencies which occasioned this stop being represented to the house of commons, and the danger that attended them too evident to be over-looked, the house considered, in a grand committee, the state of the nation, and how to prevent the stop of commerce during the re-coining of the clipped monies. After several debates on this matter, they resolved, on the 9th of January, first, "that "the recompense for supplying the clipped mony "should extend to all clipped mony, which was silver, altho' of a coarser allay than the standard. "Secondly, that the collectors and receivers of his "Majesty's aids and revenues be injoined to receive "all such mony. Thirdly, that a reward of 5 l. "per cent. be given to all such persons as should "bring in, either milled, or broad unclipped "mony, to be applied in exchange of the clipped "mony, throughout the kingdom. Fourthly,

Resolutions of the commons thereupon.

(1) The lords had before addressed the King to the same effect.

(2) This tax was of two shillings yearly upon each house, four shillings yearly upon every house having ten windows, and eight shillings yearly, upon such houses as have twenty windows, over and above the said two shillings.

(3) This stop was partly occasioned by the backwardness of the people to receive any old mony,' tho' allowed at present to pass, upon an apprehension, that at last, it would be left upon their hands; partly, from the slowness of re-coining, in respect of the wants of the public, tho' otherwise dispatched, with all the expedition possible in so great an affair; and partly by reason of the unequal intrinsic value, between the new-milled mony, and those pieces or denominations of the old, which were allowed to be current: for while the hammered mony, and pieces not clipped within the rim, were permited to pass, for the present necessity of trade, no body was willing to make payments in new mony, which so much exceeded the old in its intrinsic value. And therefore, the new silver mony, as fast as it issued from the mints and exchequer, was stopped, in a great measure, in the hands of the first receiver: for none were disposed to make payments, in the new silver coin, at the old standard, when they could do it in the clipped pieces, so much below it: and those who had no payment to make kept their new mony in their chests, as medals and rarities; and there is a great deal of reason to believe, that at first, large sums of the new mony, by the help of the crucible, went in ingots abroad to purchase gold, which at this time, was a very profitable commodity in England.

"that

"that a reward alſo of 3 d. per ounce be given to "all perſons who ſhould bring in wrought plate to "the Mint to be re-coined. Fifthly; that for the "ſooner bringing in the clipped mony to be re-"coined, any perſons might pay in their whole next "years tax of 4 s. in the pound, in the ſaid clipped "mony, at one convenient time, appointed for "that purpoſe: Laſtly, that commiſſioners be ap-"pointed in every county, to pay and diſtribute "the milled and broad unclipped mony and the "new-coined mony, and to receive the clipped "mony." A committee was appointed at the ſame time, to prepare and bring in a bill upon the ſaid reſolutions.

A bill upon theſe reſolutions.

A bill was accordingly preſented, and, after a ſecond reading, on the 21ſt of January, commited to a committee of the whole houſe. The queſtion was put the ſame day, that it be an inſtruction to the ſaid committee, to conſider the price of guineas, which paſſed in the negative. The ſiting of this committee was interrupted for ſome time; however, on the 4th of February it was reſolved: "that a farther incouragement be given "for bringing in plate to be coined, and broad "mony in order to be exchanged for clipped mo-"ny; and that a clauſe be inſerted in the ſaid bill "to prevent the melting down, and exportation of "coin, or any bullion." Two days after the ſaid "committee was impowered to receive another clauſe, "to prohibit the uſe of plate in public "houſes (1).

The houſe of peers having, on the 6th of January, made ſeveral amendments to the "bill for re-"gulating the coinage of the ſilver mony of this "kingdom," moſt of which were, on the 13th, after ſeveral debates and conferences, diſagreed to by the commons, mr. chancellor of the exchequer, according to order, preſented, the 16th, another bill to the houſe, "for remedying the ill ſtate of the coin of "this kingdom," which was received, and after ſome amendments had been made to it, by a committee of the whole houſe, ordered to be ingroſſed, and then ſent up to the lords, for their concurrence.

Acts paſſed.

The 21ſt, his Majeſty gave the royal aſſent to this act, and at the ſame time, to "an act for inlarging "the times to come in, and purchaſe certain an-"nuities, &c; an act for regulating trials, in caſes "of treaſon and miſpriſion of treaſon; an act for "preventing charge and expenſe in elections of "members to ſerve in parliament;" and to ſeveral private bills: the 13th of February, the King came again to the parliament houſe, and gave the royal ſanction to "an act for granting to his Majeſty an "aid of 4 s. in the pound; an act to prevent falſe "and double returns of members to ſerve in par-"liament; an act for the more eaſy recovering of "ſmall tithes," and to ſeven private acts.

Debates about lowering the price of guineas.

The next debate of moment, which may properly follow the former concerning the re-coining of the ſilver mony, as being relative thereunto, was concerning the exhorbitant price of guineas. This debate was occaſioned by a petition preſented, the 8th of February, to the commons, by diverſe merchants and others; in which they prayed, that the difficulties they labored under, and loſſes which they ſuſtained, in their trade and payments, occaſioned by the riſe of guineas, might be taken into conſideration. The houſe begun, by ordering a bill to be brought in, "for taking off the obligation and "incouragement of coining guineas, for a certain "time;" and then they proceeded to the lowering of the value: which was not however done without ſome oppoſition.

The reaſons againſt lowering the price of guineas were; "that the people were eaſy and pleas'd "with their being at this price; that abundance of "people, in whoſe hands they ſhould, at laſt, be "found, would be looſers, which would occaſion "great diſturbance and clamor in the kingdom; "that it ought, therefore, to be conſidered, how far "it was fit to incenſe the common people in this "juncture of affairs, who had already ſuffered ſo "much by the war." The oppoſite party, who were for reducing the price of guineas, objected; "that there was as great reaſon to bring down the "price of guineas, as there was to re-coin the ſilver "mony, at the old ſtandard; (here they reckoned "up the miſchiefs mentioned above on that head;) "that however the parliament were obliged to "manage, by the neceſſity of affairs, and to ſuffer, "for a time, the guineas to paſs at that exceſſive "rate, that there might be in ſome meaſure a "currency of mony, while the Mints were imploy-"ed in re-coining the ſilver; yet now they were "obliged to ſink the price nearer the old ſtandard, "that the ſilver mony might not be hoarded up, "as faſt as iſſued from the Mint? and that what-"ever loſſes and inconveniencies the people might "ſuffer, by the reducing of guineas, yet the miſ-"chiefs which aroſe, and would daily increaſe, "from not doing it, did infinitely over-balance "thoſe on the other ſide."

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Reaſons againſt it.

Reaſons for it.

The value of guineas ſunk.

Theſe reaſons, at length, prevailing, the commons reſolved to lower the price of guineas, and that they might do it with the leſs grievance to the people, they at firſt, on the 15th of February, reduced them from thirty to twenty-eight ſhillings, afterwards from twenty-eight ſhillings to twenty-ſix ſhillings, till at laſt, a clauſe was inſerted in the "bill "for incouraging the bringing of plate to the "the Mint," whereby they were ſettled at twenty-two ſhillings, from which they naturally fell to their former price of twenty-one ſhillings ſix-pence. And thus this great undertaking, which tho' highly difficult was abſolutely neceſſary, came to a happy end, to the immortal honor of this parliament in general, and in particular of mr. Charles Montague, (afterwards lord Halliſax) to whoſe ſhare the management of this arduous and important affair chiefly fell.

Affair of the Scotiſh Eaſt-India-company.

I come now to an affair, which, together with another I ſhall mention afterwards, gave the King no ſmall uneaſineſs: the Scots, purſuant to the act of parliament they had obtained, for erecting a company to trade to Africa and the Eaſt-Indies, of which I made ſome mention above, having procured a great many ſubſcribers, as well Engliſh Interlopers and Hamburghers, as Scots; the Engliſh Eaſt-India-company preſented a petition to the houſe of peers, ſeting forth; "that this Scotiſh "company would not only be greatly prejudicial to "the Engliſh Eaſt-India-company, but to the na-"tion in general." The houſe of lords, hereupon, formed an addreſs to the King, to which the commons gave their concurrence, wherein they repreſented to his Majeſty: that having "taken into "their conſideration the ſtate of the trade of this "kingdom, they found, that beſide many other "diſadvantages and difficulties it now lay un-"der, an act of parliament which had lately re-"ceived his Majeſty's royal aſſent in his king-"dom of Scotland, for erecting a company trad-"ing to Africa, and the Indies, was likely to "bring many prejudices and miſchiefs to all his "Majeſty's ſubjects, that were concerned in the "wealth and trade of this nation; that the ſaid "act did provide," that all ſhips, merchandize,

(1) This afterwards proved one of the beſt expedients to ſupply the Mint with bullion, there being at this time, ſcarce any public houſe in England, that had not ſeveral ſilver tankards, and other utenſils of the ſame metal, which the owners choſe rather to ſend to the Mints and turn into ready mony, than to keep ſo much uſeleſs and dead ſilver at home.

and other effects whatſoever, belonging to that company, ſhould be free from all manner of reſtraints or prohibitions, and of all cuſtoms, taxes, ſeſſes, ſupplies, or other duties impoſed, or to be impoſed by act of parliament, or otherwiſe, for the ſpace of twenty-one years: and farther, that the ſaid company, whoſe members, officers, ſervants, or others belonging thereto, ſhould be free, both in their perſons, eſtates and goods imployed in the ſaid ſtock and trade, from all manner of taxes, ſeſſes, ſupplies, exciſes, quartering of ſoldiers, tranſient or local, levying of ſoldiers, or other impoſitions whatſoever, during the ſpace of twenty-one years. "That "by reaſon of the great advantages granted to the "Scotiſh Eaſt-India-company, and the duties and "difficulties which lay upon that trade, in Eng- "land, a great part of the ſtock and ſhiping of "this nation would be carried thither; and by "this means Scotland might be made a free port "for all Eaſt-India-commodities; and conſequent- "ly thoſe ſeveral places in Europe, which were "ſupplied from England, would be furniſhed from "Scotland, much cheaper than could be done by "the Engliſh, and therefore, this nation loſe the "benefit of ſupplying foreign parts with thoſe "commodities, which had always been a great ar- "ticle in the ballance of their forein trade. More- "over, that the ſaid commodities would unavoid- "ably be brought by the Scots into England "by ſtealth, both by ſea and land, to the vaſt "prejudice of the Engliſh trade and navigation, "and to the great detriment of his Majeſty, in "his cuſtoms: and that when the Scotiſh nation "ſhould have ſettled themſelves in plantations in "America, the Engliſh commerce in tobacco, "ſugar, cotton, wool, ſkins, maſts, &c. would "be utterly loſt, becauſe the privileges of that "nation, granted them by this act, were ſuch, that "that kingdom muſt be the magazine for all com- "modities, and the Engliſh plantations, and the "traffic there, loſt to this nation, and the expor- "tation of their own manufactures yearly decreaſed: "that beſide theſe, and many other obſtructions, "that this act would unavoidably bring to the gene- "ral trade of this nation, another clauſe in the ſaid "act, whereby" his Majeſty promiſed to interpoſe his authority to have reſtitution, reparation and ſatisfaction made, for any damage that might be done to any of the ſhips, goods, merchandizes, perſons or other effects whatſoever, belonging to the ſaid company, and that upon the public charge; "did "ſeem to ingage his Majeſty to imploy the ſhiping "and ſtrength at ſea of this nation, to ſupport "this new company, to the great detriment even of "this kingdom."

To this addreſs, the King anſwered: "that he "had been ill-ſerved in Scotland, but he hoped "ſome remedies might be found to prevent the in- "conveniences which might ariſe from this "act."

The 26th of January, the commons, after having read the report of a committee appointed to examine by what methods the ſaid act was procured, together with ſeveral other papers relating to this affair, came to a reſolution, that "the directors "of the company of Scotland, trading to Africa, "and the Indies, adminiſtring and taking here, "in this kingdom, an oath de fideli, and under "color of a Scotiſh act of parliament, ſtyling "themſelves a company, and acting as ſuch, and "raiſing mony in this kingdom, for carrying on the "ſaid trade, were guilty of a high crime and "miſdemeanor; and that the lord Belhaven, "William Patterſon, the projector (1), and the "reſt of the directors, who were reſident in Eng- "land, ſhould be impeached.

Will' III. An' 1696.

The commons having conſidered ſeveral times, in a grand committee, the ſtate of the nation, in relation to trade, reſolved, firſt, "that a coun- "cil of trade be eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, "with powers for the more effectual preſervation "of the trade of this kingdom; ſecondly, that "the commiſſioners conſtituting the ſaid council "be nominated by parliament; thirdly, that "none of the commiſſioners be of this houſe; "fourthly, that the ſaid commiſſioners ſhould take "an oath, acknowledging that King William was "rightful and lawful heir of this realm, and that the "late King James had no right or title thereunto, &c. Theſe, with ten other reſolutions relating to the ſaid council, being reported to the houſe, the two firſt, with ſome more of them, were approved; but ſeveral others, and eſpecially the fourth, which occaſioned a warm debate, were rejected by the houſe: whereupon a bill was ordered to be brought in, upon the reſolutions agreed to (2).

A council of trade voted.

The other affair I mentioned, which gave great uneaſineſs to the King, was a grant his Majeſty had made to the earl of Portland, and to his heirs for ever, of the manors of Denbigh, Bromfield and Yale, in the county of Denbigh, being part of the demeſnes of the Prince of Wales. The gentlemen of Wales ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this grant, and the warrant coming to the lords of the treaſury, they were, at one or two days notice only, heard againſt it, before their lordſhips: they repreſented; "that the Welſh were never ſubject to any but to "God and the King; that thoſe lordſhips were "unalienable; that they belonged to the Prince of "Wales when there was one, and the rents now "ſupported the government there, the ſalaries of "the judges, and other officers of the crown, "being paid out of them: they ſaid, the grant was "too great for any forein ſubject to have; and "the people of the country were too great to be "ſubject to a foreiner: that if ſuch grants were "frequently made, there would be nothing left "for the King or his ſucceſſors to ſubſiſt on: they "could not conceive how the glory and grandeur "of England could be upheld by a poor landleſs "crown, and a miſerable neceſſitous people: that "they were not Engliſh, but forein politicians, "that adviſed the King to theſe grants: that the "Kings of England always reigned beſt when they "had the affections of their Engliſh ſubjects; of "which they were ſecure, when the people were "ſenſible the King was intirely in their intereſt, "and loved the Engliſh ſoil, as well as the people's "mony:" To which mr. Price, then a member of the houſe of commons, but afterwards a very famous judge, towards the concluſion of a long ſpeech he made, added: "let it be conſidered (ſaid he) "can it be for his Majeſty's intereſt or honor "(when the people hear this and underſtand it)

A grant to the earl of Portland reſented.

(1) The other directors were David Nairne, James Smith, James Cheiſly, William Shepherd, Robert Blackwood, James Balfour, James Fowlis, Thomas Coutts, Abraham Wilmer, Daniel van Mildert, Robert Williamſon, Anthony Merry, Paul Dominicque, Robert Douglas, Thomas Skinner, Hugh Fraſier, James Bateman, Walter Stewart, and Joſeph Cohen d' Azevedo. Hiſt. of King William III, Vol. 3. p. 131.

(2) The Scots, notwithſtanding all this oppoſition, proceeded in their project of making ſettlements in the Weſt-Indies, and actually ſettled a colony on the Iſthmus of Darien or Panama in America; from whence it was thought they propoſed to trade both with the Eaſt-Indies and Europe, if they had not been expelled from thence by the Spaniards, who never ſuffer any European nations to carry on a trade, thro' the Pacific ocean, or South-ſea, to the Eaſt-Indies.

"that

" that he daily gives away the revenues, and " more, the perpetuity of his crown-revenue to his " forein ſubjects? Good Kings, after a long and " chargeable war, were accuſtomed to tell their " people, that they ſorrowed for the hardſhips the " nation underwent by long war and heavy taxes, " and that now they would live on their own: but " it is to be feared, if grants are made ſo large " and ſo frequent, there will be nothing for the " King or his ſucceſſors, to call his own to live " upon." Having all done ſpeaking, the lord Godolphin ſaid; " they had offered many " weighty reaſons, which they (the lords of the " treaſury) ſhould repreſent to his Majeſty."

From the treaſury, the gentlemen of Wales attended the grant to the privy-ſeal, where their reaſons and complaints againſt it were heard and received with all candor and goodneſs: yet, notwithſtanding all this, the ſaid grant being only ſuperſeded, but not recalled, ſir Thomas Groſvenor, ſir Richard Middleton, ſir John Conway, ſir Robert Cotton, ſir William Williams, ſir Roger Puleſton, Edward Vaughan, Edward Brereton, and Robert Price, eſqs; addreſſed themſelves, by petition, to the commons. Upon this occaſion mr. Price again made a long and very memorable ſpeech, in which having obſerved, " that this petition, tho' " ſubſcribed by a few hands, yet had the appro- " bation of thouſands, who were not influenced " by their own intereſt, but acted for the honor of " the crown, and the welfare of the Britiſh nation;" he added, to what he had before offered to the lords of the treaſury and the lord privy-ſeal, among many others, the following weighty arguments: " We are in a confederacy in war, and ſome of " thoſe confederates our enemies in trade, tho' " planted among us, ſome of them are in the " King's council; ſome in the army; and the " common traders have poſſeſſed themſelves of the " outſkirts of this great city: we find ſome or " other of them naturalized, and others made " denizens; every parliament, we find, indeavors " for a general naturalization, and that warmly " ſollicited from court. We ſee our coin all gone, " and our confederates openly coining baſe mony, " of Dutch allay for us: we ſee moſt places of " power and profit given to foreigners: we ſee " our confederates in conjunction with the Scots, " indeavoring to ruin our Engliſh trade: we ſee " the revenues of the crown daily given away to " one or other, who make ſale of them, and tranſ- " mit their eſtates elſewhere: we do not find any of " them buy lands or eſtates among us; but what " they can get from us, they ſecure in their " own country; how can we hope for happy days " in England, when this great lord, and other " foreigners (tho' naturalized) are in the Engliſh, " and alſo in the Dutch councils? if theſe ſtrangers " (tho' confederates) ſhould be in different intereſts, " (as they evidently are, in point of trade) to " which intereſt is it to be ſuppoſed, theſe great " forein counſellors and favorites would adhere? " So that I foreſee, when we are reduced to ex- " treme poverty (as we are now very near it) we " are to be ſupplanted by our neighbors, and be- " come a colony to the Dutch. We ought to con- " ſider we are Engliſhmen, and like good pa- " triots, ſtand by our country, and not ſuffer it " to become tributary to ſtrangers: we have " rejoiced, that we have beat out of this country " Popery and Slavery, and do now, with as great " joy, entertain Socinianiſm and Poverty; and yet " we ſee our properties daily given away, and our " liberties muſt follow. The remedies (added " he to conclude) that our fore-fathers took to cure " ſuch like ills, are well known. I deſire more " redreſs than puniſhment; therefore I ſhall nei- " ther move for an impeachment againſt this noble " lord, nor the baniſhment of him; but ſhall beg " he may have no power over us, nor we any de- " pendence on him; and ſo conclude with this mo- " tion; that an addreſs be made to his Majeſty, " to ſtop the grant that is paſſing to the earl " of Portland, of the lordſhips of Denbigh, " Bromfield and Yale, and other lands in the prin- " cipality of Wales, and that the ſame be not " granted but by conſent of parliament."

Part of mr. Price's remarkable ſpeech.

This bold ſpeech had ſo great weight with the houſe, that mr. Price's motion was carried by unanimous conſent: and an addreſs being prepared, purſuant thereunto, and preſented to the King, on the 22d of January, by the whole houſe, his Majeſty expreſſed himſelf to this effect:

An addreſs againſt it.

" I have a kindneſs for my lord Portland, which " he has deſerved of me by long and faithful ſer- " vices: but I ſhould not have given him theſe " lands, if I had imagined the houſe of commons " could have been concerned: I will, therefore, re- " call the grant, and find ſome other way of ſhew- " ing my favor to him.

The King's anſwer.

The attention not only of the court and parliament, but of the whole nation, began now to be taken off from all other affairs, by a diſcovery that was made, as well of an invaſion and inſurrection, with which the kingdom was threatned, as with an aſſaſſination intended againſt his Majeſty's royal perſon. The French King began to be heartily tired of the war, having in a manner ruined and depopulated his whole country, and the laſt campain in Flanders having, as it were, blaſted all his hopes in the field, he determined, before he gave up the cards, to make one grand effort to reſtore his ally, King James. In order to this, new levies were made in France, during the winter, and a great number of forces were ordered to file off towards Dunkirk and Calais. Towards the begining of February, it began to be a public diſcourſe in France, that his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty was now fully reſolved to re-eſtabliſh King James, and had concerted matters ſo well, that nothing but the wind and waves could prevent it (1). The 18th of February, O. S. King James went in a poſt-chaiſe to Calais, in order to imbark for England, being attended by the marſhal de Boufflers, and the duke of Berwick, with ſir George Barclay; and ſome reformed officers were ſent before to England, to prepare King James's friends to join him there, at his landing. The French King, beſide the other expences of this expedition, made a preſent of 100,000 louis d'or, to King James, with a promiſe of ſix millions of livres more, as occaſion ſhould require, and the abdicated Monarch borrowed 150,000 livres on his jewels. In order to facilitate this enterprize, ſome of the moſt deſperate of the conſpirators (ſome ſay with, others will have it without, the knowledge of King James, or indeed, any conſiderable men of their party) (2) had reſolved to attack King William's guards, as he came

A plot to invade England and aſſaſſinate the King.

(1) They were ſo confident, in France, of the ſucceſs of this enterprize, that the duke of Orleans urged it as an argument to the duke of Savoy, to make his ſeparate peace, before the total overthrow of the confederates, which of neceſſity would attend the reſtoration of the abdicated Monarch. Hiſt. of King William III, Vol. 3. p. 145.

The preparations which were made in France, for this invaſion, were very extraordinary. The troops appointed for it, conſiſted of eighteen regiments of foot, three of horſe, and two of dragoons, all veteran troops, amounting together to 16,000 men, to be commanded by the marquis d'Harcourt. Between 4 and 500 tranſports were ready at Calais and Dunkirk, and they were to be convoyed by fifty-one men of war. They had orders to land at Dover or Rye; where the Jacobites had promiſed to receive them. Cont. of Rapin in French. Book 25. p. 249.

(2) Thoſe who are for exculpating King James, and the moſt conſiderable of the conſpirators, from having any knowledge of the intended aſſaſſination, pretend, it appears, by the trials, that it was known to very few of them; and that all from hunting; and either to take him priſoner, and hurry him away to France (as thoſe who judge moſt favorably of the deſign pretend) or to kill him on the ſpot (as is moſt probable) whence this conſpiracy had the name of the Aſſaſſination-plot.

Will' III. An' 1696.

The news of King James's arrival at Calais was no ſooner ſpread thro' the Netherlands, than the Prince of Wirtemberg, the elector of Bavaria, and Prince Vaudemont, immediately diſpatched expreſſes of it to King William, and the former acquainted his Majeſty, that he had ſtoped all the ſhips, in the harbor and canal of Oſtend, as well as in that of Bruges, in order to tranſport the forces under his command, for his Majeſty's ſervice: and that, in caſe he did not quickly hear from his Majeſty, he would run the hazard of bringing them over, which accordingly he did: nor were the States of Holland backward, in making the like preparations, at Sas van Ghent.(1)

The aſſaſſination being, however, agreed on, at leaſt by ſome of the conſpirators, ſeveral conſultations were held, to fix upon the manner of, and place for effecting it (2): and at length, they fixed upon a place between Turnham-green and Brentford, in a Mooriſh bottom, where there is a bridge, and diverſe roads that croſs one another. On the North ſide there is a road, which goes round Brentford, and on the South, a lane, leading to the river; ſo that paſſengers can come thither ſeveral ways. After having paſſed the bridge, the road grows narrow, with a foot-path on one ſide, and a high thick hedge on the other (3). Here it was the horrid parricide was to be commited; and for the manner of it, the conſpirators agreed to divide themſelves into three parties: one commanded, by Rockwood, was to attack the guards in front, and another, under Porter, in the rear, while a third, commanded by ſir George Barclay, was to ride directly up to the coach and aſſaſſinate his Majeſty.

They propoſed afterwards to ride in a body to Hammerſmith, and there ſeparating to take ſeveral ways for London. The firſt day fixed for perpetrating this helliſh deſign, was the 15th of February; but the King having put off the deſign of hunting that day, it was prevented: whereupon ſome of the moſt timerous of the conſpirators, fearing a diſcovery, declined the action, and withdrew: but others, concluding the deſign was not diſcovered, becauſe no body was taken up, had another meeting, wherein they reſolved it ſhould be done the next inſuing Saturday: but being diſappointed in their hopes, and there being a muttering among the people, that a plot was diſcovered, they all diſperſed, and every one was thoughtful how to ſecure himſelf by flight.

Will' III. An' 1696.

The firſt who gave his Majeſty a circumſtantial account of this horrid conſpiracy, was probably mr. Pendergraſs: he had been ſent for out of the country to London, and was, 'till then, wholly ignorant of the deſign: but being ſtruck with horror at the propoſal, it was thought he immediately took the reſolution to ſave the King's life; tho' the better to manage his intended diſcovery, he ſeem'd willing to be one of the party (4). The 14th of February, at night, this gentleman, went to the earl of Portland, and being admited to a private interview with his lordſhip, he, tho' a ſtranger, without farther ceremony, deſired "he would perſuade "the King, to ſtay in his palace the next morning, "for that, if he went abroad to hunt he would "be murder'd." He was introduced to his Majeſty, the ſame night, tho' late, and diſcover'd the whole plot. His deportment ſhewing him to be a man of honor, a great ſtreſs was laid upon his information, and, thereupon, the King is ſuppoſed to have put off his deſign of hunting.

The next day, one de la Rue, a Frenchman, and one of the conſpirators, who knew nothing of any diſcovery made before, confirm'd all Pendergraſs had ſaid: but tho' they had ſeparately given the ſame account of the whole conſpiracy, they would not, at firſt, be prevail'd upon to name the conſpirators; till the 21ſt of February, the King having examined them both ſeparately in his cloſet, he found arguments of ſufficient weight to remove all their ſcruples, all the criminals, at their execution, denied King James's having given any commiſſion or orders for killing King William: tho' in this, there ſeems to be a mental reſervation: for they allow of a commiſſion which ſome of them ſaid they had ſeen, being only in general, "to make war upon the Prince of Orange;" or as other relations expreſs it, "to attack and ſeize "the Prince of Orange in his winter quarters, to which ſome add, in the midſt of his guards." The continuator of Rapin, however, leaves it undetermined, whether this commiſſion, which was produced by ſir George Barclay, was real or fictitious

(1) Notwithſtanding the expedition made by the expreſſes ſent the King from the Netherlands, it is generally believed, that his Majeſty had before certain intimation not only of the intended invaſion, but likewiſe of the conſpiracy againſt his perſon. It has been ſaid, that every ſtep the conſpirators took was, from time to time, diſcovered to the earl of Portland, by one Richard Fiſher, who had his knowledge of it from Harriſon the prieſt, as being thought to be one of their party; and that one Grimes had likewiſe diſcovered ſomething of it to the ſame lord, having got ſome dark hints of it from another of the party: but as they both refuſed to name the conſpirators, no great credit was given to their information: the continuator of Rapin in French pretends Fiſher and Grimes made their diſcoveries, the 10th of February, but four days before it was made by Pendergraſs: and as Fiſher was not made an evidence, nor indeed was ever heard of afterwards, many are apt to think, that the government had little or no intelligence of theſe matrers, 'till two or three of the conſpirators, being jealous of one another, gave the court an account of them.

(2) Some propoſed to kill his Majeſty at Kenſington, by attacking his guards, and entering his palace in the dead of the night; but this was found wholly impracticable. Others were for murdering him as he came on Sunday, to St. James's chappel; for which purpoſe forty men, well armed, were to attack his guards, then conſiſting of twenty-five men only, while ſix men on foot, ſhould ſhut Hide-park-gate, and the reſt aſſaſſinate his Majeſty. It was alſo propoſed to kill the coach-horſes, as they were entering into the park, that the paſſage being ſtoped, the guards might not be able to come 'till the aſſaſſines had done their work. Another propoſal was to murder the King, as he returned from hunting, in a narrow lane, by a wood-ſide, near Richmond, leading to the Thames, on the other ſide of the water, about 150 paces long, in which there is a gate, that when ſhut, hinders coaches and horſes from coming that way: but this being diſapproved of by ſir George Barclay, was, as well as the former, laid aſide.

(3) They could indeed hardly have found a more proper place, for the King being accuſtomed to enter the ferry-boat, in his coach, and as ſoon as he landed on this ſide the water, to let the coach drive on without expecting the reſt of the guards, who could not croſs the Thames, 'till the boat returned to the Surry-ſide, to bring them over, he generally paſſed thro' this lane, with only five or ſix of his guards.

(4) This is the favorable account given of Pendergraſs by our hiſtorians; but the continuator of Rapin in French, who calls him an Iriſhman, a Soldier, a Roman-Catholic, and a virulent Jacobite, gives a very different account of the motives which induced him to make this diſcovery: "having (ſays he) neglected to meet the conſpirators, at a place and time fix'd "for a rendezvous, they ſuſpected he had a deſign to betray them, and, therefore, reſolving to ſend him out of the world firſt, "gave the commiſſion to Porter. Pendergraſs, meeting with Porter, gave ſo good an account of the cauſe of his abſence, as "not only ſatisfied him, but ingaged him to divulge the ſecret, and acquaint him with the cruel orders he had received, "which he was glad he had now an excuſe not to obey. Pendergraſs, having eſcap'd this danger, and being apprehenſive the "reſt of the confederates might not be ſo eaſily convinced of his integrity, he immediately reſolved, for his own preſervation, "to diſcover the whole deſign. The ſame author accounts, in the like manner, for Porter's leaving the conſpirators, fearing "they might revenge on him the mercy he had ſhewn to Pendergraſs." B. xxv. p. 253, 254.

and, upon a promiſe that they ſhould not be made uſe of as evidences, they conſented to tell the names of the aſſaſſins.

Mr. Porter, who had drawn Pendergraſs into the plot, coming in likewiſe and accuſing him, among others, as a conſpirator, he thereby thought himſelf diſcharged from all obligation, and, together with de la Rue and Porter, conſented to be evidences.

Proclamation to apprehend the conſpirators.

His Majeſty, being now perfectly inform'd of all circumſtances, cauſed his proclamation to be iſſued, the 23d of February, for apprehending the conſpirators (1), with a promiſe of 1000l. reward, for every offender that ſhould be taken and brought to juſtice. This proclamation was no ſooner publiſh'd, than mr. George Harris, who, with others, had been ſent out of France, to obey the orders of ſir George Barclay, and was actually ingag'd in the aſſaſſination, reſign'd himſelf to ſir William Trumball, and diſcovered all he knew, ſo that the King's evidences of the plot daily increaſed.

Acts paſs'd.

The 24th of February, the King came to the houſe of lords, and having ſent for the commons, his Majeſty gave the royal aſſent to "an act for "taking, examining, and ſtating the public ac- "counts. To an act for repairing the highways, "between London and Harwich;" and to two private acts: after which he made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

The King's ſpeech about the plot.

"I am come hither, this day, upon an extraor- "dinary occaſion, which might have proved fatal, "had it not been diſappointed, by a ſingular mercy "and goodneſs of GOD; and may now, by the con- "tinuance of the ſame providence, and our own "prudent indeavors, be ſo improved, as to become "a ſufficient warning to us, to provide for our "ſecurity, againſt the pernicious practices and at- "tempts of our enemies. I have received ſeveral "concuring informations of a deſign to aſſaſſinate "me, and that our enemies, at the ſame time, are "very forward in their preparations for a ſudden "invaſion of this kingdom; and have, therefore "thought it neceſſary to loſe no time, in acquaint- "ing my parliament with theſe things, in which "the ſafety of the kingdom, and the public wel- "fare, are ſo nearly concerned, that I aſſure myſelf "nothing will be omited, on your part, which "may be thought proper for our preſent or future "ſecurity. I have not been wanting to give the "neceſſary orders for the fleet; and I hope we "have ſuch a ſtrength of ſhips, and in ſuch a readi- "neſs, as will be ſufficient to diſappoint the inten- "tions of our enemies. I have alſo diſpatch'd "orders for bringing home ſuch a number of our "troops, as may ſecure us from any attempt. Some "of the conſpirators againſt my perſon, are already "in cuſtody, and care is taken to apprehend ſo "many of the reſt, as are diſcovered: and ſuch "orders are given, as the preſent exigency of affairs "does abſolutely require, at this time, for the pub- "lic ſafety."

My lords and gentlemen,

"Having now acquainted you with the danger "which has threatned us, I cannot doubt of your "readineſs and zeal, to do every thing which you "ſhall judge proper for our common ſafety: and "I perſuade myſelf, we muſt be all ſenſible, how "neceſſary it is, in our preſent circumſtances, that "all poſſible diſpatch ſhould be given to the buſi- "neſs before you (2).

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Both houſes attended his Majeſty, the ſame day, at Kenſington, with an addreſs; in which "they "congratulated his preſervation, and declared their "abhorrence of the barbarous deſign; beſeeching "him to take a more than ordinary care of his "perſon:" they likewiſe laid hold of this occaſion to aſſure him; "that they would ſupport and aſſiſt "his perſon and government againſt the late King "James, and all his enemies; and, in caſe his "Majeſty came to a violent death, they would "revenge it; deſiring he would ſeize and ſecure "ſuch perſons, with their horſes and arms, as he "ſhould think fit."

Addreſs of both houſes.

In anſwer to this addreſs, his Majeſty "thank'd "them heartily for it; aſſured them, that on his "part, he would do all that was within his "power, and readily venture his life, for the pre- "ſervation of this kingdom, to which he had ſo many "obligations, and recommended himſelf to the "continuance of their loyalty and good affection."

The King's anſwer.

The commons, to ſhew the King they were in earneſt, order'd, the ſame day, a bill to be brought in, "to impower his Majeſty to ſecure and detain "all ſuch perſons, as his Majeſty ſhould ſuſpect "were conſpiring againſt his perſon and govern- "ment;" as alſo, "a bill, that whenever it ſhould "pleaſe GOD to afflict theſe realms with the death "of his preſent Majeſty, the parliament then in "being ſhould not be diſſolved thereby, but ſhould "continue untill the next heir to the crown in ſuc- "ceſſion, according to the late act of parliament, "ſhould diſſolve the ſame, and if there ſhould be "no parliament then in being, that the laſt preceed- "ing parliament ſhould immediately convene and "ſit (3)." They, likewiſe voted an addreſs to his Majeſty, to deſire him to iſſue his royal proclamation, "to baniſh all Papiſts from the cities of Lon- "don and Weſtminſter, and ten miles from the "ſame, and that he would give inſtructions to the "judges, going the circuits, to put the laws in exe- "cution againſt Papiſts and Non-jurors.

The commons ſpent the next three days, in ſigning the following aſſociation:

An aſſociation ſign'd by the commons.

"Whereas there has been a horrid and deteſtable "conſpiracy, formed and carried on by Papiſts, "and other wicked and traiterous perſons, for aſſaſſi- "nating his Majeſty's royal perſon, in order to in- "courage an invaſion from France, to ſubvert our "religion, laws and liberties; we, whoſe names "are hereunto ſubſcribed, do heartily, ſincerely "and ſolemnly proteſs, teſtify and declare, that his "preſent Majeſty King William is rightful and "lawful King of theſe realms. And we do mutually "promiſe and ingage, to ſtand by and aſſiſt each "other, to the utmoſt of our power, in the ſup- "port and defenſe of his Majeſty's moſt ſacred per- "ſon and government againſt the late King James, "and all his adherents. And in caſe his Majeſty come "to any violent and untimely death (which God for-

(1) The perſons nam'd in this proclamation were the duke of Berwick, ſir George Barclay, major Lowick, George Porter, captain Stow, captain Walbank, James Courtney, lieutenant Sherburn, Brice Blaire, Dinant, Chambers, Boice, George Higgens, and his two brothers, ſons of ſir Thomas Higgens, Davis, Cardell, Goodman, Cramburn, Keyes, Pendergraſs, Byerley, Trevor, ſir George Maxwell, Durance, a Flemming, Chriſtopher Knightley, lieutenant King, Holmes, ſir William Perkins and Rockwood. Charnock, and thirteen more had been taken up the day before.

(2) It being a thing very common to ridicule plots, and render the diſcovery of them fictitious, ſir William Trumball, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and a member of the houſe of commons, made a ſpeech in that houſe, to ſecond his Majeſty's ſpeech, to urge the credibility of the witneſſes, and the improbability of their conſpiring together to abuſe the belief of the nation.

(3) This bill was of double uſe; for as, thereby, the parliament wiſely provided againſt that confuſion and diſorder that might happen by the ceſſation of parliament, and all commiſſions, on his Majeſty's deceaſe; ſo nothing could have been imagined more effectual for the ſecurity of the King's life, againſt the malice and violence of his enemies: ſeing by this means all hopes of eſcape and impunity were cut off, in caſe they ſhould ſucceed in their barbarous attempts.

"bid)

Will'III. An' 1696.

" bid) we do, hereby, farther freely and unanimouſly oblige ourſelves, to unite, aſſociate and " ſtand by each other, in revenging the ſame upon " his enemies, and their adherents; and in ſupporting and defending the ſucceſſion of the crown, " according to an act made in the firſt year of the " reign of King William and Queen Mary, intitled, an act declaring the rights and liberties " of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the " crown (1).

The aſſociation preſented to the King.

The 3d of April, this aſſociation was preſented to the King, by the commons in a body, with this requeſt: " that his Majeſty would order both that, " and all other aſſociations, by the commons of " England, to be lodg'd among the records in the " Tower, there to remain as a perpetual memorial " of their loyalty and affection to his Majeſty:" Upon which, his Majeſty told them, " that he " took this as a moſt convincing and acceptable " evidence of their affection: and as they had freely aſſociated themſelves, for his and their common " ſafety, he did heartily enter into the ſame aſſo " ciation, and would be always ready with them, " and the reſt of his good ſubjects, to venture his " life againſt all, who ſhould indeavor to ſubvert " the religion, laws and liberties of England". His Majeſty, at the ſame time, promiſed, that this and all other aſſociations ſhould be lodged among the records of the Tower.

The King's declaration thereupon.

The aſſociation voted legal.

The 4th, the commons voted, " that whoever " ſhould, by word or writing, affirm, that the aſ- " ſociation enter'd into by any member of this " houſe, or any other perſon, was illegal, ſuch " perſon ſhould be deem'd a promoter of the " deſigns of the late King James, and an enemy " to the laws and liberties of this kingdom". The lords likewiſe preſented an aſſociation, ſoon after, and the laudable example of parliament was followed by the corporations, not of England only, but of Scotland and Ireland alſo.

Preparations to oppoſe the attempts of France.

While all theſe things were doing in parliament, the King was no leſs aſſiduous in puting the nation in a poſture of defenſe, in caſe the enemy had perſiſted in their project of an invaſion: the forces which were in England, were ordered to be in a readineſs to march; a train of artillery was forthwith provided to attend them, and the duke of Wirtemberg arrived, with about twenty battalions of foot, from the confederate army. Admiral Ruſſel repaired, in the mean time, to Deal, to take upon him the command of the fleet, which, by a particular providence, had been detain'd many weeks in the Downs, by contrary winds. This fleet was ſoon re-inforced by ſeveral men of war from the river, and by twelve Dutch ſhips from Spithead, which increas'd the number in five or ſix days, to near ſixty men of war. With this fleet the admiral ſet ſail, towards the latter end of February, and ſtood over directly for the coaſts of Calais and Dunkirk: but as I ſhall ſpeak more particularly of the proceedings of this fleet below, I ſhall only obſerve here; that when King James came to Calais, in order to imbark for England, he found his deſign fruſtrated, and, thereupon, returned to St. Germains.

King James returns to St. Germains.

Habeas-corpus act ſuſpended.

The 7th of March, the King came to the parliament-houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to " an act " impowering his Majeſty to apprehend and detain " ſuch perſons as were conſpiring againſt his government;" with three other acts.

Will'III. An' 1696.

Trials of Charnock, King and Keyes.

The 11th, mr. Charnock (2), lieutenant Richard King, and Thomas Keyes, three of the conſpirators, were brought to their trials at the Old-baily. The indictment ſet forth, " that the priſoners, having " a traiterous deſign to murder the King, and bring " this kingdom under the ſubjection of France, " did, on the 10th of February laſt, and at diverſe " other times, before and ſince, conſult and agree, " with diverſe other perſons, to aſſaſſinate his Ma- " jeſty; and, in order to effect it, provided forty " horſemen, of whom they were to be part, to ly " in ambuſh, and ſet upon the King, in his coach, " and upon the guards that were to attend him, " and deſtroy him, and that they bought horſes " and arms for that purpoſe."

Captain Porter's evidence.

Captain Porter, who had been one of their accomplices, being produced as an evidence, depos'd, " that he lodged with mr. Charnock, in Norfolk- " ſtreet; and that ſir William Perkins came thither " laſt January, and told them ſome friends were come " from France: that, afterwards, mr. Charnock, " the priſoner, acquainted the deponent, that ſir " George Barclay, and thoſe who were come from " France, had brought a commiſſion to levy war " upon King William; and ask'd him, how many " he could bring to join them, if the King landed? " that he was at ſeveral conſultations with ſir George " Barclay, mr. Holmes, mr. Charnock, and other " conſpirators, to conſider of time and place to " aſſaſſinate his Majeſty: that ſir George Barclay " ſaid, he had mony enough to buy about forty " horſes, and Charnock ſaid, he would bring ſix " or ſeven men out of the country: that ſir William " Perkins promiſed to lend five horſes; and the de- " ponent promiſed to find ſeven men and horſes; " and that it was at length agreed to attack the " King, on the 15th of February, as he came from " hunting at Richmond, between Brentford and " Turnham-green: that they were to be divided " into three parties, and that ſir George Barclay " was to have four out of each party, to ſhoot into " the King's, coach, and kill the King, and thoſe " that were with him, and when the matter was " over, they were to return to town, and ly con- " cealed, 'till there ſhould come a ſufficient number " from abroad to their aſſiſtance: for King James " would be near the French ſhoar, with his army, " and there would be four or five thouſand French " ſent to Scotland to make a diverſion there: that " being diſappointed, by the King's not going " abroad, on Saturday the 15th of February, they " met, on Friday, the 21ſt, at the Sun-tavern in the " Strand; where ſome ſuggeſting the deſign was diſ- " cover'd, the deponent anſwer'd, if it was, they " ſhould have been taken up: and it was, thereupon " reſolved to attempt the execution of their deſign " the next day, for which all things were prepared: " but news being again brought, that the King did " not go abroad that day neither, they concluded " they were diſcovered, and thereupon diſperſed."

The next evidence who was produced, was monſ. de la Rue, likewiſe one of the conſpirators: who depoſed; " that there had been a deſign

(1) Some members having abſented themſelves, on pretenſe of ill-health or buſineſs, it was order'd, on the 27th of February, " that ſuch members, as had not already ſign'd it, ſhould do it in ſixteen days, or declare their refuſal, notwithſtanding their " leave to be abſent." This not having all the effect that was expected, the ſpeaker was order'd to write to thoſe who were in the country, and had not ſign'd the aſſociation, or that had not declared their refuſal ſo to do, to know what they would do, and return their anſwer by the firſt opportunity; and, at the ſame time, the clerk of the houſe was order'd to attend ſuch members as were ill, in town, with the ſaid aſſociation, in order to their ſigning the ſame, or receiving their anſwer or refuſal. Theſe meaſures at length ſo prevail'd over the obſtinacy of the abſent members, that they either ſubſcrib'd, or promiſed to do it on their firſt coming to town.

(2) This unhappy perſon, who now went by the title of captain, and was next in the intended aſſaſſination to ſir George Barclay, was a gentleman of parts, and the ſame King James had preferred to the vice-preſidentſhip of Magdalen college.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

to ſeize his Majeſty's perſon ſome years: that colonel Parker had propoſed it to him, five or ſix years before, at St. Germains; and that the colonel afterwards came to England, in order to effect it: that laſt year, there were ſeveral conſultations about it, between ſir William Perkins, captain Porter, mr. Charnock, and others, and that Charnock told him, they had ſent to King James for a commiſſion to execute the matter, and to authorize them to carry the King into France, if they could take him; and if they could not, they agreed to excuſe themſelves, by pretending he was killed by a random-ſhot: he underſtood the commiſſion was delayed a long time, and then they reſolved to execute the deſign, without a commiſſion; and he was told all things were ready, only they wanted a ſhip to carry him off: that the deponent promiſed to go with them, and they propoſed to get a ſhip at Deal: but King William going to Flanders, they had not time to compleat the affair then, and ſo the deſign was put off to the laſt winter. That in the month of November or December laſt, King, the priſoner, told the deponent, a major-general would come over from France: and the latter end of January, or the begining of February, they told him a major-general was come over from France, and a great many people beſide, and ſomething would be ſpeedily put in execution for the King's ſervice: that King likewiſe told him, there was the rareſt place for the execution of their deſign, that was poſſible, within a quarter of a mile of Richmond: that he ſaw King at Charnock's lodgings, on Saturday the 15th of February, when King ſaid, the Prince of Orange did not go out that day, adding that ſir George Barclay had brought over ſixteen of the guards and two officers, a brigadier, and a ſub-brigadier, who were ſubſiſted at the rate of four ſhillings a day, as the guards were here: King alſo told him, that Charnock and Porter had ſeveral conferences, how to murder or aſſaſſinate his Majeſty; for ſir George Barclay ſaid, he was not ſure of horſes enough to carry him off; and therefore they reſolved to aſſaſſinate him, in the lane between Brentford and Turnham-green: that ſir George Barclay was to command eight perſons, to attack the King, and thoſe who were in the coach with him, mr. Charnock was to attack the guards in the rear, and Rockwood with a party that came from France, and captain Porter, were to attack the guards on each flank."

Captain Pendergraſs's evidence.

Captain Pendergraſs depoſed, "that about the 11th of February laſt, Porter ſent for him to town, and told him, there was a deſign to take away the King's life; and that ſir George Barclay, and other officers, were come on purpoſe, from France, to execute it:" the reſt of his evidence agreed with that of Porter's and de la Rue.

Bertram's evidence.

Bertram, another conſpirator, depoſed, "that, on the 22d of February, he met mr. Charnock at Lincoln's-inn back-gate, who told him warrants were out againſt them; and they had as good go to Kenſington, do the work at once, and take him off, and then they ſhould be quiet, and have the King peaceably here.

Charnock's defenſe.

Mr. Charnock, who made a long but frivolous defenſe, tho' he ſpoke with great preſenſe of mind, readineſs of ſpeech, and ſeemingly great knowledge of the laws, obſerved, "that captain Porter acknowleged he had never ſeen the commiſſion he mentioned from King James, neither could he name the perſons they were to command; which was ſtrange, if the deſign was ſo near being put in execution, as he depoſed; nor was there any proof, that he had ſo much as a horſe provided for the deſign: that as Porter owned he himſelf had contrived and promoted the aſſaſſination, little regard was to be had to his evidence; he became a witneſs to ſave his own life: that the conſultation mentioned by the witneſſes, to carry King William to France alive, was extreamly ridiculous, the thing being impoſſible: that he might ſay, there was a noiſe that King James would come, for it was in the Gazets; but it was not true, that he ſaid there was ſomething to be done firſt, they muſt take off the Spark. That the evidence produced againſt him was frivolous and weak; and if it were all true, it was only diſcourſe, there was no plain and manifeſt proofs of any overt-act, but only preſumptions: that it was ſaid there were forty men to do this fact upon the King, in his coach, amidſt his guards: could it be ſuppoſed that any man in his ſenſes would do ſuch an act, without reſpect to his ſecurity? The guards were at leaſt treble the number, and better appointed; and they muſt be mad to attack them under ſuch diſadvantages, eſpecially when they had no aſylum, no caſtle or fort to retire to, nor any to back or aſſiſt them." The other two had little to ſay for themſelves, Keys eſpecially, who had formerly been a trumpeter, and lately captain Porter's ſervant; ſo that upon a full hearing of the evidence, of which I have given but a brief abſtract (refering for the reſt to the ſtate-trials) they were all three found guilty of high-treaſon, and according to ſentence were executed at Tyburn, on the eighteenth of March.

AN' 1696. WIL' III.

They are condemn'd and executed.

At the place of execution, they delivered each a paper to the ſheriff, in which they confeſſed the crime they were accuſed of; but indeavored to palliate it; and, at the ſame time, to juſtify King James, the Jacobites, and the Roman Catholics, Charnock, in particular owned, "that to facilitate King James's invaſion upon England, himſelf, and ſome others, did agree to attack the Prince of Orange and his guards; that as for any order or commiſſion of King James's, for aſſaſſinating the Prince of Orange, he neither ſaw nor heard of any; but had had frequent aſſurances of his Majeſty's having rejected ſuch propoſals when they had been offered; that he did hear, there was a commiſſion arrived for levying of war; which was natural to believe, if the King, was in ſuch readineſs for coming over, as was reported; but that he never ſaw it: and as to what regarded the body of the Roman Catholics, he muſt do them the juſtice, that they had no manner of knowlege of this deſign, nor did he believe it was communicated to any other party of ſuch as were reputed the King's friends, but carried on meerly by a ſmall number, without the advice, conſent or privity of any parties whatſoever.

Their confeſſions.

The 18th of March a proclamation was iſſued, offering a reward of 500 l. for apprehending the lord Montgomery and ſir John Fenwick, who were ſuſpected to be accomplices in the plot.

The 23d, ſir John Friend was brought to his trial, and charged with ſo much of the conſpiracy as related to the intended inſurrection and invaſion. Captain Porter who was the firſt evidence produced againſt him depoſed, "that ſir John was at a conſultation with the lord Ayleſbury, the lord Montgomery, ſir William Perkins, ſir John Fenwick, mr. Cooke, captain Charnock, and himſelf, at the King's-head in Leadenhall-ſtreet, in May or June, of the preceeding year 1695; and at another conſultation with them, about the ſame time, at mrs. Montjoy's, in St. James's ſtreet, at both which it was agreed to ſend mr. Charnock to France, to King James, to deſire him to borrow of the French King 10,000 men,

Trial of ſir John Friend.

Will' III. An' 1696.

" men, and they all agreed, when the King landed, " to meet him with a body of 2000 horſe, of " which every man was to furniſh his quota : and " that Charnock, on his return from France, told " them the French King could not ſpare ſo many " men that year.

Captain Blair's evidence.

Captain Brice Blair gave evidence ; " that about " two years before, ſir John Friend ſhewed him a " commiſſion from King James, to be colonel of " horſe, and that he alſo ſaw ſeveral letters, in " the priſoner's lodgings, from the lord Melford, " and ſecretary Caroll : that the deponent was to " have been his lieutenant-colonel and actually pro- " cured ſeveral officers and men, whoſe names he " enumerated, to ſerve under him: and that he " received ſeveral ſums from the priſoner to be " ſpent on the men that belonged to the regiment : " that the priſoner alſo told him, he had advan- " ced 100 l. toward colonel Perkins's eſcape out " of the Tower ; and King James ordered one " Pigot to repay the priſoner that mony, 50 l. " whereof the deponent received of Pigot, by the " priſoner's orders."

Sir John Friend's defenſe.

The chief matter ſir John Friend argued in his defenſe was, in effect, the ſame with what the lord Ruſſel had argued, in a former reign ; viz. " that " conſulting to levy war, could not be an overt- " act of compaſſing the King's death ; and that " conſulting to levy war was not high-treaſon, " unleſs a war was actually levied." Some thought ſir John Friend's caſe hard, becauſe there was but one witneſs to the conſultation and one to the levying war: but to this it was anſwered, that tho' there were not two witneſſes to the ſame fact, yet as each fact had a tendency to promote the ſame ſpe- cies of treaſon, viz. " the deſtruction of the Prince," they were juſtly to be deemed two witneſſes, with- in the meaning of the ſtatute ; and ſir John Friend was accordingly convicted.

He is convicted.

Sir William Perkins's trial.

The next day, ſir William Perkins, who was accuſed, as well of the intended aſſaſſination, as the inſurrection, was brought to his trial (1).

Porter's evidence.

Porter, who was the firſt evidence, ſwore ; " he " was acquainted with the deſign of attacking the " King and his guards, and promiſed to furniſh " men and horſes for that purpoſe ; but declared " he would not ingage in it in perſon. " As to the intended invaſion and inſurrection, " he " gave the ſame evidence againſt ſir William, as " he had againſt Charnock ; and ſome other wit- " neſſes proved, the priſoner had provided horſes " and arms."

Other evidences.

His defenſe.

Sir William's chief defenſe was ; " that there " was but one witneſs to one overt-act :" but to this he met with the ſame anſwer as Friend had done, viz. " that one witneſs to one overt-act, and ano- " ther witneſs to another overt-act, of the ſame ſpe- " cies of treaſon, was ſufficient."

Sir William Perkins and Sir John Friend condemned.

Sir William Perkins being therefore convicted, ſir John Friend was again brought to the bar, where they both received ſentenſe, as in caſes of high-treaſon.

Their examination before a committee of the houſe of commons.

The firſt of April, which was the day it was thought ſir John Friend and ſir William Perkins would have ſuffered, and great numbers of people flocked together between Newgate and Tyburn, to be ſpectators of their exit, the commons thought fit to appoint ſuch members of their houſe as were privy-counſellors, to go to Newgate to examine ſir William Perkins and ſir John Friend in relation to the plot : which being done, it was reported, the next day, that having been examined ſeverally : " the firſt owned his being privy to the intended " aſſaſſination, and in company when it was diſ- " courſed of at two or three meetings ; and thought " himſelf guilty of a fault that he did approve of it : " that he had received hints, ſeveral times, of " King James's deſign of coming over, and par- " ticularly now, and was reſolved to ſerve him " whenever he came over, with himſelf and friends, " thinking that he had wrong done him, and that, it " was his duty to help him whenever he could. That " he conſulted not with any, but thoſe with whom " he could ingage, and he had an influence " upon. That he gueſſed he could have been " able to have brought in to the number of a " troop, but that he would never redeem his " own blood, at the expenſe of thoſe he had drawn " in. That ſince Chriſtmas he did ſee a commiſſion, " which he underſtood to be King James's, direct- " ed to his loving ſubjects, to levy war againſt the " Prince of Orange, and all his adherents: that " he believed it was ſigned by King James, that " it had a ſeal to it, and that he ſaw it in the hands " of a friend, whom he deſired not to name, but " believed he was not in England.

Will'III. An' 1696.

That ſir John Friend, on his examination, " diſowned knowing any thing of the intended aſ- " ſaſſination, but expreſſed his abhorrence of it. " He confeſſed he was at the two meetings men- " tioned in his trial, and that the perſons named to " be preſent were there likewiſe : and that " Charnock was ſent to France from one of thoſe " meetings, to acquaint King James, that if he " could come over with 8000 foot, and 2000 horſe, " 3 or 4000 horſe would be ready to join him here : " of which he did ingage to furniſh about 2000." This report being made, it was ordered to be en- tered upon the journal, and printed with the votes of the houſe.

Their execution,

The 3d of April, ſir John Friend and ſir Wil- liam Perkins were executed at Tyburn, purſuant to their ſentenſe; where they likewiſe delivered their confeſſions in writing to the ſheriffs.

And confeſſion.

Sir John Friend, tho' he abſolutely denied having any knowledge of the intended aſſaſſination, and would have evaded that of the invaſion, yet ſeemed to own himſelf guilty, in indeavoring to juſtify himſelf, by ſaying, " that the cauſe he ſuffered for " he did firmly believe to be the cauſe of God, " and true religion, and agreeable to the laws of " the land, which he had ever heard, to require a " firm duty and allegiance : that as no forein, ſo " neither any domeſtic power can alienate our alle- " giance : for it was altogether new and unintelli- " gible to him, that the King's ſubjects can depoſe " and dethrone him, on any account, or conſtitute " any that have not an immediate right to his place ; " and that as they ought not to do this, ſo when " it was done, to aſſiſt him in the recovery of his " right, was juſtifiable and their duty. He pro- " feſſed himſelf a member of the church of Eng- " land, which he heartily beſought God Al- " mighty to bleſs and preſerve ; to deliver this " ſinful nation from the guilt of rebellion, blood " and perjury ; to comfort the diſtreſſed King, " reſtore him to his right, and his miſled ſubjects " to their allegiance, and to bleſs his royal conſort,

(1) It is remarkable that theſe two trials were on the two days before the "act for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon" became of force. Sir William inſiſted, as Charnock had done before him, that he might have counſel : but he was told, that the act which allowed the priſoner counſel, did not commence 'till the next day : to this, ſir William replied, " that the " preamble to this law declared, it was juſt and reaſonable the priſoner ſhould have counſel, and the other privileges mentioned " in the act, towards making his defenſe, and what would be juſt and reaſonable to morrow was ſo to day : he, therefore, " preſſed that his trial might be put off 'till the next day, as well for this reaſon, as becauſe ſome of his witneſſes were want- " ing : " but his motion was rejected.

" and his royal highneſs the Prince of Wales, that " he might grow in ſtature, and in favor with " GOD and man."

Sir William Perkins confeſſed; " that he was " privy to a deſign upon the Prince of Orange, but " was not to act in it; and he was fully ſatisfied, " that very few or none knew of it, but thoſe who " undertook it: that he had ſeen a commiſſion " from King James, to levy war againſt the " Prince of Orange, but as for any commiſſion " particularly levelled againſt his perſon, he had " neither ſeen or heard of any ſuch: that he thought " it for his honor to ſay, that he was intirely in the " intereſt of King James, being always firmly per- " ſuaded of the juſtice of his cauſe, and looked " upon it as his duty, both as a ſubject and " an Engliſhman, to aſſiſt him in the recovery of " his throne, which he believed his Majeſty to be " deprived of, contrary to all right and juſtice; " in which opinion he took the laws and conſtitu- " tion of his country to be his guide; and laſtly, " that he died in the communion of the church of " England, in which he was educated.

The male-factors abſolved by nonjuring clergymen.

Mr. Collier, mr. Cooke, and mr. Snat, three nonjuring clergy-men, having aſſiſted the male-factors in their laſt hours, were obſerved, at the place of execution, to pronounce to them the abſolution of the church, as it ſtands in the viſitation of the ſick, and accompanied this ceremony with a ſolemn impoſition of hands. The government was highly offended at this, and two of them, mr. Cooke and mr. Snat, were commited to Newgate. There was likewiſe an indictment prefered againſt them in the court of King's-bench, but not being proceeded upon, no manner of puniſhment was inflicted on them (1).

The 21ſt of April, brigadier Rockwood, major Lowick, and mr. Cramburn, three other conſpirators, were brought to their trials, (2) and the evidence againſt them being very plain and poſitive, they were all three found guilty, and receiving ſentenſe accordingly, they were executed the 29th (3). Cramburn died a Proteſtant, read a paper, and ſpoke long to the ſpectators: among other things, he ſaid he died for his loyalty, and that what he would have done was no more than his duty: Rockwood and Lowick died Roman Catholics, and delivered each a paper to the ſheriff, in which they partly owned their crime, but juſtified King James, as to the pretended commiſſion for murdering the Prince of Orange.

Mr. Cook and Mr. Knightly condemned but repriev'd.

The laſt who were tried this year, were mr. Cooke and mr. Knightly; but tho' they likewiſe received ſentenſe, the firſt upon his being convicted, and the other upon his own confeſſion; yet by his Majeſty's clemency, mr. Cooke was only baniſhed England, and mr. Knightly obtained his Majeſty's moſt gracious pardon.

Ways and means.

Having thus given an account of the proceedings againſt the conſpirators, I return to the affairs of parliament. The funds the commons had 'till now ſettled not being ſufficient to anſwer one half of the ſum they had granted, great difficulties aroſe how to raiſe the reſt. After many debates and conſultations, the houſe at laſt gave into a project (4), which at firſt ſeem'd calculated only to advance the landed men's intereſt, in oppoſition to the growing power of monied men and uſurers, but which, in the end, had very near ruined the public credit. Purſuant to this project, the commons reſolved, the 6th of March, firſt, " That a fund redeemable by par- " liament be ſettled in a national land-bank, to be " raiſed by new ſubſcriptions. Second, that no per- " ſon be concerned in the bank of England, and in " the national bank, at the ſame time. Third, " That the duties upon coals and culm, and upon ton- " nage of ſhips (which had been found grievous to " the people) be taken off, from the 17th of June " 1696. Fourth, That for the making up the ſum " of 1,724,000 l. already voted by the houſe, " and the monies to be made good for the duties up- " on coals and culm, and upon tonage of ſhips, " reſolved to be taken off; and for diſcharging what " the duties upon ſalt were to anſwer, from the " 17th of May 1696, the ſum of 2,564,000 l. be " raiſed upon the ſaid perpetual fund, redeemable " by parliament:" at the ſame time, they ordered a bill to be brought in purſuant to the ſaid reſolutions.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Civil liſt and French Proteſtants conſidered.

The King having, in his ſpeech, at the opening of this ſeſſion, recommended the civil liſt, and the diſtreſs'd French Proteſtants, the commons took that matter into conſideration, the 12th of March, and the committee of the whole houſe having ſat ſeveral times on that affair, it was, at length, reſolved, on the 17th of that month, " that the ſum of 500,000 l. " be granted for defraying the expences of the firſt, " and 15,000 l. for the relief of the latter," which ſums they reſolv'd on the 18th, " to raiſe by a " duty upon all low wines, and ſpirits of the firſt " extraction, and alſo upon all mix'd liquors, com- " monly call'd ſweets, for the ſpace of five years, " from the 25th of March 1696." And the committee who were to prepare this bill was inſtructed to receive a " clauſe, for preſerving the revenue to " her royal highneſs the Princeſs Ann of Den- " mark."

National land-bank bill.

The bill for eſtabliſhing a national land-bank, &c. having been read a ſecond time, the committee of the whole houſe, to whom it was commited, were inſtructed, on the 17th of March, to reſtrain the bank not to lend mony, but " upon land-ſecurity, " or to the government into the exchequer; and to " receive a clauſe, that if the mony did not come " in, by a certain time, his Majeſty be inabled to " borrow the ſame." The next day, the bank of England preſented a petition againſt this bill, and were, afterwards, by order of the houſe, heard by their council, but without ſucceſs. The houſe, thereupon, proceeded on the bill, and reſolved, the 9th of April; " that towards the ſupply to be granted " to his Majeſty for making up the fund of intereſt " of 2,564,000 l. the capital ſtock of the intended " national-bank, certain duties upon glaſs-wares, " ſtone and earthen bottles, granted before to the " King, for a term of years, be granted to his " Majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors: ſecondly, that " a duty be laid upon tobacco-pipes; and, thirdly,

(1) The archbiſhops and biſhops, who happened to be then in London, to the number of fourteen, publiſhed a declaration, in which they cenſured the performance of this office of the church, without a previous confeſſion made, and abhorrence expreſſed by the priſoners of the heinous crime for which they died, " as extremely inſolent, and without precedent in the manner, and " altogether irregular in the thing: being a manifeſt tranſgreſſion of the churches order, and prophane abuſe of the authority " of Chriſt, ſince they muſt either look upon the perſons abſolved as impenitents or martyrs.

(2) Theſe were the firſt, who had the benefit of the ſtatute, made this very ſeſſion, to regulate trials in caſes of high treaſon, but neither the copy of the indictment which was given them, nor the advantage of being defended by ſir Bartholomew Shore and two other eminent lawyers, did avail them any thing, ſo ſtrong and evident were the proofs againſt them.

(3) Several noblemen interceded for the life of Lowick, and Cramburn petitioned to be tranſported, but both to no purpoſe.

(4) The author of this project was the famous manmid-wife dr. Chamberlain; but for all his ſkill in midwifery, it proved an abortion, no body ſubſcribing to it.

" that a farther duty be laid upon ſtone and earthen-
" ware." Which reſolutions were ordered to be inſerted in the bill.

Bill for the ſecurity of his Majeſty's perſon and government.

The ſecond of April, it was unanimouſly reſolved, that a bill be brought in " for the better ſecurity " of his Majeſty's perſon and government," containing the following heads: firſt, " that ſuch as " ſhould refuſe to take the oaths to his Majeſty " ſhould be ſubject to the forfeitures and penalties " of Popiſh recuſants convict. Second, To inflict " a penalty on ſuch as ſhould, by writing or other-
" wiſe, declare, that King William was not lawful " and rightful King of theſe realms: or that the " late King James, or the pretended Prince of " Wales, or any other perſon, than according to " the act of ſettlement of the crown, had any right " to the crown of theſe realms. Third, To ra-
" tify and confirm the aſſociation enter'd into by all " his Majeſty's good ſubjects, for the preſervation " of his Majeſty's perſon and government. Fourth, " That no perſon ſhould be capable of any office of " profit or truſt, civil or military, that ſhould not " ſign the aſſociation. And, Fifth, That the ſame " penalties be inflicted on ſuch as come out of France, " as upon thoſe who go thither.

Acts paſs'd.

The 10th, the King came to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent; Firſt, to " an act for the " continuing, meeting, and ſettling of a parlia" ment, in caſe of the death or demiſe of his Ma-
" jeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors. Second, an act for " granting to the King ſeveral rates and duties " upon houſes, for making good the deficiency of " clipp'd mony. Third, an act for granting to his " Majeſty an additional duty upon all French goods. " Fourth, an act for continuing four former acts for " preventing theft and rapine, upon the northern " borders of England. Fifth, an act for the raiſing " the militia, for the year 1696. Sixth, an act for re" gulating the elections of members to ſerve in par" liament, and for the preventing irregular proceed" ings of ſheriffs and others officers, in the electing " and returning ſuch members. Seventh, an act for " continuing ſeveral former acts, for puniſhing offi" cers and ſoldiers, who ſhould mutiny or deſert, &c. " Eighth, an act for the increaſe and incouragement " of ſeamen. Ninth, an act for preventing frauds, " and regulating abuſes in the plantation-trade. " Tenth, an act to incourage the bringing plate in-
" to the Mint to be coined, and for the farther re-
" medying the ill ſtate of the coin. Eleventh, an act " requiring the practitioners of the law to take the " oath, and ſubſcribe the declaration therein men-
" tion'd. Twelfth, an act for the repairing of the " high-ways, between Wymondham; and Attle-
" borough, in the county of Norfolk," and to ſeveral private acts (1).

More acts paſs'd.

The 27th of the ſame month, the King came again to the houſe of lords, and paſs'd ſuch other bills as lay ready for the royal aſſent: viz. Firſt, " an act for laying ſeveral duties upon low wines, or " ſpirits of the firſt extraction, &c. Second, an " act for continuing certain duties on ſalt, glaſs-
" wares, ſtone and earthen-bottles; for granting " ſeveral duties on tobacco-pipes, and other earthen-
" ware; for eſtabliſhing a national land-bank, and " for taking off the duties upon tonage of ſhips, " and upon coals. Third, an act for reſtraining " marriages, without licenſe or banes. Fourth, " an act for the better ſecurity of the King's perſon " and government. Fifth, an act for the more ef-
" fectual preventing the exportation of wool, and " for incouraging the importation thereof from Ire" land. Sixth, an act for incouraging the linnen " manufacture of Ireland. Seventh, an act for " continuing ſeveral acts of parliament therein " mentioned. Eighth, an act for taking away the " cuſtom of Wales, which hinders perſons from " diſpoſing their perſonal eſtates by their wills. " Ninth, an act for the eaſe of jurors, and better re" gulating juries. Tenth, an act for the better amen-
" ding and repairing the high-ways, &c. Eleventh, " an act for the incouragement of charitable gifts " and diſpoſitions. Twelfth, an act for the in-" couragement of the Greenland-trade. Thirteenth, " an act that the ſolemn affirmation and declara" tion of the people call'd Quakers, ſhould be ac" cepted inſtead of an oath in the uſual form:" and to one private act.

This done, his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he told them:

The King's ſpeech to the parliament.

" That they had ſhewn ſo great concern for his " perſon, and zeal for his government, and had " done ſo much for the preſervation of the one, and " for the ſtrengthening of the other, by the good " laws that had been made, and by the ſupplies they " had provided, for the ſeveral occaſions of this " year, that the late deſigns of their enemies were " (by the bleſſing of God) like to have no other " effect, than to let them ſee how firmly his Majeſty " and his parliament were united, and to give him " this occaſion to acknowledge their kindneſs, and " to aſſure them of all the returns which a Prince " could make to his people. And the neceſſity of " affairs requiring his abſenſe out of the kingdom, " for ſome time, he earneſtly recommended to " them, to be aſſiſting to thoſe whom he ſhould " leave to adminiſter the government, and that " they would be careful in preſerving the public " peace."

The parliament prorogued.

The lord-keeper, by his Majeſty's command, then prorogued the parliament to the 16th day of June next inſuing (2).

Growth of Socinianiſm.

The act of toleration leaving every one at liberty to broach what doctrine they pleas'd, hereſies of all ſorts began to multiply like Hydra's heads; but Socinianiſm ſeem'd to be the favorite hereſy propagated at this time. To check the inſolence of this ſect, the learned dr. Sherlock, dean of St. Paul's, undertook to vindicate the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity: but while the doctor indeavor'd to prove three diſtinct perſons, he carried matters ſo far as to advance a doctrine which ſeem'd to border upon Tritheiſm, and aſſerted, that there were in the the godhead, three minds, three beings, and three intelligences. This heterodox aſſertion giving the Unitarians an opportunity to triumph, dr. South, prebend of Weſtminſter, confuted dr. Sherlock's new way of vindicating the Trinity. Dr. Sherlock, by way of recrimination, attempted to prove, that his antagoniſt's doctrine ſavored of Sabellianiſm. The controverſy grew warm, and theſe two eminent divines treated one another ſometimes too angrily, and ſometimes too ludicrouſly for ſo ſacreda myſtery. On this occaſion, a member of the Univerſity of

(1) There was another " bill, for farther regulation of elections of members to ſerve in parliament, " which had paſs'd both houſes, but was now refuſed the royal aſſent: it was, therefore, moved, the 14th of April, in the houſe of commons, and the queſtion put, " that whoſoever adviſed his Majeſty not to give the royal aſſent to that bill, was an enemy to the King and king" dom:" but it paſs'd in the negative, by a majority of two hundred and nineteen, againſt ſeventy votes.

(2) The bills which on ſeveral accounts were loſt this ſeſſions were, 1ſt, a bill for regulating printing and printing-preſſes. 2d, A bill for reverſing a judgment giving againſt ſir William Williams, the 2d of James II, by which he was find 5000 l. for having printed the laſt days votes of the houſe of commons, and for aſſerting the rights and freedoms of parliament. 3d, A bill for ſettling and regulating the Eaſt-India-trade. 4th, Another to regulate the trade of Africa. 5th, A bill to confirm the earl of Torrington's grants. 6th, Two bills to veſt in the crown, all forfeited eſtates in England and Ireland, and to vacate all grants made thereof. 7th, A bill to prevent ſtock-jobbing; and 8th, a bill for preventing Papiſts from diſinheriting their Proteſtant heirs.

Oxford,

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Oxford taking upon him, in a ſermon preach'd before that learned body, to advance, "that there were "three infinite diſtinct minds and ſubſtances in "the Trinity; and that the three perſons in the "Trinity were three diſtinct minds or ſpirits, and "three individual ſubſtances;" the Univerſity thought fit to cenſure theſe words as "falſe, im-"pious and heretical, diſagreeing and contrary to "the doctrine of the church of England." This ſolemn decree not being, however, ſufficient to compoſe the jarring parties, and the Socinians taking advantage of theſe diviſions, the King interpoſed his royal authority, and, as head of the Anglican church, ſent certain directions to the archbiſhops and biſhops, with charge to ſee them obſerved within their ſeveral dioceſes. Which ſufficiently vindicated his Majeſty from the aſperſions caſt upon him by his enemies, that he was a favorer o f Socinianiſm.

Lords juſtices appointed.

The firſt of May, his Majeſty declared in council, that he had appointed the ſame perſons to adminiſter the government during his abſenſe, who had ſo honorably diſcharged that truſt, the year before.

Preferments.

The ſame day (1), ſir John Lowther baronet, was created baron Lowther, and viſcount Lonſdale; and ſir John Thompſon, baronet, was created baron Haverſham. His Majeſty conſtituted, at the ſame time, ſir Thomas Littleton, one of the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury; Chriſtopher Muſgrave, clerk of the ordinance, and James Lowther, eſq; clerk of the delivery of the ordnance of this kingdom: he likewiſe, confer'd the honor of knighthood on Theodore Janſſen, an eminent merchant in the city of London, yet living, for the zeal he had, on all occaſions, expreſs'd, for his Majeſty's government; particularly in the buſineſs of the bank of England. Not long after this, the lord keeper of the great ſeal of England, or lord chancellor; the preſident of the privy council; the firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, or lord treaſurer, the firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty; or lord admiral; the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and the chancellor of the exchequer, for the time being, together with the earls of Bridgewater and Tankerville, ſir Philip Meadhouſe, William Blaithwait, John Pollexfen, John Lock, Abraham Hill, and John Methwen, eſqs; were declared his Majeſty's commiſſioners for incouraging, improving, and protecting the trade, plantations, manufactures, and fiſhery of this kingdom.

The King goes to Holland.

The 2d of May, the King went from Kenſington to Margate, and the next day, imbark'd for Holland; but the wind proving contrary, in the evening, with the appearance of a ſtorm, his Majeſty came on ſhoar again: two days after, both wind and weather proving fair again, he went on board the Elizabeth, vice-admiral Aylmer commander, and landing ſafely, the ſeventh, at Oranjapolder, arrived about midnight at the Hague: here I ſhall leave his Majeſty to give a brief account of the martime affairs of this year.

Maritime affairs.

What preparations the French had made, at the begining of this year, to imbark an army at Calais, Dunkirk, and other ports thereabouts, in order to make a deſcent in England; and that, thereupon, the King had order'd admiral Ruſſel, with the fleet that then lay in the Downs, and the other ſhips which afterwards join'd them, to ſail for the coaſts of France, to prevent the deſigns of the enemy, the reader has already ſeen above. To this end, admiral Ruſſel repair'd, the 24th of February, to the Downs, and, on the 28th, came to an anchor off of Grovelin, with part of the fleet, and the lord Berkley, with a ſquadron, lay between him and Dunkirk.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Admiral Ruſſel ſails to the coaſt of France.

As he ſailed cloſe in with Calais, he ſaw between three and four hundred veſſels, of all ſorts, for imbarkation, with their ſails to their yards; and, in Flemiſh-road, were about ſeventeen men of war, great and ſmall, which, with the tranſports, would probably have been, in a few days, on our coaſts, had not ſuch extraordinary diligence been uſed in geting a powerful fleet to ſea. Thirteen of theſe ſhips of war retired as cloſe as they could into the pier of Dunkirk; and ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, with ſeveral captains, were ſent to look on them; but they found nothing could be attempted againſt them, with hopes of ſucceſs. The 23d of March, three bomb veſſels joined ſir Cloudeſly. The 31ſt, admiral Allemonde came into the Downs from Holland, with ſix men of war of the line, and two fireſhips.

Many tranſports at Calais;

And men of war in Flemiſh-road.

Impracticable to attack them.

The firſt of April, ſeveral of our ſhips came into the Downs, from Spithead; and, the next day, ſir Cloudeſly Shovel was order'd to return, with all the bomb-veſſels, and ſuch ſmall ſhips as he ſhould think neceſſary, and attempt the burning of Calais, with the tranſports, and other ſhips in that harbor. The 3d, between noon and night, about 300 bombs and carcaſſes were thrown into the town, and among the ſhips, which did conſiderable damage, and ſet fire to the town in three or four places, and to ſome ſhips: but the bomb-veſſels and brigantines having received damage in their rigging, and all the mortars but two being diſabled, and, beſide the wind coming about, the next day, from S. S. E. to S. W. with hard gales, it was thought convenient to return to the Downs: from whence ſir Cloudeſly Shovel appointed a ſquadron, to indeavor to keep the French in at Dunkirk (2).

Calais bombarded.

The 27th of May, ſir George Rooke, who, upon his return from the Streights had taken the command of the fleet, being order'd to return to his duty at the admiralty board, the lord Berkley was appointed admiral of the fleet. Before ſir George came aſhore, he had intelligence, that the French had ſeventy men of war a little above Camaret-bay, all ready to put to ſea, with four flags flying, beſide ſome ſmall ſhips in the bay: upon his coming to town, he made a propoſal to attempt theſe ſhips there: which, however, was not thought practicable by a council of war, of Engliſh and Dutch admirals. Nevertheleſs, his lordſhip arriving, with the fleet, at Torbay, the 3d of June, received orders, ſome time afterwards, from the lords of the admiralty, touching the fleet's lying in Camaret and Bertheaume bays; and a ſquadron being ſent, with the bomb-veſſels, to deſtroy ſome of the

The lord Berkley appointed admiral of the fleet.

(1) His Majeſty had before beſtow'd ſeveral marks of his favor; and, among others, the lord George Hamilton was created earl of Orkney, in the kingdom of Scotland, in conſideration of his military ſervices in Ireland and Flanders; and the lord Murray, eldeſt ſon of the marquis of Athol, was made one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, in Scotland, in the room of the lord Stairs. The begining of this year, likewiſe, his moſt illuſtrious highneſs, the duke of Gloceſter, was elected a knight-companion of the moſt noble order of the garter, and was afterwards inſtall'd at Windſor, with great ſolemnity.

(2) The account the French give of this bombardment of Calais is in ſubſtance: that, the 13th (third) between the hours of one at noon and ſeven at night, the Engliſh ſpent three hundred and fifty bombs, and ten or twelve fire-pots: of which not above half fell into the city, the reſt fell into the port, and on ſhoar. The damage ſuſtained was chiefly in the Caſerns, the church and convent of the hoſpital, and eight or ten houſes. Three ſhips, and about thirty or forty houſes received ſome little harm; but as the bombs ſet fire to neither houſes nor ſhips, it is not believed that the whole damage amounts to above ten thouſand crowns.

The continuator of Rapin, in French, ſays, ſir Cloudeſly Shovel had before propoſed this enterprize to a council of war, and had the mortification to ſee it rejected. What ſatisfaction muſt it not then have been to him, to find it afterwards approved by the court of admiralty.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

French towns, a council of war was called, on the 16th; and tho' it was judged, that the fleet could not ride, in either of thoſe bays, out of bomb-ſhot, it was reſolved, as ſoon as weather would permit, to look into them, and indeavor to deſtroy what ſhips they ſhould meet there. The admiral turned it up, accordingly, as high as Dartmouth; but the ebb being ſpent, and the wind blowing hard, at W. S. W. he was oblig'd to put into Torbay, where, on the nineteenth, the Dutch admiral receiv'd orders, from the King, to ſend eight ſhips of the line, to Holland.

Reſolution to ſail to Bertheaume and Camaret bays.

Eight Dutch ſhips ordered home.

The 24th, the fleet got out of the channel, and, in Broad-ſound, one of our ſhips took a French privateer, which came from Breſt fourteen days before. The 4th of July, the fleet anchored about two leagues from Belle-iſle, and ſome of our men, who had been landed the day before, at Grovais, (or Gray) whither they had been ſent in the Burford and Newcaſtle men of war, with a fire-ſhip, burnt moſt of the villages, and kill'd and brought off a great number of cattle, without any reſiſtance: and at Howat, one of the iſlands called Cardinals, ſome of our men being landed in the barges and pinnaces, brought off about three hundred head of cattle, having burnt the town of that name. The next day, three more Engliſh, and two Dutch men of war, with the long boats of diverſe other ſhips, and ſeven hundred ſoldiers and ſeamen, were ſent to join the Burford and Newcaſtle at Grovais, who finiſh'd what captain Fitz-Patrick had begun; having deſtroy'd there about twenty villages more, and carried away thirteen hundred head of black cattle and horſes, with twenty ſmall veſſels; and the boats imployed againſt Howat, were ordered, at the ſame time, on the like ſervice, againſt Heydick (1). The men of war at the iſle of Rhee, with the bomb-veſſels, under the command of ſir Martin Beckman and captain Meeze, having thrown two thouſand bombs into the towns of St. Martins and Olonna, left them in flames and returned to the fleet.

Our fleet does conſiderable damages on the iſlands, on the coaſt of France.

Thus ended theſe little enterprizes, and, with them, thoſe of the body of the fleet, which being now in great want of moſt ſpecies of proviſions, and daily leſſened, not only by the withdrawing of moſt of the Dutch ſhips, but ſome of our own, by orders from the admiralty, the admiral was directed to come to Spithead, where he arrived the 13th of July.

The fleet ordered home.

I might now go on to give my readers an account of the proceedings of vice-admiral Mitchel, with a ſquadron, and afterwards, of captain George Meeze, with a detachment of that ſquadron, in the Soundings; but all that can be ſaid of them may be reduced to this, that they both uſed their beſt diligence to protect our trade, the chief end of their being there; that the firſt ſuffered very much, in a ſtorm, and that the latter, when he returned to Spithead, brought with him three French privateers, one of eight and thirty, another of ſix and thirty, and a third of fourteen guns.

Vice-admiral Mitchel, and captain Meeze's proceedings in the Soundings.

Before I conclude the naval tranſactions of this year, I muſt ſay a word or two of rear admiral Bembow, who, the begining of May, was ordered to command the ſquadron which lay off of Dunkirk, to prevent monſ. du Bart's geting to ſea, with his ſquadron. When he came on the coaſt, he found the ſhips he was to command lying about five leagues north from that port, and going in with his boat, into Flemiſh road, diſcovered the enemy's ſhips, being nine, ready to ſail. From the circumſtances of wind and tides, he expected them out of the north channel, and, therefore, not having ſhips enough to cover both, he ſpread what he had, Engliſh and Dutch, before that paſſage; but it being hazy, the next day, he found, the day following, du Bart had given him the ſlip and was got out of the eaſt chanel.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Du Bart eſcapes him.

Having notice, on the 20th, that du Bart had been ſeen on the weſt-end of the Doggar-bank, the rear-admiral proceeded thither; but the Dutch, having no orders ſo to do, refuſed to accompany him. After ſome time ſpent, in vain, in ſearch of him, in company with five Dutch men of war he met at ſea, he returned to Yarmouth-roads, from whence he ſailed with the Eaſt-country-trade, and arrived at Gottenburg the 30th of June; having detached neceſſary convoys with the ſhips bound to ſeveral ports. He was there informed, that du Bart was at the Cow and Calf, in Norway: but, for want of proviſions and neceſſaries, he was not then in a condition to go in ſearch of him. The rear-admiral, being returned to the Downs, and there ſupplied with all neceſſaries, ſet ſail for Hamburg, to convoy a rich fleet of merchant-ſhips from thence: but, in his paſſage, got advice, that they were ſafely arrived at Orfordneſs, upon which he proceeded off of the Broad-fourteens, in ſearch of monſ. du Bart. The 15th of September, he met with ten Dutch men of war, and the 18th with the Ruby, and three Engliſh Eaſt-India ſhips, which had come north about, and were deſigned, with eleven Dutch, for the Texel. The next day, he diſcovered du Bart's ſquadron, conſiſting of ten ſhips, who, fortunately for the Engliſh and Dutch trade, had miſs'd theſe fourteen from the Eaſt-Indies. He gave chaſe to him, and two of our ſhips got within a league of him; but the reſt were three a ſtern; ſo that he plainly ſaw the French out-ſailed him, and, therefore, loſing ſight of them, when the night came on, he gave over the chaſe.

He follows him; but in vain.

Convoys the Eaſt-country-fleet.

Goes in purſuit of du Bart again.

Diſcovers his ſquadron, and gives chaſe to it.

But du Bart is too nimble for him.

Having thus diſpatch'd our maritime affairs, before I go to thoſe of the continent, I ſhall take a ſmall view of thoſe of Scotland and Ireland. The parliament of Scotland, being met, the 8th of September, at Edinburg, the lord Murray, one of his Majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, for that kingdom, being lately created earl of Tullibardine, and appointed his Majeſty's high commiſſioner, his grace made a ſpeech to them, on occaſion of their meeting; as did, likewiſe, the lord Polwarth, lord high chancelor of Scotland. The King's letter to the parliament was read the 10th, after which committees were appointed as uſual, for the ſecurity of the kingdom, for trade and controverted elections; and then all the members ſigned the aſſociation, being the ſame, in ſubſtance, as that which the parliament of England had ſubſcribed. The following

Affairs of Scotland.

(1) Upon a modeſt computation, there were deſtroyed at leaſt twenty villages; the continuator of Rapin makes them forty or fifty, and thirteen hundred houſes; and near ſixteen hundred head of black cattle and horſes were killed. The Engliſh took about twenty barks; and a veſſel from Newfoundland, re-took another veſſel from the iſlands of America, laden with ſugar, and one of our frigats was taken by a St. Malo's privateer.

The loſs the French received (ſays biſhop Burnet) was not conſiderable in it ſelf; but it put their affairs in great diſtraction: and the charge they were at, in defence of their coaſt, was much greater than ours in attacking it. F. Daniel agrees with the biſhop in the firſt, but paſſes by the latter. The French Gazetteer had the vanity to turn this expedition into ridicule: he began his relation, in the following manner: "the Engliſh are ſo extravagant in their operations, that they confound even "reaſon itſelf, and their expeditions are ſo pitiful, that they beget nothing but ſcorn and contempt." And in another place: "they (the Engliſh) will be little feared, for the future; ſince, having attack'd the weakeſt part of our coaſts, with their "greateſt ſtrength, the very powder they ſpent in theſe fruitleſs expeditions amounts to much more than the damage they "have done us." But they were ſoon awaken'd out of theſe pleaſing dreams, by letters from the inhabitants, of thoſe parts, lamenting their great loſſes; and eſpecially St. Martins, where they allow'd the loſs to amount, at leaſt, to a hundred thouſand crowns; and that three parts in four of their houſes were ruined.

days,

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

days, they resolved to give his Majesty a supply of 1,440,000l. Scots, to be raised by a land-cess, and an additional excise, for maintaining the standing-forces, both by sea and land. And considering the danger this kingdom was in, by the late conspiracy against his Majesty's person and kingdoms, they ordered an act to be brought in "for securing their "religion, lives and properties, in case his Ma-"jesty should come to an untimely death; and "another for obliging all, in public trust, to sign "the association." The 20th, the parliament read and approved the latter of the said acts, as also their answer to the King's letter; and, on the 25th, the lord-commissioner gave the royal assent to the "act "for the supply," and to such other acts as were approved by the parliament. The 9th of October, he returned to the house, and touch'd with the scepter, "an act for the security of the kingdom; "an act in favor of preachers at vacant churches; "and another in favor of the universities, schools "and hospitals; an act for the levy of 1000 men; "an act against Protestant servants in Popish fami-"lies; an act for better providing for the poor; "an act against prophaneness;" and several other acts: whereupon the parliament was adjourned, the 12th, to the 8th of December following.

Affairs of Ireland.

In Ireland, the lord Capel, lord-deputy of that kingdom, expired, the 30th of May, after a long sickness; upon which, the council, pursuant to an act made in the thirty-third year of King Henry VIII, elected the lord-chancellor Porter, to be lord-justice and chief governor of that kingdom, 'till his Majesty's pleasure was known. The 27th of June, the Irish parliament met at Dublin, according to their last adjournment. The King's commission, appointing the lord-chief-justice Haly, to be their speaker, being read, in the house of lords, and he being sworn, a motion was made, and unanimously agreed to, that the whole house, with their speaker, should wait upon the lord-justice Porter, to congratulate his being placed in the government. The commons, at the same time, having first expell'd mr. Sanderson, the only member of that house who had not sign'd the association, made the same unanimous vote, and, in the afternoon, both houses attended the lord-justice, and then adjourn'd to the 4th of August; upon which day, sir Charles Porter, lord chancellor, and the earls of Montroth and Drogheda, lately appointed lords-justices and general governors of Ireland, signified his Majesty's pleasure to the parliament, that they should farther adjourn themselves.

Proceedings of the lords-justices of England.

I might now, before I proceed to the affairs of the continent, give an account of the proceedings of the lords-justices of England: but very little of moment happen'd, during the King's absense: they may, therefore, be reduced to the issuing of proclamations and orders, "for appointing a fast; for "the currency of some species; the relief of the "poor; the apprehending of several clippers, and "preventing the exportation of coin and bullion; "for restraining the unwarrantable practises of "privateers and pirates; and one, in particular, "for apprehending the famous sea-robber, Henry "Every, and his crew, who had commited several "depredations in the seas of India or Persia, to the "great prejudice of the East-India-company; and, "lastly, for the execution of the late act of par-"liament for the increase and incouragement of "seamen."

The orders abovemention'd, for the currency of certain species, and to prevent the exportation of bullion, &c. were, indeed, highly necessary; for notwithstanding all the wise steps that had been taken, there was great confusion and distress, in England, upon calling in and re-coining the clipp'd mony, especially among the laboring and meaner sort of people, who could get little or no mony for their work, and, indeed, few cared to imploy any workmen. To remedy these, and the like inconveniences, an order of council was issued in July, this summer, that "the justices of peace should "frequently meet in their divisions, and consider "how to relieve and subsist the poorer sort of peo-"ple, till mony become more plentiful:" and another order of council was published, "requir-"ing the attorney-general to prosecute all those "who had entered into confederacies not to im-"ploy any persons, in the woollen, and other "manufactures, during this scarcity of mony.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Campain in Flanders.

I come now to the affairs of the continent, and first of Flanders, where the confederates began with doing the enemies all the mischief they could, without coming to an ingagement. The news was no sooner come into those parts, that the conspiracy in England was happily discovered, the King safe, and the nation freed from all apprehensions of an invasion, than the Prince of Vaudemont, and other generals, bethought themselves of making an extraordinary bonefire for joy, at the expense of the French: in order to which, having drawn together a body of troops from several garisons, the earl of Athlone, and lieutenant-general Cohorn, march'd from Namur, the 13th of March, N. S. with forty squadrons, thirty battalions, fifteen pieces of cannon, and six mortars. The earl, with the greatest part of these troops, invested Dinant, and blocked up that garison, while our famous ingineer advanced, with the rest of the troops, and all the artillery, to Givet, where the enemy had laid up a vast magazine; and having got his batteries in readiness, by the 16th in the morning, he began to fire into the town, with bombs and red-hot bullets, which set fire, not only to the forrage but the houses. A detachment of soldiers was commanded, at the same time, to enter the town, with large flambeaux in their hands, which they perform'd with great bravery, firing the cazerns and granaries, where the oats and other provisions lay; so that, as well the whole town, as the magazine, were utterly consumed, and reduced to ashes: and what was yet more extraordinary, all this was executed, with the inconsiderable loss of nine or ten men.

The enemy's magazines at Givet burnt.

Notwithstanding this success, before the opening of the campain, when it was opened, it proved the most pacific of any that had happen'd during the war; and, indeed, the wants which both armies had to strugle with, were such that no great matter could be expected from either of them. The French had intirely exhausted their country, by keeping such numerous armies on foot, and, among other inconveniences, the re-coining of the mony in England, had brought the English army, in Flanders, under no small difficulties. The generals had so much to do to provide subsistence for their troops, that it, in a great measure, took off their thoughts from military exploits. The French were, at first, superior to the allies; but the latter being re-infored, by the coming up of the Germans, soon became equal to them. However, the generals, on both sides, spent the whole campain in observing one another, and in indeavoring to possess themselves of the most convenient 'camps, for the subsisting of their indigent troops.

The French sue for peace.

The French had, before the King arrived in Holland, sent monsr. Calliere to the Hague, offering to acknowledge King William, and to deliver up some considerable places as a barrier for the allies against France. The streights to which the confederate army was reduced, seem'd to favor monsr. Calliere's negociations, and the Dutch began to listen to the proposals of France: 'tho the latter soon found, they could not play the game of Nimeguen over again, and that the States were not to be brought to any reſolution, without the conſent of King William, and the reſt of the allies (1). However, ſome demands were made, by the Dutch, by way of preliminaries to a treaty, as the reſtitution of Lorrain, and of the towns of Straſsburg and Luxemburg. Theſe monſ. Calliere, in the name of his maſter, ſeem'd very ready to conſent to; tho' he ſoon clog'd the firſt with ſome difficulties. Matters being thus far advanced, on the part of the Dutch, and the Engliſh being, likewiſe, on account of the great loſſes their trade had ſuffer'd by the enemy's privateers and cruiſers, their heavy taxes, and the ſmall proſpect of being gainers by the war, rather inclin'd than averſe to the peace, it was, at length, agreed, at all hands, thro' the mediation of the King of Sweden, and the prudent management of the baron van Lilienrodt, his embaſſador in Holland, that plenipotentiaries ſhould be named, for carrying on this ſalutary work.

Will' III. An' 1696.

Affairs of Italy.

The better to ſucceed in this negociation, the court of France had, during the whole courſe of the preceding winter, been privately treating with the duke of Savoy, to ingage him to a ſeparate peace; and the Pope's nuncio, together with the Venetian envoy, ſeconded the intrigues of that court ſo effectually, and made ſuch advantageous offers to his Royal Highneſs, in the name of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, that he at length reſolved to accept of them. As this matter was to remain, for ſome time, at leaſt, a ſecret to the allies, the duke of Savoy went, towards the cloſe of the winter, with a ſmall retinue of his own naming, to our lady of Loretto, under pretenſe of a religious vow: and tho', as it was known, that his Royal Highneſs had more of the ſtateſman than the bigot in him, a ſuſpicion aroſe, that there was ſomething more than devotion in this journey; eſpecially as the Engliſh miniſter, lord Galway, was not allowed to accompany him: and tho' upon this ſuſpicion, ſpies were ſent after him, yet notwithſtanding all the vigilance of the allies, they could never get the leaſt notice of the treaty of peace, which the duke actually ſigned at Loretto, by the mediation of the agents of Rome and Venice, and a private meſſenger ſent by the marſhal de Catinat (2). By this treaty, "the French reſtored to his "Royal Highneſs all the new conqueſts they had "made, as alſo Pignerol demoliſhed; gave him "four millions of livres, towards the reparation of "the damage he had ſuſtained during the war; "ingaged to aſſiſt him with 8000 foot and "4000 horſe to be maintained at the charge of "France; and that a marriage between the duke "of Burgundy and the Princeſs, his Royal High-"neſs's daughter, ſhould forthwith be treated on, "in order to the conſummation thereof, as ſoon "as they ſhould be of age." With reſpect to the Princeſs's portion, it was agreed; "that the duke "ſhould give her 200,000 crowns in gold, towards "the payment of which, his Royal Highneſs was "to give a diſcharge for 100,000 crowns of gold, "which remained due by France to the houſe of "Savoy, a part of the ducheſs Royal's portion: "the remainder, the King of France promiſed to "remit in conſideration of the preſent treaty;" which was ſoon after ratified in France, with the guaranties of the Pope, and the republic of Venice.

A ſeparate peace between France and Savoy.

This treaty having been ſo artfully and ſecretly managed, the next care the duke had was to conceal it, not only from the miniſters and generals of the allies, but even from his own; none of which had been intruſted with this important ſecret but the marquis de St. Thomas, who, to carry on the treaty, had taken many a journey in diſguiſe, to Pignerol, to confer with the governor of that place and the marſhal de Catinat, who likewiſe came thither incognito. However, notwithſtanding all the precaution the duke could take, he was not long returned from Loretto, before King William, by ſome means or other, had got information of this ſeparate treaty, and obtained copies of the articles of it; which being ſent to the lord Galway, he communicated them to the miniſters of the allies, and even ſhewed them to the duke himſelf. His Royal Highneſs, tho' he was amazed at the diſcovery, ſtill denied the treaty, 'till, by the aſſiſtance of France, he was in a condition to throw off all diſguiſe. Towards the latter end of May, the marſhal de Catinat came down from the mountains of Savoy, into the plains of Turin, with an army of near 50,000 men, which was much ſuperior to that of the confederates. The duke of Savoy yet continued his diſſimulation, and, as if he had no private intelligence with the court of France, put all his own infantry into his fortreſſes, under pretenſe of defending them, and ſent all the confederate forces to the camp at Montcallier.

A ſham truce between France and Savoy.

The 12th of July, the duke concluded a ſham-truce with the French, for a month, and afterwards continued it to the 15th of December: and tho' the allies would not give their conſent to this ſuſpenſion of arms, they were conſtrained to behave, as if they had in effect accepted of it. At length, the duke of Savoy threw off the maſk, and openly notified the ſeparate peace he had made with France, to King William, in his camp at Gemblours, by the mouth of the preſident de la Tour, who, at the ſame time, ſignified to his Majeſty, that the forces of the allies, were to depart his country, within a limited time, or would be forced to it by his Royal Highneſs's troops, aſſiſted by thoſe of France: but that it was in the power of the confederates, to make a neutrality which ſhould include all Italy, within the ſame time.

Valenca beſieged.

The allies were accordingly obliged to retire out of a country where they were already looked upon as enemies, and to provide for the ſecurity of the Milaneſe; which the French troops, in conjunction with thoſe of Savoy, had reſolved to attack in order to oblige the Spaniards to accept the neutrality of Italy. The duke of Savoy followed the allies cloſe, and upon the expiration of the truce, the 13th of September, entered the Milaneſe, at the head of the French troops, and his own, by virtue of a commiſſion of generaliſſimo, from his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty (3); and four days afterwards, he

(1) If we may give credit, to the continuator of Rapin, in French, the Dutch were not ſo very nice and ſcrupulous: for, according to him, the Dutch had privately treated with this ſame Calliere, two years before at Meaſtricht, whither he came by virtue of paſſes granted him by the States, and where he treated with their deputy, monſ. van Dyckvelt: and this year (ſays the ſame author) they again treated with him privately at Ghent, by means of burgo-maſter Borcel, whom they ſent thither, for that purpoſe, in the room of monſ. van Dyckvelt, who being ſo noted, they fear'd his appearance there might excite the jealouſy of the confederate powers: but notwithſtanding all their precaution, theſe myſterious ſteps could not wholly eſcape the vigilance of their miniſters. B. 25. p. 285.

(2) The continuator of Rapin, in French, pretends that the duke of Savoy, having information that the Dutch were treating privately with France, took this method to ſecure himſelf, leſt he ſhould be neglected in a general treaty.

(3) We ſhall hardly meet with an example in hiſtory, that the ſame general commanded two contending armies in one and the ſame campain: but what is yet more remarkable, before the allies departed his territories, the duke gave orders to both armies, at the ſame time, as well they as the French acknowleging him for their chief. His anceſtors had indeed, upon ſeveral occaſions, ſhewed themſelves inconſtant enough, between the houſes of France and Auſtria: but this was a ſtrain of policy, in which he exceeded them all, and is hardly to be parallelled, tho' ſome more modern events may be ſaid, in ſome meaſure, to come up to it.

laid ſiege to Valencia. This ſiege, tho' it was rather a political, than a real attack, at leaſt on the ſide of the French, who were, by no means, for increaſing the power of ſo troubleſome a neighbor as the duke of Savoy, ſo intimidated, however, the Spaniards, who were not deep-ſighted enough to penetrate into the real deſign of France, that, on the 7th of October, a meſſenger from his Catholic Majeſty brought his acceſſion to the peace of Italy; whereby a neutrality, or ſuſpenſion of arms, was eſtabliſhed in that country, 'till a general peace inſued; to which theſe artful intrigues and negociations of France were, without doubt, a great ſtep.

The neutrality of Italy agreed to.

Campain in Catalonia.

To facilitate this ſeparate as well as the general treaty, which followed it, the French formed a deſign of doing great matters in Catalonia; which however ended in little or nothing. The duke of Vendome did indeed, attack the Spaniards in their camp near Oſtalric, and obliged them to retreat under the cannon of their lines, which they did, however, in ſo good order, that the French, greedy of the purſuit, met with ſo warm a reception there, as quickly obliged them to retire in their turn. In this action, which was the only one that happened on his ſide, worthy our notice, the Spaniards loſt near 300 men, and the French about 100 leſs.

And on the Rhine.

On the Rhine, the campain was ſo inconſiderable, that it is hadly worth mentioning. The French, at the begining of it, did indeed paſs that river, and obliged Prince Lewis of Baden to intrench himſelf to avoid an ingagement: but towards the concluſion of it, the Prince, in his turn, gained the ſame advantage over the French, and cannonaded them ſeveral days, in their ſtrong intrenchments. General Thungen was to have croſſed the Rhine, at the ſame time, near Phillipſburg (Prince Lewis having paſſed it near Mentz) in order to have attacked the French in their rear: but they having timely notice of that deſign, detached the marquis de Huxelles, to prevent it; ſo that all the Germans could do was to repaſs the river with ſome booty, and diverſe hoſtages, for contribution: and thus the campain ended.

Death of the Queen mother of Spain, and the King of Poland.

While I am on the continent, I ſhall juſt mention the death of two crowned heads, to whom this year proved fatal: I mean Mary Ann of Auſtria, Queen-mother of Spain, who died on the 17th of May, N. S. of a cancer in her breaſt; and the brave John Sobieſki III, King of Poland, who departed this life the 17th of June, N. S. of an appoplectic fit, in the ſeventieth year of his age. The firſt was a conſiderable loſs to the confederates in general, and to the Spaniards in particular; her prevailing influence over the counſels of the latter making them frequently take ſuch reſolutions, as were conformable to the intereſts of the former. What were the conſequences of the death of the King of Poland, the reader will ſee in the ſequel.

King William leaves the army.

I return now to his Majeſty King William, who, being tired of a campain that furniſhed him with no opportunity of exerciſing his martial genius, left the army, the 26th of Auguſt, N. S. under the command of the elector of Bavaria, and retired to his beloved diverſion of ſtag-hunting, near his Royal palaces of Dieren and Loo. The 14th of September, his Majeſty ſet out from the laſt of theſe places, accompanied by the duke of Zell (a Prince for whom he always ſhewed a more than ordinary regard) and went the next day to Cleves, where he was magnificently entertained by the court of Brandenburg. Having ſpent two days at this place, he returned with the duke of Zell to Loo, whither he was followed three days after, by the electoral Prince of Brandenburg. Having ſtaid three weeks longer at Loo, his Majeſty went to the Hague; and on the 14th of October, N. S. imbarked on board the William and Mary yacht, attended by ſeveral other yachts, and a ſquadron of men of war, under the command of vice-admiral Aylmer. He landed two days afterwards at Margate, and arrived the ſame evening at Kenſington.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

Returns to England

And is complimented by the city.

The 8th of October, O. S. the lord-mayor and court of aldermen of London attended his Majeſty; and mr. Recorder, in the name of the city, "congratulated his Majeſty's ſafe return, and gave "him their hearty thanks for his Princely care, "and indefatigable pains for the ſafety of his own "kingdoms, and the ſecurity of Chriſtendom, "with the humble aſſurance of the city's ſincere "affection and conſtant loyalty, which they would "upon all occaſions effectually demonſtrate to the "utmoſt of their power." His Majeſty received this compliment very graciouſly, and upon that occaſion, confered the honor of knighthood upon John Johnſon, one of their aldermen, and upon the two ſheriffs, John Wolf and Samuel Blewet, eſqs;

The parliament meets.

The 20th, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, purſuant to their laſt prorogation, when the King, repairing to the houſe of lords, with the uſual ceremony, told both houſes;

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"That he had called them together, as ſoon as "was poſſible, and he thought it a great happineſs, "that this year had paſſed without any diſadvantage "abroad, or diſaſter at home, conſidering their "great diſappointment in the funds given at their "laſt meeting, and the difficulties which had ariſen, "upon the re-coining of the mony; which was ſo "convincing a proof of the diſpoſition of the army, "and of the ſteady affections of his people, that "he could not but take notice of it, with great "ſatisfaction."

"Our enemies (continued he) have not been "without hopes, that ſuch a conjuncture might "have proved fatal to us; but as they have failed "in thoſe expectations, ſo I am fully perſuaded, "that your unanimous proceedings, in this ſeſſion, "will make them for ever deſpair of an advantage, "from any diſagreement among ourſelves. It muſt "be confeſſed, that the buſineſs which you have "before you is very great, becauſe of the neceſ-"ſity of ſupplying former deficiencies as well as "making proviſions for the next year's ſervice: "and upon this occaſion, it is fit for me to acquaint "you, that ſome overtures have been made, in or-"der to the entering upon a negociation for a gene-"ral peace: but I am ſure we ſhall all agree in opi-"nion; that the only way of treating with France "is with our ſwords in our hands, and that we can "have no reaſon to expect a ſafe and honorable "peace, but by ſhewing ourſelves prepared to make "a vigorous and effectual war.

"In order to this, I earneſtly recommend to you, "gentlemen of the houſe of commons, that you "would conſider of raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies, "as well for maintaining the honor of parliaments, "in making good the funds already granted, as "for carrying on the war, the next year; which, "I think, ought not to be leſs, than what was in-"tended to be raiſed for that purpoſe, the laſt "ſeſſion. I muſt alſo put you in mind of the civil "liſt, which cannot be ſupported without your "help; and the miſerable condition of the French "Proteſtants does oblige me to mention them to "you again.

In the concluſion, his Majeſty addreſſed himſelf to both houſes, telling them: "that it might de-"ſerve their conſideration, whether there did not "ſtill remain ſome inconveniencies relating to "the coin, which ought to be remedied: that he "hoped, they would find out the beſt expedients "for the recovery of credit, which was abſolutely "neceſſary, not only with reſpect to the war, but

Will'III. An' 1696.

" for carrying on of trade: that he was of opinion, " that there was not one good Engliſhman, who " was not intirely convinced, how much did depend " upon this ſeſſion: and therefore he could not but " hope for unanimity and diſpatch in their reſolu- " tions, which at this time, were more neceſſary " than ever, for the ſafety and honor of England.

The houſe of commons having, as uſual, appointed the ſiting of the grand committees for religion, trade, grievances, courts of juſtice, and privileges and elections, made an unanimous vote, " that " they would ſupport his Majeſty and his govern- " ment, againſt all his enemies, both at home and " abroad, and that they would effectually aſſiſt " him, in the proſecution of the preſent war againſt " France." Purſuant to this vote, an addreſs was drawn up, by mr. chancellor of the exchequer, by their order, and was preſented to his Majeſty, by the whole houſe in a body, on the 23d of October: in this addreſs the commons took notice:

Addreſs of the commons to the King.

" that this was the eighth year, in which they had " aſſiſted him with large ſupplies, for carrying on " a juſt and neceſſary war in defenſe of their religion, " preſervation of their laws, and vindication of the " rights and liberties of the people of England; " which they had hitherto preſerved, and by the " bleſſing of God, on his Majeſty's conduct and " good government, would ſtedfaſtly maintain " and intail on their poſterity. That this had " coſt the nation much blood and treaſure, but " the hopes of accompliſhing ſo great and ſo " glorious a work, had made his ſubjects chear- " fully ſupport the charge: and to ſhew his Maje- " ſty, and all Chriſtendom; that the commons " of England would not be amuſed or diverted " from their firm reſolutions of obtaining by war, " a ſafe and honorable peace, they did, in the name " of thoſe they repreſented, renew their aſſurances " to his Majeſty, that this houſe would ſupport " him and his government, againſt all his enemies, " both at home and abroad, and effectually aſſiſt " him in the carrying on the preſent war againſt " France." To this addreſs, the King anſwered:

His Majeſty's anſwer.

" That the continuance of their zeal and af- " fection was the only thing in the world he moſt " valued, and that he would make their good, and " the ſafety of the nation, the principal care of his " life:"

Theſe aſſurances of affection, on the one ſide, of loyalty, on the other, and of mutual confidence on both, being over, the commons entered, with great alacrity, upon thoſe great affairs, which ſo much required their attention: but I ſhall poſtpone the farther proceedings of parliament for a while, to give an account of a very remarkable affair, which begun ſome months before the opening of this ſeſſion, and was afterwards the occaſion of very warm debates in both houſes; I mean the caſe of ſir John Fenwick, who was concerned in the late aſſaſſination and invaſion-plot.

Affair of ſir John Fenwick.

Sir John had lain concealed in London, from the time of the diſcovery of the plot, 'till the begin- ing of June, when he indeavored to make his eſ- cape to France: but was taken at Romney, in Kent, where he went under the name of Thomas Ward, and was in company of Robert Webber, an attorney: while he was at Romney, tho' in cuſtody, he found means to write the following letter to his lady, with a black-lead pencil:

His letter to his lady;

" What I fear'd is at laſt happened; had I " gone alone I had done it; but the other was " betray'd from London. It is God's will, ſo we " muſt ſubmit. I know nothing can ſave my " life, but my lord Carliſle's going over to him, " (meaning King William,) back'd by the reſt of " the family of the Howards, to beg it, and offering " that I will be abroad, all his time, where I can- " not hurt him, and that I will never draw ſword " againſt him: I muſt leave it to you what elſe to " ſay. All friends muſt be made; my lord Devon- " ſhire may, perhaps, by my lady; my lord Go- " dolphin and my lord Pembroke, by my lady " Montgomery; mr. Nelſon, by the biſhop of Can- " terbury; my lord Arran might ingage his bro- " ther Selkirk, to uſe his intereſt with Keppel. I " believe, if my lord Carliſle would go, it were " beſt before my trial, or elſe they will cut me " ſhort for want of time. If he can prevail with " him, for a pardon, he will procure it as well " before my trial as after; at leaſt, he may prevail " for a reprieve, till ſome can come over to him. " My lord will alſo have an opportunity to ingage " Benting (the earl of Portland) and get my " lord of Eſſex, to join with him. I cannot " think what elſe to ſay: but the great care muſt " be the jury; if two or three could be got, that " would ſtarve the reſt, that or nothing can ſave " me. Mony, I know, would do it: but, alas, that " is not to be had, nor ſhall I get enough for coun- " ſel. I beg of you not to think of being ſhut up " with me; I know it will kill you; and, beſide, " I have no ſuch friend as you, to take care of my " buſineſs; tho' it would be the comfort of my " life, the little time it laſts, to have you with me: " and I have this only comfort now left, that my " death will make you eaſy. My deareſt life, " grieve not for me, but reſign me to God's will. " You will hear as ſoon as they bring me to town, " where they put me, and then I would have a " ſervant, or ſome-body, with me. I am inter- " rupted, ſo can ſay no more now: ingage ſir John " Lowther, the new lord, who has more intereſt " than any body: let my lord Scarſdal ingage " Germain, to ingage Overkirk for me. Speak " to my lady Arlington. If my trial could be " put off, till the King comes back, there would " be more opportunity to ſolicit him."

Will'III. An' 1696.

Sir John having deliver'd this letter to mr. Webber, the campanion of his flight, it was afterwards intercepted, by the mayor of Romney, and brought to the lords-juſtices. At his firſt examination, being ignorant of the miſcarriage of the letter, he denied every thing he was charged with: 'till the lords-juſtices producing it, he was quite confounded. His hopes of geting a jury pack'd, being, by this diſcovery, intirely defeated, he had now no proſpect of ſaving himſelf, but by geting his trial put off 'till the King's return; and to effect this he pretended, if time was allowed him, he would lay open the whole matter, and give the government a clearer light of this affair than they had hitherto had. In his firſt private treaty with the duke of Devonſhire, he inſiſted to have an aſſurance of life, upon his promiſe of diſcovering all he knew. This the King refuſed, and would have it left to himſelf to judge of the integrity and importance of what he ſhould diſcover. Sir John reſolved, there- upon, to throw himſelf upon the King's mercy, and ſent his Majeſty a paper, in which, after a bare account of the conſultations among the Jacobites, he ſaid, in general, that there was, in England, a ſettled number of perſons to manage the affairs of King James: and being afterwards put upon to name thoſe perſons, and to deſcend to particulars, he gave in another writing, in which, among other things, he pretended, that King James, and thoſe who were imployed by him, had aſſured the Jacobites, that the earls of Shrewſbury, Bath, and Marlborough, the lord Godolphin and admiral Ruſſel, were reconciled to him, and, being now in his intereſt, were acting for him; that Shrewſbury came into the office of ſecretary of ſtate, by the the operation and consent of King James; and that his grace was in treaty with that Monarch, before he laid down the seals. That the lord Marlborough had promised King James some service, which had inclined his Majesty to promise him his pardon; that the earl of Bath was to betray Plymouth into the hands of the French King; that admiral Russel and the lord Godolphin had likewise undertaken particular services; and that commissary Crawford had sent over to France a list of the forces in England (1).

These informations, at first, startled not only the court, but the King himself, and gained sir John Fenwick some time. But as he did not offer the least appearance of proof or circumstance, to corroborate his assertions, not even that could amount to a presumption, to support his accusation, this pretended discovery could, at most, go no farther, than to raise the King's jealousy of those noblemen: but, with every impartial person, it could be look'd on as no more than a mean prevarication without any grounds.

Tampers with the King's witnesses.

Fenwick, being, in the mean time, sensible that his sham-plot must be, at length, discovered, indeavor'd to get off at least one of the two evidences who had sworn against him before the grand-jury: in this he succeeded with Cardel Goodman, who, in consideration of a large sum of mony, was induced to withdraw himself into France. Indeavours were likewise used with the other evidence, captain Porter, and the large temptation of 1000 l. a year was offer'd him, by means of one Clancey, an Irish peruke-maker: but Porter having already a pension of 300 l. per annum from King William, and thinking it not safe to trust a party he had so lately betray'd, discover'd the whole intreague to the government, whereupon Clancey was sentenced to pay a fine of 500 marks, and to stand three times in the pillory, which was executed accordingly.

The parliament was, at this time, ingaged in a multiplicity of important affairs, as the reader will see below: However, the great men who had been charged by sir John Fenwick, of corresponding with King James, being determined to clear their reputations, and make sir John feel the weight of their resentment, found means to have that matter inquired into by both houses.

Admiral Russel brings this case before the house of commons.

The government finding themselves abused by the clandestine practises of the Jacobites, and having now no remedy left against the prisoner, in the ordinary course of law, the King gave leave to admiral Russel, to acquaint the house of commons with these proceedings, and lay before them the several papers which were given in by sir John Fenwick, in the nature of information against himself and several other persons of quality: this he did, the 6th of November, and desired that the said papers might be read, that he might thereby have the opportunity to justify himself, or if he did not, he was willing to fall under the censure of the house.

Sir John Fenwick examined by the house of commons.

The papers being read, sir John was ordered to be brought to the bar of the house, which being done, the 9th of the same month, and he being interrogated by the speaker, concerning his inclinations to discover the designs and practises of the enemies of the government; he, at first answer'd, he did not know but what he should say might hurt himself, and, therefore, desired he might have some security, that his confession should not rise up against him, in a court of judicature, adding, that he would not willingly offend, either the King or the house. Being ordered to withdraw, several debates arose in the house, and upon his being called in again, he was urged to make what discoveries he could, as the only means to bespeak the favor of the house: after many expostulations and excuses, which served to no end but to prejudice the house against him, he address'd himself to the commons in these words:

WILL'III. AN' 1696.

"When first I spoke to the privy counsellor, "I proposed to him, whether I might have a pardon, without being made an evidence against any "man, and, in that case would serve the King, so "as to tell him, all that I knew. It was upon "honor, what I did to him, and he took the "words in writing from me, and sent them "to the King in Flanders: the King's answer "was, that he made no objection as to my "being an evidence, nor his giving me a pardon: "But that I could expect no pardon, 'till he knew "what I could say." He added, "that, thereupon, he was incouraged to do what he had "done, for his Majesty's service; but the King's "answer being, that he should more fully make "good what he had said, he afterwards explain'd "what he had inform'd that honorable person; and "still it was answered, it was not satisfactory: "that he hoped he should not find this, from this "honorable house, and that they would consider, "he was upon his life; that he knew this house "was good security for it, but 'till he had it, he "was under these circumstances, and he might be "told all was not satisfactory, and so desired the "house to consider of it."

His informations voted scandalous.

The speaker again press'd sir John, to make a discovery; but all his answers were but so many prevarications; insomuch that, at length, the house, to do justice to the loyalty of the injured noblemen, and to clear them intirely, from these false accusations, voted; "that the papers which had been "read, intitled, sir John Fenwick's informations, "accusing several peers of the realm of disloyalty, "were false and scandalous, tending to the subver-"sion of the government, to raise a jealousy be-"tween the King and his subjects, and to stifle the "truth of the controversy."

Bill to attaint him of high treason.

A motion was then made, for leave to bring in a bill, to attaint him of high treason, which, after a warm debate was carried in the affirmative, 179 voices against 61. The bill was accordingly presented to the house three days after, and the question being put, after a long debate of several hours, for a second reading, it was likewise carried in the affirmative, 196 voices against 104. The same day, the house ordered, that sir John Fenwick should have a copy of the bill, and of the order for reading it, eight days after; and that mr. secretary Vernon should then produce the letter written in Kent, by sir John Fenwick. The day before the bill was to be read a second time, sir John presented a petition, praying to be heard by his counsel, against the passing of the said bill; upon which the house ordered, that he should be allowed two counsel at the bar of the house, to make his defense.

(1) The author of the history of King William says, this expedient was suggested to Fenwick, by a person, who tho' he had been a great instrument in the late revolution, yet to gratify a private resentment, advised sir John to set up this counter-plot, by impeaching several of the King's best and heartiest friends, as guilty of conspiring against his Majesty. Vol. 3. p. 206.

Bishop Burnet carries the matter yet farther, and says Fenwick was put upon this artifice to save his life, or at least to gain time, by the earl of Monmouth, formerly known by the name of the lord Mordaunt; who (he adds) was the contriver of it, more out of spleen or revenge against certain persons, whom he thought were more favored than he, than to serve Fenwick. To this end, he drew up certain instructions, which he put into the hands of the duchess of Norfolk, to be convey'd to the prisoner; who finding it accompanied with threats and promises, according to the use he should make of those instructions, he thereupon formed this accusation. History of his own times.

The

Will' III. An' 1696.

The 13th of November, sir John Fenwick was brought to the bar of the house, and was heard by his council, against the bill: the speaker opened the matter, and addressing himself to sir John Fenwick, laid before him the heinousness of the "crime "with which he stood charged, and how destructive "it would have been, if it had succeeded, to the "very being of this kingdom: and therefore, that "he might not go unpunished, if he was guilty, "they had ordered a bill to be brought to "attaint him for high-treason, which had been "once read, and would be now read to him, at the "bar, and then he would hear the evidence against "him, and have liberty to make his defense: "that tho' he could not claim any right thereto, "the house, to shew how ready they were to favor "him, in giving him any reasonable help, did allow "him counsel to assist him: that he was, likewise, "to acquaint those who were his counsel, that the "house did reckon their own prudence would so "guide them, as not to give any just offense to "this house. That they ought not to question the "power of parliament to pass bills of attainder, "when they judge it requisite, of which the com-"mons are more proper judges than any person, "and therefore they did not allow him to debate "that point.

This speech being ended, the clerk of the house of commons read the bill, importing, "that "whereas sir John Fenwick was, upon the oaths "of George Porter and Cardel Goodman, in-"dicted of high-treason, in conspiring to assassinate "his Majesty's sacred person, and incouraging the "French King to invade this kingdom: that sir "John Fenwick having obtained his Majesty's favor "to have his trial delayed, from time to time, "upon his repeated promises of making an in-"genuous and full confession of his knowlege of "any conspiracy against his Majesty's person or "government, he had so far abused his Majesty's "great clemency and indulgence, that instead of "making such confession, he had contrived false and "scandalous papers, as his informations, reflecting "on the fidelity of several noble peers, diverse mem-"bers of the house of commons, and others, only by "hear-say, and contriving thereby to undermine the "government, and create jealousies, between the King "and his subjects, and to stifle the real conspiracy: "and that whereas Cardel Goodman, one of the "witnesses against the said sir John Fenwick, to "prove the said treason, lately, and since the se-"veral times appointed for the trial of the said sir "John Fenwick, at one of which times, the said "sir John Fenwick had been tried, had it not "been for the expectation of the said discoveries "so often promised by him, was withdrawn, so "that the said Cardel Goodman could not be had, "to give evidence upon any trials: be it there-"fore, inacted, that the said sir John Fenwick be "convicted and attainted of high-treason, and "suffer the pains of death, and incur all forfeitures "as a person attainted of high treason."

To give a particular account of the pleadings on both sides, and of the several debates in the house, on this and other subsequent days 'till the bill passed, would carry me too great a length: I shall therefore only give an abridgment of the proceedings during that time. The bill being read, as I said above, the commons went on to examine witnesses, as well to the treasons contained in the indictment of sir John Fenwick, as to the allegations in the bill of attainder: and captain Porter was examined as to the lady Fenwick's practising with him, about his evidence: to the latter sir John's counsel objected, that what a wife said or did could be no evidence against her husband. Goodman's examination, before mr. secretary Vernon, was likewise read against the prisoner: but his counsel insisted that was no evidence. After this, several of the grand jury-men were examined, who found the indictment against the prisoner, concerning the evidence that induced them to find the bill; and this his counsel objected was another extraordinary step. The record of Cooke's conviction was also read against sir John, and some of Cooke's jury were examined, what evidence Goodman gave at Cooke's trial; but this was objected to as illegal. Mr. secretary Vernon then gave evidence of the various artifices sir John had made use of to put off his trial. There were likewise some debates and questions concerning sir John Fenwick's letter.

Will' III. An' 1696.

The bill being read a second time, as ordered, great debates arose about its commitment; as there did likewise five days after, at the third reading of it: I shall only mention some few of the arguments, which were made use of, in these debates, for and against the bill. Debates on the bill.

The arguments against the bill were chiefly, "that the person to be condemned by this bill was "forth coming; had been indicted, and had pleaded, "and was ready to undergo his trial, in the ordi-"nary courts of justice: that the meanest subject "was intitled to a trial by jury: even the regicides "who actually murdered the King, and did not "fly, were admited to a trial in the ordinary court, "of justice, tho' a bill of attainder passed against "the rest: that it would be thought strange for "the same parliament which passed an act re-"quiring two witnesses in high-treason, to pass "another act to put a man to death, without one "legal witness, and without allowing him any trial "at all. That if mr. St. John's position, in the "lord Strafford's case, was admited, that a subse-"quent law might be made to take away a man's "life without any evidence, other than the private "opinion or conscience of every particular law-"maker, then none are safe: that, in the "lord Strafford's case, the proceedings were first "by impeachment: the witnesses had been exa-"mined in the house of peers, and the bill of at-"tainder recited, that it had been fully proved: "but for a bill to begin originally in the house of "commons, and judgment be given there, to de-"prive a man of his life, and all that is valuable, "without the sanction of an oath, was extremely "hard. Reasons against the bill.

"That bishop Burnet, in his history of the re-"formation had observed: that such bills could "not be enough condemned; for that they were a "breach of the most sacred and unalterable rules "of justice. Had the government been in danger "by the prisoner, ordinary rites might indeed "be dispensed with: but this being for an offense "commited a year before, the persons executed, "who were concerned in it, and all the danger "over, there could be no manner of reason for "resorting to their legislative power to punish this "man. The most that could be thought reason-"able, in this case, would be to inact, that "Goodman, the witness's evidence, tho' he was "fled, should be read at his trial. They could "not condemn the prisoner, and put him in a "worse condition, than if Goodman was here; "for then he would have had a trial by a jury, "the benefit of his challenges, the witnesses sworn, "and might have had his exceptions to their testi-"mony, all which he was deprived of here. That "the parliament had power to make such a law "was granted: but they thought it ought not to "be used, but upon extraordinary occasions, when "the offenders were so great, that they could not "otherwise

" otherwiſe be brought to juſtice, or where the " crimes did not fall under the denomination of the " common law, which was not the preſent caſe

" That there was not one precedent for attainting " a perſon who was in cuſtody and forth-com- " ing, but what had been univerſally branded ; " they were rather reproaches to the ill reigns " they were made in, and to be marked out as " rocks for us to avoid, than patterns to be imi- " tated : that tho' it were true, they were not tied " up by the rules in Weſtminſter-hall, yet what " was reaſon and juſtice in Weſtminſter-hall was " ſo every where, and ſo far as their rules were " founded on reaſon and juſtice, they ought to be " purſued : that they had indeed, by a law, pre- " vented people's being executed by an arbitrary " power, and in an unlawful manner, in Weſtmin- " ſter-hall : but if they made this example, they " might be perpetually executed here, and the ſub- " ject would be never the ſafer for the bill of trea- " ſons : that one time or other, every one might " be concerned, and have a proceeding of this " ſort againſt him : we have ſeen parties hang one " another by turns, with great violence. Some, " indeed, ſaid, they did not aim at the priſoner's " blood, but his confeſſion ; and ſo he was, in a " manner, to be racked to death, from one read- " ing of the bill to another ; and poſſibly might " come to be hanged at laſt, not for high-treaſon, " but for not confeſſing it. As to the ſafety of the " government, which was pretended, they did not " ſee how that depended on his life, or that it " would be one penny the worſe, if the bill did not " paſs. The preamble of the bill for attainting the " duke of Monmouth gave a ſubſtantial reaſon for " it ; that he was in arms, and could not be " brought to juſtice ; which implied, that if " he could have been brought to juſtice, they " would not have attainted him : that where the " government was at ſtake, and nothing would " preſerve it, but the breaking thro' the ſettled " forms, there the government did, and always " would break thro' them, whatever rules were " preſcribed : but they did not think ſir John " Fenwick's living or dying was of that conſequence " as this bill of attainder was. As to the allegation " that he protracted his trial, it was natural what " every body attempted, and could not be ſuffici- " ent ground to attaint him. That as to his " being the occaſion of withdrawing the evidence, " it was neither proved, nor ſo much as ſuggeſted " in the bill ; and if it had, it did not demand " ſuch a puniſhment, any more than his having " aſperſed ſome great perſons, as the bill charged : " that it was true, ſome were accuſed ; and it " was hard they ſhould ſit as judges on the perſon " who accuſed them, and indeavor to baffle his " evidence, by craming a bill of attainder down his " throat : that there were other gentlemen in the " houſe, who were counſel for the King, and pro- " ſecutors, and they thought it hard too, that they " ſhould ſit in judgment on the priſoner : that it " was agreed by all, that this power ought not to " be exerciſed, but on extraordinary occaſions : " that high-treaſon, 'tis true, was a great crime ; " but what was there in this caſe to make it differ " ſo much from other high-treaſons, that they muſt " proceed in this extraordinary manner ? he had " aſperſed great men ; he had prevaricated with " the government, and protracted his trial, 'till a " witneſs was withdrawn : but if theſe reaſons were " ſufficient to induce them, to have recourſe to a " bill of attainder, then, whenever there ſhould " be but one witneſs for the future, by virtue of " this precedent, the legiſlature muſt interpoſe, " and a bill of attainder be brought in ; and then " to what purpoſe was the care and wiſdom of " their anceſtors, and of themſelves, who had provided, that where the crime was ſo great, and attended with ſo great puniſhment, there ſhould be two witneſſes ?

Will' III. An' 1696.

" That in this precedent, it would appear, by " their journals, that they had cauſed the depoſi- " tion of a perſon to be read, who was abſent, " taken before a juſtice of peace, when the party " accuſed had no opportunity to interrogate him ; " and that they had heard a witneſs, as to what " was ſwore in the trial of another man ; and this " appeared to be to ſupply the defect of a witneſs " viva voce. That it was not becauſe it was diſa- " greeable to the rules in Weſtminſter-hall, that " ſuch a teſtimony was not admited ; but the rule " was founded on juſtice and common right ; that " no evidence ſhould be brought againſt a man, " that was given in a cauſe, where he was not a " party, when the oath was made, and he had " no opportunity to croſs-examine the witneſs. " That, according to the opinion of their prede- " ceſſors, ſuch proceedings as theſe were contrary " to the fundamental articles of juſtice and right ; " which parliaments, as well as other courts, ought " to be governed by ; that moſt of the attainders, " which had been produced as precedents for them, " had been reverſed, and that becauſe the perſons " condemned had not had the due benefit of the law, " and if that was a good reaſon for reverſing " ſuch attainders, it was alſo a good reaſon why " they ſhould not proceed by attainder.

" That to tell them the government was in dan- " ger, and that the ſtate of England and Europe, " depended on this bill, was certainly offered " rather to amuſe than convince them. It was im- " poſſible the government could be in danger, " from one they had in their power, and might " reſtrain him of his liberty for life, and whoſe " eſtate and intereſt were ſo inconſiderable. It was " ſtrange that the government could not ſupport " itſelf, without taking away the life of ſuch a " one, contrary to the rules of law.

Reaſons for the bill.

On the other hand, thoſe who argued for the bill, alleged, " that the parliament would never " take things out of the ordinary courts of juſtice, " or attaint a perſon of treaſon, unleſs in extra- " ordinary caſes : but here it appeared, they had " been deprived of the evidence that was neceſſary, " in the ordinary courſe of proceedings ; and in ſuch " caſes, it was uſual for the parliament to interpoſe : " and as to that objection, that what had been " offered was not legal evidence, the parliament " might make uſe of ſuch informations, as would " give them any light into the matter, and were not " tied down to the rules of Weſtminſter-hall ; " they were judges of their own methods, and " how far ſir John Fenwick was concerned upon the " circumſtances before them. That this power, " had indeed been ſeldom exerted, but where the " party was withdrawn from juſtice, and could not " be come at in the ordinary courſe ; but this was a " parallel caſe ; they could not come at juſtice in the " ordinary courſe, their witneſs having been tamper- " ed with, and withdrawn ; and, therefore, by their " own arguments, it was proper to be brought before " the parliament : that they were inveſted with a " diſcretionary power, to do whatever they appre- " hended to be for the good of the kingdom ; and " this was a fit occaſion to exert that authority. " That indeed this power was like thunder in the " hands of providence, and was not to be uſed " but upon extraordinary occaſions, and then it " ought not to fail : for men would trifle with and " deſpiſe that power, which was not able effectu- " ally to exert itſelf : that as ſome gentlemen were " afraid of making an ill precedent, it was for " that reaſon too, that they were for the bill : for, " as

Will' III. An' 1696.

" as the bill ſtood, he was but a bungling poli" tician, who could not ruin the government, and
" yet not come within the bill of treaſon, to be " hanged for it; and therefore for the keeping
" miniſters of ſtate in awe, and that the parlia" ment might have it in their power to puniſh future
" offenders as they thought fit, as well as the pri-
" ſoner, they were for the bill.

" That it had been ſaid, this was a matter of
" no great conſequence, becauſe it concerned ſir
" John Fenwick's life; he was not thought to be
" ſo conſiderable, as, by his eſcape, to bring the " public into any danger: but it was a very juſt
" obſervation, that if a plot was diſcovered, and
" not thoroughly proſecuted, it would ſtrengthen
" and grow upon them, and ten to one, if it did not " ſubvert the government: that no one could think
" that ſir William Perkins and ſir John Friend,
" and the reſt who were diſcovered, were the only
" perſons concerned in this conſpiracy, they believed
" there muſt be much greater men concerned in it:
" that when they ſaw ſuch a ſtruggle to get people
" outof goal, and ſend them out of the way, they " could not ſuppoſe, but that there was ſomething
" extraordinary ſtill to be done, and they would not " have men think to ſecure themſelves by brib-
" ing witneſſes. It was notorious what parties
" there were for King James; perſons were plot-
" ing in every part of the kingdom, and an open
" invaſion threatned: and if this was not time to " exert their extraordinary power, when would it
" be a proper time?

" Others urged, if it were the law of God and " nature, that no man ſhould be put to death with" out two witneſſes, they wondered all Chriſtian
" nations were not governed by that law. But,
" indeed no two nations agreed in their manner of " proof, and we differed from all other nations,
" in producing the witneſſes, face to face, and re-
" quiring two witneſſes, in caſes of treaſon:
" that we ourſelves did not require the ſame proof
" in ſome caſes as we did in others; one witneſs was
" ſufficient in felony; and before the ſtatute of Ed" ward VI, even in treaſon, that evidence was ſuffi-
" cient which was ſufficient to incline the jury to give
" verdict: that if this precedent had been made
" in the caſe of an innocent perſon, or even where
" the fact was doubtful, by a prevailing party, it
" had been an ill precedent; but it being made for " a man who was notoriouſly guilty, and one who " deſerved this extraordinary reſentment of the " nation, and who had been brought to juſtice in
" the ordinary manner, if he had not eluded and " made it impracticable; they thought, if it ſhould
" appear that the nation would not be put off ſo,
" but made an example of him, poſterity would
" applaud and thank them for it: that they did
" not however condemn him, becauſe he had pro-
" tracted his trial, but becauſe he had been guilty
" of high-treaſon, the worſt of treaſon, which " would have been proved, in the ordinary courſe
" of proceedings, if he had not pretended to make " diſcoveries, and by that means, put off his " trial 'till a witneſs was gone; and when he found
" himſelf out of the ordinary reach of juſtice, ſet
" the juſtice of his country in defiance: altho' theſe
" were not ſufficient reaſons why he ſhould die, yet
" they were ſufficient to juſtify their proceed-
" ing in this manner againſt him: that tho'
" ſir John Fenwick was ſo inconſiderable, that " he could not indanger the government, it was " plain he was to be general, and knew a great
" many officers: that he had not made that " atonement to his injured country (by an ingenuous
" confeſſion) as he ought to have done; and un-
" leſs they proceeded ſteadily againſt him, they
" ſhould have none of thoſe diſcoveries: not that " they would hang up a man becauſe he would not
" confeſs; but that he, having been guilty of the " worſt treaſons, and aggravated his crime in that " manner, deſerved to die, unleſs he would merit
" his life, by a diſcovery of what he knew.

And in the upper houſe.

The proteſt of ſome lords.

These debates being at an end, and the queſtion put, " that this bill do paſs," it was carried in the affirmative, 189 againſt 156. The bill was thereupon ſent up to the houſe of lords for their concurrence, where, likewiſe, it was attended with great debates, and at length was carried by a majority of ſeven voices only: there being ſixty-eight againſt ſixty-one. The lords who were againſt it entered their proteſts, for the following reaſons:

1. " Becauſe bills of attainder againſt perſons in
" priſon, and who therefore are liable to be tried
" by common law, are of dangerous conſequence
" to the lives of the ſubjects, and may tend to the " ſubverſion of the laws of the kingdom.

2. " Becauſe the evidence of grand jury-men,
" of what was ſworn before them againſt ſir John
" Fenwick, as alſo the evidence of the petty
" jury-men, in another cauſe, was admited here;
" both which are againſt the rules of law; beſide
" that, they diſagreed in their teſtimony.

3. " Becauſe the information of Goodman in " writing was received, which law was not to be
" admited; and the priſoner, for want of his ap" pearing face to face (as is by law required) could " not have the advantage of croſs-examining him;
" and it did not appear by evidence, that ſir John
" Fenwick, or any other perſon imployed by him,
" had any way perſuaded Goodman to withdraw
" himſelf: and it would be of very dangerous
" conſequence, that any perſon ſo accuſed ſhould
" be condemned; for, by this means, a witneſs
" who ſhould be found inſufficient to convict a
" man, ſhould have more power to hurt a man by " his abſenſe, than if he were produced viva voce
" againſt him.

4. " Becauſe if Goodman had appeared againſt
" him, he was infamous in the whole courſe of his " life, and could not be a good witneſs, eſpecially
" in caſes of blood.

5. " Becauſe, in this caſe, there was but one " evidence, viz. Porter, and he a very doubtful one.

6. " Becauſe ſir John Fenwick was ſo inconſider-
" able a man, as to indangering the peace of the " government, that there was no neceſſity of proceed-
" ing againſt him in ſo extraordinary a manner."

The act has the royal aſſent.

Sir John Fenwick beheaded.

A paper given by him to the ſheriffs.

The 11th of January the King gave the royal aſſent to this " act of attainder againſt ſir John
" Fenwick" (1); and his puniſhment being afterwards commuted from hanging to beheading, he was executed, the 28th of the ſame month, on Tower-hill, where he delivered a paper to the ſheriffs importing:

" That he died in the communion of the church
" of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, wherein he " was brought up, and which he had ever profeſſed;
" tho' he confeſſed he had been an unworthy mem-
" ber of it, in not living up to the ſtrict and ex" cellent rules thereof; that his religion taught
" him his loyalty, which he bleſſed God was un-
" tainted; and he had ever indeavored, in the " ſtation wherein he had been placed, to the utmoſt
" of his power, to ſupport the crown of England,

(1) His Majeſty gave, at the ſame time, the royal aſſent, to another act, " for the attainder of ſuch of the perſons concerned
" in the late conſpiracy, to aſſaſſinate his Majeſty's Royal perſon, who were fled from juſtice, unleſs they rendered themſelves to
" juſtice; and for continuing ſeveral others of the ſaid conſpirators in cuſtody.

WILL' III. AN' 1696.

" in the true and lineal courſe of deſcent, without " interruption: that as for what he was now to die, " he called GOD to witneſs, he went not to that " meeting in Leadenhall-ſtreet, with any ſuch in- " tent as to invite King James, by force, to invade " this nation: nor was he himſelf provided with " either horſe or arms, or ingaged for any number " of men, or gave particular conſent for any ſuch " invaſion, as was moſt falſly ſworn againſt him. " He alſo declared, in the preſenſe of God, that " he knew nothing of King James's coming to " Calais, nor of any invaſion intended from thence, " 'till it was publicly known, and that the only " notion he had, that ſomething might be attempt- " ed, was from the Toulon-fleet coming to Breſt. " That he received the knowlege of what was con- " tained in thoſe papers that he gave to a great " man, who came to him in the Tower, both from " letters and meſſages, which came from France; " and that the great man told him, when he read " them to him, that the Prince of Orange had " been acquainted with moſt of theſe things before. " That he might have expected mercy from that " Prince, becauſe he was inſtrumental in ſaving " his life: for when, about April 1695, an at- " tempt formed againſt him came to his knowlege, " he did, partly by diſuaſſions, and partly by delays, " prevent that deſign, which he ſuppoſed was the " reaſon, that the laſt villanous project was con- " cealed from him. That if there were any perſons " whom he had injured, in word or deed, he hear- " tily prayed their pardon, and begged of GOD to " pardon thoſe who had injured him, particularly " thoſe who had zealouſly ſought his life, and " brought the guilt of his innocent blood on this " nation, no treaſon being proved upon him. That " he returned his moſt hearty thanks to thoſe noble " and worthy perſons, who gave him their aſſiſtance " in oppoſing this bill of attainder, without which " it was impoſſible he could have fallen under the ſen- " tenſe of death; and he prayed GOD to bleſs them " and their poſterity; tho' he was fully ſatisfied, they " pleaded their cauſe, while they defended his. In " the concluſion, he prayed GOD to bleſs his true and " lawful ſovereign, King James, the Queen and " Prince of Wales, and reſtore him, and his poſterity, " to this throne again, for the peace and proſperity " of this nation, which could not poſſibly proſper, 'till " the government was ſettled upon a right foot (1).

Ill ſtate of the coin farther remedied.

I return now to the other affairs of parliament: the King had recommended, from the throne, three important affairs to the conſideration of parliament, viz. " A farther remedy of the ill ſtate of " the coin; the reſtoring of the public credit, " and the providing a ſupply for the next year's ſer- " vice." In order to effect the two firſt, the commons reſolved: " that they would not alter the " ſtandard of gold or ſilver, in fineneſs, weight or " denomination, and that they would make good " all parliamentary funds, ſince his Majeſty's ac- " ceſſion to the throne, that had been made credits " for loans from the ſubject:" and as the circulation of guineas was obſtructed, the 22d of October, a bill was ordered to be brought in, " for the giving " leave to import guineas, and to coin gold at the " mint." The 28th, two other bills were likewiſe ordered to be prepared, one " for the farther reme- " dying the ill ſtate of the coin, and the other " for incouraging the bringing plate into the mints to be coined." The firſt two bills received the royal aſ- ſent, the 3d of December, at which time his Ma- jeſty, likewiſe, confirmed " an act, to explain that " part of the act paſſed the laſt ſeſſion of parlia- " ment (for laying ſeveral duties on low wines, and " ſpirits of the firſt extraction, and for preventing " the frauds and abuſes of brewers, diſtillers, and " other perſons chargeable with the duties of exciſe) " which relates to the payment of tallies, and the " intereſt thereof.

Acts paſſed.

A ſupply granted.

The commons having taken into conſideration the ſtate of the war for the year 1697, as well with regard to the navy as the land-forces; they granted, on the 4th of November, " 2,372,197 l. " for the maintenance of 40,000 ſeamen, and of the " two marine regiments; and for the ordinary of " the navy, and the charge of the regiſtry of ſea- " men: and the ſum of 2,507,882 l. for the main- " tenance of 87,440 men, to imployed in Eng- " land, and beyond the ſeas, for the extraordi- " nary ſervice of the office of ordnance, the pay " of the general officers, and the charge of the " tranſports, hoſpitals, and other contingencies of " the war." Beſide theſe large ſums, they voted " farther, on the 23d of December, " 125,000 l. " for making good the deficiency, in re-coining " hammered mony, and to be given, for bringing " plate into the mints, to be coined."

Ways and Means.

In order to raiſe theſe great ſums, the commons had recourſe, on the 22d of December, to a general capitation or poll-tax, from which none were ex- empt but thoſe who received alms; and, at the ſame time, they laid three ſhillings in the pound upon land. Towards levying the 125,000 l. above- mentioned, they reſolved, on the 9th of January, to lay a duty of ſix-pence per ounce, upon all plate that ſhould not be brought in to be coined, and twenty per cent, upon all paper, paſt-board, parch- ment and vellom imported; as alſo 17 l. 10 s. upon the ſame goods made in this kingdom, or in ſtock, for the term of two years.

Loſs of public credit.

The loſs of public credit was, however, the greateſt difficulty this parliament had to ſtrugle with (2); and ſo great it was, that the kingdom was thereby reduced to a diſtreſs'd condition. Mony was, indeed, coin'd with all poſſible expedition; but thoſe who received it from the Mint, being generally monied men, would not part with it, with- out unreaſonable advantages; inſomuch that govern- ment-tallies and debentures were at forty, fifty, and ſixty per cent. diſcount, and even bank-bills at above twenty per cent. The ſellers, as well of the one as the other, being very numerous, they were offer'd, and, in a manner, cried about the exchange, which, while ſome men ſuffer'd egre- gioufly, gave an opportunity to others to raiſe vaſt fortunes, by buying them up (3). The enemies of Great diſtreſs of the nation.

(1) Great interceſſion was made to obtain the King's pardon. His lady, who had been the chief inſtrument to ſeduce him into the unhappy meaſures which coſt him his life, continued her ſupplications to the King and miniſtry to the very day of his cataſtrophe, and her petitions were backed by numbers of the nobility. His Majeſty was once inclined to ſhew him mercy, at the preſſing inſtances of his lady, when a certain lord interpoſing ſaid, " Sir, this lady is to be pitied, but if the plot had ſuc- " ceeded, the nation would have been more ſo. England would not only have ſhed tears as ſhe does: but would have ſeen " ſtreams of blood flowing, by the maſſacre of her moſt valuable citizens." And this conſideration proved of ſuch weight as to overbalance his Majeſty's clemency.

(2) The occaſion of this was, on one hand, the deficiency of parliamentary ſecurities, eſpecially the land-bank, which proved wholly abortive, and inſtead of above two million and a half, with which it was charged, did not produce one penny: and on the other hand the recoining of the ſilver.

(3) This it is generally believed, gave the firſt riſe to that infamous practiſe of ſtock-jobing (which continued to be the bane of our trade, till very lately the wiſdom of parliament thought fit, in a great meaſure, to put a ſtop to it) many buying who had no mony to purchaſe, and as many ſelling what they were never poſſeſs'd of. Stories were fram'd, and feign'd intelligences divulged, to raiſe or ſink this kind of ſtock, in order to purchaſe or ſell to an advantage.

the

the nation had now, indeed, the ſatisfaction of ſeing it ſufficiently diſtreſs'd, it being hardly poſſible, that the public affairs could be more imbaraſs'd, than they were at this juncture: but ſuch was the diligence of parliament, which was, in a more particular manner, animated by the wiſdom, ſagacity and eloquence of the chancellor of the exchequer; that what by the eſtabliſhing new duties, and continuing others which were near expiring, funds were created for the diſcharge of the government's debts, in a courſe of time: and as the Bank of England had been found of great advantage to the miniſtry, in order to raiſe the credit of it, a reſolution was taken, to increaſe their capital ſtock another million, by new ſubſcriptions, and to continue their term to the year 1710. And tho' theſe new ſubſcriptions were allowed to be made in tallies and bank-notes; yet as there were now good funds ſettled for paying them off, the monied men, who could bear ſtock, run into it, by which means, bank-bills and notes, in a ſhort time, roſe to par again: but nothing was more effectual to ſupply the want of caſh, at this time, than the parliament's authoriſing the treaſury to iſſue out near three millions of exchequer-notes, which being allowed in taxes, and circulated by the Bank, for a moderate premium, redreſs'd, in a great meaſure, this grievance, and contributed to reſtore things to their ancient ſtate.

Remedied by the wiſdom of parliament.

I ſhould have mention'd before, that towards the begining of this ſeſſion, the commons, in a grand committee, having conſidered the ſtate of the nation, and taken notice of the late miſcarriages of the fleet, ordered, the fourth of November, that ſir George Rooke ſhould attend the houſe, to give an account why the French Toulon ſquadron was not intercepted in going into Breſt? The admiral attended accordingly, and afterwards produced copies both of his journal, and of the orders he had received from the admiralty; which being examined, it was ordered, the 23d of November, that ſir Cloudeſly Shovel ſhould lay before the houſe copies of all ſuch orders as he received, in order to the joining ſir George Rooke. Four days after, ſir Robert Rich, from the commiſſioners of the admiralty, preſented to the houſe of commons, copies of all orders ſent both to ſir George and ſir Cloudeſly, in relation to the fleet, in general, between the firſt day of January 1696, and the time the French got into Breſt; as alſo an account of what intelligences they received of the Toulon ſquadron's ſetting out, and their motions towards Breſt. Much time was ſpent, in both houſes, about this affair; but after all, it did not appear, that either of thoſe two admirals had fail'd in their duty.

Miſcarriages of the fleet inquired into.

An' 1697. Farther ways and means.

The 9th of February 1697, the commons computed the aids granted to his Majeſty, both by the capitation act and other ſubſidies, at three millions, which falling ſhort of the mony to be raiſed for the ſervice of the year 1697, and for making good the deficient funds, they reſolved, on the 17th, "that "for raiſing the ſum of 840,000 l. charged upon "the duties laid upon ſalt, and upon coals and "culm, and tonage of ſhips, taken away the laſt "ſeſſion of parliament, for which the proviſion then "made had proved defective, a farther duty, of "fifteen per cent, be laid upon all leather for three "years.

Meſſage concerning the civil liſt.

The 18th, the commons received a meſſage from the King, by mr. ſecretary Trumball, importing: "that his Majeſty finding himſelf under very great "difficulties, for want of mony to ſupply the occaſions of the civil liſt, he had thought neceſſary "to remind the houſe, of that part of his ſpeech, "which related to that head, deſiring that ſpeedy "care might be taken to make effectual proviſion "for it." The commons, thereupon, took his Majeſty's ſpeech again into conſideration; and, on the 26th, reſolved, "that a ſupply of 515,000 l. be "granted to his Majeſty, for the ſupport of the "civil liſt; and, the next day, that the ſaid ſum "be raiſed by laying a duty of ſix-pence per buſhel "upon malt, for three years and a quarter." And becauſe the aforementioned impoſitions did not fully anſwer the ſums already voted, the commons reſolved, on the 3d of March; "that towards the "ſupply granted for carrying on the war, and for "the ſupport of the civil liſt, over and above the "duties already payable, a farther duty be laid "upon all cyder, perry, liquors call'd ſweets, mum, "wine, and upon all goods made of, or mix'd with "wool, ſilk or hair." The 8th, the houſe likewiſe reſolved; "that for making good the defi-"ciency of the proviſion for payment of the intereſt of the tranſport debt, for the reducing of "Ireland, a duty of 4 l. per annum be laid upon "all hawkers and pedlars for one year; and that "every hawker and pedlar, travelling with a "horſe, aſs or mule, ſhould pay 4 l. per annum, "more, for each horſe, aſs, or mule he ſhould ſo "travel with."

Will' III. An' 1697. The civil liſt provided for.

Bills paſs'd.

The ſame day, the King went to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent to "Firſt, an act "for granting to his Majeſty ſeveral duties upon "paper, vellom and parchment; to incourage the "bringing plate and hammer'd mony into the "Mint, to be coined. Second, An act for con-"tinuing certain additional impoſitions upon ſeveral "goods and merchandizes. Third, An act to inable "the returns of juries as formerly, until the firſt "day of November 1697. Fourth, An act for "the preventing frivolous and vexatious ſuits. "Fifth, An act to reſtore the markets at Black-"well-hall to the clothiers, and for regulating the "factors there. Sixth, An act to inable James, "duke of Ormond, to raiſe mony by ſale of "woods, and making leaſes for lives renewable "for ever, for payment of debts; and for incourag-"ing Engliſh plantations in Ireland; and for Charles, "lord Preſton, earl of Arran, in the kingdom of "Ireland, to make leaſes of his eſtate in the "ſaid kingdom;" and to ſeveral other private bills.

Farther ways and means.

The commons having conſider'd of ways and means to raiſe the 840,000 l. abovemention'd, reſolved, the 17th of March, "that the duties upon "leather be appropriated for the ſatisfaction of what "remained unpaid of the principal and intereſt "of the 560,000 l. advanced on the duties upon "coal and culm, taken away the laſt ſeſſion, that "for raiſing the remaining ſum of 280,000 l. the "times be inlarged for perſons to come in, and "purchaſe the annuities mentioned in a former "act. And that in caſe the ſaid ſum of 280,000l. "and intereſt due thereupon, was not raiſed there-"by, that it would be made good out of the "firſt aids, to be granted the next ſeſſion of par-"liament."

Acts paſs'd:

The firſt of April, the King gave the royal aſſent, Firſt, to "an act for the compleating, build-"ing and adorning the cathedral of St. Paul's, "London, and for repairing the collegiate church "of St. Peter's Weſtminſter. Second, an act for "making good the deficiences of ſeveral funds, and "for inlarging the capital ſtock of the Bank of "England. Third, an act for repealing a "clauſe in a former act, relating to party guiles, "and for preventing frauds of brewers, and others "chargeable with the duties of exciſe. Fourth, an "act for inlarging common highways. Fifth, an "act for continuing ſeveral former acts, for puniſh-"ing mutineers in the army, &c. Sixth, an act "for the relief of creditors, by making compo-"ſitions with their debtors, in caſe two thirds in "number and value do agree; and Seventh, an act

" act for paving and regulating the Hay-market, " within the liberty of Weſtminſter.

Ways and means re-ſumed.

The third of April, the queſtion was put, whether the bill for laying a farther duty upon wines ſhould be ingroſs'd, which paſs'd in the negative. The 7th, the commons reſolved; " that for raiſing " the ſum of 600,000l. towards the ſupply gran- " ted to his Majeſty, for the proſecution of the " war, inſtead of the duties upon wines, the duty " of the old ſubſidy of tonage and poundage upon " goods imported (dying wares excepted) accord- " ing to the book of rates ſettled in the year " 1660, be doubled, for the term of two years " and three quarters; and that an additional aid, of " one ſhilling per pound, be laid upon all lands, for " one year, as an equivalent of the duty of ten per cent " laid upon the manufactures made of, or mix'd " with wool, ſilk or hair."

More acts paſs'd.

The 16th the King came again to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent; Firſt, " to an act " for laying a duty upon leather, for the term of " three years. Second, an act for granting to the " King certain duties, on malt, mum, ſweets, " cyder, and perry. Third, an act for licenſing " hawkers and pedlars, for a farther proviſion for " payment of the tranſport-debt, for the reducing " of Ireland. Fourth, an act for granting to his " Majeſty a farther ſubſidy of tonage and poun- " dage upon merchandizes imported; and an ad- " ditional land-tax. Fifth, an act for leſſening " the duties upon tin and pewter exported, and " granting an equivalent for the ſame, by a duty " upon drugs. Sixth, an act to make perpetual " and more effectual an act to prevent delays at the " quarter-ſeſſions of the peace. Seventh, an act " to inforce the act for the increaſe and incourage- " ment of ſeamen. Eighth, an act for raiſing " the militia for the year 1697. Ninth, an act " for explaining and inforcing the act for paving " the ſtreets of London and Weſtminſter. Tenth, " an act for the farther incouragement of the manu- " facture of luſtrings and alamodes; and for pre- " venting the importation of the ſame. Eleventh, " an act for the repair of the piers of Burlington, " in the county of York. Twelfth, an act for " the better obſervation of the courſe anciently " uſed in the receit of the Exchequer. Thirteenth, " an act for the eaſier obtaining partition of land " in coparcenary, &c. Fourteenth, an act for ſup- " plying ſome defects in the laws, for the relief of " the poor. Fifteenth, an act to reſtrain the num- " ber and ill practiſes of brokers and ſtockjobers. " Sixteenth, an act for the better preventing the " counterfeiting the current coin of this kingdom; " and, Seventeenth, an act for the more effectual " relief of creditors, in caſes of eſcapes, and for " preventing abuſes in priſons, and pretended pri- " vileg'd places." After which, his Majeſty told both houſes:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

" That he was now to return them his hearty " thanks for what they had done this ſeſſion, which " had been carried on with great prudence, temper " and affection: that at the opening of the ſeſſion, " he told them, how ſenſible he was of the difficul- " ties to be ſtruggled with, which were of ſuch a " nature, that he would freely own, the hopes he " had of overcoming them were founded only on " the wiſdom and zeal of ſo good a parliament. " That expectation (continued his Majeſty) has " been fully anſwer'd: you enter'd upon the buſineſs " with ſo much chearfulneſs, proceeded ſo unani- " mouſly, and have, at laſt, brought things to " ſuch a concluſion, that we may hope to carry on " the war with ſucceſs, in caſe our enemies do not " think it their intereſt to agree to an honorable " peace; and ſo effectual a proviſion being made " for ſupplying the deficiencies of the funds (which " is the beſt foundation for the re-eſtabliſhing of " credit) I doubt not, but in a ſhort time, it will " have a very happy effect, to the univerſal eaſe " and ſatisfaction of my people." In the concluſion, he acquainted them; " that the circumſtances " of affairs making it neceſſary for him to be out " of the kingdom for ſome time, he ſhould take " care to leave the adminiſtration of the govern- " ment, during his abſenſe, in the hands of ſuch " perſons as he could depend upon. And that " he had nothing more to aſk of them, but that " they would carry down the ſame diſpoſition, into " their ſeveral countries, which they had expreſſed " in all the proceedings of that ſeſſion.

This ſpeech being ended, the lord-keeper declared his Majeſty's pleaſure, that this preſent parliament ſhould be prorogued to the 13th of May next (1).

Plenipotentiaries named.

I return now to other domeſtic affairs, which happen'd during the latter part of this ſeſſion of parliament. Towards the concluſion of the foregoing year, the King made choice of the earl of of Pembroke, lord-privy ſeal, the lord viſcount Villiers, and ſir Joſeph Williamſon, to be his plenipotentiaries for the treaty of a general peace.

Other domeſtic occurrences.

The 6th of February, his Majeſty conſtituted the lord Galway, one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, and John Methwen, eſq; lord-chancelor of that kingdom, in the room of ſir Charles Porter, lately deceaſed, who held both thoſe offices during his life.

The 12th, the earl of Ayleſbury, who had been commited ſome months before to the Tower, upon the ſame evidence by which ſir John Fenwick loſt his head, was brought to the court of King's-bench, by a habeas-corpus, and was there admited to bail: but the lord Montgomery, who was likewiſe brought up by a habeas-corpus, was remanded to Newgate.

The 17th, the earl of Portland was created a knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, and was inſtall'd the 25th of the inſuing month at Windſor, with great pomp and ſplendor.

The 29th of February died John lord Berkley, baron of Stratton, who had ſignalized his valor, conduct and zeal for the preſent government, in ſeveral enterprizes in the channel: and, upon his death, his regiment of marines was beſtowed on ſir Cloudeſly Shovel.

The 11th of April, ſir Thomas Mompeſſon, ſir Charles Cotterel, jun. and James Tyrril, eſq; were appointed commiſſioners for executing the office of lord privy-ſeal, during the abſenſe of the earl of Pembroke; and, the 14th, the earl of Mancheſter, captain of the yeomen of the guard, was named his Majeſty's embaſſador extraordinary to the ſtate of Venice. Sir James Ruſhout was appointed, at the ſame time, embaſſador to the Ottoman port, and Lambert Blackwell, eſq; (who was ſoon after

The 22d, his Majeſty beſtowed the title of lord chancelor of England, upon ſir John Sommers: and, the ſame day, appointed the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord chancelor, the earl of Pembroke, lord privy-ſeal, the dukes of Devonſhire and Shrewſbury, the earls of Sunderland and Romney, and Edward Ruſſel, eſq; firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, lords-juſtices of England during his abſenſe. The 24th, the King left Kenſington, and having embark'd at Margate, the 26th, landed ſafely, the next day, in Holland; where we ſhall leave his Majeſty for a while.

The King goes for Holland.

A few days after his Majeſty's departure, it was publicly declared, that the lord-chancelor was created lord Sommers, baron of Everſham, in the county of Worceſter; Edward Ruſſel, eſq; baron of Shingey, viſcount Barfleur, in Normandy, and earl of Orford, in the county of Suffolk: Thomas lord Coventry, viſcount Deerhurſt, and earl of Coventry; and the viſcount Galway, earl of Galway, in the kingdom of Ireland. That the marquis of Wincheſter, the earl of Galway, and the lord viſcount Villiers were appointed lords juſtices of Ireland; that Arnold van Keppell was created earl of Albermarle, viſcount Bury, and baron of Aſhford in Kent. That the earl of Stamford was made chancelor of the duchy and county-palatine of Lancaſter; that the office of chief-juſtice in Eyre, on this ſide Trent, was granted to the lord Wharton, who was, likewiſe, appointed lord-lieutenant of the county of Oxon; and that the government of Barbadoes, was beſtowed on Ralph Grey, eſq;

Captain Vaughan executed.

During the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, captain Thomas Vaughan, commander of a ſhip call'd the Royal Clancarty, was tried and convicted of high-treaſon, for that being a ſubject of King William's, he had accepted of a commiſſion from the French King, and cruiſed upon the ſubjects of England, with an intent to take and ſpoil them of their goods, upon the high ſeas, and he was executed as a traytor accordingly.

The treaty of Ryſwick was the grand tranſaction of this year, but before I proceed to give an account of that, and other affairs of the continent, I ſhall give a brief narration of the affairs of Ireland.

Affairs of Ireland.

In Ireland, the parliament met, the 27th of July, purſuant to their laſt adjournment, and the lords-juſtices made a ſpeech to both houſes; in anſwer to which, the houſe of commons having unanimouſly voted an addreſs of thanks, it was preſented the 30th. Theſe mutual aſſurances of truſt and confidence being paſs'd, the commons examined the account of the debt due on the civil and military liſts; and, on the 11th of Auguſt, unanimouſly reſolved to grant his Majeſty the ſum of 150,000 l. for the clearing of that debt, to the 30th of June incluſive. About the ſame time, the parliament, likewiſe, paſs'd a bill tranſmited out of England, "for confirming "ſeveral out-lawries and attainders, and for veſt-"ing in his Majeſty the eſtates of thoſe who were "dead in rebellion there, or in foreign parts." The commons, ſoon after, preſented a petition in favor of the Proteſtants, to which the lords-juſtices gave a favorable anſwer.

The 8th of September, the commons ordered a bill to be prepared, "for the incouragement of "Proteſtant ſtrangers to ſettle in that kingdom"; and voted an addreſs to the lords-juſtices in their "behalf. They made, at the ſame time, "an act "for baniſhing all Papiſts exerciſing any eccleſi-"aſtical juriſdiction, and all regulars of the Popiſh "clergy, out of that kingdom;" which, together with "an act, for the confirmation of the "articles made at the ſurrender of the city of Li-"merick;" and another, "to prevent Proteſtants "inter-marrying with Papiſts, received the royal "aſſent, on the 27th of the ſame month.

Will' III. An' 1697.

Both houſes were then adjourned to the 20th of October, and afterwards to the begining of November. The 19th of that month, the lords-juſtices gave the royal aſſent to "an act for continuing an "additional duty on tobacco, beer, ale, and other "liquors, and on ſeveral merchandizes, to the "25th of December 1702. An act to hinder the "reverſal of ſeveral outlawries, and to prevent the "return of ſubjects of that kingdom, that had "gone into the dominions of the French King, in "Europe, and an act for taking away the benefit "of the clergy, in ſome caſes." The 24th, the lords-juſtices ſent a meſſage to the commons, to haſten their proceedings, which had ſo good effect, that on the 4th of December, their excellencies paſſed, 1. "An act to raiſe mony, by way of a poll. "2. An act for the better execution of an act for "the better ſuppreſſing of tories and rapperies, &c. "3. An act to prevent frivolous and vexatious "law-ſuits. 4. An act to prevent frauds and clan-"deſtine mortgages. 5. An act for the more in-"tire obtaining partition of lands in copercenary, "&c. 6. An act for the more eaſy ſecuring and "recovering of ſmall debts;" and ſome others of leſs importance.

Treaty of Ryſwick.

I come now to the treaty for a general peace; and here the firſt difficulty that aroſe, was about the place for the congreſs. Mentz or Francfort were propoſed by the Emperor: but the Dutch, with moſt of their allies, were for ſome place in Holland. After ſeveral debates on this head, towards the middle of January, monſ. Cailliere moved, by his maſters orders, that the plenipotentiaries of the allies ſhould reſide at the Hague, and thoſe of France at Delft, and that the conferences ſhould be held at Ryſwick, a palace belonging to K. William, which was ſituate at an equal diſtance, between theſe two places. This motion was approved of by the confederates, and it being ſettled accordingly, after ſeveral debates, the preliminaries were likewiſe concluded and ſigned, the 10th of February, and were as follow:

The prelimi-naries.

1. "That the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nime-"guen ſhould be the baſis of this, to be negoci-"ated at Ryſwick.

2. "That Straſburg ſhould be reſtored to the "Empire, in the ſame condition the French took it;

3. "And Luxemburg to the Spaniards, in its "preſent condition (1).

4. "That Mons and Charleroy ſhould be ſur-"rendered as they were.

5. "That all places taken by the French in Ca-"talonia, ſince the peace of Nimeguen, ſhould be "reſtored in the ſame manner.

6. "That Dinant, both city and caſtle, ſhould "be given up to the biſhop of Liege, as they were "when taken.

7. "That all re-unions ſince the treaty of "Nimeguen ſhould be made void.

"8. That Lorrain ſhould be reſtored, accord-"ing to the conditions of the treaty (2).

(1) For theſe two places, however, the French offered the allies an equivalent.

(2) It was here farther agreed, that in caſe the condition made in reſpect to that country ſhould not pleaſe, that article ſhould be refered to the general treaty, and that it ſhould be the firſt point debated in the negociation. Here it was likewiſe farther agreed, more particularly, that upon concluſion of the peace, the King of France ſhould acknowlege the Prince of Orange, as King of Great Britain, without any manner of difficulty, reſtriction, condition, or reſerve; but as for other Princes, whether they were in the confederacy or not, their pretenſions ſhould be reſerved to the general negociation, under the mediation of the King of Sweden: who was prefered to ſeveral other powers, and in particular the Pope, the King of Portugal, the republic of Venice, and the duke of Savoy, who all aſpired to the honor of being mediator of the peace of Europe.

9. "That

WILL'III. AN' 1697.

9. " That the duchy of Deux-ponts ſhould be " reſtored to Sweden.

10. " That Philipſburg ſhould be given up to " the biſhop of Spire.

11. " That the fort of Kiehl, and other forti- " fications made on the Rhine, ſhould be razed.

12. " That the ſame ſhould be done by Fort " Lewis and Hunningen.

13. " That Traerbach and Mont-royal ſhould " be given up; the firſt diſmantled; but upon con- " dition never to be fortified again.

14. " That the Elector-palatine ſhould not " only be reſtored to all the Electorate, but alſo " to the duchies of Simmeren and Lauthern; with " the earldom of Manheim, and all other places, " whereof he had been diſpoſſeſſed to the preſent " time.

15. " That the ducheſs of Orleans ſhould not " have recourſe to open force, to maintain her " pretenſion; but might bring her action accord- " ing to law, in relation to the Elector.

16. " That the caſtle and county of Veldens " ſhould be reſtored to their lawful owner.

17. " That Biſweiler ſhould be given to the " count of Hanau.

18. " That the ſeigneuries of March, Marmoſy " and Dagſtein, and the county of Dagſburg, " ſhould be delivered up to the count of Overſtein.

19. " That the ſeigneuries of Salms and Valken- " ſtein ſhould be given up to the Prince of Salms, " or to their proprietors, ſince the ſame was ſtill " in queſtion.

20. " That the ſeigneuries of Latzenſtein and " Altheim ſhould be delivered to their owners.

21. " That Otweiler ſhould be given up to the " houſe of Naſſau.

22. " That the city and county of Mombelliard, " Harcourt, Bainon and Chattelette ſhould be put " into the poſſeſſion of the houſe of Wirtemberg.

23. " That Germeſheim ſhould be given up to " the Elector-palatine, notwithſtanding any for- " mer treaties to the contrary: and,

24. " That the principality of Orange ſhould " be given up to its ſovereign.

Objections made againſt them.

Several of the miniſters of the allies, having conſulted their maſters upon theſe preliminaries, declared, that, as to the firſt article, they fully agreed to it: but as for Straſburg, they farther inſiſted it ſhould be reſtored, with its fortifications and dependencies, and that no equivalent ſhould be accepted. The three following articles they agreed to: only they inſiſted, that not only the city, but the county of Luxemburg, and that of Chinay ſhould be given up; as they did, likewiſe, that the city and caſtle of Dinant ſhould be yielded; together with the duchy of Bouillon, in the ſame ſtate they were. They likewiſe owned themſelves ſatisfied as to the ſeventh article, concerning the re-unions: but not ſo with the agreement made about Lorrain, which they would have reſtored to the duke, its ſovereign, without any manner of reſtriction.

Death of the King of Sweden.

Theſe objections were ſome hinderance to the affair, and the death of Charles XI, King of Sweden, who after having been ill ſome time, died at Stockholm, the 5th of April, O. S. in the forty-ſecond year of his age, and the thirty-ſeventh of his reign, leaving his crown to his ſon, Charles XII, then ſcarce fifteen years of his age, was like to have put a ſtop to it: however, this accident made no manner of alteration in the affairs of Europe, for there gents (1) of Sweden, among whom the Queen had two voices, having full power to make treaties, and to perform all other acts of ſovereignty, as ſhould be agreed on by the major part of them, ſent immediately expreſſes to ſeveral foreign courts, to acquaint them with their intentions to purſue the mediation, begun by the late King, for the tranquility of Chriſtendom; and diſpatch'd a new commiſſion to mr. Lillienrodt, for that purpoſe.

WILL' III. AN' 1697.

Ceremonials ſettled.

It had been agreed, on the 3d of April, by the plenipotentiaries at the Hague, that, to carry on the treaty with the greater eaſe, all ceremonies ſhould be laid aſide, and the titles any Prince took be of no conſequence: that the ſeveral miniſters ſhould have free and ſecure correſpondence with the Princes, their maſters; that in order, thereunto, blank paſs-ports ſhould be given to each party for the couriers diſpatched by them, as alſo for the packet-boats to and from England, and that the powers of the reſpective plenipotentiaries ſhould be on the ſame foot they were at Nimeguen.

Theſe things being ſettled, monſ. Lillienrodt, the mediator, appointed the firſt conference to be held at Ryſwick, on the 9th of May, and accordingly the allies being met together, in the appartments on one ſide of the palace, and the French in the appartments on the other ſide, and the mediator in the middle between both, the allies and the French ſhewed him their powers, and gave him copies of the ſame, which he communicated to the reſpective miniſters, and left the copies with them. This, and the ſettling part of the ceremonial, in order to farther proceedings, took up about three hours, and then the conference was adjourned to the eleventh of the ſame month; when being met again, in the ſame manner as they did the firſt time, the mediator exchanged the powers of the allies with thoſe of the French plenipotentiaries. They, likewiſe, agreed to meet conſtantly on Wedneſdays, in the morning, and on Saturdays, in the afternoon, and that to prevent the inconveniencies that might ariſe from crowds of attendants, each plenipotentiary ſhould go to the congreſs with one coach and ſix horſes only, two pages, and two footmen. The 15th and 18th the mediator and the plenipotentiaries met again; but all they did, at thoſe two conferences, was only to regulate ſeveral points of ceremony, in which, for the moſt part, they followed the rules which were obſerved at the treaty of Nimeguen.

To go thro' the ſeveral daily tranſactions, at all the meetings for this treaty, and what happened during that time, on the continent, would carry me beyond the limits I am here tied down to: I ſhall therefore only in general obſerve; that the Emperor and Spaniards, not being ſo perfectly ſatisfied, with what King William and the Dutch had done for them, ſhewed, for ſome time, a backwardneſs to come into the terms ſtipulated. This perhaps may have been, in a great meaſure, the reaſon, why the Engliſh and Dutch ſo tamely ſuffered the French to take, during the treaty, the towns of Aeth, in Flanders, and Barcelona in Spain. This induced the Spaniards to ſign the peace, at the ſame time the Engliſh and Dutch did, viz. the 20th of September, N. S. a little before midnight (2). The

The treaty ſigned.

(1) The late King had, by his will, appointed the Queen, and five of the ſenators, to adminiſter the government during the young King's minority, which was to be 'till he was entering upon the eighteenth year of his age.

(2) During the negociations at Ryſwick, King William, wiſely conſidering what a hinderance the uſual forms and incident chicaneries, of a ſolemn negociation were to the progreſs of a treaty, thought fit to commit his perſonal intereſt, and thoſe of his dominions, to the arbitration of two men of the ſword, viz. the earl of Portland, on his ſide, and the marſhal de Boufflers, on the ſide of France, and they had ſeveral meetings, on this account, at an equal diſtance between the two reſpective camps, being attended with the ſame number of guards, and ſeveral officers of diſtinction; in which conferences, the principal matters between England, France and Holland were adjuſted, and thereby the negociations at Ryſwick, greatly accelerated.

miniſters of the Emperor and the Empire, who were, moſt of them, all the while preſent in the hall, were however ſo far from approving what was done, that, on the contrary, they required the mediator to enter a proteſtation; "that this was the ſecond "time a ſeparate peace had been concluded with "France (meaning that of Nimeguen for one) "in which the Emperor and Empire had been ex-"cluded; and that the States of the Empire, who "had been impoſed upon thro' their one credulity, "would not, for the future, be ſo eaſily per-"ſuaded to enter into confederacies:" being however unable to maintain the war alone, they ſigned the peace, likewiſe, on the 30th of the inſuing month, N. S.

Principal articles between Great-Britain and France.

The moſt material articles of the treaty, beween Great Britain and France were, the 3d, "that all "offences, injuries and damages, on either ſide "ſhould be forgoten. The 4th; by which the "French King ingages, on the word and faith of a "King, not to diſturb King William in the do-"minions he injoys, or to aſſiſt, directly or indirect-"ly, any of the enemies of the ſaid King, or "favor any plots and conſpiracies againſt him. "The 5th; which allows free commerce and navi-"gation between the ſubjects of each Prince. "The 7th; which agrees to a reſtoration of all "countries, iſlands, forts and colonies, which either "the French or Engliſh poſſeſſed before the war. "The 10th; by which all ſhips and merchandizes, "taken on either ſide, within twelve days after the "publication of the peace, in the Britiſh and "North-ſeas, as far as cape St. Vincent; within "ten weeks beyond the Cape, and on this ſide the "Equator, and within ſix months beyond the Equa-"tor, ſhall remain in the poſſeſſion of the captors. "The 12th; by which ſix months are allowed to "the ſubjects on either ſide to withdraw their effects, "in caſe of a rupture. The 13th; by which, the "principality of Orange, and all other lands be-"longing to the King of Great-Britain, as Prince "of Orange, were to be reſtored to him, with the "meſne profit. The 15th; being a confirmation, "of the late treaty between the French King, and "the duke of Savoy. The 16th; by which it was "ſtipulated, that all powers be comprehended in "this treaty, which ſhould be named within ſix "weeks after the ratification of it, and particularly, "the King of Sweden, the mediator: and, by a "ſeparate article, the Emperor was allowed till "the 1ſt of November, to accept the condi-"tions agreed on for him between the two Kings.

Between France and Spain.

"By the treaty between France and Spain, the "following towns and places were to be reſtored "to the latter; viz. Gironne, Roſes, Belver, and "Barcelona, in Catalonia; Luxemburg, the pro-"vince and duchy of Luxemburg, with the coun-"try of Chinay, as before the treaty of Nimeguen, "as alſo Charleroy, Mons, Courtray, and ſeveral "other places, of leſs note, in the Low-countries.

Between France and the States.

"By the treaty between France and the States "General, all cities, lands, forts, iſlands and places, "which had been taken on either ſide, during the "war, were to be reſtored; and particularly the "fort of Pondicherry, in the Eaſt-Indies, to the "States: but the greateſt advantage the Dutch got "by this peace, was the concluding a treaty of "commerce with France, very much in their "favor, and even beyond any thing that was ſtipu-"lated for England.

Will' III. An' 1697.

Between France the Emperor and the Empire.

By the treaty between France, the Emperor and the Empire, it was agreed, "that the treaties "of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen ſhould be the baſis "and foundation of this treaty, in matters both "eccleſiaſtical and civil, unleſs where it was ex-"preſly covenanted to the contrary. That the "French King ſhould reſtore to the Emperor and "the Empire, and the members thereof, whatever "places had been taken, as well during the war, "by way of force, as by the name of unions and "re-unions, which were ſituated without Alſace; "only the Roman Catholic religion ſhould re-"main in thoſe places thus reſtored, in the ſtate "it then was (1). Particularly, it was agreed, "that France ſhould yield up to the Emperor and "Empire, Fort Kiehl, Friburg, Sturtort, Old "Briſac, and Phillipſburg: that Dinant ſhould "be reſtored to the biſhop of Liege, and that the "caſtles of Traerbach, Ebrenburg, Kiruburg, and "the fortreſs of Mont-royal, ſhould be demoliſh-"ed, and reſtored to the reſpective proprietors. "And, on the other hand, it was agreed, that the "Imperial town of Straſburg, the capital of Alſace, "and dependencies on the left ſide of the Rhine, "ſhould be yielded up and united to the kingdom "of France; ſo that the Rhine was looked upon "as the boundary between the Empire and France, "'till the preſent war."

The intereſt of the late King James not regarded at Ryſwick.

The abdicated King James made, in the mean time, but an indifferent figure, at St. Germains: the French King's promiſes to that unfortunate Prince, and open declaration to all Europe, that he would never lay down his arms 'till he had reſtored him to his throne, had all along greatly fed his hopes: but he now found, by ſad experience, how little the promiſes of Sovereigns are to be relied upon, when their own intereſt comes in competition. The King of France, being exhauſted by a tedious war, both of men and mony, thought it prudence to clap up a peace, and reſtore to his neighbors all the conqueſts he had made ſince the treaty of Nimeguen (2). He neither did inſiſt, that a miniſter from that unfortu-nate Monarch ſhould be admited at the conferences at Ryſwick, which propoſal was unanimouſly re-jected by the allies, nor would the French pleni-potentiaries concern themſelves with that Prince's manifeſto. The late King James finding himſelf thus abandoned by the French King, and that neither his pardons nor his threats had any effect upon his late ſubjects, was perſuaded to publiſh his ſaid ma-nifeſto, which contained as well "a ſummary ac-"count of the reaſons that ſhould ingage the con-"federate Catholic Princes to promote his reſtora-"tion, as an expoſtulation of the injuſtice done "him, and a proteſtation againſt what was done at "Ryſwick, as null, in reſpect to the violation of "his rights:" but of all this no notice was taken by any of the allies. In the mean time, his friends

(1) The miniſters of the Proteſtant Princes of Germany were ſo offended at this article, that they refuſed to ſign the treaty when concluded, and publiſh'd a declaration, in which, among other things, they alledged, that this clauſe was intirely oppoſite to the fundamental laws of the Empire, and more eſpecially to the peace of Weſtphalia, which ought to be look'd upon as the baſis and foundation of this peace, and is declared to be ſo in the preceeding article, where it is likewiſe added, that immediately after the ratifications, the ſaid treaties ſhall be duly put in execution, in reſpect of the ſpiritual and the temporal, and ſhall be inviolably obſerved for the future.

(2) It was thought Lewis the XIVth was the readier to conclude this treaty, in hopes that having diſarmed and broke the confederacy, he might recover all he now loſt, at the death of the King of Spain, who had been many years in a lingring ſtate of health, and was, at this time, in ſo deſparate a condition, that the French court thought he could not live a month longer.

in England were ſo inraged to ſee him thus forſaken, that they could not forbear venting their bitter invectives againſt his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty (1).

The French refugees diſappointed.

Nor was it King James alone who was diſappointed in his hopes, on this occaſion; as he was abandon'd by the French King, ſo the French refugees, in England, Germany and Holland, thought themſelves no leſs neglected by King William, who having always declared himſelf their protector, they expected he would alſo prove their deliverer, and never conclude a peace with France, 'till they were reſtored to their eſtates, and the free exerciſe of their religion in their own country: but they found theſe their expectations fruſtrated, and that they were not ſo much as mentioned in the articles of peace (2).

Maritime affairs.

Having thus given a brief account of the treaty of peace at Ryſwick, before I return to King William, I ſhall give the reader a ſhort relation of what happen'd this year at ſea. The main body of the fleet was, this ſummer, under the command of ſir George Rooke, as admiral: but as no conſiderable action happen'd, nor, indeed, any thing ſo memorable paſs'd in the Narrow-ſeas as to deſerve a place in a general hiſtory, I ſhall refer the reader for farther particulars to Lediard's naval hiſtory (3), and confine myſelf here, to a tranſaction in America, which made a great noiſe in the world, at that time; I mean monſ. Ponti's expedition, with a ſquadron of French men of war fitted out at the charge of a company erected by the French King's permiſſion for that purpoſe, which ſet ſail from Breſt, the begining of this year. We had, at this time, a ſquadron of men of war, in thoſe parts, under the command of vice-admiral Nevil, who arrived at Barbadoes, the 17th of April, where his ſquadron was re-inforc'd by ſeveral as well Dutch as Engliſh men of war. The 28th, he bore away for Antegoa, and ſeting ſail from thence the begining of May, he detach'd one of his frigats to St. Thomas's, for a pilot, to conduct her to Puerto-Ricco, for intelligence: from whence ſhe was to return to Puntade la Guada, the place of rendezvous. About this time, the Monmouth, a ſhip of the ſame ſquadron, took a French privateer, which had juſt put the governor of Petit-Guavas aſhoar.

Vice-admiral Nevil's expedition in the Weſt-Indies.

He arrives at Barbadoes.

Gets intelligence of monſ. Ponti's ſquadron.

The eight of May, this frigat join'd the fleet again, and brought certain intelligence, that monſ. Ponti ſailed from Petit-Guavas, the 11th of March, O. S. with ſix and twenty ſhips, ſmall and great. This occaſioned a council of war, where it was reſolved to proceed immediately to Jamaica. The fifteenth of May, being off of the Eaſt-end of that iſland, the admiral was informed of a report, that the French ſquadron was before Carthagena; whereupon, having watered at Port-royal, the 24th, he took advantage the five and twentieth, of a ſmall gale, off of ſhoar, and got clear of the keys, ſteering away S. E. by S. and S. S. E. for Carthagena.

WILL' III. AN' 1697.

Comes up with them.

The 27th, being about half ſeas over, that part of his ſquadron, which was to windward, made a ſignal of ſeing ſhips ſtanding weſtward; upon which he immediately tack'd and ſtood after them, with a preſs'd ſail, judging them to be either French, or Spaniſh gallions. The next morning early, they were perceived to be ten men of war and two fly-boats; and, continuing to give them chaſe, the Warwick, a fifty-gun ſhip, came up with one of them and fired at her; but ſhe being a better ſailor, got clear. Soon after, the ſame ſhip got up with one of the fly-boats, and, taking her, found her to be laden with powder, cannon-ball, ſhells, and one mortar. Some accounts ſay, this ſhip was formerly taken from the Spaniards, being vice-admiral of the Barlovento-fleet, and had now on board, beſide plate, eight hundred barrels of powder, and a hundred negroes, valued at twenty thouſand pounds; the author of the Britiſh Empire in America, ſays two hundred thouſand pounds; but there ſeems to be a cypher too much.

And chaſes them;

In the afternoon, four of our ſhips, the Briſtol, Trident, Goſport and Newcaſtle, being near them, monſ. Ponti drew his ſquadron into order of battle, and fired ſeveral ſhot at the Briſtol; but his vice-admiral, monſ. de Labbé, with another of his ſhips, left him, and made off, as the whole fleet did towards evening.

But they eſcape.

Our fleet continued the chaſe two days and two nights longer, ſometimes near, and ſometimes at a greater diſtance; but could never reach them again (4); which was chiefly occaſion'd by our ſhips, moſt of them loſing their top-maſts, and ſpliting their ſails, with preſſing the chaſe, tho' thoſe of the French ſtood firm. By theſe accidents, we loſt the rich booty which monſ. Ponti had made, at the taking of Carthagena (5).

(1) Upon this occaſion the following Latin epigram appeared;

Pompeium Pharius tradit, Lodovixque Jacobum:
Regibus infidis hoſpes uterque perit.
Vilici at Gallus quam gens malefida Canopi;
Hoc admiſiſſes tune, Photine, Nefas?
Prodidit his ſocium, Victori victus amicum:
Aſt victor victo tradidit ille ſuum. Hiſt. of King William III. Vol. 3. p. 268.

(2) King William did, indeed, direct the Dutch plenipotentaries to open that matter, at a diſtance, to the French embaſſadors; which they did; but the French King, to whom this overture was communicated, expreſſing an inſuperable averſeneſs to it, and urging, that as he did not pretend to preſcribe to King William any rules about his ſubjects, ſo he expected the ſame liberty as to his own, which he looked upon as the great prerogative of a Sovereign; upon which the matter was no longer inſiſted upon.

(3) The reader will not only there find a particular account of the tranſactions of this year, which are not judged of ſufficient moment, and too prolix to be inſerted here; but, likewiſe, obſervations on the conduct of our officers, and the ſucceſs of our fleet, during this whole war, and liſts of the ſhips taken and deſtroy'd on both ſides. Vol. 2. p. 723.

(4) The author of the hiſtory of King William ſays, the Engliſh admiral Nevil, reckoning there was no ſafety for the French, but to go before the wind for the Streights of Bahama, ſlackned his way, propoſing to get ſo much a-head of them as to hinder their paſſage. Hereupon the French, at the cloſing of the night, tack'd about, and found the ſucceſs of their working the next day; for they could reckon no more than fourteen ſhips following them in a line; and they not ſo nigh, by far, as the day before, which made the French continue the ſame board, till they got within twenty leagues of Carthagena, where they were on the nine and twentieth, and the next day got clear of the Engliſh fleet.

(5) Biſhop Burnet, who makes light of monſ. Ponti's booty, ſays, the plate had all been ſent away (from Carthagena) before the French came there; but they landed and pillaged the place, and then gave it out, that they had found many millions there, which, at firſt, ſeemed incredible, and was afterwards known to be falſe; yet it was conſtantly aſſerted, at that time, to cover the reproach of having miſcarried in the attempt, on which they had raiſed great expectations, and to which many undertakers had been drawn in. Our ſquadron (continued the biſhop) was much ſuperior to theirs, yet never ingaged them. Once indeed they came up to the French, and had ſome advantage over them: but did not purſue it.

The French allow the Spaniards had time to ſend away a hundred and thirty mules, laden with gold, valued at thirty millions of livers, or about a million and a half ſterling; but that, notwithſtanding this, monſ. Ponti brought home, eight millions in ſilver, and a million in jewels, beſide cannon, and the booty which the ſeamen got. But that the Spaniards ſhould have time to load ſo many mules with gold, and ſhould not take their jewels with them, in their pockets, is not very probable.

Will'III. An' 1697.

The vice-admiral arrives at Carthagena.

The vice-admiral, when he loſt the French, judged himſelf to be about eighteen leagues ſhort of Carthagena, the appointed rendezvous, and therefore ſtood in for that place. He brought to, towards evening, within ſight of land, where rear-admiral Meeze, with ſix ſhips more, which had likewiſe all their ſails blown away, joined him. He anchored, the next evening, before Bocca-Chiga Caſtle, at the entrance of Carthagena harbor; where he found the French, having taken the place, had diſmantled and quited it; and that, what with Ponti's plundering, and the ravaging of privateers, who had been to gleen his leavings, the inhabitants were in a diſtreſſed condition, and had moſtly deſerted the place. The vice-admiral let the governor know, he was going that night to ſea, becauſe he fear'd the gallions might be in danger. But that, if the wind ſhould hang out of the way, he would ſpare him what neceſſaries he could.

And finds it deſtroyed by the French.

The next day at noon, the wind coming weſterly, the vice-admiral weigh'd and ſtood eaſtward, leaving orders for the ſhips which were miſſing to follow him; and, the 6th of June, diſcovering eight privateers, under the ſhoar of Sambay, he ſent the Colcheſter, Goſport, and one ſhip more, with a fire-ſhip, to deſtroy them, while he ſtood over for cape Tuberon, or Petit-Guavas: but, not being able to fetch either of thoſe places, proceeded for Hiſpaniola, where, having taken a privateer of twenty-four guns, and burnt another of twelve, he anchored the 19th of June.

Petit Guavas burnt.

The vice-admiral receiving intelligence, on the 22d, from ſir William Beaſton, governor of Jamaica, that it would be of great ſervice if he could deſtroy Petit-Guavas, he ordered rear-admiral Meeze thither with nine ſhips of the ſquadron; who effected it, on the 28th, and after having taken the town, by ſurprize, burnt it down to the ground.

The 30th, the vice and rear-admirals being again join'd, they ſail'd for Jamaica. The 11th of July, they made the iſle of Pines; the 16th, got about a range of rocks, called the Calleradoes, and the next day rear-admiral Meeze died.

The ſquadron arrives at the Havanna.

The 22d, the ſquadron arrived at the Havanna, where the vice-admiral, in requital for his great care and vigilance for the ſafety of the gallions, was not only refuſed entrance into the harbor, and what water and refreſhments he wanted, by the Spaniſh governor; but when he let the general of the gallions, which were then lying there, know, that the chief intent of his voyage was to ſecure them, and to convoy them to Spain, he was told, he had no ſuch orders, and therefore could not accept of the courteſy. The vice-admiral, therefore, put his ſhips into the beſt condition he could, and ſailed for Virginia, where he died the 27th of Auguſt; but the ſeamen moſt of them recovered their health there. The command of the fleet, thereby devolving on captain Thomas Dilkes, being the only ſurviving captain of the whole fleet he arrived with it in England, the 24th of October.

Ill uſage of the Spaniards.

Death of the vice-admiral.

The fleet returns.

As the reader may be deſirous to know what came of monſieur Ponti, after he eſcaped vice-admiral Nevil's ſquadron, I think it proper to mention here, that the firſt place he touched at, in his way home, was Newfoundland, where captain John Norris, afterwards ſir John Norris, lay in the harbor of St. John's, with a ſquadron conſiſting of four fourth-rates, two fifth-rates, two ſixth-rates, two fire-ſhips, and two bomb-veſſels, with a hagboat. But tho' captain Norris had re-itterated intelligence that was monſieur Ponti's ſquadron returning with the riches he had taken from Carthagena, and that his ſhips were but weakly manned; and tho' the commadore was convinced of the truth of this intelligence, and was for going in ſearch of them; yet he was over-ruled in ſeveral councils of war, held on that occaſion; and, upon a perſuaſion, that this was a much ſtronger ſquadron under the command of monſieur Neſmond, a reſolution was taken, not only to remain in the harbor of St. John's, but to ſecure themſelves againſt any attack from his part, by laying booms a-croſs the mouth of the harbor, raiſing batteries, and placing the ſhips in a proper poſture of defenſe; and thus monſieur Ponti eſcaped us a ſecond time, tho' not ſo honorably for us as the firſt, that being probably owing to the knavery, or at leaſt neglects of the purveyers for the navy: but this, to an ill-timed caution (if not worſe) of our officers (1).

Will'III. An' 1697.

Thus monſieur Ponti twice eſcaped out of our clutches; but he was not yet clear; for after being got ſafe upon our coaſt, he was met by five Engliſh men of war, and a fireſhip, under the command of captain Harlow, who purſued him after an ingagement of two hours, for two days and two nights; without being able to come up with him again: ſo he had the good fortune to eſcape a third time, and carried the ſpoil of the Spaniards into Breſt.

Soon after the concluſion of the peace, King William named the earl of Portland to be his embaſſador extraordinary in France; about the ſame time, his Majeſty created the lord viſcount Villiers, one of his plenipotentiaries at Ryſwick, earl of Jerſey, and gave him the character of his embaſſador to the States-general. The 7th of November, the King, who had left the army the begining of Auguſt, and retired to his palace at Dieren, having ſettled ſeveral important matters with the Elector of Bavaria and Prince Vaudemont, and paid off the foreign troops, in his ſervice, went to the Hague, where he was received with all imaginable marks of reſpect, and, on the 9th, gave a private audience to the French embaſſadors, in his cloſet.

King William comes to the Hague.

The lords-juſtices had, in the mean time, cauſed the peace to be proclaimed in London, on the 19th of October, O. S. with univerſal joy; and on the 11th of November, having information that the duke of Berwick, ſir George Barclay, Harriſon, Durant, colonel Parker, and ſeveral other ſuſpected perſons under favor of the peace, which had opened a free paſſage between France and England, were arrived at London, on ſome treaſonable deſigns, they iſſued out their proclamations for apprehending them, promiſing for every one of them the reward of 1000 l.

Peace proclaimed.

(1) Biſhop Burnet ſays, commodore Norris's ſquadron (which was ſent to thoſe parts, with ſome land-forces, to recover Hudſon's bay) might have fallen upon the French, and would probably have maſtered them; but as they had no certain account of their ſtrength, ſo being ſent out upon another ſervice, they did not think it proper to hazard the attacking them; ſo the French got ſafe home, and the conduct of our affairs at ſea was much cenſured: yet our admiralty declared themſelves ſatisfied with the account the commanders gave of their proceedings: but that board was accuſed of much partiality. On all ſuch occaſions, the unfortunate muſt expect to be blamed, and to outward appearance there was much room given, either to cenſure the orders, or the execution of them. The King owned, he did not underſtand thoſe matters: and Ruſſel (now made earl of Orford) had both the admiralty and the navy board in a great dependance on himſelf; ſo that he was conſidered almoſt as much, as if he had been lord high-admiral: he was too much in the power of thoſe, in whom he confided, and truſted them too far; and it was generally believed, that there was much corruption, as it was certain there was much faction, if not treatchery, in the conduct of our mariners.

WILL' III. AN' 1697.

The King lands in England.

The King having finiſhed all his affairs, at the Hague, and regulated with the States-general the number of the forces which it was judged neceſſary to keep on foot the next year, his Majeſty imbarked for England the 13th of November, and landed the next morning ſafe at Margate. The ſame day, he went to Canterbury, where he received the congratulations of the magiſtrates and the clergy, upon his happy return with peace. The 15th, his Majeſty lay at Greenwich, and, the next day, at the requeſt of his loyal city of London, to honor them, made a moſt ſplendid public entry, thro' that city, to his palace, and gave the ſatisfaction to an incredible number of ſpectators, to ſee their hero return crowned with victories, and the conſequence of them, peace.

The triumphant cavalcade proceeded to Whitehall, where the lord-mayor attended his Majeſty to the foot of the ſtairs, leading up to the guard-chamber; and having taken leave of his Majeſty, his lordſhip, and the aldermen, were conducted into the lodgings, and treated with a magnificent ſupper, by the lord ſteward. The whole ceremony was performed with great order and magnificence: the cannon at the Tower were diſcharged at his Majeſty's taking coach, and at his paſſing over the bridge: the foot-guards gave three vollies, in St. James's Park; and the evening concluded with bonefires, illuminations, ringing of bells, and all other popular demonſtrations of duty and affection.

A thankſgiving appointed.

Upon his Majeſty's arrival at Kenſington, the firſt thing he did, was, on the 17th of November, to iſſue a proclamation appointing a ſolemn day of thankſgiving to ALMIGHTY GOD for the bleſſing of a general peace, to be held the 2d of December; and at the ſame time, another proclamation was iſſued, to prolong the prorogation of the parliament to the 3d of December. On the ſame, and ſome following days, the two univerſities, and moſt of the corporations in his Majeſty's dominions, preſented their humble addreſſes to his Majeſty, in which they congratulated his proſperous return to theſe his kingdoms, in peace, ſafety, and honor.

And celebrated.

The day appointed for the thankſgiving, on account of his Majeſty's ſafe return, and the happy concluſion of the peace, being come, it was celebrated with the greateſt appearance imaginable of an unanimous and hearty joy and ſatisfaction. The King, to ſet an example to his ſubjects, went to the royal chapel at Whitehall, where a ſermon ſuitable to the occaſion was preached by the biſhop of Saliſbury. His Majeſty was pleaſed afterwards to dine with the earl of Romney, and, in the evening, ſaw the fire-works, which his lordſhip had cauſed to be prepared in St. James's-ſquare. On this ſolemn occaſion, the choir of St. Paul's was firſt opened, for divine ſervice, and at night, there were bonefires and illuminations, in all parts of London and Weſtminſter.

The parliament meets.

The next day, the 3d of December, the parliament met, according to their laſt prorogation: when the King, being come to the houſe of peers, addreſſed himſelf to both houſes, in the following words:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"The war which I entered into, by the advice "of my people, is, by the bleſſing of God, and "their zealous and affectionate aſſiſtance, brought "to the end we all propoſed, an honorable peace; "which I was willing to conclude, not ſo much to "eaſe myſelf, from any trouble or hazard, as to "free the kingdom from the continuing burden of "an expenſive war. I am heartily ſorry, my ſub-"jects will not at firſt find all that relief from the "peace which I could wiſh, and they may expect: "but the funds intended for the laſt year's ſervice, "have fallen ſhort of anſwering the ſums for which "they were given, ſo that there remain conſiderable "deficiencies to be provided for. There is a debt "upon account of the fleet and the army: the "revenues of the crown have been anticipated by "my conſent, for the public uſes; ſo that I am "wholly deſtitute of means to ſupport the civil "liſt; and I can never diſtruſt you will ſuffer this "to turn to my diſadvantage, but will provide for "me, during my life, in ſuch a manner as may "be for my honor, and for the honor of the "government. Our naval force being increaſed "to near double what it was, at my acceſſion to "the crown, the charge of maintaining it will be "proportionably augmented, and it is certainly ne-"ceſſary for the intereſt and reputation of England, "to have always a great ſtrength at ſea. The cir-"cumſtances of affairs abroad are ſuch, that I "think myſelf obliged to tell you my opinion, "that for the preſent, England cannot be ſafe with-"out a land-force; and I hope we ſhall not give "thoſe who mean us ill, the opportunity of af-"fecting that under the notion of a peace, which "they could not bring to paſs by a war. I doubt "not but you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, "will take theſe particulars into your conſidera-"tion, in ſuch a manner, as to provide the ne-"ceſſary ſupplies, which I do earneſtly recom-"mend to you."

WILL' III. AN' 1697.

My lords and gentlemen,

"That which I do moſt delight to think of, and "am beſt pleaſed to own, is, that I have all the "proofs of my people's affection, that a Prince "can deſire: and I take this occaſion to give you "the moſt ſolemn aſſurance, that as I never had, "ſo I never will, nor can have any intereſt ſeparate "from theirs. I eſteem it one of the greateſt ad-"vantages of the peace, that I ſhall now have "leiſure to rectify ſuch corruptions or abuſes, as "may have crept into any part of the adminiſtra-"tion during the war, and effectually to diſcourage "prophaneneſs and immorality, and I ſhall imploy "my thoughts in promoting trade, and advancing "the happineſs and flouriſhing ſtate of the king-"dom. I ſhall conclude with telling you, that as "I have, with the hazard of every thing, reſ-"cued your religion, laws and liberties, when they "were in the extreameſt danger, ſo I ſhall place "the glory of my reign, in preſerving them intire, "and leaving them ſo to poſterity.

Addreſs of the lords.

The lords hereupon made an addreſs to his Majeſty, in which having "congratulated his "happy return, accompanied with the bleſſings of "a ſafe and honorable peace, which, next under "GOD they were ſenſible was owing to his "courage and conduct; they told him, that after "the hazards and labors he had ſo long ſuſtained "for the good of Europe, there wanted nothing "but this to compleat the glory of his reign; and "aſſured his Majeſty, that they ſhould never be "wanting in their indeavors to aſſiſt his Majeſty in "maintaining the quiet which he had ſo gloriouſly "reſtored to theſe his kingdoms, and in contribu-"ting all they could to the ſafety of his perſon, "and the ſecurity, peace and proſperity of his "government.

The King's anſwer.

His Majeſty, in return, "aſſured their lord-"ſhips of his kindneſs, and told them, he hoped "this peace would be ſo bleſſed, that they might "injoy it."

The commons were not, this time, ſo ready with their addreſs as the lords; for his Majeſty's ſpeech had a various effect upon them. Some thought ſeveral expreſſions in it too magiſterial; others ſeemed to be offended that they were put in mind of what his Majeſty had done for the nation:

others

Will' III. An' 1697.

others again diſtruſted the great promiſes of what he would do for them, and many others began to be jealous of what he had told them, "that England "could not be ſafe without a land-force;" as if his Majeſty meant to keep a ſtanding army, to invade their liberties, in defenſe of which the nation had ſpent ſo vaſt a ſtock of blood and treaſure. However, the 9th of December, they preſented an addreſs to his Majeſty, in which they told him; "that they who had ſo frequently waited on "his Majeſty, with the tender of their aſſiſtance, "for carrying on the war, came now to congratu- "late his Majeſty upon the happy concluſion "of it, in a peace ſo honorable and advantageous "to the nation, as ſufficiently juſtified the wiſdom "of the commons, in adviſing, and his Majeſty's "conduct in the proſecution, of it. That the pro- "ſpect of the benefit his people would receive "from the peace was very pleaſing: that the ho or "his Majeſty had reſtored to England, of holding "the balance of Europe, gave his ſubjects great "content: but what his commons were moſt ef- "fected and delighted with, was, that his Ma- "jeſty's ſacred perſon would now be ſecure from "thoſe many and great dangers, to which he had "ſo often expoſed it for their ſake; nothing being "ſo evident, as that his Majeſty's return in ſafety "was a bleſſing more welcome to his people than "peace, and received with greater demonſtrations "of joy. That therefore, with hearts full of af- "fection, duty and gratitude, they did aſſure his "Majeſty, in the name of all the commons of Eng- "land, that this houſe would be ever ready to "aſſiſt and ſupport his Majeſty, who, by puting "a period to the war, had confirmed them in the "quiet poſſeſſion of their rights and liberties, and "ſo fully compleated the glorious work of their "deliverance.

Addreſs of the commons.

To this addreſs his Majeſty anſwered;

"That nothing, which related to the peace, "pleaſed him ſo much, as the ſatisfaction they "had in it, and as they had aſſiſted him in the war, "beyond all expreſſion, ſo he did not doubt but "they would be as zealous in maintaining the "peace.

The ſame day, the commons voted a ſupply, and order'd an account to be laid before them of the deficiencies of the laſt year's aids, of the arrears of the army and navy, and of the debt charged on the revenue. The next day, they conſidered, in a grand committee, the ſtate of the nation, and what forces ſhould be diſbanded, was the main point in debate. The court-party was for preſerving part of the army, and, therefore, alledged, "That the "nation was ſtill unſettled, and not deliver'd from "the fear of King James; that the friends of that "abdicated Prince were as bold and numerous as "ever, and himſelf ſtill protected by the French "King, who having as yet reformed none of his "troops, was conſequently as formidable as be- "fore; that if the army was intirely diſbanded, "the peace, which was obtained at the expenſe of "ſo much blood and treaſure, would be altogether "precarious, and not only England, but all Europe, "ly, once more, at the mercy of that ambitious "Monarch, an inveterate enemy to King William, "the Proteſtant religion and the liberties of Chriſt- "endom, whom the neceſſity of his affairs, not his "inclination, had reconciled."

A ſupply voted.

Reaſons for and againſt diſbanding the army.

The country-party, and the repulicans, on the other hand, who, tho' diametrically oppoſite in their views, upon this occaſion, ſpoke the ſame language, both in this debate, viva voce, and in their writings, was only repreſented the danger of keeping up a ſtanding army. The arguments they made uſe of to ſupport this aſſertion, taken partly from the examples ſo plentifully found in the hiſtories of other nations, ancient and modern, and partly from the preſent circumſtances of things, were too numerous and prolix, to find place here, and are, beſide, the leſs neceſſary, as they are much the ſame as have been frequently made uſe of ſince, upon the like occaſions, and are conſequently freſh in the minds of moſt readers. I ſhall, therefore, only obſerve, that this party, whether by the force of their arguments, or their ſuperior number, I ſhall not determine, had the fortune to prevail, and the commitee of the whole houſe came thereupon to this reſolution, "that all the land- "forces of this kingdom, which had been raiſed, "ſince the 29th of September, 1680, ſhould be "paid and diſbanded." This reſolution being reported to the houſe, on the 11th, the courtiers moved, that the report be re-commited: but their motion being rejected, the houſe agreed with the committee, in their reſolution. The 14th, the commons took into conſideration the ſervices of the officers and common men, who, amidſt ſo many hardſhips, dangers, and diſappointments in nine ſucceſſive campains, had recovered the declining reputation of the Engliſh valor, and preſerved the kingdom from the aſſaults of the moſt potent Empire that perhaps was ever erected in the world, and thereupon paſſed a vote, "that it be an in- "ſtruction to the committee who were to conſider "of the ſupply, that they ſhould likewiſe con- "ſider of a gratuity to be given to ſuch officers "and ſoldiers of the Engliſh army, who were or "ſhould be diſbanded." At the ſame time they ordered mr. Hammond and mr. Moyle to bring in a bill "to inable ſoldiers who ſhould be diſbanded, "to exerciſe their trades in any town or corporation "throughout the country." The 17th, they appointed ſeveral members to prepare and bring in a bill, "to regulate the militia, and make them more "uſeful"; and the next day, they reſolved, "that "10,000 men were ſufficient for a ſummer and "winter-guard at ſea for the year 1698 (1).

Will' III. An' 1697.

The diſband- ing of the army voted.

The 20th of December, the commons took the ſupply into conſideration, and reſolved, "that in "a juſt ſenſe and acknowlegment of what great "things his Majeſty had done for theſe kingdoms, "the ſum of 700,000 l. per annum, be granted to "his Majeſty, during his life, for the ſupport of "the civil liſt." Some members moved indeed, the next day, that this reſolution might be re-commited, but it was, nevertheleſs, approved by the houſe.

A ſupport for the civil liſt voted.

The 14th of January 1698, the King came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent, 1. To "an act to prevent the farther currency of any "hammer'd ſilver coin; for re-coining ſuch as was "now in being, and the making out new exchequer "bills, where the former bills were or ſhould be "filled up with indorſements. 2. An act againſt "correſponding with the late King James, and his "adherents. 3. An act for continuing the impri- "ſonment of ſeveral conſpirators; and, 4. An act "to give farther time for the adminiſtring of oaths "relating to tallies and orders, and for the eaſier "diſpatch of public buſineſs in the exchequer, and "in the bank of England.

Farther lutions c cerning t ſupply.

(1) Theſe reſolutions very much diſpleaſed the King, who, tho' he was willing to eaſe his Engliſh ſubjects, and free them from the apprehenſions of a ſtanding army, by diſbanding a good number of regiments, and reducing others, did not think proper abſolutely to comply with the commons, as to the diſcharging all the troops which had been raiſed ſince the year 1680, whereby he muſt leave himſelf and his kingdom too much expoſed.

mittee, about the ſupply; viz. Firſt, "That the "ſum of 350,000 l. be granted to his Majeſty, "for maintaining guards and gariſons for the "year 1698. Second, that a ſupply be granted "to his Majeſty, which, together with the funds "already ſettled for that purpoſe, ſhould be ſuf- "ficient to anſwer and cancel all exchequer-bills, "iſſued, or to be iſſued, not exceeding 2,700,000l. "and Third, that a ſupply be granted to his Ma- "jeſty, for the ſpeedy paying and diſbanding the "army."

The 18th, the houſe ſettled the bounty which was to be given to every trooper, foot-ſoldier, and non-commiſſion'd officer, upon their being diſbanded; voted a ſupply of 250,000 l. for that charge, and reſolved, that proviſion be made, for giving half-pay to the commiſſion-officers (being his Majeſty's natural-born ſubjects) diſband- ed, or to be diſbanded, till they ſhould be fully paid off and cleared, and otherwiſe provided for. At the ſame time, they order'd, that a liſt be laid before them of ſuch commiſſion-officers as were to injoy the benefit of this reſolution (1). The 22d, the commons granted 536,000 l. for making good the deficiency of the aid of 4s. in the pound, and 940,000 l. for ſupplying the other deficient ſubſidies granted the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and having afterward taken the arrears of the army into con- ſideration, they reſolved, that the ſum of 1,254,000l. was neceſſary to clear the arrears of pay due to the land-forces, according to the eſtabliſhment, from the 1ſt of April 1692, 'till the laſt of September 1697, beſide 940,815 l. for ſubſiſtence; 28,295 l. for contingencies; 50,000 l. for the general-officers, and 75,000 l. for the guards and gariſons; in all 2,348,102 l. and that there was but 855,502 l. remaining in the hands of the pay-maſter of the army, the firſt day of January 1697-8.

Ways and means.

The 9th of February, they reſolved, in order to raiſe the ſums voted neceſſary for diſbanding the army, paying off of quarters, paying of ſea- men, and towards making good loans, and the de- ficiencies of former funds, to lay an aid of three ſhillings in the pound upon land, by way of aſſeſſ- ment upon every county, in proportion to the rates of the firſt four ſhillings aid, granted in 1691, by which they put a ſtop to any future deficiencies of this aid.

National debts.

The 10th, they conſidered the eſtimate of what was due, to ſome of his Majeſty's allies, as well for arrears of ſubſidies, as for payment of auxiliaries, and reſolv'd, "that 180,000 rix-dollars were due "to the Elector of Brandenburg; 250,000 rix- "dollars to the Land-grave of Heſſe-Caſtle; 121,203 rix-dollars to the duke of Wolfembuttle; "149,997 rix-dollars to the biſhop of Munſter; "50,000 rix-dollars to the dukes of Hanover and "Zell; 25,000 rix-dollars to the duke of Holſtein; "and 200,000 rix-dollars to the King of Denmark, "as well on the accounts abovemention'd, as in "conſideration of an intire prohibition of com- "merce, between that crown and France." They alſo reſolved, that there was due "177,000 l. "to the contracters for bread and forage." The 15th, they continued their examination of the debt of the nation, and reſolved, "that the ſum of "1,392,742 l. was due upon the ſeveral heads of "the eſtimate of the general debt of the navy; "204,157 l. to the office of ordnance; 340,708 l. "for tranſports for reducing Ireland; 125,785 l. "for other tranſport-ſervice; and 49,929 l. for "quartering and cloathing the army raiſed by "act of parliament in 1677, and diſbanded by "another act in 1679.

Will' III. An' 1698.

This debt being ſo very conſiderable, that it was impoſſible for the parliament to think of providing for it at once, the commons came to a reſolution of doing it by degrees: to this end, they voted, Firſt, "that of the debt due for clearing the army, "from the firſt of April 1692, to the laſt of Sep- "tember 1697, amounting to 1,254,000 l. the ſum "of 139,066 l. be raiſed in the year 1698, which "would clear the army, to the firſt of April "1693. Second, that the ſum of 203,450 l. be "raiſed for the clearing the arrears of ſubſiſtence to "the troops in England, between the firſt day of "January 1696, and the firſt day of Auguſt "1697. Third, that 450,816 l. be raiſed, for "clearing the arrear of ſubſiſtence due to the troops "in Flanders, to the 4th of October 1697. Fourth, "that the ſum of 50,000 l. be raiſed for the "general officers. Fifth, that 137,990 l. be raiſed "for clearing the arrears of ſubſiſtence due to the "troops in Flanders, from the 4th of October "1697, to the laſt of December. Sixth, that the "ſum of 1,100,117 l. be raiſed for the navy, "viz. 100,000 l. for wear and tear; 600,000 l. "for ſeamens wages, in part of 1,862,849 l. due "on that ſcore; 16,389 l. due to the regiſter'd "ſeamen; 24,000 l. for the ſallaries of the com- "miſſioners of the admiralty, and other officers, "and for contingencies; 28,663 l. for the half- "pay ſea-officers; 90,073 l. for penſions to ſu- "peranuated ſea-officers and widows; 15,927 l. "for the charge of the yards; 849 l. for the "muſter-maſters of the out-ports; 43,399 l. for "wages to ſhips and veſſels in ordinary; 19,608 l. "for victuals of the ſhips in ordinary; 32,558 l. for "harbor-moorings; 35,848 l. for ordinary repairs "of the navy; 55,520 l. for the two marine "regiments; and 37,286 l. for the charge of the "office for regiſtering ſeamen. Seventh, that the "ſum of 60,000 l. be allowed for the ordnance; "and Eighth, that proviſion be made towards pay- "ment of the principal and intereſt of the tran- "ſport-debt; all which ſums, they reſolved to "raiſe, in the year, 1698."

Part of the national debt provided for.

Farther ways and means.

To this end, beſide the land-tax, already voted, on the 7th of April, they laid "a duty upon all "coal and culm, over and above the duties, already "payable," and reſolved, on the 9th, "that the "fourth part of the clear value of all the benefi- "cial grants from the crown of England or Ire- "land, and all the forfeited eſtates, which had been "reſtored by the crown, by reverſal of outlawry, "or otherwiſe, ſince the 29th day of May 1660, "be applied to the uſe of the public. On the 14th, "they continued the poll or capitation-tax for "one year longer. The 16th, they laid a duty "upon all coals imported from Scotland, or other "parts beyond the ſeas. The 28th, they doubled "the duties upon ſtamp'd vellom, parchment and "paper, 'till the firſt day of Auguſt 1706; con- "tinued the duties upon coffee, tea, chocolate and "ſpices; as alſo the duties payable by hawkers "and pedlars, for the term of three years, to com- "mence from the expiration of the preſent duties "upon them. The 7th of May, they laid a far- "ther duty upon ſalt; and, the 14th, they doubled "the duties upon luſtrings and alamodes imported, "and inlarged the time for purchaſing annuities, "upon the ſeveral acts of parliament for granting "the ſame." As even all this was not ſufficient to anſwer the neceſſities of the year, the commons

(1) The court was very backward in leting this liſt be laid before the commons, being, as it has been ſaid, unwilling to let them know, how few of the regiments were actually diſbanded: and, when the commons addreſs'd the King, on this ac- count, his Majeſty put them off, by telling them, "he would comply with their deſire as ſoon as conveniently he could."

resolved, on the 19th, "that towards raising a "fund for two millions, the duties upon salt, "granted before and during this session, and "the additional duty upon stamp'd vellom, "parchment, and paper, voted three weeks be- "fore, be granted to his Majesty, his heirs and "successors, redeemable by parliament."

In order to keep my account of the supplies voted this session, and the ways and means provided for the raising of them, intire, and in one connexion, I have postponed my relation of several other transactions in parliament which I shall now resume: but shall first mention an occurrence or two, which happen'd, during this time, out of parliament.

Some transactions out of parliament.

Towards the conclusion of the foregoing year, James Vernon, esq; was constituted secretary of state, on the resignation of mr. secretary Trumbal; and the commons being about to address his Majesty, to remove the earl of Sunderland (1), his lordship prudently withdrew, and resigned his office of lord-chamberlain.

Whitehall consumed by fire.

This winter proved fatal to the ancient palace of Whitehall, which was burnt down by accident, on the 4th of January, in the evening, nothing of it remaining the next morning, but the Banqueting-house, which, indeed, was the only part of it that had any shew of grandeur.

The Czar of Muscovy arrives in England.

The 11th of the same month, arrived in England, Peter Alexowitz, Czar or Emperor of Russia, who having form'd a design of civilizing his barbarous subjects; of introducing arts and sciences among them, and of rendering the forces of his Empire, by sea and land, equal to those of his politer neighbors, travelled incognito, in the retinue of his own embassador, thro' most countries in Europe, for his instruction: tho' he made his longest stay in England and Holland (2), to make himself master of navigation and ship-building; being persuaded, that nothing could contribute so much to his grandeur, as his having fleets of men of war, in the Baltick, the Black-sea, and the Caspian-sea. He was magnificently entertain'd, during his stay in this kingdom, and had several private conferences not only with the King, but with the Prince and Princess of Denmark.

The 14th, the earl of Portland, who, as I mention'd above, had been appointed his Majesty's embassador to the court of France, departed for that kingdom, and, on the 27th of the next month, made his public entry into Paris, with the utmost magnificence.

The 4th of April, the earl of Jersey was appointed to succeed the earl of Portland, in the embassy of France. Soon after, the marshal de Tallard arrived here as embassador from that court, and, the 18th of May made his public entry thro' the city of London. The 18th of June, the earl of Portland return'd from France, and the same day, the earl of Marborough was declared governor to the duke of Gloucester, who was then entring the tenth year of his age, and dr. Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, was appointed his preceptor. But to return to the parliament.

Farther proceedings of parliament.

The commons, after their inquiring into the grants made by King Charles II, and King James II, proceeded to examine those made by his present Majesty in Ireland; and finding, on the 16th of February, that there was one made to mr. Roylton, which mr. Mountague, chancellor of the exchequer, own'd to be for his benefit, a warm debate arose, thereupon, in the house; and it was mov'd, that he should withdraw, which, however, pass'd in the negative. It was, thereupon, resolved, by a great majority; "that it was the opinion of this "house, that the honorable Charles Montague, "esq; chancellor of the Exchequer, for his good "services in this government, did deserve his Ma- "jesty's favor:" which will stand a monument to his fame, to all succeeding ages.

An address of the commons against impiety, &c.

The commons having observed, that the enemies of Christianity were more audacious at this time than ever, in ridiculing the mysteries of that holy faith, both in their conversations, and the blasphemous pamphlets they publish'd, and that prophaneness and immorality daily gained ground among us, presented, on the 17th of the same month, an address to the King, in a body, in which, among other things, they desired "his Majesty would issue his procla- "mation, requiring the judges, and inferior ma- "gistrates, to put the laws in execution against "prophaneness and immorality, and to discounte- "nance them in his officers and courtiers, and that "he suppress all pernicious books and pamphlets, "which contained impious doctrines against the "Holy Trinity, and other fundamental articles of "our faith:" To this, his Majesty answered; "that he could not but be very well pleased with "an address of this nature: and he would give im- "mediate directions, in the several particulars they "desired: but that he could wish some more ef- "fectual provision were made for the suppressing "those pernicious books and pamphlets, which "their address took notice off." Accordingly, on the 28th, was published, his Majesty's proclamation, for preventing and punishing immorality and prophaneness. In the mean time, the house of lords, to shew their zeal for so laudable a design, prepared and pass'd a bill "for the more effectual suppressing "Atheism, Blasphemy, and Prophaneness," to which, after several conferences, the commons gave their concurrence.

Society for the reformation of manners.

On this occasion, probably, and about this time, by the incouragement of the King, not only the archbishop of Canterbury, with several other prelates and divines, but a great many of the laity, formed themselves into a "society for the refor- "mation of manners (3);" which proved the fore-runner of another, "for the propogation of "the gospel in forein parts."

Acts pass'd.

The 7th of March, the King came to the house of lords, and gave the royal assent, First, to "an "act for explaining another act for laying certain "duties on malt, mum, sweets, cyder and perry. "Second, an act for satisfying arrears of several "annuities which incurr'd between the 17th of "May 1696, and the 17th of May 1697. Third, "an act, that all retailers of salt shall sell by weight. "Fourth, an act for rendering the laws more ef- "fectual, for preventing the importation of forein "bone-lace, needle-work, point and cut-work.

(1) His enemies accused him of most of the arbitrary proceedings taken in the late reign, and pretended to have well-grounded suspicions of advising the like in this, and especially the keeping up a standing army. Salmon's history of England, vol. 24. p. 260.

(2) He had before had an interview with his Majesty, in Holland, which was managed in the following manner: the Russian embassadors having had their audience of the States-general at the Hague, they were admited to that of King William at Utrecht; which being over, his Majesty and the Czar met in a small gallery, into which they entered both at a time, out of the adjoining apartments. Hearty imbraces and compliments being mutually pass'd, they had a long conference together about the posture of affairs, in which, it is said, the Czar highly applauded his Majesty's indefatigable indeavors, and constant aim to reduce France within its ancient limits.

(3) This institution is, in itself, certainly very laudable, tho' it be not attended with all the success that were to be wish'd, and is not only render'd, in a great measure, useless, but laid open to censure, by the scandalous and unwarrantable practices of those beggarly informers, whom the society are under a necessity of imploying, for the detecting of vicious persons.

" And, Fifth, an act to prevent the throwing and " firing of ſquibs, ſerpents, and other fireworks " (1)." And, on the 2d of May, his Majeſty came again to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to; " Firſt, an act for granting to his Majeſty " 1,484,015 l. for diſbanding forces and paying " ſeamen. Second, an act for explaining an act " for the relief of the poor; and, Third, an act " for diſſolving the marriage between Charles earl " of Macclesfield, and Ann his wife, and to illegi- " gimate her children."

The earl of Macclesfield's caſe.

His lordſhip caſe was this: going to travel, ſoon after he was married, he left his lady, at his father's houſe; but ſhe, not liking the place or company, went to her mother, the lady Maſon's. The earl, being returned home, and reſenting this ſtep of his lady's, which ſhe had made without his privity or conſent, inſtead of recalling her, ſuffered her to live in a ſtate of ſeparation: during this time, the counteſs entertain'd a gallant, by whom ſhe had a daughter, towards the latter end of the year 1696. This child dying before the earl had heard any thing of the matter, by the interceſſion of friends, he was prevailed upon to allow her 500 l. per annum, as a ſeparate maintenance, till he heard ſhe had another child; and then, being out of all patience, he indeavor'd to get a divorce in Doctor's-commons: but conſidering that court could not authorize his marrying again, he brought the matter before the houſe of lords.

While this cauſe was depending in Doctor's-commons, the counteſs inſiſted on her innocence, and ſaid, that her huſband, neglecting to cohabit with her on his return from his travels, ſhe had, with the aſſiſtance of a woman of intrigue, ſurprized him into a private meeting with her; and he, not diſcovering ſhe was his wife, had got her with child: but this matter being afterwards diſcover'd, ſhe only inſiſted, in the houſe of lords, that the late earl had turn'd her out of doors, and that the preſent earl had been the occaſion of her misfortune, by refuſing to live with her, at a time when he could make no juſt objection to her conduct; notwithſtanding ſhe had ſaved his life, by petitioning King James in his behalf. The lords, tho' they paſs'd the bill for diſſolving the marriage, and to make her children illegimate, had ſuch a regard to her repreſentations, that they added a proviſo, whereby the earl was obliged to reſtore her fortune.

Affairs of the Eaſt-India trade.

The buſineſs of the Eaſt-India-trade, which had been depending many years, and was look'd on as ſo nice and difficult, that it had been refer'd to the King and his council, and back again by them to the parliament, was now brought upon the carpet again. The old company having offer'd to advance 700,000 l. at four per cent, for the ſervice of the government, in caſe the trade to India might be ſettled on them, excluſive of all others, the houſe ſeem'd inclined to imbrace their propoſal; when another number of merchants, the chief of whom was mr. Shephard, who were, likewiſe, favor'd by the court, propoſed to the houſe to raiſe two millions, at eight per cent, on condition the trade to India might be ſettled on the ſubſcribers excluſive of all others. They alſo propoſed, that theſe ſubſcribers ſhould not be obliged to trade in a joint-ſtock, but if any members of them ſhould afterwards deſire to be incorporated, a charter ſhould be granted them for that purpoſe. The houſe judged this new overture not only to be more advantageous to the government, but, likewiſe, very likely to ſettle this controverted trade, on a better footing than it had hitherto been. A bill was, therefore, ordered, the 26th of May, to be brought into the houſe, " for ſettling the trade to the Eaſt-Indies, on " thoſe who ſhould ſubſcribe the two millions, " according to the limitations before-mentioned," and then they made the following reſolutions:

WILL' III. AN' 1698.

" 1ſt, That every ſubſcriber might have the " liberty of trading yearly, to the amount of his " reſpective ſubſcription, or might aſſign over his " liberty of trading, to any other perſon.

" 2d, That his Majeſty be impower'd to in- " corporate ſuch of the ſaid ſubſcribers as ſhould " deſire the ſame.

3. " That the powers and privileges for carrying " on the Eaſt-India trade ſhould be ſettled by par- " liament.

4. " That the ſaid ſubſcribers ſhould injoy the " ſaid eight per cent, and liberty of trading to the " Eaſt-Indies, excluſive of all others, for the term " of ten years, and until the ſame ſhould be re- " deemed by parliament.

5. " That every perſon ſubſcribing 500 l. have " a vote, and no perſon to have more votes than " one.

6. " That all ſhips laden in the Eaſt-Indies " ſhould be obliged to deliver in England.

7. " That no perſon who ſhould be a member of " any corporation trading to the Eaſt-Indies, ſhould " trade otherwiſe, than in the joint-ſtock of ſuch " corporation of which he was a member.

8. " That 5 l. per annum, ad valorem, upon all " returns from the Eaſt-Indies, be paid by the im- " porter, to be placed to the account of the ſub- " ſcribers, towards the charge of ſending em- " baſſadors, and other extraordinary expences; " and;

9. " That over and above the duties now paya- " ble, a farther duty of one ſhilling and ten pence " per pound weight, be laid upon all wrought-ſilks " imported from India and Perſia, to be paid " by the importer.

The bill being accordingly brought into the houſe, the old Eaſt-India-company petitioned againſt it, to which the commons had ſo much regard, as to offer the ſettling of this trade on them, if they would accept it on the ſame terms and limitations, on which the others were contented to take it, and which the parliament judged moſt advantageous for the kingdom; but the members of the old company having rejected this propoſal, the commons paſſed the bill, the 25th of June, in favor of the new adventurers.

Notwithſtanding this bill had paſſed the houſe of commons, the old company would not yet give up their cauſe, but followed the bill to the houſe of lords, where they were heard by their council, ſir Thomas Powis and ſir Bartholomew Shore, as their antagoniſts were, in anſwer to their allegations. The lords having weighed the reaſons on both ſides, and chiefly conſidered, that the propoſal the old company had at length made, to lend the two millions, was like to prove ineffectual, by reaſon that ſome of their principal members were known to have no great affection to the preſent government, upon mature conſideration they gave their concurrence to the bill (2). (2) Biſhop Burnet gives us the following account of the paſſing of this act: while the houſe of commons (ſays he) was ſeeking a fund for paying the arrears of the army, and for the expence at ſea and land, for the next year; a propoſal was made for conſtituting a new Eaſt-India-company, which ſhould trade with joint-ſtock, others being admited in a determinate proportion to a ſeparate trade. The old Eaſt-India-company oppoſed this, and offered to advance a ſum (but far ſhort of what the public occaſions, Affairs of the African company.

As I am now upon the affairs of trade, it may not be improper to mention here, that the commons took likewiſe into conſideration, thoſe of the African company, which had long wanted a due regulation: and upon account of the neceſſity of keeping up forts and caſtles, for the defenſe of the Engliſh factories, on the coaſt of Guinea, the parliament made a bill to ſettle the ſaid company, and to inable them to maintain all ſuch forts, as they now had in their poſſeſſion, or ſhould hereafter purchaſe or erect, for the preſervation of their trade: and inacted, at the ſame time, that any of the ſubjects of this realm, as well as the ſaid company, might, after the 24th of June 1698, trade from England, or after the 1ſt of Auguſt, from any of his Majeſty's plantations in America, to the coaſt of Africa, between Cape-mount, and the Cape of Good Hope, both the ſaid company, and the interlopers, anſwering a duty of 10 per cent, of the value of the goods exported thither from England, or from his Majeſty's American plantations, towards the maintenance of the forts and ſettlements.

Owlers and ſmugglers puniſh'd.

This ſeſſion, likewiſe, the parliament, for the benefit of trade, made ſeveral prudent proviſions, inan act "for the explanation and better execution "of former acts made againſt tranſportation of "wool, fuller's-earth, and ſcouring clay;" they likewiſe applied themſelves with great diligence, to diſcover and puniſh ſuch offenders, who carried on a fraudulent and ſecret commerce with France, and, to the great damage of the royal luſtring company of this kingdom, had, for diverſe years paſt, ſurreptitiouſly brought in great quantities of French alamodes and luſtrings. Many of theſe private ſmugglers being detected, were impeached before the houſe of lords, of high-crimes and miſdemeanors; and eight of them were, by that houſe, fined in the ſum of 18,000 l. which, at the requeſt of the commons, was appropriated towards the building of Greenwich-Hoſpital.

Falſe indorſements on exchequer bills detected.

Offenders of another kind were likewiſe animadverted upon, this ſeſſion, by the commons, tho' they had the good fortune to come off at a rate no way adequate to their crime. Theſe were certain officers concerned in the revenue, who found means to rob the public many ways; but more particularly by falſe indorſements on exchequer notes; by which they gained 7. l. 12 s. per cent, which indeed was allowed, upon the ſecond iſſuing of exchequer-bills, but not upon the firſt, 'till theſe plunderers of their country found means clandeſtinely to procure ſuch indorſements to defraud the public. The chief of theſe were mr. Charles Duncomb, receiver-general of the exciſe; John Knight, treaſurer of the cuſtoms; Bartholomew Burton of the exciſe-office; and Reginald Maryot, one of the deputy-tellers of the exchequer; the laſt of whom procured his pardon, by being an evidence againſt the reſt. Duncomb and Knight, who were members of the commons, were expelled the houſe and commited to the Tower, and Burton was ſent to Newgate. But after a bill had paſſed in the houſe of commons, to puniſh Duncomb, it was loſt in the upper houſe, by one ſingle voice; upon which the proſecution was dropped, and they all eſcaped (1).

Acts paſſed.

The 16th of May, the King came again to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent, 1. To "an act for laying ſeveral duties upon coals "and culm. 2. An act to execute judgments and "decrees, ſaved in a clauſe in an act made in this "reign, for taking away the courts holden before "the preſident and council of the marches of "Wales. 3. An act for continuing the duties "upon coffee, tea, chocolate and ſpices; for the "ſatisfaction of the Iriſh tranſport-debt. 4. An "act for the better preventing the counterfeiting "and diminiſhing the coin of this kingdom. "5. An act for determining differences by arbitration. 6. An act for the better payment of "inland-bills of exchange. 7. An act to naturalize the children of ſuch officers and ſoldiers, the "natural-born ſubjects of this realm, who had been "born abroad during the war; the parents of ſuch "children having been in the ſervice of the government. 8. An act to repeal an act made the "39th year of Queen Elizabeth, for reſtraining "malſters from making of malt;" and ſeveral "private acts.

The dependance of Ireland, on the parliament of England aſſerted.

The 21ſt, a complaint being made to the houſe of commons, of a printed book, intitled: "the "caſe of Ireland's being bound by acts of parliament "in England," (written by William Molyneux of Dublin, eſq;) which denied the dependance of Ireland on the parliament of England; the commons in a body preſented an addreſs to his Majeſty, wherein they ſet forth; "the dangerous attempts which had "been made by ſome of his ſubjects of Ireland, to "ſhake off their ſubjection to and dependance on "England; which appeared not only by the book "above-mention'd, but more fully by the proceedings "of the houſe of commons in Ireland, who pretended to paſs an act for the confirming an act of the "Engliſh parliament, for the ſecurity of his Majeſty's perſon and government, expreſly binding "Ireland, and making ſeveral alterations therein, "which amounted to a repeal of what was inacted in England: they therefore humbly beſought his Majeſty, that he would give his orders for preventing any thing of the like nature "for the future, and to diſcourage all things which "might in any degree leſſen the dependance of Ireland and England:" to which his Majeſty anſwered: "that he would take care what they "complained of ſhould be redreſſed.

The King's revenue provided for.

The 28th the commons reſolved, in order to make up the King's revenue, "that of the hereditary and "temporary exciſe, poſt-office, ſmall branches "of the new ſubſidies of tonage and poundage, "continued to the firſt day of February 1699, "700,000 l. be granted to his Majeſty, during "his life, and that whatſoever the ſaid revenues "ſhould exceed 700,000 l. yearly ſhould be ap-occaſions required) for an act of parliament, that ſhould confirm their charters. The projectors of the new company offered two millions, upon the ſecurity of a good fund to pay the intereſt of their mony at eight per cent; great oppoſition was made to this; for the King, upon an addreſs that was made to him, by the houſe of commons, had granted the old company a new charter, they being obliged to take in a new ſubſcription of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, to increaſe their ſtock and trade. Thoſe impowered by this new charter were not charged with any malverſation. They had been trading under great diſadvantages, and with great loſſes, by reaſon of the war; it is true, the King had reſerved a power to himſelf, by a clauſe in the charter, to diſſolve them, upon warning given, three years before ſuch diſſolution: ſo it was ſaid, that no injuſtice was done them, if public notice ſhould be given of ſuch an intended diſſolution. To this it was anſwered, that the clauſe, reſerving that power, was put in many charters; but that it was conſidered only as a threatning, obliging them to a good conduct; but that it was not ordinary to diſſolve a company, by virtue of ſuch a clauſe, when no error or malverſation was objected. The old company came at laſt to offer the whole ſum that was wanted; but the party was now formed, ſo they come too late, and this had no other effect, but to raiſe a clamor againſt this proceeding, as extreamly rigorous, if not unjuſt: but the act was carried: the King was very indifferent in the matter at firſt, but the greatneſs of the ſum that was wanted, which could not probably be raiſed by any other project, prevailed on him.

(1) It was then generally believed, that Duncomb came off by the force of almighty gold, and that his ill acquired wealth, computed by ſome at 400,000 l. was ſunk at leaſt a third, if not one half, on this account. The commons were however ſo diſſatisfied at Duncomb's being ſet at liberty, by order of the houſe of lords, without their conſent, that they cauſed him to be remanded to the Tower, where he continued 'till the end of the ſeſſion.

Complaints againſt the woollen manufactures in Ireland.

The laſt thing I have to mention of note, which came under the conſideration of the houſe of commons, this ſeſſion, was the complaints made, that the woollen manufacture was carried on in Ireland, to the great prejudice of that ſtaple-trade in England. To ſtop the progreſs of this growing evil, they enter'd indeed upon a bill, but it terminated in an addreſs to the King, in which, among other things, they told his Majeſty, " that the par- " liament of England would be neceſſitated to inter- " poſe, to prevent this miſchief, unleſs his Ma- " jeſty, by his authority and great wiſdom, ſhould " find means to ſecure the trade of England, by " making his ſubjects of Ireland, to purſue the " joint intereſt of both kingdoms :" to this addreſs his Majeſty anſwered : " he ſhould do all that in " him lay, to promote the trade of England, and to " diſcourage the woollen, and incourage the linen- " manufacture in Ireland."

Acts paſſed.

WILL' III. AN' 1678.

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

" That he could not take leave of ſo good a " parliament, without publicly acknowleging the " ſenſe he had of the great things they had done " for his ſafety and honor, and for the ſupport and " welfare of his people. Every one of your ſeſſions " (continued he) has made good this character : the " happy uniting of us in an aſſociation, for our " mutual defenſe ; the remedying the corruption of " the coin, which had been ſo long growing upon " the nation ; the reſtoring of credit ; the giving " ſupplies, in ſuch a manner, for carrying on the " war, as did by GOD's bleſſing, purchaſe an hono- " rable peace ; and after that the making ſuch pro- " viſions for our common ſecurity, and towards " ſatisfying the debts contracted in ſo long a war, " with as little burden to the people as is poſſible, are " ſuch things as will give a laſting reputation to this " parliament, and will be a ſubject of emulation to " thoſe who ſhall come hereafter." He added, " that " beſide all this, he thought himſelf perſonally ob- " liged to return his thanks to the houſe of com- " mons, for the regard they had had to his honor, by " the eſtabliſhment of his revenue ; that there was " nothing he valued ſo much as the eſteem and love " of his people : and as, for their ſakes, he avoided " no hazards during the war, ſo his whole ſtudy " and care ſhould be to improve and continue to " them the advantages and bleſſings of peace." He concluded, " by earneſtly deſiring them all, in " their ſeveral ſtations, to be vigilant in preſerving " peace and good order, and a due and regular " execution of the laws, eſpecially thoſe againſt " irreligion and prophaneneſs.

The parliament diſſolved, and another called.

Then the parliament was prorogued to the 2d of Auguſt : but, on the 7th of July, a proclamation was iſſued, for diſſolving the preſent parliament, and calling another, to meet the 24th of Auguſt.

A new Eaſt-India-company erected.

The act for eſtabliſhing the new Eaſt-India-company having obtained the royal ſanction, the commiſſioners appointed by his Majeſty, for taking ſubſcriptions towards the raiſing of two millions, and for ſettling a new Eaſt-India-company, opened their books, the 14th of July, at Mercer's-hall, and ſuch was the zeal which people of all ranks, and even foreigners, ſhewed on this occaſion, to aſſiſt the government, and promote the trade of the nation, that in three days, the whole ſum was compleated (2).

(1) Tho' the deſign of this act was good, there was a neceſſity of repealing it ; becauſe debtors took the advantage of it, to make ſo many feigned creditors, that they out-voted the real creditors, and thereby, in a great meaſure, defrauded them of their debts.

(2) When the books were cloſed, it appeared, that there was ſomething more ſubſcribed than the two millions ; and it was then generally believed, that if they had been kept open, 'till the diſtant corporations, private men in remote countries, and merchants beyond-ſea could have remited their commiſſions, for the large ſums they intended to ſubſcribe, the ſubſcription would have amounted to, at leaſt two millions more : an aſtoniſhing inſtance of the opulence of England, and of the ſtrength of the government, hardly to be parallelled in the hiſtory of former times, and which poſterity will ſcarce believe.

Will'III. An' 1698.

His Majeſty afterwards granted a charter, bearing date the 5th of September, grounded upon this act of parliament, made and paſſed for that purpoſe, to this new ſociety for carrying on a trade to the Eaſt-Indies, by the name of; "The General Society, "intitled to the advantages given by an act of par- "liament, for advancing a ſum not exceeding two "millions, for the ſervice of the crown of England." For which, every ſubſcriber towards it, beſide the freedom of traffic to the Eaſt-Indies, under the reſtrictions and limitations mentioned in the ſaid charter, are intitled to an annuity of eight per cent for ever, in the manner by the act preſcribed.

We have an abſtract of this charter, in Harris, to which are annex'd heads of an agreement between the two Eaſt-India-companies; but they are too prolix to be here inſerted.

Some domeſtic occurrences.

I muſt now go back to ſome other tranſactions which happened during the ſeſſion of parliament. I have already mentioned monſ. de Tallard's arrival in England, as embaſſador from France: the 28th of March, he had his firſt private audience of the King at Kenſington. The next day baron Simeoni, captain of the guards of the elector of Bavaria, had his firſt public audience of his Majeſty; and the count de Platen, chamberlain to his electoral highneſs of Brumſwick, had, the ſame day, his audience of leave.

The King goes to New-market.

The 4th of April, the King went to New-market, to take the diverſions of hunting and horſe-racing: and the next day, the univerſity of Cambridge paid their duty to his Majeſty, being introduced by their chancellor, the duke of Sommerſet. Monſ. de Tallard followed his Majeſty to that place, and was not a little ſurprized to ſee ſo vaſt a concourſe of nobility and gentry (eſpecially as it was in time of parliament) and the prodigious ſums of mony that were either won or loſt there. The 16th, his Majeſty returned to Kenſington; the 26th, the count de Bonde, embaſſador extraordinary from the court of Sweden, made his public entry in mourning on occaſion of the death of the late King of Sweden; and on the 29th had his firſt public audience of King William at Windſor. The 16th of May, the French embaſſador made his public entry, with a very handſome, tho' ſmall retinue, and on the 19th had his firſt public audience at Windſor, where he was ſplendidly entertained at dinner. The 30th the Swediſh embaſſador returned to the Sovereign the Garter and George of his late Majeſty Charles XI, King of Sweden, with the whole habit, and other enſigns of the order, that he had been inveſted with in 1669; which act was performed at Kenſington with great ce remony.

Will'III. An' 1698.

I have already mentioned the earl of Portland's embaſſy to France, where he made his public entry with ſuch pomp and ſplendor, as had never been ſeen at that court, ſince the duke of Buckingham was there, to demand the Princeſs Mary Henrietta, of France, in marriage for King Charles I. The 11th of March, he was admited to hi firſt public audience, where nothing was wanting on the ſide of the court, to ſhew him the moſt diſtinguiſhing marks of honor (1). Nor were the Princes of the blood, and the marſhals of France, and other perſons of the higheſt diſtinction in that kingdom, leſs forward in ſhewing him the moſt ſingular marks poſſible of honor and reſpect. He was in particular treated four days, with great magnificence at Verſailles (2).

The earl of Portland's embaſſy to France.

The 4th of June, the earl of Portland had his laſt private audience (having had ſeveral before) of the French King, at Verſailles, in his cloſet, when he took his leave, as he did of the reſt of the court ſoon after. The King ſent the earl the uſual preſent of his picture ſet with diamonds: but it was obſerv'd that the ſtones were of three times the value uſual on thoſe occaſions. The 8th, he left Paris, and arrived at Kenſington, on the 19th of the ſame month (3).

Lords-juſtices appointed.

The 16th of July, the King declared in council his intention of going to Holland, in a ſhort time, and that he had nominated the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord Sommers, lord chancellor; the earl of Pembroke, lord privy-ſeal; the duke of Devonſhire, lord ſteward of his Majeſty's houſhold; the earl of Dorſet; the earl of Marlborough, governor to his Highneſs the duke of Glouceſter; the earl of Romney, lord warden of the Cinque-ports; the earl of Oxford, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty; and Charles Montague eſq; firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, to be lords-juſtices of England, for the adminiſtration of the government, during his abſenſe. Four days after, the King ſet ſail for Holland, attended by a ſquadron of men of war, under the command of ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, and landing the next day at Orange-polder, lay that night at his palace at Hounſlardike, and went from thence to the Hague; where I ſhall leave his Majeſty to give a brief account of the affairs of Scotland and Ireland.

The King goes to Holland.

The parliament of Scotland meeting, the 19th of July, the King's letter to them was read, in which

Affairs of Scotland.

(1) He had this audience, in his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's bed-chamber, and even within the rails round the bed, where the King ſtood, with the three young Princes his grandſons, the count de Thouloufe, the duke d'Aumont, and the marſhal de Noailles; an honor rarely ſhewn any embaſſador, unleſs on very extraordinary occaſions.

(2) I muſt not here omit a paſſage between mr. Prior, ſecretary of the embaſſy, and one of the French King's officers. The latter leading the ſecretary about the apartments, ſhewed him, among other curioſities, thoſe fine pieces of Le Brun, repreſenting Lewis XIVth's victories, and could not forbear being ſo vain, to aſk him, in a taunting manner, whether King William's actions were, likewiſe, to be ſeen, in his palace? To which mr. Prior, as wittily, as aptly replied: "No, ſir, "the monuments of my maſter's actions are to be ſeen every where but in his own houſe."

(3) Thus ended this famous embaſſy, which, it has been ſaid, coſt King William 80,000 l. to little or no purpoſe, but to do honor to his favorite; for, as it has been very juſtly obſerved, "no embaſſador was ever more honored, or leſs ſucceſsful, than "the earl of Portland: not having been able to gain one of the two points, which he had principally in commiſſion; I mean "the removal of King James, and the relief of the Proteſtants of France, againſt whom the perſecution, which had been, in "ſome meaſure, interrupted by the war, began to rage afreſh, with redoubled violence; both which, Lewis XIV flatly "denied:" and he perhaps, may have been the more tenacious, in thoſe and other points, as France had not found any great immediate benefit by the peace, farther than the diſcontinuance of a war, they were not in a condition to carry on, and a time to breathe, in order to prepare for the execution of other great ſchemes, they had even now undoubtedly in view. The continuator of Rapin, in French, gives this matter a very different turn, and will not allow that the French King was reduced to any neceſſity of making peace, being (as he expreſſes it) every where conqueror; but that it was a meer ſtrain of policy: however it is moſt probable that they both concurred. As to their commerce with England, in particular, they did not find their expectations anſwered. The Engliſh were uſed, before the war, to ſend vaſt ſums of mony yearly into France, not only for wines, paper, ſtuffs, linen, hats and ſilks; but alſo for a great many unprofitable and unneceſſary bawbles, which were all paid for with ready mony; they taking little or nothing of our growth or manufacture: but the Engliſh had, by this time, learnt to make ſhift without theſe commodities of the product of France. They ſupplied themſelves with wines, chiefly from Portugal, Italy, and Spain, with linen from Holland and Sileſia; and for papers, ſtuffs, hats and ſilks, the manufactures of thoſe goods ſet up here by the French refugees ſufficiently furniſhed us; ſo that when the French King ſent over a commiſſary-general, to regulate the commerce between the two nations, he met with inſuperable difficulties; as well on this account, as becauſe of the great duties laid on all French goods, which were already appropriated to ſeveral uſes.

"he

" he thanked them for the proofs they had given " him of their loyalty and affection during the war, " and aſſured them, he would give them ſuch in- " couragement, on all occaſions, that they ſhould " find the advantages of their fidelity and duty to " him; and he was ſorry the ſituation of his affairs " prevented his deſign of holding this ſeſſion of " parliament in perſon: he acquainted them, that " it was abſolutely neceſſary, for the forces to be " continued, and deſired ſupplies accordingly. " He recommended the diſcouragement of irre- " ligion, vice and immorality: and put them in " mind of the great deliverance he had been the " occaſion of; aſſuring them, at the ſame time, of " his care to maintain their religious and civil " rights, and of his favor and protection, in all " their concerns.

The Scots Eaſt-India-company were, however, notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances, very uneaſy, on account of the ſtop put to their ſubſcriptions, by England; they therefore prefered a petition to their parliament, in which they repreſented; " that " notwithſtanding the King and parliament had, " by two ſeveral ſolemn acts, and letters-patent, " eſtabliſhed their company, with ſuch powers and " privileges, as were neceſſary to incourage their " undertakings; and particularly, impowered them " to raiſe a joint-ſtock, and to infranchiſe ſuch " foreiners, as would become partners with them, " and to enter into treaties of commerce, with " any in amity with his Majeſty: and accordingly " their directors propoſing to ſhare theſe privileges " with their country-men, and their neighbors in " England, 300,000 l. had been ſubſcribed, by " the ſubjects of both kingdoms, within the " ſpace of nine days, as one half of their capital- " ſtock, and one-fourth thereof paid in ſpecie: " that the commons of England had, notwith- " ſtanding, defeated their enterprize, by ſum- " moning, not only the Engliſh ſubſcribers, but " ſeveral of the ſubjects of Scotland, before them, " and laid them under ſuch diſcouragements, that " they were forced to relinquiſh the undertaking: " that, however, the nobility, gentry, and mer- " chants in Scotland, upon the faith of the " ſaid acts of parliament and letters-patent, raiſed " ſtill a more conſiderable ſtock, for carrying on " this trade, and had as great expectations of fo- " rein aids as their hearts could wiſh; eſpecially " at Hamburg, where the merchants of that city " entered into a contract with their directors, to " join at leaſt 200,000 l. ſterling with them: but, " to their great ſurprize, the Engliſh miniſters, un- " der pretenſe of a warrant from his Majeſty, put a " ſtop thereto, not only diſowning the authority of " the ſaid acts of parliament, and letters-patent, " but by threatning both the ſenate and inhabi- " tants of Hamburg, with the King's utmoſt diſ- " pleaſure, if they countenanced or joined in the " ſaid trade.

" That as the proſpect they had of aſſiſtance " from Hamburg, and ſeveral other places, had " induced them to prepare a far greater equipage, " than otherwiſe they would have done; ſo the ren- " dring thoſe meaſures abortive had not only weak- " ened their ſtock, leſſened their credit, retarded " their firſt expedition, and diſheartned many of " their partners at home, but even ſlackened their " reſolution and power of proſecuting, at that time, " ſeveral other branches of forein and domeſtic " trades and improvements, which they had in " view, that tho' their company was more imme- " diately and ſenſibly touched, by theſe proceed- " ings; yet they conceived, that the honor and " independency of the nation, as well as the credit " and authority of parliament, was ſtruck at, " thro' their ſides: and therefore they could not " avoid laying this matter before the great " council of the nation, that they might provide " ſuch remedies, as they, in their great wiſdom, " ſhould judge proper, and vindicate their com- " pany's reputation abroad, by ſupporting the " credit of the acts of parliament and letters " patent, by which the ſame was eſtabliſhed, and " wherein the honor of the nation was ſo much " concerned."

WILL' III. AN' 1698.

The parliament, hereupon, addreſſed his Majeſty, and ſet forth, " that having conſidered the " repreſentation made to them, by their company " trading to Africa and the Indies, ſhewing ſeveral " obſtructions they had met with in their trade, by " a memorial preſented to the ſenate of Hamburg, " by his Majeſty's reſident, and otherwiſe; they, " therefore laid before his Majeſty, the whole nation's " concern in that matter; earneſtly intreating, and " aſſuredly expecting, that his Majeſty would take " ſuch meaſures as might effectually vindicate the " undoubted rights and privileges of the ſaid com- " pany, and ſupport the credit and intereſt thereof; " and as they returned his Majeſty their hearty " thanks for the aſſurances he had given them of all " due incouragement, for promoting the trade of that " kingdom, they humbly recommended to the " more eſpecial marks of his favor, the concern " of the ſaid company, as that branch of their " trade, in which they, and the nation they " repreſented, had a more particular inte- " reſt."

This addreſs, and two petitions from the Eaſt-India-company to the King, had, however no effect; his Majeſty thinking it neceſſary to continue diſincouraging the undertaking, both at Hamburg and in England. This was ſo highly reſented by the parliament of Scotland, that they came to ſome threatning reſolutions; upon which, the high commiſſioner adjourned them, from time to time, which did but more and more incenſe the nation. Under all theſe difficulties, they however proceeded to ſettle a colony or Darien, and might probably have maintained it, if the jealouſy of the Spaniards, and their precautions, backed by a prohibition from England to the iſland of Jamaica, and all other Engliſh ſettlements in America, to have any intercourſe or correſpondence with the Scots at Darien, or to furniſh them with proviſions of any kind, had not deprived them of all means of ſubſiſtence: but I ſhall have occaſion to ſay more of this matter, in the ſequel.

Affairs of Ireland.

While the King was in Holland, a parliament was alſo aſſembled in Ireland, which met the 17th of September, according to their laſt prorogation, and was opened with a ſpeech by one of the lords-juſtices; in which he reminded the Iriſh, " that it was to King William they owed their de- " liverance, their preſent ſafety, and their hopes of " future proſperity: he then recommended to the " parliament the incouragement of the linen- " manufacture; and told them, that the woollen- " manufacture could never be incouraged there, " being the ſtaple-trade of England, from whence " all forein markets were ſupplied: he likewiſe " informed them, that the King would ſend over " from England part of the forces, which had " ſerved abroad, and diſband moſt of thoſe in Ire- " land (except five regiments of French refugees) " however, the King declared he would keep the " officers in pay 'till they could be otherwiſe pro- " vided for, and deſired ſupplies accordingly."

Upon this, both houſes voted " their thanks to " his Majeſty for what he had done, and intended " to do for them; but could, by no means, come " into the ſcheme for ſuppreſſing their woollen " manufacture: they hoped to regulate it ſo (they " ſaid) that it might not be prejudicial to England."

A motion

Will'HI. An' 1698.

A motion was alſo made, for addreſſing his Majeſty, to diſband the five French regiments in Ireland; but it was rejected. The parliament then proceeded to the buſineſs of the ſupply, and readily granted what was demanded of them. The bill for levying the ſupply granted being compleated, the lord-juſtices adjourned the parliament, and then took a progreſs into the country, to view the ſtate of ſeveral places in the kingdom, and give ſuch inſtructions as were neceſſary for the ſecurity of the government.

Maritime affairs.

I ſhould now, according to the method I have hitherto obſerved, give an account of our maritime affairs: but nothing happen'd this year at ſea, worthy our notice (1); towards the latter end of the year, rear-admiral Bembow was, indeed, ordered to the Weſt-Indies, with three men of war of the fourth-rate, and a ſmall French prize: and he ſailed, accordingly, the 29th of November: but as nothing occured, before the concluſion of this year, I ſhall defer my relation of his proceedings to the next; and give ſome account of what was doing, during this time, beyond the ſeas. We left the King at the Hague, ſtill imploying his thoughts how to eſtabliſh the public tranquility of Europe, as well by mediating a peace between the Chriſtians and the Turks, as by providing againſt the pretenſions which France might make upon the death of the King of Spain, who was in a languiſhing condition. His Majeſty having aſſiſted at the aſſembly of the States of Holland, and that of the States-general, and given audience to ſeveral public miniſters, went, the 6th of Auguſt, N. S. to Loo, whither he was attended by the earls of Eſſex, Portland and Selkirk, with ſeveral other perſons of quality.

Negociation of the firſt treaty of partition.

Here it was the count de Tallard, in the name of the French King, made the firſt propoſal to King William (2), of coming to an agreement with his Britanic Majeſty, concerning the ſucceſſion of the crown of Spain. The French embaſſador being very urgent for his Majeſty's anſwer, the earl of Portland was ordered to write a letter to mr. ſecretary Vernon, and inform him; "that count "Tallard having declared an accommodation "might be found out, in relation to the Spaniſh "ſucceſſion, his Majeſty had founded France upon "the conditions, of which he ſubjoined the par"ticulars (3)". The King, at the ſame time, acquainted the lord Sommers by letter, "that "he had ordered mr. Vernon, not to communi-"cate the propoſals made by count Tallard, to "any other beſide his lordſhip, and to leave to his "lordſhip's judgment, to whom elſe he ſhould "think proper to impart them; to the end that "his Majeſty might know his lordſhip's opinion "upon ſo important an affair, which required the "greateſt ſecreſy, and in which no time was to "be loſt, if it was fit the negociation ſhould be "carried on." For that purpoſe, his Majeſty commanded the lord Sommers, "to ſend him the "full powers, under the great-ſeal, with the names "in blank, to treat with count Tallard, which he "believed might be done ſecretly, that none but "his lordſhip and Vernon, and thoſe to whom "his lordſhip ſhould communicate it, might "have knowledge of it; and ſo that the clerks "themſelves, who were to write the warrant, and "the full powers, might not know what it was." To preſs the neceſſity of this treaty, his Majeſty obſerved; "That, according to all intelligence, "the King of Spain could not out-live the month "of October, and that the leaſt accident might "carry him off, before that time."

Will'III. An' 1698.

The lord Sommers being at Tunbridge, when mr. Vernon received the earl of Portland's letter, that to his lordſhip was immediately ſent him thither, and he as ſoon returned it to mr. Vernon, deſiring him to communicate the contents of it to the lord Orford, mr. Montague, and the duke of Shrewſbury, and to let them know, at the ſame time, how ſtrictly his Majeſty required that it ſhould remain an abſolute ſecret. Mr. Vernon, however, did not think it proper to impart it then to any but the earl of Shrewſbury. Some time after, mr. Montague and mr. Vernon going to Tunbridge, they and the lord Sommers, debated this important matter; and thereupon his lordſhip writ a letter to the King, acquainting him:

The lord Sommers's anſwer.

"That, upon the whole diſcourſe, three things "had principally occured to be humbly ſuggeſted "to his Majeſty: Firſt, that the entertaining a "propoſal of this nature ſeem'd to be attended "with very many ill conſequences, if the French "did not act a ſincere part; but that they were "ſoon at eaſe, as to any apprehenſion of that ſort, "being fully aſſured his Majeſty would not act "but with the utmoſt nicety, in an affair wherein "his glory, and the ſafety of Europe, were ſo "highly concern'd. Second, that the next thing "to be conſidered was the very ill proſpect of what "was like to happen, upon the death of the King "of Spain, in caſe nothing was done previouſly, "towards the providing againſt that accident, "which ſeemed probably to be very near; the "King of France having ſo great a force, in ſuch "a readineſs, that he was in a condition to take "poſſeſſion of Spain, before any other Prince could "be ready to make a ſtand. That his Majeſty, "who was ſo perfectly inform'd of the circum-"ſtances of parts abroad, was the beſt judge whe-"ther this was the caſe: but that ſo far as related to "England, it would be want of duty, not to give "his Majeſty this clear account; that there was "a deadneſs and want of ſpirit in the nation uni-"verſally, ſo as not at all to be diſpoſed to the "thoughts of entring into a new war; and that "they ſeem'd to be tired with taxes, to a degree "beyond what was diſcerned, 'till it appear'd upon "the occaſion of the late elections; and that this "was the truth of the fact, upon which his Ma-"jeſty would determine what reſolutions were pro-"per to be taken. That what remained was,

(1) Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that before the King departed for Holland, there came news from Spain, that their King was dying. The French (continues he) upon this ſent a fleet to ly before Cadiz, which came thither at the time the gallions were expected home, from the Weſt-Indies; and, it was apprehended, that if the King had died, they would have ſeized on all that treaſure: we ſent a fleet thither, to ſecure them; but it came too late to have done any ſervice, if it had been needed. This (adds the Biſhop) was much cenſured: but the admiralty excuſed themſelves, by ſaying, that the parliament was ſo late in fixing the funds, for the fleet, that it was not poſſible to be ſooner than they were: However the King of Spain recovered for that time. Hiſtory of his own times.

(2) This propoſal had been made by the French King to the earl of Portland, while he was in France, and it was probably in order to ingage King William to give into it, without ſuſpecting any latent ſubterfuge, that he indeavor'd to dazzle his Majeſty's eyes, by the extraordinary reception he gave to his embaſſador, and by the marks of his eſteem and affection which he gave him in ſeveral letters: which overture King William had communicated to his chancelor before he left England.

(3) Theſe conditions were in ſubſtance, "that the Electoral Prince of Bavaria ſhould have the kingdom of Spain, the Indies, "and the Low-Countries, and all that depended upon the Spaniſh dominions, except Naples and Sicily, Sardinia, the province "of Guipuſcoa, on this ſide of the Pyrenées, Fontarabia and St. Sebaſtian, Final, and the places in Tuſcany, of which Spain "ſtood poſſeſſed, in conſideration of which France was abſolutely to renounce the right it pretended to the ſucceſſion of Spain, "and as for Milan, it was to be given to the arch-duke Charles, the Emperor's ſecond ſon (now Emperor)."

"Third,

Will' III. An' 1698.

" Third, the conſideration, what would be the " condition of Europe, if the propoſal took place? " that of this they thought themſelves little capable " of judging; but it ſeem'd, that if Sicily was in " French hands, they would be intirely maſters of " the Levant-trade; that, if they were poſſeſs'd of " Final, and thoſe other ſea-ports on that ſide, " whereby Milanf would be intirely ſhut out from " relief by ſea, or any other commerce, that duchy " would be of little ſignification in the hands of " any Prince; and that if the King of France had " poſſeſſion of Guipuſcoa, which was mentioned " in the propoſal, beſide the ports he would have " in the ocean, it was apparent there would be as ea- " ſy a way of invading Spain on that ſide, as he now " had on the ſide of Catalonia: but that it was not " to be hoped, that France would quit its " pretences to ſo great a ſucceſſion, without con- " ſiderable advantages; and that they were all " aſſured his Majeſty would reduce the terms as " low as could be done, and make them, as far " as poſſible, in the preſent circumſtances of things, " ſuch as might be ſome foundation, for the future " quiet of Chriſtendom, which, all his ſubjects " could not but be convinced, was his true aim. " That if it could be brought to paſs, that Eng- " land might be ſome way a gainer by this tranſ- " action, whether it was by the Elector of Bava- " ria (who was the gainer by his Majeſty's inter- " poſition in this treaty) his coming to an agree- " ment, to let the Engliſh into ſome trade to the " Spaniſh plantations, or in any other manner, it " would wonderfully indear his Majeſty to his ſub- " jects. That it did not appear, in caſe this ne- " gociation ſhould proceed, what was to be done " on his Majeſty's part, in order to make it take " place; whether any more was required, than " that the Engliſh and Dutch ſhould ſit ſtill, and " France itſelf ſhould ſee it executed? that if it " were ſo, what ſecurity ought to be expected; " that if by their being maſters, the French were " ſucceſsful, the latter would confine themſelves to " the terms of the treaty; and not attempt to make " farther advantages of their ſucceſs?" the lord Sommers concluded theſe prudent and weighty cautions, by telling the King; " that he ſuppoſed " his Majeſty would not think it proper to name " commiſſioners, that were not Engliſh, or natura- " lized, in an affair of this nature."

The negociation was, in the mean time, ſo eagerly carried on, that, on the 29th of Auguſt N. S. ſeveral days before his Majeſty had received the lord Sommers's anſwer, a treaty was concluded, by which it was agreed:

The firſt treaty of partition.

I. " That the peace of Ryſwick ſhould be " confirm'd.

II. " That in conſideration of the ill ſtate of the " King of Spain's health, and for preſerving the " public peace, in caſe the ſaid Prince ſhould die " without iſſue, the kingdom of Naples and " Sicily, with the places then depending upon " the Spaniſh monarchy, ſituated on the coaſts of " Tuſcany, or the adjacent iſlands, comprehended " under the name of Santo-Stephano, Porto-Her- " cole, Orbitello, Telamone, Portolongo, Piom- " bino, the marquiſate of Final, the province of " Guipuſcoa, particularly the towns of Fontarabia " and St. Sebaſtian, and eſpecially Port-Paſſage; " and, likewiſe, all places on the French ſide of " the Pyrenees, or the other mountains of Navarre, " Alava or Biſcay, on the ſide of the province of " Guipuſcoa, with all the ſhips and gallies, and " other appurtenances belonging to the ſaid gallies, " ſhould be given to the Dauphin, in conſideration " of his right.

III. " That the crown of Spain, and the other " kingdoms, and places, both within and without " Europe, ſhould deſcend to the Electoral Prince of " Bavaria, of whom his father, the Elector, was " to be a guardian and adminiſtrator, till he came " of age.

IV. " That the duchy of Milan ſhould be re- " ſerved and alloted to arch-duke Charles, the " Emperor's ſecond ſon."

This treaty was to be communicated to the Emperor and the Elector of Bavaria, by the King of Great-Britain and the States-General; and if they did not agree to it, then the proportion of the party not agreing, ſhould remain in ſequeſtration, 'till things could be brought to an accommodation. And in caſe the Electoral Prince of Bavaria ſhould come to inherit his ſhare, and yet die before his father, without iſſue, the Elector was to ſucceed him in thoſe dominions, and his heir after him. Likewiſe the duchy of Milan, upon the arch-duke's refuſal to accept of it, was to be ſequeſtred and govern'd by the Prince of Vaudemont, and, after him, by his ſon, Prince Charles of Vaudemont.

Intreagues of the marquis de Harcourt.

While the French King was thus decoying King William into the treaty of partition, the marquis de Harcourt, the French embaſſador, at the court of Spain, was ſeting all his engines to work, to pave the way, for a Prince of the houſe of Bourbon, to mount the Spaniſh throne: but the Queen of Spain, who was nearly related to the King of the Romans, and intirely in the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, by her vigilance, ſo circumvented his intreagues, that all he could do, for the preſent, was to ingage cardinal Portocarrero in the intereſt of France (1).

Farther intreagues of France.

The French King was no leſs aſſiduous to ſtrengthen his intereſt in the Northern parts of Europe, than in the Southern; to which end he ſought the alliance of the King of Sweden, with whom, at length, he concluded a treaty, at Stockholm, the 9th of July: and as his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, in order to be in a readineſs, at all events, had cauſed 60,000 of his beſt men to file towards the frontiers of Catalonia and Navarre; and ſent a conſiderable number of his ſhips of war and gallies, into ſeveral ports of Spain; ſo, on the other hand, he cauſed a great camp to be formed at Campiegne, under the pretenſe of inſtructing the duke of Burgundy in the art of war: but which was thought to be deſign'd, to make, upon occaſion, a ſudden irruption into the Spaniſh Netherlands. However, the unexpected recovery of the King of Spain's health, diſpell'd the fears of one party, and diſappointed the hopes of the other, for the preſent.

King William goes to Zell.

King William, having taken a review of the Dutch troops near Arnheim, went, on the 20th of September, to pay a viſit to the duke of Zell, at his reſidence of that name, where he was received with extraordinary reſpect, and was waited upon by ſeveral neighboring Princes and Princeſſes, particularly the Electreſs of Hanover, with the Electoral

(1) By this, and what follows, the reader may form a judgment how juſt the precautions, and how ſalutary the counſels were, which the lord Sommers laid before his Majeſty, tho' they came too late to take effect. This, however, the author of the continuation of Rapin in French denies, and calls it a miſtake of the author of the compleat hiſtory of England. " It is " certain, ſays he, that the treaty was not ſign'd till September, or October; for the beſt writers are divided, as to which " of theſe two months, and even as to what day it was in either. There are very ſtrong reaſons to believe it was not ſign'd till " the 31ſt of October. Book 25. p. 327. Whenever this treaty was ſign'd, the private views France had in it are too evident, and will too plainly appear in the ſequel, to need any illuſtration here.

Will' III. An' 1698.

Prince and the Princeſs his ſiſter, and at his return to Loo, the duke of Bavaria came thither to pay his acknowlegements to his Majeſty for the care he had taken, in the late treaty of partition, for his intereſt. King William's journy to Zell gave the court of France great uneaſineſs; tho' he had nothing more in view but to cement the union of the Princes of Germany, by a match between the King of the Romans, and the Princeſs of Hanover, which was now agreed on, and ſoon after compleated; and by removing the apprehenſions ſome members of the Empire were under of the growing power of the Emperor. This latter, King William, to his immortal honor, found means to do effectually, in concert with the States, by puting a ſtop to the Hungarian war, which had laſted above fifteen years, and by their joint mediation ſet on foot the conferences at Carlowitz, which ended in the ſeveral treaties of peace and truce between the Turks, the Emperor, the Muſcovites, the Poles and the Venetians (1): and as, by this time, the new King, Auguſtus of Poland, had brought the Cardinal-Primate, who had all along ſtickled for the Prince of Conti, to acknowledge his title, and the troubles of Lithuania were likewiſe compoſed, there ſeemed now to be a univerſal peace ſettled, throughout Chriſtendom: but it proved of ſhort duration, as we ſhall ſoon ſee.

Treaty of Carlowitz.

King William returns to England.

The 9th of November, O. S. King William arrived at the Hague, from Loo; and having regulated all things neceſſary with the States-general, he imbark'd, the firſt of December, on board the William and Mary-yacht, and ſet ſail from the coaſt of Holland, attended by ſeveral other yachts, and a ſquadron of men of war commanded by ſir Cloudeſly Shovel. The 3d his Majeſty landed at Margate, and the 6th the parliament met.

The parliament meets.

The King being come to the houſe of peers, the chancelor ſignified to the commons his Majeſty's pleaſure, that they ſhould forthwith proceed to the choice of a ſpeaker. The commons, thereupon, returned to their houſe, and having made choice of ſir Thomas Littleton, baronet, preſented him, at the appointed time, to the King, who having declared his approbation of their choice, his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them:

Sir Thomas Littleton choſen ſpeaker.

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

" That he had no doubt but they were met together, with hearts fully diſpoſed to do what " was neceſſary for the ſafety, honor, and happi- " neſs of the kingdom, and that was all he had to " aſk of them: that, in order to this, two things " ſeemed principally to require their conſidera- " tion.

" One was, what ſtrength ought to be maintained at ſea, and what force kept up at land, for " this year; that all he ſhould obſerve to them " upon this head was, that the flouriſhing of trade, " the ſupporting of credit, and the quiet of peo- " ples minds at home, would depend upon the " opinion they had of their ſecurity; and that to " preſerve to England the weight and influence it " had at preſent, on the counſels and affairs abroad, " it would be requiſite Europe ſhould ſee they " would not be wanting to themſelves.

" That the ſecond thing he ſhould mention " to them, as of great conſequence, was the mak- " ing ſome farther progreſs towards diſcharging " the debts which the nation had contracted by " reaſon of the long and expenſive war. That " in this, the public intereſt, as well as juſtice, was " concerned, and he thought an Engliſh parliament could never make ſuch a miſtake, as not to " hold ſacred all parliamentary ingagements. He, " therefore, earneſtly recommended theſe things to " the houſe of commons; that they might pro- " vide ſuch ſupplies, as they ſhould judge neceſſary " for theſe ſeveral occaſions; and concluded, by " telling both houſes, that he thought it would be " happy, if ſome effectual expedient could be found, " for imploying the poor, which might tend to the " great increaſe of our manufactures, as well as to " remove a heavy burden from the people: that " he hoped alſo they would imploy their thoughts " about ſome good bills for the advancement " of trade, and for the farther diſcouraging of " vice and prophaneneſs: and theſe things which he " now mentioned to them, being of common con- " cern, he could not but hope for unanimity " and diſpatch."

Will' III. An' 1698.

It is remarkable, that the King, in this ſpeech, does not ſo much as mention the partition-treaty he had ſo lately concluded abroad; his Majeſty, for what reaſons I ſhall not pretend to determine, making it a ſecret, as well to the privy-council as the parliament. It appears, however, by this ſpeech, that the King was deſirous of having a good body of land-forces kept on foot, as well as a good navy maintained at ſea, to compel the execution of that treaty, if upon the King of Spain's death, France ſhould attempt to fly off from it: but the parliament not being acquainted (at leaſt not in form) with this treaty, did not apprehend it neceſſary, to have a great army on foot, in time of peace; the firſt reſolution, they, therefore, came to, in this ſeſſion was; " that all the land-forces " in Engliſh pay, exceeding 7000 men (and thoſe " conſiſting of his Majeſty's natural-born ſubjects) " be forthwith paid off and diſbanded: and that " all the forces in Ireland, exceeding 12,000 men, " (and thoſe his Majeſty's natural-born ſubjects, to " be kept and maintained by the kingdom of Ire- " land) be, likewiſe, forthwith diſbanded, and they " ordered a bill to be brought in, purſuant to that " reſolution," which had a quick paſſage thro' both houſes. Theſe proceedings occaſioned a great clamor, and it was ſtrongly urged, " that this great " reform would leave the kingdom naked, and " expoſed to the enemy:" but, on the other hand, it was argued, that the King had ſtill an army of 24 or 25,000 men, viz. the 7000 in England, 12,000 in Ireland, and 4 or 5000 in Scotland, and beſide, that all the officers of the late army were kept either in whole or half-pay; ſo that, at a very ſhort warning, the Engliſh army might have been increaſed to 50,000 men. But even allowing all this, if the nation had been in diſtreſs, either by an invaſion, from abroad, or an inſurrection at home, it would have found but very little ſafety, from theſe troops, ſo diſperſed in the three kingdoms.

An' 1699.

Theſe proceedings could not but make the King very uneaſy: however, his Majeſty conſidering, that to contend with the commons would but be to kick againſt the pricks, went to the houſe of lords, on the firſt of February, and gave the royal aſſent to, " Firſt, an act for granting an aid of 800,000 l. for " the effectual diſbanding of the army. Second, an " act to prevent the making or ſelling of buttons " made of cloth, ſerge, druget or other ſtuff. " Third, an act to prohibit the exportation of any " corn, malt, meal, flour, bread, biſcuit or ſtarch, " for one year;" and ſome private bills. On this occaſion, his Majeſty made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

Acts paſs'd.

(1) By this peace, the Emperor preſerved his late acquiſitions, and vaſtly inlarged his territories: the Poles had the important place of Caminieck reſtored to them, with other advantages: the Muſcovites were gainers by the keeping of Aſſoff: and the Venetians had all the Morea, and ſeveral fortreſſes in Dalmatia, yielded up to them; ſo that the Turks loſt the beſt half of their dominions in Europe.

My

WILL' III. AN' 1699.

My lords and gentlemen,

The King's speech to both houses.

" I am come to paſs this bill (meaning the mony-bill) as ſoon as I underſtood it was ready for me; tho', in our preſent circumſtances, there appears great hazard in breaking ſuch a number of the troops; and tho' I might think myſelf unkindly uſed, that thoſe guards, who came over with me, to your aſſiſtance, and have conſtantly attended me, in all the actions wherein I have been ingaged, ſhould be removed from me; yet it is my fix'd opinion, that nothing can be ſo fatal to us, as that any diſtruſt or jealouſy ſhould ariſe between me and my people; which I muſt own, would have been very unexpected, after what I have undertaken, ventured and acted, for the reſtoring and ſecuring of their liberties.

" I have thus plainly told you the only reaſon, which has induced me to paſs this bill; and now I think myſelf obliged, in diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in me, and for my own juſtification, that no ill conſequences may ly at my door, to tell you as plainly my judgment, that the nation is left too much expoſed.

" It is, therefore, incumbent upon you, to take this matter into your ſerious conſideration, and effectually to provide ſuch a ſtrength as is neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the preſervation of the peace, which GOD has given us.

Addreſs of the commons.

The commons, hereupon, unanimouſly voted an addreſs of thanks to his Majeſty, which was preſented, the fourth, by the whole houſe; wherein they ſet forth;

" How ſenſible they were of the difficulties and labors he had ſuſtained; and the hazards he had run in reſcuing their religion, and liberties, and giving peace to Chriſtendom; they thank'd him for his good will and affection to his people, and the undeniable proofs he gave to comply with their deſires in parliament, and, laſtly, aſſured him, he ſhould never have reaſon to think his commons undutiful or unkind to him, but that they would always ſupport his perſon and government, againſt all his enemies.

In anſwer to this, the King told them:

The King's anſwer.

" That he was fully ſatisfied of their duty and affection, and had no doubt but they would always act in the manner they had expreſſed on this occaſion.

Addreſs of the lords.

The lords, likewiſe, preſented an addreſs to his Majeſty on this occaſion; " thanking him for his willingneſs to diſband the army, as well as for his great care and concern for the ſafety of the kingdom upon all occaſions, aſſuring his Majeſty, that, at all times, for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the preſervation of the peace, which GOD had given them, they would aſſiſt and defend his Majeſty, againſt all his enemies, both at home and abroad:" for which addreſs, the King returned them his thanks.

The army reduced to 7000 men.

By theſe addreſſes it plainly appeared, that neither of the houſes ſeemed inclined to indulge the King, in keeping on foot a greater number of troops; upon which, his Majeſty wiſely gave into what he found would be to no purpoſe to oppoſe, and gave effectual orders for reducing the army, according to the late act: but he retained a greater number of horſe than foot, according to the uſual proportion, as likewiſe a larger number of officers, than that body of troops required. Amidſt theſe compliances, his Majeſty could not, however, conceal the reluctance he had of being obliged to ſend away his Dutch guards; a regiment, which he ſet the greater value upon, as they had attended his perſon from the cradle, followed his fortune every where, and to whom, beſide many other ſignal ſervices, he thought the famous victory of the Boyne chiefly owing; with theſe, I ſay, his Majeſty had the utmoſt regret to part. He therefore, on the 18th of March, ſent the following meſſage to the commons by the lord Ranelagh, not only ſigned, but all written with his own hand.

WILL' III. AN' 1699.

The King's meſſage about the Dutch guards.

" His Majeſty is pleaſed to let the houſe know, " that the neceſſary preparations are made for tranſporting the guards, who came with him into " England; and that he intends to ſend them " away immediately, unleſs, out of conſideration " to him, the houſe be diſpoſed to find a way for " continuing them longer in his ſervice, which " his Majeſty would take very kindly." W. R.

The queſtion was hereupon propoſed; that a day be appointed to conſider of his Majeſty's meſſage: but it was rejected, and inſtead thereof, they voted an addreſs to his Majeſty, in which they repreſented:

The addreſs of the commons thereupon.

" That the paſſing the late act for diſbanding the " army gave great ſatisfaction to the ſubjects, and " the readineſs his Majeſty had expreſſed, to com- " ply with the punctual execution thereof, would pre- " vent all occaſions of diſtruſt and jealouſy between " his Majeſty and his people.

" That it was an unſpeakable grief to them, his " Majeſty ſhould be adviſed to propoſe any thing, " to which they could not conſent, with due regard " to that conſtitution his Majeſty came over to re- " ſtore, and had ſo often expoſed himſelf to pre- " ſerve; reminding him of his declaration, that all " the forein forces he brought over ſhould be ſent " back.

" In duty therefore, to his Majeſty, and to diſ- " charge the truſt repoſed in them, they begged " leave to lay before him, that nothing conduced " more to the happineſs and welfare of this king- " dom, than an intire confidence between his Ma- " jeſty and his people, which could no way be ſo " firmly eſtabliſhed, as by intruſting his ſacred per- " ſon, with his own ſubjects, who had ſo eminent- " ly ſignalized themſelves during the late long " and expenſive war.

This addreſs being reported, the 20th of March, to the houſe, a motion was made, and the queſtion put, that it ſhould be re-commited, which having paſſed in the negative, the addreſs was preſented, the 24th, to his Majeſty, by the whole houſe.

The King's anſwer.

To this, the King replied, " that he came hither " to reſtore the ancient conſtitution of this govern- " ment; that he had all poſſible regard to it ſince " his coming, and was reſolved, thro' the courſe of " his reign, to indeavor to preſerve it intire, in all " the parts of it. That he had a full confidence in " the affections of his people, and was well aſſured, " they had the ſame in him; and as to his ſub- " jects, who had ſerved in the army, he was an " eye-witneſs of their bravery and zeal for his perſon " and government, and had all the reaſon to rely " upon them, that a Prince could have; he was ſa- " tisfied, that there was not a man among them " capable of entertaining a thought, that what " was propoſed in his meſſage, proceeded from any " miſtruſt of them.

" That it ſhould be his ſtudy to perform the part " of a juſt and good King; and as he ſhould ever " be nicely careful of obſerving his promiſes to his " ſubjects ſo he would not doubt of their tender " regard for him.

The Dutch guards return to Holland.

Hereupon his Majeſty finding the commons not to be removed from their reſolutions, the Dutch guards were ſoon after ſhipped off for Holland.

Acts paſſed.

The ſame day, the King came to the houſe of lords and gave the royal aſſent, 1. " To an act to prevent " the exceſſive diſtilling of ſpirits and low-wines " from corn, and againſt the exporting of beer and " ale, and to prevent frauds in diſtillers. 2. An " act to inlarge the trade to Ruſſia. 3. An act for " preventing

" preventing irregular proceedings of ſheriffs and " other officers, in making the returns of members " choſen to ſerve in parliament. 4. An act for the " clearing, repairing and maintaining the haven and " peers of Great Yarmouth, in the county of " Norfolk. 5. An act for making and keeping the " river Tone navigable, from Bridgwater to Taun- " ton in the county of Sommerſet.

Miſmanagements of the navy inquir'd into.

The army being thus diſbanded, the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the navy, and after a ſtrict examination of the preſent and paſt management of the maritime affairs, preſented an addreſs to his Majeſty, complaining of ſome miſconduct therein.

Addreſs of the commons thereupon.

In particular they repreſented, that the Streights ſquadron not ſailing 'till September laſt was prejudicial to England, and a great miſmanagement. That the orders made by the commiſſioners of the admiralty, the 12th of September 1695, giving Henry Prieſtman, eſq; an allowance of ten ſhillings per diem, from the date of his commiſſion, as commander in chief, before Sallee, in the year 1684, 'till the ſhip Bonadventure was paid off, over and above his pay, as captain of the ſaid ſhip, was very unreaſonable, and a miſapplication of the public mony. That the victualling any of his Majeſty's ſhips, by others than by the victualers appointed for that ſervice, or their agents, was contrary to the courſe of the navy, and might be of ill conſequence. That many new and unneceſſary charges had, in an extraordinary manner, been introduced into the navy, which was a great miſmanagement. That the deductions of poundage, taken by the paymaſters of the navy, for ſlop-cloths, dead-mens wages, tobacco, cheſt at Chatham, chaplain and ſurgeon was without warrant, and ought to be accounted for. That it was inconſiſtent with the ſervice of the navy, for the ſame perſon to be one of the commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral, and treaſurer of the navy, at the ſame time. And that the paſſing of any account of monies impreſſed for the contingent uſes of the navy, without regular vouchers, or ſuch other proof as the nature of the ſervice would admit, either with or without a ſign manual, was contrary to the rules and methods of the navy, and of dangerous conſequence. All which they beged leave to lay before his Majeſty, deſiring that he would be graciouſly pleaſed, to take effectual care, that the miſmanagements herein complained of might be prevented for the future (1).

The King's anſwer.

His Majeſty's anſwer was; " That he would " conſider their addreſs; that it was his deſire, that " all ſorts of miſmanagements and irregularities " ſhould be prevented or redreſſed; and that they " might be aſſured he would take the beſt care he " could in relation to the navy, the right ma- " nagement whereof was of ſo great concern to he " kingdom."

The diſaffected, and more eſpecially the Papiſts, being very elate upon the diſbanding of the army, the commons thought fit to take notice of it, in the following addreſs to his Majeſty:

Addreſs of the commons againſt Papiſts &c.

" We your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſub- " jects, the commons in parliament aſſembled, having " obſerved the great concourſe to this city of Pa- " piſts and other diſaffected perſons, who have not " owned your Majeſty to be lawful and rightful " King of theſe realms, and the boldneſs they aſ- " ſume from your Majeſty's unexpected clemency, " not only to keep horſes and arms, contrary to law, " but alſo to frequent all public places of reſort, " near your two houſes of parliament, and even to " approach near your royal palaces, whereby they " may have opportunities to perpetrate any wicked " attempt againſt your perſon, on the ſafety and " preſervation whereof our religion and liberties, " and the peace and welfare, not only of theſe " kingdoms, but of all Europe, do in a very great " meaſure depend.

" And having alſo conſidered the many plots and " conſpiracies againſt your Majeſty's perſon and go- " ment, but eſpecially the late horrid intended aſ- " ſaſſination, contrived and carried on, not only by " Papiſts (whoſe religion and intereſt might lead " them to it) but even by ſuch who at their death " (to the great ſcandal of our religion) profeſſed " and owned themſelves to be members of the " church of England, which chiefly (under God) " owes its preſervation and defenſe to your Majeſty, " and whoſe doctrines are directly oppoſite to all " ſuch inhuman and treaſonable practiſes.

" And having alſo certain information, that great " numbers of Popiſh Prieſts and Jeſuits, within " this city, and parts adjacent, intrude themſelves " into the preſenſe of ſick and dying perſons, with " deſign to prevail upon them, in their weakneſs, " to be reconciled to the church of Rome, and " daily indeavor to pervert and ſeduce from their al- " legiance, your Majeſty's good ſubjects, in poiſoning " them with their wicked and damnable doctrines and " principles, and that they have imported great " quantities of Popiſh books, to keep ſchools to " breed up and inſtruct children in the Romiſh " ſuperſtition and idolatry.

" We, therefore, hold ourſelves obliged, for " quieting the minds of your good ſubjects, and " in duty to your Majeſty, to intreat that you " will be graciouſly pleaſed (in order to ſuppreſs " ſuch practiſes, of the reſtleſs and notorious " enemies of your government) to iſſue out your " royal proclamation, for removing all Papiſts " and others, who diſown your Majeſty's govern- " ment, from the city of London, and parts ad- " jacent, according to the laws; and that the laws " may be put in execution againſt them, in ſuch " manner, that their wicked deſigns may be effectu- " ally diſappointed.

The King's anſwer.

To this addreſs his Majeſty anſwered: " He " would take care that the laws ſhould be put in " execution, according to the deſire of the com- " mons: and, in order thereunto, on the ſecond of " March, he cauſed his royal proclamation to be " publiſh'd.

A ſupply granted.

I return now to the ſupply: the 18th of February, the commons reſolved; " that 15,000 men be im- " ployed, for a ſummer and winter guard of the " ſea, for the year 1699, and that they ſhould " conſiſt of ſeamen only (2)."

Ways and Means.

The 9th of March, they ordered a bill to be brought in, " for granting to his Majeſty the ſum " of 1,484,015 l. (including the 800,000 l. before " voted) for diſbanding and paying off the army, " providing for the fleet, maintaining the guards " and gariſons, and for other neceſſary occaſions;" to raiſe which ſum, they reſolved, " that an aid " of three ſhillings in the pound be laid upon all " lands, penſions, offices and perſonal eſtates, to

(1) This addreſs of the houſe of commons was chiefly levelled againſt the earl of Orford, who was both treaſurer of the navy, and one of the lords-commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral of England, and who it was believed had been a great gainer by his late expedition in the Mediterranean; tho' it was likewiſe thought by many, that the riches he acquired there proceeded from preſents he received from the States he protected, and not from any undue practices. However, his lordſhip ſeing what ſtorm was gathering againſt him, thought it prudence to retreat, and lay down all his imploys.

(2) The reaſon of this was, leſt the King, under the notion of marines, ſhould keep more ſtanding forces, than the 7000 men already mentioned.

Proviſion ordered for ſeveral debts.

The 28th, the commons reſolved; " that proviſion be made, from time to time, for making " good the principal and intereſt, due on all the " parliamentary funds, granted ſince his Majeſty's " happy acceſſion to the crown; and particularly, " that farther proviſion be made, within the year " 1699, for the exchequer-bills; that proviſion be " made both for ſecuring and paying off the prin- " cipal and intereſt, due on the aid of three ſhillings " in the pound, granted in the year 1697, the " duties on paper, vellom and parchment; and on " ſuch of the malt-tickets, as were or ſhould prove " deficient: for paying and diſcharging the arrears " of the annuities lately charged on the tonage- " duties, and now on the aditional exciſe: for " ſecuring and paying the debt due for tranſport- " ſervice, performed at any time ſince the begin- " ing of the late war.

The 31ſt, they took the ſame reſolution, " for " giving half-pay to the commiſſion-officers (his " Majeſty's natural-born ſubjects of England) of " horſe, dragoons and foot, diſbanded and to be " diſbanded, 'till the ſaid officers ſhould be fully " paid off, or otherwiſe provided for: for ſecur- " ing and paying the arrears due to the general- " officers of the army upon the Engliſh eſtabliſh- " ment, and for ſecuring and paying the arrears of " pay and ſubſiſtence, due to the officers and ſoldiers " of the army, upon the Engliſh eſtabliſhment (1).

Petition of the old Eaſt-India company.

I have already given an account of the eſtabliſhment of the new Eaſt-India-company, by which the old company thought themſelves ſo aggrieved, that, in hopes of obtaining ſome relief, they preſented, the 24th of February, a petition to the commons, praying: " that their caſe might be " taken into conſideration; and that this houſe " would make ſome proviſion, that their corpora- " tion might ſubſiſt, for the reſidue of the term of " twenty-one years, granted by his Majeſty's " charter.

" That the payment of the five per cent, by the " late act for ſettling the trade to the Eaſt-Indies, " might be ſettled and adjuſted, in ſuch a man- " ner, as it might not remain a burden upon the " petitioners: and that ſuch farther conſideration " might be had for the petitioners relief, and for the " preſervation of the Eaſt-India-trade to England, " as ſhould be thought meet."

A bill in their favor rejected.

The commons having taken this petition into conſideration, ordered, the 27th of February, a bill to be brought in, purſuant thereunto; but it was rejected, the 9th of the next Month, without coming to a ſecond reading.

Acts paſs'd.

The 4th of May, the King came to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent, Firſt, to " an " act for granting to his Majeſty the ſum of " 1.484,015 l. for diſbanding the army, provid- " ing for the navy, and for other neceſſary occa- " ſions. Third, an act for the more effectual charg- " ing the duties upon rock-ſalt. Fourth, an act to " incourage the trade to Newfoundland. Fifth, an " act to prevent the exportation of wool out of the " kingdoms of Ireland and England, into forein " parts, and for the incouragement of the woollen " manufactures of the kingdom. Sixth, an act for " limiting certain times, within which writs of er- " ror ſhall be brought, for the reverſing fines, " common recoveries, and ancient judgments. " Seventh, an act for raiſing the militia, for the " year 1699, altho' the month's pay, formerly ad- " vanced, be not repaid. Eighth, an act for the " better apprehending and puniſhing houſe- " breakers, robbers and horſe-ſtealers. Ninth, " an act for making Billingſgate a free market, for " the ſale of fiſh. Tenth, an act for continuing " the act for the more eaſy recovery of ſmall " tithes. Eleventh, an act for ſuppreſſing of Lot- " teries. " Fourteenth, an act to inable poſthumous chil- " dren to take eſtates, as if born in their father's " life-time. Fifteenth, an act to inable ſuch officers " and ſoldiers, as have been in his Majeſty's ſer- " vice, during the late wars, to exerciſe trades, " and for officers to account with their ſoldiers. " Sixteenth, an act for continuing the impriſon- " ment of Counter, and others, for the late horrid " conſpiracy, to aſſaſſinate the perſon of his ſacred " Majeſty. Seventeenth, an act for making and " keeping the river Trent, in the counties of " Leiceſter, Derby, and Stafford navigable. Eigh- " teenth, an act for ſettling augmentations on cer- " tain vicariges for ever: " and to ſeveral private acts.

WILL' III. AN' 1699.

After this, his Majeſty made the following ſpeech to both houſes;

My lords and gentlemen,

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

" At the opening this parliament, I told you " my opinion was, that you were come together, " with hearts fully diſpoſed to do what was neceſſary " for the ſafety, honor and happineſs of the king- " dom; and having nothing elſe to recommend to " you, I had reaſon to hope for unanimity and " diſpatch.

" You have now ſat ſo many months that the " ſeaſon of the year, as well as your particular af- " fairs, make it reaſonable you ſhould have a " receſs. I take it for granted you have finiſh'd " all the bills which, for the preſent, you think " requiſite to be paſs'd into laws, and I have given " my aſſent to all you have preſented me. If any " thing ſhould be found wanting for our ſafety, " the ſupport of public credit, by making good " the faith of the kingdom, as it ſtands ingaged " by parliamentary ſecurities, and for diſcharge " of the debts occaſioned by the war, or towards " advancing of trade, the ſuppreſſing of vice, and " the imploying of the poor, which were all the " things I propoſed to your conſideration, when " we met firſt, I cannot doubt but effectual care " will be taken of them next winter; I wiſh no " inconvenience may happen in the mean time."

The parliament prorogued.

This done, the lord chancellor prorogued the parliament to the 1ſt of June next.

I muſt now give a brief account, of ſome tranſactions which happened during the latter part of this ſeſſion of parliament.

The King's order to the play-houſes.

His Majeſty, who had always the reformation of manners at heart, ſent an order, on the 18th of February, to both play-houſes, importing: " that " his Majeſty being informed, that notwithſtand- " ing an order made, the 4th of June 1697, by " the earl of Sunderland, then lord chamberlain " of his Majeſty's houſhold, to prevent the pro- " phaneneſs and immorality of the ſtage, ſeveral " plays had lately been acted, containing expreſſi- " ons contrary to religion, and good manners;

(1) Theſe reſolutions were not, however, put in execution, this ſeſſion.

Will' III. An' 1699.

" and whereas the maſter of the revels had repre-
" ſented, that in contempt of the ſaid order, the " actors did neglect to leave out ſuch prophane and " indecent expreſſions, as he had thought proper
" to be omited, therefore, it was his Majeſty's
" pleaſure, that they ſhould not hereafter pre-
" ſume to act any thing, in any play, contrary to " religion and good manners, as they ſhould an-
" ſwer it at their utmoſt peril.

The maſter of the revels was at the ſame time commanded not to licenſe any plays, containing irreligious or immoral expreſſions; and to give notice to the lord chamberlain, or in his abſenſe to the vice-chamberlain, if the players preſumed to act any thing, which he had ſtruck out (1).

Proclamation for a general faſt.

The 12th of March, his Majeſty's proclamation was iſſued, for a general faſt to be obſerved throughout the kingdom, to implore God's mercy, for ſuch as ſuffered abroad, for the Proteſtant religion.

Trials of the lords Warwick and Mohun,

The 28th, Edward earl of Warwick was brought to his trial, in Weſtminſter-hall, before the houſe of peers, for the murder of Richard Coote, eſq; and was found guilty of manſlaughter only; and the next day, Charles lord Mohun, was tried for the ſame fact and acquited. The caſe was this: theſe two noble peers, with mr. Coote, and three other gentlemen, were drinking late at night, at Locket's (then a famous tavern in the Strand) and ſome words ariſing, they all took chairs, and were carried to Leiceſter-fields, where they ingaged three againſt three, and Coote was killed, but by whom it did not certainly appear (2).

Preferments.

The duke of Shrewſbury, one of his Majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, being in a declining ſtate of health, reſigned that poſt, in order to travel into Italy, and was ſucceeded, the 14th of May, by the earl of Jerſey, then lately returned from his embaſſy at the court of France; where he was ſucceeded by the earl of Mancheſter. And the 18th the King declared, Thomas earl of Pembroke lord preſident of the council; and John lord viſcount Lonſdale, lord privy-ſeal, in his room.

Lords-juſtices appointed.

The 31ſt, the King nominated the following perſons lords-juſtices, for the adminiſtration of the government, during his Majeſty's abſenſe, viz. the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, the lord-preſident, the lord privy-ſeal, the duke of Devon, the earls of Bridgwater, Marlborough and Jerſey, and mr. Montague, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury.

King William goes to Holland.

The 1ſt of June, the King left Kenſington, and imbarking the next day at Martgate landed ſafely, the day following, at Orange-polder, from whence he went to the Hague; where I ſhall leave his Majeſty to give an account of the affairs of Scotland and Ireland.

Scotiſh affairs.

Tho' the ſituation of the Scotiſh India-company's affairs gave that whole nation no ſmall uneaſineſs, and notwithſtanding the company had met with ſeveral repulſes in England, their court of directors wrote, towards the begining of the year to the lord Seafield, to put him in mind of ſeconding their petition, and the parliament's addreſs to his Majeſty; to which his lordſhip anſwered, the 7th of February;

" that he had repreſented their petition to the King,
" and that he was commanded to let them know,
" that there being accounts, that the ſhips belong-
" ing to the company were arrived on the coaſts of " America, and the particular deſign not being " communicated to his Majeſty, he, therefore,
" delayed giving any anſwer, 'till he received cer" tain information of their ſettlement."

This intimation being given the company, by the King's orders, their council-general wrote a letter to his Majeſty, on the 21ſt of March, importing; Will' III. An' 1699.

" that they had arrived ſafe at their intended port,
" within a league of the Golden-iſland, on the " coaſts of Darien; and after having treated, on " board their ſhips, with the natives, who were al" ways owned to be the only proprietors of that " part of the coaſt, their men had, at the requeſt,
" and with the conſent of the ſaid natives, landed
" on the 4th of November 1698, and taken poſ-
" ſeſſion of an uninhabited place, never before occu" pied by any European whomſoever; and that,
" in purſuance of the ſaid treaty, the chief men
" and leaders of the ſaid natives, had joined with
" and taken commiſſion from the ſaid council. That " they thought it their duty, at their firſt meet-
" ing, to give his Majeſty an account thereof,
" and likewiſe, that by letters from the ſaid coun" cil, bearing date at NewEdinburg, in Caledonia,
" (the name of their new ſettlement) the 28th of " December, they were poſitively informed, that " the French had a deſign upon all that coaſt, or
" or leaſt to make a ſettlement ſomewhere there-
" abouts: and they humbly conceived, that the firſt
" ſettlement of their colony, in thoſe parts, might " be a means of preventing, or at leaſt leſſening the " evil conſequences that might ariſe to his Majeſty's
" kingdoms and dominions every where, by the " ſettlement of any powerful foreign neighbor in,
" upon, or near any part of that coaſt. And that,
" as they were always bound thankfully to acknow-
" lege his Majeſty's goodneſs, for granting them
" thoſe privileges mentioned in the acts of parlia" ment, and his Majeſty's letters-patent, by which " their company was eſtabliſhed; ſo they did, in
" all humility, confidently expect his Majeſty's
" royal favor and protection, as having, in all
" the ſteps of their conduct, tho' the whole courſe
" of that affair, ſtrictly obſerved the conditions re" quired by the ſaid act of parliament, and letters-
" patent: and they refered that, together with the " contents of their laſt petition to his Majeſty's
" royal conſideration, to give ſuch directions there-
" in, as in his royal wiſdom ſhould ſeem meet and
" expedient."

This ſettlement, in the mean time, gave alarm to " all the nations of Europe, who had plantations in that neighbourhood:" and eſpecially the Spaniards, who thinking themſelves more immediately concerned, their embaſſador in England preſented a memorial to his Majeſty, on the 3d of May; in which they termed this undertaking of the Scots, an inſult upon his Catholic Majeſty's ſovereign dominions in America, and particularly in the province of Darien, and as a rupture of the alliance ſubſiſting between the two kiugdoms of Great-Britain and Spain: adding, that his Majeſty would take ſuch meaſures as he ſhould think convenient, to reſiſt ſuch hoſtilities and unjuſt procedures, The company were unwilling, after the great expences they had been at, to abandon their deſign; and, therefore to juſtify the legality of their ſettlement, in oppoſition to the pretentions of the Spaniards or any other nation whatſoever, and to ſhew that it could be no prejudice to the Engliſh but rather an advantage, they made ſeveral long repreſentations to his Majeſty: but the King and council muſt have thought otherwiſe; for, on the 8th of April, the governor of Jamaica by expreſs commands from his Majeſty, ſignified to him by one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, iſſued a proclamation, " forbiding all manner of

(1) This reſtraint upon the play-houſes was, perhaps, in ſome meaſure, occaſion'd by " mr. Jeremy Collier's view of the " immorality and prophaneneſs of the Engliſh ſtage," publiſhed not long before.

(2) The earl claiming the benefit of his peerage, according to the ſtatute, in that caſe provided, was there upon, diſcharged: but was adviſed, by the lord chancellor, who was conſtituted lord high-ſteward for the day, not to offend again, becauſe he could injoy that benefit but once.

" intercourſe between any of his Majeſty's ſubjects, " and the colony of Darien, or the furniſhing them " with any aſſiſtance of arms and ammunition, pro- " viſions, or any other neceſſaries whatſoever, at " their utmoſt peril. And the like proclamations " were about the ſame time, iſſued by the governor " of Barbadoes, New York and New England."

The Spaniards making, in the mean while, great preparations in America, to diſlodge the Scots, the council of Caledonia had again recourſe to his Majeſty's clemency and protection, in an addreſs preſented in the month of September, about which time, the Spaniſh embaſſador preſented a ſecond memorial againſt this Scotiſh ſettlement, as did likewiſe the French embaſſador another, which occaſioned a ſecond petition from the company to the King to implore his protection, to which his Majeſty directed the lord Seafield to anſwer; " that he very " much regreted the loſs, which that kingdom and " the company had lately ſuſtained: that he would " upon all occaſions protect and incourage the trade " of the nation: and would alſo take care, that " the ſubjects of that kingdom ſhould have the " ſame freedom of trade and commerce, with the " Engliſh plantations, as they ever had formerly:" and as for the parliament (which they had begged might be allowed to meet) his Majeſty ordered them to be acquainted, " that it was adjourned to the " 5th of March next inſuing, and that he would " cauſe them to meet, as ſoon as he judged the " good of the nation required it."

Affairs of Ireland.

The commons of England having voted, as we have ſeen above, that 12,000 men ſhould be maintained in Ireland, the parliament of that kingdom applied themſelves to find the neceſſary funds for that purpoſe: and on the 26th of January, the lords-juſtices gave the royal aſſent, 1. " To an " act for raiſing 120,000 l. on all lands, tenements " and hereditaments, in Ireland. 2. An act to " compleat the ſupply to his Majeſty, and to build " and finiſh the barracks. 3. An act for laying an " additional duty upon woollen manufactures export- " ed out of that kingdom. 4. An act for making " improvements on church-lands. 5. An act for " confirming eſtates and poſſeſſions injoyed under " the acts of ſettlement and explanation. 6. An act " for the preſervation of the game. 7. An act " againſt deceitful, diſorderly and exceſſive gaming. " 8. An act for planting and preſerving timber- " trees. 9. An act to prevent Papiſts being ſolli- " citors. 10. An act for determining differencces by " arbitration. 11. An act for explaining an act for " confirming the acts of ſettlement and explana- " tion. 12. An act to hinder the reverſal of ſeveral " outlawries." And to ſome other as well private as public bills.

Spencer Cowper's

While the King was abroad, a remarkable trial came on at Hertford, which, at that time, was ſo much the converſation of the town, that it might be look'd upon as a neglect to paſs it by wholly in ſilence; I mean that of Spencer Cowper, eſq; then an eminent counſel, and afterwards a judge, for the pretended murder of mrs. Sarah Stout, a young Quaker at Hertford. She was not only a client, but an intimate acquaintance of mr. Cowper's, and was, at the ſame time, in great intimacy with his wife. Mr. Cowper coming down to Hertford, as counſel at the Lent aſſizes of this year, came late that night the judge came in, to mrs. Stout's, the mother of the unfortunate young woman, with a deſign, as it was ſaid, to ly at her houſe; but, while his bed was warming, the young lady and he, ſiting by themſelves, in the parlor, had ſome words; upon which he went to his inn and lay there, and ſhe was found, the next morning, drowned, in the river, a little diſtance from the town. The whole body of Quakers, thereupon, pretended, Cowper had hired certain perſons, who came with him to Hertford, to murder her, if he had not a hand in it himſelf; and being indicted, he was tried for it accordingly: preſumptions were likewiſe ſo ſtrong againſt him, that all his eloquence, in his own defence, with that of his brother, afterwards lord chancelor, for him, and the joint intereſt they had in that country, were but barely ſufficient to bring him off. Being, however, acquited, a writ of appeal was lodg'd againſt him: but on occaſion of ſome practices to deſtroy it, that affair came before the court of King's-bench, where it dropp'd: upon this, the whole body of Quakers indeavor'd to revive it by an act of parliament, in order to try him again: but, on this occaſion, it appeared, that the intereſt of the Cowper's was more powerful than that of the Quakers, for their petition was rejected: for farther particulars, I ſhall refer the reader to the ſtate-trials (1).

WILL' III. AN' 1699.

Before I return to his Majeſty in Holland, I ſhall ſay a word or two of maritime affairs: I juſt hinted, among the tranſactions of the foregoing year, that rear-admiral Bembow ſailed the 20th of November, with a ſmall ſquadron, for the Weſt-Indies: his inſtructions were to viſit Jamaica, Barbadoes, and the Caribbee-iſlands, and ſo to imploy the ſhips under his command, as might be moſt proper, for the defenſe of the trade and plantations: he was, likewiſe, inſtructed to demand ſatisfaction of the Spaniards, for ſeveral depredations they had commited on our ſhips, goods and men: and as the government was informed, that one Kidd, who ſailed from England, a conſiderable time before, on a private account, in a ſhip called the Adventure-gally, with a commiſſion, under the great ſeal, and power to ſeize on pirats, and their effects, had ſo far broke his inſtructions, and, indeed, the real and only deſign of his voyage, as to commit ſeveral notorious piracies himſelf; the rear-admiral was particularly charged, to make diligent inquiry after him, and to ſeize on and ſecure his perſon, together with his men, ſhip, and effects, that ſo they might be brought to deſerved puniſhment.

Maritime affairs.

As the affair of Kidd made, afterwards no little noiſe, and I ſhall have occaſion to make farther mention of it, I ſhall give the reader a brief account, for what reaſon, and in what manner he was ſent to ſea.

Some pirates (ſays biſhop Burnet) had got together in the Indian-ſeas, and robb'd ſome of the Mogul's ſhips, in particular one, which he was ſending with preſents to Mocca; moſt of which pirats were Engliſh. The Eaſt-India-company having repreſented the danger of the Mogul's taking reprizals of them for theſe loſſes, it appeared that there was a neceſſity of deſtroying theſe pirats, who were harboring themſelves in ſome creek in Madagaſcar: ſo a man of war was to be ſet out to deſtroy them, and one Kidd, who knew their haunts, and was thought a proper man for the ſervice, was pitch'd upon to command it: but there was not a fund to

(1) Upon the whole, I do not find it appears, that mr. Cowper was guilty of the murder: it is certain, ſhe was very fond of, and ſome ſay even troubleſome to him: and it was, thereupon ſuggeſted, that the impoſſibility of having him for a huſband, or his ſlighting her, had driven her to deſpair. It was inſinuated, ſome ſay by mr. Cowper's friends, that ſhe was with child by him, and that ſhe drowned herſelf to avoid the ſhame: but the Quakers, to remove this ſcandal, had her opened, and proved, that there was not the leaſt ground for this report. It is highly probable, that matters had not gone this length, eſpecially as the unfortunate young woman did not want good ſenſe to rule her conduct, except in this unhappy inſtance, and generally bore a fair and virtuous character.

bear

bear the charge of this: for the parliament had ſo appropriated the mony given for the ſea, that no part of it could be applied to this expedition. The King propoſed the management of it by a private undertaking, and ſaid he would lay down three thouſand pounds himſelf, and recommended it to his miniſters to find the reſt: in compliance with this, the lord Sommers, the earls of Orford, Rumney, Bellamount, and ſome others, contributed the whole expence; for the King excuſed himſelf, by reaſon of other accidents, and did not advance the ſum, that he had promiſed: lord Sommers underſtood nothing of the matter, and left it wholly to the management of others, ſo that he never ſaw Kidd, only he thought it became the poſt he was in, to concur in ſuch a public ſervice. A grant was made to the undertakers of all that ſhould be taken from thoſe pirats, by their ſhip. Here was a handle for complaint; for as it was againſt law to take a grant of the goods of any offenders before conviction, ſo a parity between that and this caſe was urged; but without any reaſon: the proviſions of law being very different, in the caſe of pirates, and that of other criminals. The former cannot be attack'd but in the way of war; and, therefore, ſince thoſe, who undertook this, muſt run a great riſk in executing it, it was but reaſonable, and according to the law of war, that they ſhould have a right to all that they found in the enemy's hands; whereas thoſe who ſeize common offenders, have ſuch a ſtrength by the law, to aſſiſt them, and incur ſo little danger in doing it, that no juſt inference can be drawn from the one caſe to the other. When this Kidd was thus ſet out, he turn'd pirate himſelf; ſo a heavy load was caſt on the miniſtry, but chiefly on him, who was at the head of the national affairs; it was ſaid, he ought not to have ingaged in ſuch a project; and alſo maliciouſly inſinuated, that the privateer turned pirate, in confidence of the protection of thoſe who imployed him; if he had not ſecret orders from them for what he did. Such black conſtructions (continues the biſhop) are men, who are ingaged in parties, apt to make of the actions of thoſe, whom they intend to diſgrace, even againſt their own conſciences: ſo that an undertaking, that was not only innocent but meritorious, was traduced as a deſign for robbery and piracy. This was urged in the houſe of commons as highly criminal, for which all who were concerned in it, ought to be turned out of their imployments; and a queſtion was put upon it: but it was rejected by a great majority.

But to return to rear-admiral Bembow, being arrived at Jamaica, the governor and merchants intreated him to ſail to Puerto-bello, to demand ſatisfaction for the depredations commited by orders of the admiral of the Barlovento-fleet; he ſailed thither accordingly; but to no purpoſe; for tho' after ſome rude treatment at firſt, fair promiſes of ſatisfaction were given him; he was no ſooner departed than they were forgotten and came to nothing. He returned therefore to Jamaica, where having intelligence that captain Kidd was hovering on the coaſt, he went in queſt of him, but without ſucceſs, as he did once more afterwards.

We left King William at the Hague, where having received the compliments of the forein miniſters, and other perſons of diſtinction, and aſſiſted at the aſſembly of the States-general, as well as at that of the States of Holland; he left the Hague, on the 22d of June, and went for Loo, where, and at his palace of Dieren he ſpent the ſummer, in his uſual diverſions of hunting and ſhooting. There his Majeſty was waited on by ſeveral embaſſadors from different courts, and received a viſit from the old duke of Zell, who came thither attended with a numerous and magnificent retinue. The duke, having ſpent about a month with King William, departed the 3d of October, N. S. on his return home; and ſoon after his Majeſty came to the Hague, where he again aſſiſted at the aſſembly of the States-general. The 26th he imbarked on the Maeſe, on board the William and Mary-yacht, landed the next day at Margate, lay that night at Canterbury, and on 18th O. S. arrived at Kenſington.

Will'III. An' 1699.

King William returns to England.

The 20th, the lord-mayor, recorder, aldermen, and ſheriffs of London, waited on the King, to congratulate his ſafe return: on which occaſion, his Majeſty, after having expreſs'd his favorable acceptance of their affections, earneſtly recommended to them the vigorous execution of the laws againſt all ſorts of prophaneneſs and debauchery, and the relief of the poor; and then confer'd the honor of knighthood upon Charles Duncomb and Jeffery Jefferies, eſqs; the two ſheriffs, and William Withers, eſq; alderman. The biſhop of London at the head of the clergy of London and Middleſex, likewiſe, waited on his Majeſty, to congratulate his happy arrival.

Is complimented by the city;

And the clergy.

The 24th, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and was farther prorogued to the 16th of November; and, the next day, his Majeſty conferr'd the office of lord-chamberlain, which had been ſome time vacant, on his grace the duke of Shrewſbury.

The duke of Shrewſbury made lord-chamberlain.

The 16th the parliament met, when the King being come to the houſe of lords, and the commons ſent for up, his Majeſty made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

The parliament meets.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I hope you will not think I have called you " out of your countries too ſoon, if you conſider " that our common ſecurity requires a farther pro- " viſion ſhould be made for the ſafety of the king- " dom, by ſea and land, before we are at the end of " what was granted for that purpoſe, the laſt ſeſſion: " and when you enter upon this buſineſs, I believe " you will think it neceſſary to take care of the re- " pairs of the ſhips and of the fortifications, without " which our fleet cannot be ſafe, when it is in " harbor.

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

" I cannot omit to put you in mind of another " matter, in which ſo great a number of my ſub- " jects is concerned, and wherein the honor of the " kingdom, and the faith of parliaments, is ſo far " ingag'd, that our future ſecurity ſeems to depend " upon it; I mean the making good the deficiences " of the funds, and the diſcharging the debts con- " tracted by reaſon of the war.

" And 'till we may be ſo happy, to ſee the pub- " lic debt paid, I ſhall hope no ſeſſion will end, " without ſomething done towards leſſening them: " while I am ſpeaking to you on this head, I " think myſelf obliged to mention, with a very " particular concern, a debt which is owing to the " Prince of Denmark, the ſtate whereof I have or- " dered to be laid before you.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

" Theſe things are of ſuch importance, that I " moſt earneſtly recommend them to your conſide- " ration, and deſire you to provide the neceſſary " ſupplies.

My lords and Gentlemen,

" There is nothing I ſhould more rejoice in, " than that I was not under the neceſſity of ſo often " aſking aids of my people; but, as the reaſon of " it is evident, becauſe the funds formerly applied " to defray the public expence, are now anticipated " for payment of the debts of the kingdom; ſo it " is to my ſatisfaction, that you all ſee, that no- " thing of what is demanded is for any perſonal uſe " of mine, and I do faithfully aſſure you, that no " part of what is given ſhall be diverted from any " purpoſe for what it is deſign'd.

" I believe the nation is already ſenſible of the " good

WILL' III. AN' 1699.

" good effects of peace, by the manifeſt increaſe of " trade, which I ſhall make it my buſineſs to in- " courage by all the means in my power. Probably " it might receive an advantage, if ſome good bill " were prepared for the more effectual preventing " and puniſhing unlawful and clandeſtine trading, " which does not only tend to defraud the public, " but prejudices the fair merchant, and diſcourages " our own manufactures.

" The increaſe of the poor is become a burden " to the kingdom, and their looſe and idle lives do, " in ſome meaſure, contribute to that depravation " of manners, which is complained of (I fear with " too much reaſon.) Whether the ground of this " evil be from defects in the laws already made, or " in the execution of them, deſerves your conſide- " ration. As it is an indiſpenſable duty, that the " poor, who are not able to help themſelves, ſhould " be maintain'd; ſo I cannot but think it extreamly " deſirable, that ſuch as are able and willing ſhould " not want imployment; and ſuch as are obſtinate " and unwilling ſhould be compell'd to labor.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I have a full aſſurance of the good affections of " my people, which I ſhall indeavour to preſerve " by a conſtant care of their juſt rights and liberties; " by maintaining the eſtabliſh'd religion; by ſeeing " the courſe of juſtice kept ſteady and equal; by " countenancing virtue and diſcouraging vice, and " by declining no difficulty or dangers where their " welfare and proſperity may be concern'd. Theſe " are my reſolutions; and I am perſuaded, that you " are come together, with purpoſes on your part, " ſuitable to theſe on mine. Since then our aims " are only for the general good, let us act with con- " fidence in one another, which will not fail, by " GOD's bleſſing, to make me a happy King, and " you a great and flouriſhing people."

Addreſs of the commons.

The commons took 'till the 4th of December, before they addreſs'd the King, and then did it in the following manner: they ſet forth; " that no- " thing being more neceſſary for the peace and wel- " fare of this kingdom, the quieting the minds of " his people, and diſappointing the deſigns of his " enemies, than a mutual and intire confidence, be- " tween his Majeſty and his parliament, they did " eſteem it their greateſt misfortune, that after ha- " ving ſo amply provided for the ſecurity of his " Majeſty and his government, both by ſea and " land, any jealouſy or diſtruſt had been raiſed of " their duty and affection to his ſacred Majeſty and " his people; and begg'd leave humbly to repreſent " to his Majeſty, that it would greatly conduce to " the continuing and eſtabliſhing an intire coufidence " between his Majeſty and his parliament, that he " would be pleaſed to ſhew marks of his high diſ- " pleaſure, towards all ſuch perſons who had or " ſhould preſume to miſrepreſent their proceedings " to his Majeſty: and that the commons, having, " likewiſe, a due ſenſe of the great care and concern " his Majeſty had always expreſs'd for preſerving " and maintaining the religion, laws and liber- " ties of his people (in defence of which his Ma- " jeſty had ſo often expoſed his royal perſon) would " uſe their utmoſt care and indeavors, to prevent " and diſcourage all falſe rumors and reports, reflect- " ing upon his Majeſty and his government, where- " by to create any miſunderſtandings between him " and his ſubjects. (1).

To this addreſs his Majeſty returned the following anſwer:

WILL' III. AN' 1699.

Gentlemen,

" My parliament have done ſo great things for " me, and I have, upon all proper occaſions, ex- " preſs'd ſo great a ſenſe of their kindneſs, and my " opinion has been ſo often declared, that the hap- " pineſs of an Engliſh King depends upon an intire " good correſpondence between him and his parlia- " ment, that it can't ſeem ſtrange for me to aſſure " you, that no perſons have yet dar'd to go about " to miſrepreſent to me the proceedings of either " houſe: had I found any ſuch, they would have " immediately felt the higheſt marks of my diſplea- " ſure. It is a juſtice I owe not only to my parlia- " ments, but to every one of my ſubjects, to judge " of them by their actions, and this rule I will " ſteadily purſue. If any hereafter ſhall attempt to " put me on other methods, by calumnies or miſ- " repreſentations, they will not only fail of ſucceſs, " but ſhall be look'd upon and treated by me as my " worſt enemies.

The King's anſwer.

Gentlemen,

" I am pleaſed to ſee, by your addreſs, that you have " the ſame thoughts of the great advantages which " will inſue to the kingdom, by our mutual confi- " dence, as I expreſs'd to both houſes, at the open- " ing of the ſeſſion. I take very kindly the aſſurance " you give me of uſing your utmoſt care and in- " deavors, to prevent and diſcourage all falſe ru- " mors and reports, reflecting upon me, and my " government; and I faithfully promiſe you, that " no actions of mine ſhall give a juſt ground for any " miſunderſtanding between me and my people."

What ſincerity there was in theſe fine compliments, on both ſides, the reader will beſt ſee by what follows:

The Iriſh forfeitures reſumed.

The firſt buſineſs the commons went upon was to conſider the report of the ſeven commiſſioners, appointed by them, the laſt ſeſſions, to take an account of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, who were the earl of Drogheda, Francis Anneſly, eſq; John Trenchard, eſq; James Hamilton, eſq; Henry Langford, eſq; ſir Richard Leving, and ſir Francis Brewſter.

Theſe gentlemen having put their commiſſion in execution, with great ſtrictneſs and application, framed a report, which was preſented to the commons, by mr. Anneſly, wherein they ſet forth, among other things:

Report of the commiſſioners

" That they met with great difficulties in their " inquiry, which were occaſioned chiefly, by the " backwardneſs of the people of Ireland, to give " any information, out of fear of the grantees, " whoſe diſpleaſure in that kingdom was not eaſily " born, and by reports induſtriouſly ſpread and be- " lieved, that their inquiry would come to nothing: " nevertheleſs it appeared to them, that the perſons " outlaw'd in England, ſince the 13th of February, " 1688, on account of the late rebellion there, a- " mounted to fifty-ſeven, and in Ireland to 3921. " That all the lands, in the ſeveral counties in Ire- " land, belonging to the forfeiting perſons, as far " as they could reckon, made 1,060,792 acres, " worth, per annum, 211,623 l. which (by compu- " tation of ſix years purchaſe for a life, and thir- " teen years for the inheritance, which was at this " time the value of the lands of that kingdom) " came to the full value of 2,685,130 l. Beſide " the ſeveral denominations, in the ſeveral counties, " to which no number of acres could be added, be- " cauſe of the imperfection of ſurveys. Likewiſe, " a great number of houſes, mills, fairs, mar- " kets, rectories and tithes, ferries and fiſheries.

(1) By this addreſs it is plain, that his Majeſty's ſpeech, ſtudied and elaborate as it was, had not removed the ill impreſſions, which the diſſatisfaction he expreſs'd at the proceedings of the parliament, when he laſt parted with them, had left in their minds; and that they took his advice of " acting with confidence in one another," as an implication of a diſtruſt or want of confidence in them.

"That ſome of thoſe lands had been reſtored to the "old proprietors, by virtue of the articles of Li- "merick and Galway, and by his Majeſty's favor, "and by reverſal of outlawries and royal pardons, "obtained chiefly by gratifications to ſuch perſons "as had abuſed his Majeſty's royal bounty and "compaſſion: beſide theſe reſtitutions, which they "thought to be corruptly procured, they gave an "account of ſeventy-ſix grants and cuſtodiams, un- "der the great ſeal of Ireland: as, to the lord "Romney, three grants now in being, containing "49,517 acres: to the earl of Albemarle, in two "grants, 108,633 acres, in poſſeſſion and reverſion: "to William Bentinck, eſq; lord Woodſtock, "135,820 acres of land: to the earl of Athlone two "grants, containing 26,480 acres: to the earl of "Galway, one grant of 36,148 acres, and to ma- "ny others: wherein, they obſerved, that the "eſtates ſo mentioned did not yield ſo much to the "grantees, as they were here valued at; becauſe as "moſt of them had abuſed his Majeſty, in the real "value of their eſtates, ſo their agents had impoſed "on them, and had either ſold or let the greateſt "part of thoſe lands at an under-value. But after "all deductions and allowances, there yet remain'd, "1,699,343 l. 14 s. which they laid before the "commons, as the groſs value of the eſtates, ſince "the 13th of February, and not reſtored: beſide "a grant, under the great ſeal of Ireland, dated "the 30th day of May 1695, paſſed to mrs. "Elizabeth Villiers, now counteſs of Orkney, of "all the private eſtates of the late King (except "ſome ſmall part, in grant to the lord Athlone) con- "taining 95,649 acres, worth per annum 25,995 l. "18 s. Total value, 331,943 l. 9 s. concluding "that there was payable, out of this eſtate, "2000 l. per annum, to the lady Suſanna Bellaſis, "and alſo 1000 l. per annum, to mrs. Votes thereupon.

The commons having read and examined this report, came, on the 15th of December, to an unanimous reſolution, "that a bill be brought in to ap- "ply all the forfeited eſtates and intereſts in Ireland, "and all grants thereof, and of the rents and re- "venues belonging to the crown within that king- "dom, ſince the 13th of February 1688, to the "uſe of the public;" and ordered a clauſe to be inſerted in that bill, "for erecting a judicature for "determining claims touching the ſaid forfeited "eſtates;" they likewiſe reſolved, that they would "not receive any petition, from any perſon whom- "ſoever, touching the ſaid grants or forfeited eſtates, "and that they would take into conſideration the "great ſervices performed by the commiſſioners "appointed to inquire into the forfeited eſtates of "Ireland."

A remarkable paſſage.

Sir Richard Leving, one of the commiſſioners of the forfeited eſtates, having raiſed a report, that while they were in Ireland, executing their commiſſion, a member of the commons wrote to them, that they ſhould make a ſeparate article of the grant to the lady Orkney (which they accordingly did) becauſe it would reflect upon ſomebody (meaning the King); ſir Richard, and ſome of the King's friends infer'd from thence, that this inquiry into the grants of the forfeited eſtates was intended only to caſt an aſperſion on his Majeſty, and therefore, it ought to be droped (1): but upon examining the matter, the reſt of the commiſſioners declared, "they had received no ſuch letter: whereupon, the "commons reſolved: that the ſaid report was falſe "and ſcandalous; that the commiſſioners, who "had ſigned the report, had acquited themſelves "in the execution of their commiſſion, with un- "derſtanding, courage and integrity; and that "ſir Richard Leving had been the author of that "groundleſs and ſcandalous aſperſion, caſt on the "ſaid four commiſſioners, and that he ſhould be "commited to the Tower for the ſaid offenſe.

Will' III. An' 1699. Farther votes thereupon.

Upon the ſecond reading of the bill "for ap- "plying the Iriſh forfeitures to the uſe of the pub- "lic," and commiting it to the committee of the whole houſe, the courtiers made a motion, and cauſed the queſtion to be put, "that the ſaid com- "mittee be impowered to receive a clauſe, for re- "ſerving a proportion of the forfeited eſtates in "Ireland to the diſpoſal of his Majeſty;" which paſſing in the negative, it was reſolved; "that the "adviſing, procuring and paſſing the ſaid grants "of the forfeited and other eſtates, in Ireland, "had been the occaſion of contracting great debts "on the nation, and levying heavy taxes on the "people; that the adviſing and paſſing the ſaid "grants was highly reflecting on the King's honor; "and that the officers and inſtruments concerned in "the procuring and paſſing theſe grants, had highly "failed in the performance of their duty and truſt."

During theſe tranſactions, the commons had, at ſeveral times, made the following reſolutions, viz. On the 6th of December, "that the ſum of "76,383 l. now remaining in the exchequer, on "the account of the ſubſidy of tonage and poun- "dage, with what ſhould ariſe from the ſaid fund, "to the 25th of that month, ſhould be applied to- "wards the payment of ſeamens wages: that "whoſoever ſhould advance or lend a ſum, not "exceeding 220,000 l. for the farther paying of "ſeamens wages, ſhould receive the ſame, with "intereſt at 5 l. per cent. per annum, out of the "firſt aid to be granted this ſeſſion. The 21ſt, "that 7000 men be a complement for ſea-ſervice, "for the year 1700, for thirteen months; and that "the uſual pay of 4 l. per month be allowed for "the maintaining the ſaid 7000 men, including the "ordnance for ſea-ſervice." The 16th of January, they reſolved, "that 18,000 l. be allowed for "bounty-mony, to the officers of the fleet, and "90,000 l. for the extraordinaries of the navy. "The 21ſt, that 300,000 l. be granted to his Ma- "jeſty for maintaining guards and gariſons, and "25,000 l. for the office of ordnance for the year "1700, and that half-pay be allowed to the diſ- "banded officers not otherwiſe provided for.

Buſineſs of the ſupply.

An' 1700.

Ways and Means.

To raiſe the ſupply already granted, the commons reſolved, the 26th, to lay a tax of two ſhillings in the pound, "upon all lands, penſions, offices and "perſonal eſtates," and appointed a day, "to "conſider of the grants made ſince the ſetling of the "civil liſt upon his Majeſty." The firſt of February, the bill for levying the 2 s. aid was read a ſecond time, and commited to a commitee of the whole houſe, to whom the bill for reſuming the forfeited eſtates in Ireland was alſo committed, and who were ordered to join both the ſaid bills together, and to receive a clauſe of credit, and another of appropriation. The 5th, the houſe being informed, that ſeveral grantees of forfeited eſtates in Ireland, were felling timber, and commiting other waſtes, they reſolved, that ſuch perſons ſhould be anſwerable for the ſame, and directed the committee of the whole houſe, to inſert a clauſe in the afore-mentioned bill of reſumption, for the ſaid purpoſe. Theſe ſteps being taken, the commons reſolved, the next day, "to grant a ſupply to his

"Majeſty

WILL' III. AN' 1700.

"Majeſty, for diſcharging the debt due to the army.

The state of the nation conſidered.

The 13th, the commons, in a grand committee, conſidered the ſtate of the nation, and a motion was made, and the queſtion put; "That the procuring or obtaining of grants of eſtates, belonging to the crown, by any public miniſter, concerned in the directing or paſſing ſuch grants, to or for their own uſe or benefit, while the nation lay under the heavy taxes of the late war, was highly injurious to his Majeſty, prejudicial to the ſtate, and a violation of the truſt repoſed in them;" but the court-party had ſo much influence, to get this queſtion carried in the negative: however, they gave, at the ſame time, their conſent, to an order for bringing in a bill, "to reſume the grants of all lands and revenues "of the crown, and all penſions granted by the "crown, ſince the 6th of February 1684; and "for applying the ſame to the uſe of the public." This order was nevertheleſs of no effect.

Farther proceedings about the forfeitures.

The 17th, the commons proceeded to conſider farther of the ſtate of the nation, when, after a long and warm debate, it was reſolved: "that an addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, repreſenting "to him the reſolutions of this houſe, relating to "grants of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland.

A farther ſupply granted.

They reſolved, the ſame day; "that a ſupply be "granted to his Majeſty, towards the payment of "his proportion of the debt owing to the Prince "of Denmark; and the monies to be raiſed to be "laid out in this kingdom, and ſettled upon the "Prince and Princeſs, and their iſſue, according "to their marriage-agreement." They farther reſolved, that an addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, "that he would pleaſe to uſe his indeavors, "to procure other Princes and States, to pay their "proportions of the debt due to his Royal Highneſs; and that a ſupply be likewiſe granted to "his Majeſty, for the carrying on the coinage of the "gold and ſilver of this kingdom; for continuing "the contracts and circulating exechequer-bills, "for one year longer; for making good both the "deficiencies of the aid of three ſhillings in the "pound, granted in the 8th year of his Majeſty's "reign; of the duty on paper and parchment, "granted the ſame ſeſſion of parliament; of malt-"tickets, and of the quarterly-poll, granted in "the 9th year of his Majeſty's reign, for paying "off the debt due for tranſport-ſervice; and laſtly, "for the payment of the debt due to the navy, and "the ſick and wounded ſeamen.

Farther ways and means.

Towards raiſing theſe ſupplies, the commons reſolved; "that only one moiety of the ſeveral "duties paid upon the importation of tallow-candles, "from Ireland, be drawn back upon the exportation thereof: that the forfeited eſtates, and other "intereſts in Ireland, to be veſted in truſtees, for "the benefit of the public, be applied towards ſatisfaction of the ſaid debts, to the army, the "tranſport-debts, and tallies or tickets upon "deficient funds; and that a farther duty be "laid upon wrought ſilks, bengals, and ſtuffs "mixed with ſilks, or herba, of the manufacture "of China, Perſia and Eaſt-India, and all callicoes painted, died, printed or ſtained there, untill the 30th of September 1701."

Addreſs concerning the forfeited eſtates.

The 21ſt, the commons, in a body, waited upon the King, with their addreſs in relation to the Iriſh forfeitures, to which his Majeſty gave the following anſwer:

The King's anſwer.

Gentlemen,

"I was not only led by inclination, but thought "myſelf obliged in juſtice, to reward thoſe who "had ſerved well, and particularly in the reduction "of Ireland, out of eſtates forfeited to me by "the rebellion there. The long war, in which "we were ingaged, occaſioned great taxes, and "has left the nation much in debt, and the taking "juſt and effectual ways for leſſening that debt, and "ſupporting public credit, is what, in my opinion, "will beſt contribute to the honor, intereſt and "ſafety of the kingdom.

WILL' III. AN' 1700.

Reſolution of the commons thereupon.

The 26th, the ſpeaker reported this anſwer, at which the commons were ſo provoked, that they reſolved; "that whoever adviſed it had uſed his "utmoſt indeavour to create a miſunderſtanding "and jealouſy between the King and his people."

They likewiſe, reſolved, the ſame day; "that "towards raiſing the ſupply, a duty be laid upon "all hops imported into Ireland, except ſuch as are "of the growth of this kingdom.

Votes concerning the exciſe.

The 1ſt of March, colonel Granville reported from the committee of the whole houſe, who had conſidered the ſtate of his Majeſty's revenue; that it was their opinion, "that there had been a "great loſs in his Majeſty's revenue of exciſe, to "the prejudice of the public;" To this reſolution, the houſe agreed, and moreover reſolved; "That it be an inſtruction to the committee of "the whole houſe, to whom the land-tax and "Iriſh forfeiture-bill was commited, that they re-"ceive a clauſe to inable his Majeſty, for the im-"provement of the revenue, to let to farm the "duties of exciſe, if he thought fit; and that it "be an inſtruction alſo, that no member of the "houſe be concerned in the farming or managing "the revenue of exciſe.

The commiſſioners of the Iriſh forfeitures rewarded.

The 7th, the commons reſolved, "that the earl "of Drogheda, Francis Anneſly, John Trenchard, "James Hamilton, Henry Langford, eſq; com-"miſſioners, and James Hooper, eſq; ſecretary of "the commiſſion for inquiring into the Iriſh for-"feitures, ſhould receive, each of them, 1000 l. "for their ſervice, and ſir Richard Leving, and ſir "Francis Brewſter, the other two commiſſioners, "each 500 l. in conſideration of their expenſes; "all which ſums were ordered to be paid out of "the Iriſh forfeitures.

Farther votes concerning the ſupply.

The 12th, the commons came to the following "reſolutions: 1. "That the ſurpluſage, over and "above 700,000 l. of this year's produce of the "ſubſidies, duties and ſmall branches of the revenue "appropriated to the ſervice of his Majeſty's "houſhold, be applied for the ſervice of the "year 1700. 2. That towards the farther raiſing "of the ſupply already granted, the ſum of 60,000 l. "be raiſed, by inlarging the time to purchaſe annuities. 3. That the additional duties of 25 per "cent. on all French goods, and 25 per cent. on all "French wines and brandies; the duty of 5 l. per "ton on all French ſhiping; the Plantation-duties, "and duty of one ſhilling and ten pence per pound "weight, upon all wrought ſilks, be applied for the "ſervice of this preſent year. 4. That a farther duty "be laid upon all wrought ſilks, bengals, and ſtuffs "mixed with ſilk or herba, of the manufacture of "China, Perſia, or Eaſt-India, and all callicoes painted or ſtained there, imported before the 30th of "September, 1701; of 15 per cent. upon the "groſs ſales at the candle, over and above the "duties now payable for the ſame; and, 5. That a "farther duty of 15 per cent. be laid upon all muſ-"lins imported:" which they ordered to be formed into a bill, with a clauſe for a draw-back of the duties upon Eaſt-India goods, upon the exportation thereof.

Truſtees for Iriſh forfeitures appointed.

The 28th, the commons appointed the following gentlemen, by ballot, to be truſtees for the Iriſh forfeitures, viz. Francis Anneſly, James Hamilton, John Baggs, John Trenchard, James Iſham, Henry Langford, James Hooper, eſquires, ſir Cyril Wyche, John Cary gentleman, ſir Henry Sheeres, Thomas Harriſon, William Fellowes, and Thomas Rawlins, eſquires.

The

Will' III. An' 1700.

The report concerning the forfeitures in Ireland printed.

The bill for granting an aid to his Majeſty, by the ſale of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, which, as I have ſaid above, was tacked to the land-tax-bill, having paſſed the houſe of commons, they ordered the report of the commiſſioners of the Iriſh forfeitures to be printed, with all the votes, addreſſes and ſpeeches relating to that affair, from the year 1690 to this time (1).

They, likewiſe, reſolved; "That the procu-"ring or paſſing exorbitant grants, by any mem-"ber now of the privy-council, or by any other "that had been a privy-counſellor, in this or any "former reign, to his uſe or benefit, was a high "crime and miſdemeanor.

Differences between the two houſes about the forfeiture-bill.

The court-party now found themſelves ſo weak in the houſe of commons, that they ſaw it was impoſſible to effect any thing there; they therefore indeavored to oppoſe the paſſing of the complicated bills in the houſe of lords: and, indeed, that illuſtrious aſſembly, did not ſhew any great diſpoſition to favor it: not only, as they look'd upon it as a reflection on his Majeſty, and as it nearly concerned ſome of their body; but becauſe this method of tacking one bill to another was an innovation in parliamentary proceedings, and had a direct tendency to retrench, at leaſt, if not wholly to diveſt the peers of their ſhare in the legiſlative authority. However, as they could not reject the bill, without leaving the urgent neceſſities of the ſtate unprovided for, they only made great amendments in that part of it which related to the forfeitures, and ſo ſent it back again. The commons having taken theſe amendments into conſideration, on the 8th of April, unanimouſly diſapprov'd of them, and demanded a conference, which was held the next day, and managed with great vehemence and warmth on both ſides. This was followed by two more, with as little ſucceſs: at which the commons were ſo exaſperated, that they were upon the point of taking ſome reſolutions, which would have greatly widen'd the breach; when the King, being inform'd of the high ferment the houſe of commons was in, and apprehending the conſequences, ſent a private meſſage (by the earl of Albemarle) to the lords, deſiring them to paſs the bill without any amendments, which the lords did immediately, and acquainted the commons with it (2).

The bill paſſed.

Inquiry into the commiſſions of peace.

There was another inquiry made this ſeſſion, which, it was thought, was not much more agreeable to the court than the former, and which I have hitherto omited mentioning, to keep my foregoing relation intire, and in one connexion; I mean that concerning the qualifications of the juſtices of peace, and deputy-lieutenants, who had been made for ſeven years laſt paſt.

The committee appointed to make this inquiry reported, that not only many perſons diſſenting from the church of England, but men of ſmall fortunes were put into thoſe places; whereupon the commons addreſſed his Majeſty, repreſenting, "that Addreſs of the commons, thereupon.

"it muſt conduce much to his ſervice, and the good "of the kingdom, that gentlemen of quality, and "good eſtates, be reſtored, and put into the com-"miſſions of peace and lieutenancy, and that men "of ſmall eſtates be neither continued, nor put "into the ſaid commiſſions.

Will' III. An' 1700.

The King's anſwer.

To which addreſs, his Majeſty anſwered: "he "was of opinion, that men of the beſt quality "and eſtates were the moſt proper to be intruſted in "the commiſſions of the peace and lieutenancy, and "directions ſhould be given accordingly.

This anſwer was ſo pleaſing to the commons, that they returned their thanks to his Majeſty in a body; upon which the King aſſured them, "he "ſhould always indeavor to do what was for the "good of the public."

Diſcontent of the commons.

The condeſcenſion of the lords in paſſing the reſumption-bill, without any amendment, did not, however, wholly appeaſe the commons, who purſuing their reſentment againſt the preſent miniſtry, put the queſtion, "that an addreſs be made to his "Majeſty, to remove John lord Sommers, lord "chancellor of England, from his preſenſe and "councils for ever:" which tho' it was carried in the negative, no doubt, by reaſon of his acknowleged merit and great ſervices; yet it was reſolved, "that an addreſs be made to his Ma-"jeſty, that no perſon who was not a native of his "dominions, except his Royal Highneſs, Prince "George of Denmark, be admited to his Majeſty's "councils in England or Ireland."

Acts paſſed.

Not to give the commons time to preſent this diſtaſteful addreſs, the King came to the houſe of lords, the 11th of April, and the commons being ſent for up, gave the royal ſanction to the following bills, viz. 1. "To an act for granting an aid to his Majeſty, by "ſale of the forfeited and other eſtates and intereſts "in Ireland, and by the land-tax in England, for the "ſeveral purpoſes therein mentioned. 2. An act for "laying farther duties upon wrought-ſilks, muſ-"lins, and ſome other commodities of the Eaſt-"Indies, and to inlarge the time for purchaſing "certain reverſionary annuities therein mention-"ed. 3. An act for the more effectual imploying "the poor, by incouraging the manufactures "of this kingdom. 4. An Act for aſcertaining "the meaſures of ale and beer. 5. An act to inable "his Majeſty's natural born ſubjects to inherit the "eſtates of their anceſtors, either lineal or collateral, "notwithſtanding their father or mother were "aliens. 6. An act for preventing frivolous and "vexatious ſuits in the principality of Wales, and "the counties palatine. 7. An act for the better "preſerving the navigation of the rivers Avon and "Froom, and cleanſing, paving, and inlightning the "ſtreets of the city of Briſtol. 8. An act to inable "the mayor and citizens of the city of Cheſter, to "recover and preſerve the navigation on the river "Dee. 9. An act for the farther preventing the "growth of Popery. 10. An act for making the "river Larke, alias Burne, navigable. 11. An act "for the more effectual puniſhment of vagrants, "and ſending them by law whither they ought to be "ſent. 12. An act to prevent diſputes that may "ariſe by officers and members of corporations "having neglected to ſign the aſſociation, and "taking the oaths in due time. 13. An act for the "repair of Dover-harbor. 14. An act to puniſh

(1) Whether the deſign of the houſe of commons, in making theſe matters ſo public, was to juſtify their proceedings, or to expoſe the conduct of the court, I ſhall leave undetermined; but their mentioning, in particular, the King's ſpeech to both houſes, of the 5th of January, 1690, in which he aſſured them, that he ſhould not make any grant of the forfeited lands in England and Ireland, 'till there was an opportunity of ſettling that matter in parliament, in ſuch a manner as ſhould be though moſt expedient, ſeems to have a direct tendency to both.

(2) The conſtancy of the commons in purſuing this matter to the deſigned concluſion, was the occaſion of great clamor againſt them, and of their being accuſed of high ingratitude to our glorious deliverer: I ſhall not enter into a diſcuſſion how far theſe clamors were reaſonable or not: but this I think may be ſaid in juſtification of theſe proceedings, that the nation groaning under a load of debts when theſe conſiderable grants were made; his Majeſty having ſolemnly promiſed not to make any ſuch grants without the conſent of parliament; theſe grants being made chiefly, if not wholly to foreiners, and the Britiſh generals, ſuch as the duke of Ormond, the earl of Marlborough, Douglas, Talmaſh, Cunningham, Cuts and others, who were equally inſtrumental in the reduction of Ireland, being excluded the benefit of them, were powerful motives for the reſumption of theſe grants: but biſhop Burnet was of a different opinion. See hiſtory of his own times, &c.

Toe parliament prorogued.

This done; his Majeſty cauſed the earl of Bridgwater to prorogue the parliament, to the 23d of May.

Mr. Stephens's ſermon, before the houſe of commons, cenſured.

Tho' I have now done with the proceedings of this ſeſſion of parliament, I muſt not omit taking notice of one paſſage, which, at that time, made not a little noiſe; the commons having appointed one mr. Stephens to preach before them, on the 30th of January, that miniſter, inſtead of aſſerting the rights and prerogatives of Monarchy, and ſuiting his ſermon to the occaſion, exalted the power of the people; preach'd up the exploded opinions that were the firſt cauſe of the murder of King Charles I; and would have perſuaded his honorable auditors, that the obſervation of this faſt ſhould be utterly aboliſh'd: beſide which it was remark'd, that he omited praying for the parliament, and every branch of the royal family. The next day, a motion being made, and the queſtion put, " that the thanks of the houſe be " given to mr. Stephens for his ſermon," it was carried in the negative, and reſolved; " that, for " the future, no perſon be recommended to preach " before the houſe, who is under the dignity of a " dean of the church, and has not taken the degree " of doctor in divinity."

WILL' III. AN' 1700.

A ſecond treaty of partition.

The electoral Prince of Bavaria happening to dy, during this ſeſſion of parliament (viz. on the 6th of February) the earls of Portland and Jerſey were appointed by the King, as his Majeſty's plenipotentiaries, for agitating and concluding a new treaty of partition. By this treaty, which was agreed upon the 15th of March, between the Engliſh and the Dutch, on the one part, and the French, on the other, it was ſtipulated; " that Spain, Flanders, and the " Weſt-Indies, which by the former treaty, had " been alloted to the Prince of Bavaria, ſhould de- " volve to the arch-duke Charles, the Emperor's " ſecond ſon; that Naples and Sicily, with the reſt " of the Spaniſh places on the coaſt of Italy, as like- " wiſe the province of Guipuſcoa, ſhould be aſſign'd " to the Dauphin; that Lorain ſhould be annex'd " to France, the duchy of Milan be confer'd on the " duke of Lorain, and the county of Bitſche to the " Prince of Vaudemont (3).

The great ſeal taken from the lord Sommers;

The King, in the mean time, obſerving the ſtream to run ſo ſtrong againſt the lord Sommers, that it was a matter of doubt, with him, whether he ſhould be able to ſtem it, reſolved, immediately after the parliament was prorogued, to ſend the earl of Portland, to the lord chancellor Sommers, to demand the great ſeal from him (4): and, on the 21ſt of May, commited the cuſtody of it to ſir Nathan Wright, one of his Majeſty's ſerjeants at law, with the title of lord-keeper, who, thereupon, by virtue of his office, took his place in the privy council.

And given to ſir Nathan Wright.

Knights of the garter made.

The 14th of the ſame month, his Majeſty admited the earl of Albemarle into the moſt noble order of the Garter: but to avoid the cenſure of ſhewing partiality to a foreiner, that honor was, at the ſame time, beſtow'd on the earl of Pembroke (5).

On Midſummer-day, the King was pleaſed to conſtitute Edward, earl of Jerſey, lord chamberlain; Henry, earl of Romney, groom of the ſtole, and the earl of Carliſle, one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber. The 27th, his Majeſty declared in council; that the public affairs requiring his going over to Holland, he had appointed the archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord-keeper of the great-ſeal; the lord preſident of the council; the viſcount Lonſdale, lord privy-ſeal; the lord-ſteward, and the lord-chamberlain of his houſhold; the earl of Bridgwater, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty; the earl of Marlborough, governor to his Highneſs the duke of Glouceſter, and the earl of Tankerville, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, to be lords-juſtices of England, for the adminiſtration of the government during his abſenſe.

Lords juſtices appointed.

The King goes to Holland.

July the 24th, his Majeſty ſet out from Hampton-

(1) The duke of Norfolk met with the leſs difficulty in geting this act paſs'd, becauſe of the precedent in the caſe of the earl of Macclesfield: and having beſide proved, by ſeveral unqueſtionable witneſſes, that his ducheſs lived with ſir John Germain, as his wife, at a houſe they hired at Vaux-hall, and at his lodgings in the Cock-pit, for ſeveral years: however, the duke made no advantage of that proviſion in the act, which inabled him to marry again: but dying ſome time after, the ducheſs married ſir John Germain, and ſhe was the more acceptable to him, as, by this act, her fortune was returned her. For farther particulars I refer to the State-trials.

(2) The old Eaſt-India-company laid hold of this favorable opportunity of the country-party prevailing in the houſe of commons, to get this bill paſs'd, in which they ſucceeded, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition of the new Eaſt-India-company, and the indeavors of the courtiers.

(3) It was again remark'd, and gave occaſion to ſome murmuring, that this treaty was kept a ſecret, both to the parliament and the privy council: and this murmuring (ſays the author of the continuation of Rapin, in French) was very much increas'd by the inſinuations of the Spaniſh embaſſadors, here and in Holland, as well againſt this as the former treaty.

(4.) It has been matter of diſpute, whether the King gained or loſt friends by this change: but I think the latter is almoſt evident: for tho' the lord Sommers had been attack'd by the commons, yet the majority of that houſe had ſtood warmly up in his defence: and as the abandoning ſo faithful a miniſter could not but diſcourage others from imbracing his Majeſty's ſervice heartily; ſo his yielding ſo tamely, to the negative reſolves of the houſe of commons, could not but lay him open to more vigorous attacks.

(5) This could not, however, remove the general diſlike conceived on this occaſion; and it was remark'd, that tho' the inſtallation of the two new knights was performed at Windſor, on the 5th of June, with great ſplendor, yet few of the nobility graced the ceremony with their preſenſe, and very ſevere reflections were thrown upon his Majeſty on this occaſion.

court, and, the next day imbark'd at Margate, for Holland, where he arrived the 7th of the ſame month. I come now to the affairs of Scotland.

Affairs of Scotland.

During the laſt ſeſſion of the parliament of England, the affairs of Scotland, likewiſe, gave his Majeſty no ſmall uneaſineſs: an addreſs was deſign'd to be preſented to the King by the lord Baſil Hamilton, concerning the Scotiſh Eaſt-India-company: but tho' his Majeſty declared his willingneſs to receive the petition; yet he would not allow the lord Baſil to be the preſenter of it: becauſe he did not wait upon his Majeſty, when he was formerly in London, nor had ever ſince given any public evidence of his loyalty, or had even, hitherto, own'd his Majeſty's right to the throne (1).

The houſe of peers, in England, thought fit, likewiſe, to concern themſelves in this affair, and to addreſs the King againſt the Scots ſettlement at Darien, in America; but the commons would not join with them, in that addreſs; in anſwer to which, his Majeſty propoſed a union between the two kingdoms, which would prevent all diſputes of this nature for the future. The lords accordingly brought in a bill, for authorizing commiſſioners of England, to treat with commiſſioners of Scotland on that ſubject: but the commons refuſing their concurence, the bill drop'd. In the mean time, notwithſtanding his Majeſty's proclamation, iſſued out in Scotland, againſt diſorderly petitioning, the Scots went on with a national addreſs to his Majeſty, which was preſented by the marquis of Tweedale, the 25th of March, in which having, among other things, again preſs'd the ſiting of a parliament in Scotland, his Majeſty appointed the 21ſt of May for that purpoſe, and conſtituted the duke of Queenſborough his high-commiſſioner.

The parliament being met accordingly, his Majeſty's letter was read to that aſſembly; in which he told them; "he did intend to have held that ſeſſion "in perſon, but the preſent circumſtances of affairs "abroad would not allow it; that it would be ne-"ceſſary to keep up the forces they had already, "and deſired ſupplies accordingly: he ſaid he was "heartily ſorry for the loſſes the nation had ſuſtain'd "in their trade: but recommended to them the in-"couraging their manufactures, and the improving "the native product of the kingdom, which was "not only the ſureſt foundation of the forein trade, "but would be an effectual way of providing for the "poor. He aſſured them, he would maintain their "laws, liberties and kirk-government; recom-"mended the preventing the growth of Popery, "and diſcouraging of vice and immorality; con-"cluding with an aſſurance of his favor and pro-"tection.

After the reading of this letter, the lord high-commiſſioner made a ſpeech, as did, likewiſe, the lord Marchmont, lord high chancellor; which done the houſe adjourned to the 24th. The 26th, a ſharp repreſentation came to the parliament from the council-general of the African and India-company, containing a tedious rehearſal of their loſſes, diſappointments, and grievances: which repreſentation was back'd the next day, by an addreſs from the ſhire of Haddington, importing; "that after a long and "expenſive war, they expected to have injoyed the "bleſſing of a happily concluded peace, by the "eſtabliſhment of their forein trade; incouragement "of home-manufactures; imploying the poor in the "improvement of their native product, and the "leſſening of their public burdens: but that, inſtead "thereof, to their unſpeakable loſs, and almoſt "ruin of the nation, they found their trade abroad "ſenſibly decay'd, and their coin carried out by the "importation of commodities, from places where "theirs were prohibited: that their woollen and other "manufactures at home, received not the incourage-"ment which the good of the country required: and "more eſpecially, that their company, trading to "Africa and the Indies, met with ſo much oppoſition "from abroad, and got ſo little ſupport at home, "that, after ſo great a loſs of men, and expence of "treaſure, it was too probable, that their ſettlement "in Caledonia (or Darien) would fall, a ſecond time, "under the ſame unlucky circumſtances as at firſt, if "not prevented: that yet, after all thoſe hardſhips "the nation groan'd under, numerous forces were "kept on foot, which occaſion'd them, in time of "peace, heavy and unneceſſary taxes, while their "much wealthier neighbors diſbanded theirs.

Will' III. An' 1700.

This addreſs, and ſeveral others of the like tendency, being read, it was moved to reſolve; "that "the colony of Caledonia in Darien was a legal and "rightful ſettlement, and that the parliament would "maintain and ſupport the ſame." The high-commiſſioner obſerving, that this reſolution was likely to be carried, adjourn'd the parliament for three days, and at their next meeting again for twenty days: Upon which a majority of members met that evening, and ſign'd an addreſs to his Majeſty, "complaining of their having been interrupted by a "ſudden adjournment, while they were debating a "motion concerning their colony at Darien, which "was contrary to an act of parliament of the 11th "of King James VI, which inacted, that nothing "ſhould be done or commanded, which might di-"rectly or indirectly prejudice the liberty of free "voting and reaſoning of the eſtates of parliament; "nor was the adjournment for twenty days con-"ſiſtent with their claim of right: wherein it was "declared, that parliaments ought to be frequently "call'd, allow'd to ſit, and the freedom of ſpeech "and debate ſecured to the members. They, there-"fore, earneſtly intreated his Majeſty, that he "would be pleaſed to allow his parliament, to meet "on the day to which it was adjourned, and to ſit "as long as might be neceſſary for redreſſing the "grievances of the nation.

The King, in anſwer to this addreſs, only ſaid, he would conſider of it; and being preſs'd by the lord Roſs, and the reſt of the commiſſioners ſent up with this addreſs, for a farther anſwer, he replied, "that he "could give no anſwer to their petition, at that time; "but they ſhould know his intentions in Scotland." He then adjourned the parliament farther, by proclamation, and, on the 26th of July, directed a letter to the duke of Queenſborough, and the privy-council of Scotland, which letter was publiſh'd in the nature of a proclamation, and in which he told them: "that he was ſorry for the nation's loſs, and would "do all that lay in his power to repair it: but it "was not poſſible for him to agree to the "reſolve offer'd, to aſſert the right of the Eaſt-In-"dia company's colony in America, concluding, "that his neceſſary abſenſe had occaſioned the laſt "adjournment: but as ſoon as God ſhould bring "him back from Holland, he was fully reſolved "they ſhould meet again." In this the King was

(1) How much the Scots reſented this refuſal, the reader may ſee by the letter the directors of their company wrote to this lord, in which, among other things they ſay: "they could not but heartily regret, that the carrying the company's commiſſion "ſhould be the occaſion of puting a diſtinguiſhing mark upon a perſon of his lordſhip's quality and merit, as to be denied acceſs "to his Majeſty's perſon, becauſe he had not waited on his Majeſty when laſt in London. That no body was ſo blind but might "ſee thro' it: and that whereas they never heard, that his lordſhip had ever done any thing unworthy of his quality, or incon-"ſiſtent with the duty of a loyal and peaceable ſubject; ſo they ſtill hoped his Majeſty might be undeceived of any miſrepreſenta-"tion he might have of him."

WILL'III. AN' 1700.

as good, or rather better than his word; for, before his return, his Majeſty allowed the parliament of that kingdom to meet, on the 28th of October, and ſent them a letter from Loo, in which, among other things, he told them, "he was greatly concerned at "his not being able to aſſert the company's right of "eſtabliſhing a colony at Darien, without diſturb-"ing the peace of Chriſtendom, and bringing that "ancient kingdom into an inevitable war, without "hopes of aſſiſtance."

During this interval, the Scots received the melancholy news of their people's having abandon'd, or rather ſurrender'd their new ſettlement at Darien, to the Spaniards. This occaſion'd the company to repreſent to the parliament, the firſt day of their ſeſſion; "that for want of due protection abroad, "ſome perſons had been incouraged to break in up-"on their privileges even at home." This repreſentation was back'd by a national addreſs, ſeting forth their grievances; which being preſented to the King, on the 16th of November, his Majeſty anſwered thereto; "that he could not take farther "notice of it, becauſe the parliament was then ſit-"ing, and he had made a declaration of his mind for "the good of his people, with which he hoped all "his faithful ſubjects would be ſatisfied."

The parliament having ſat near three months, at length, notwithſtanding ſome heats about the miſcarriage of their ſettlement at Darien, they came, the 21ſt of January, to the reſolution; "that in con-"ſideration of their great deliverance by his Ma-"jeſty, and that, next under GOD, their ſafety and "happineſs depended wholly on his preſervation, "and that of his government, they would ſupport "both to the utmoſt of their power, and maintain "ſuch forces, as ſhould be requiſite for thoſe ends."

Soon after, the lord high-commiſſioner gave the royal aſſent, "to an act for keeping on foot 3000 "men till the firſt of December 1702, and to ano-"ther for a land-tax to maintain thoſe troops;" which done, he communicated the King's letter, in which it was deſired he might have 1100 men on his own account, to the firſt of June following, which being readily complied with, the parliament was prorogued to the 6th of May.

Death of the duke of Glouceſter.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, England met with a very ſenſible affliction, in the death of that hopeful Prince, William, duke of Glouceſter, who departed this life, the 29th of July, ſoon after the King went for Holland (1).

Maritime affairs.

I proceed now to give a brief account of the maritime tranſactions of this ſummer, which, ſo far as they immediately concern'd the Engliſh nation, conſiſted chiefly in ſending of ſeveral ſmall ſquadrons abroad; as, one under the command of vice-admiral

A ſquadron ſent to the Mediterranean.

Aylmer, in the Mediterranean, for the ſecurity of the trade to Turky and Italy, and to confirm the treaties with the governments of Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli.

And others to Newfoundland

Captain Andrew Leake, and after him, captain Stafford Fairborn, were ſent to Newfoundland, for the ſecurity of our fiſhery there, and to convoy our ſhips from thence to Portugal, and the Mediterranean, and back again.

Captain Warren ſent with a ſquadron to the Eaſt-Indies.

Another ſmall ſquadron was ſent to the Eaſt-Indies, under the command of captain Thomas Warren, for the greater ſecurity of that rich trade, and ſuppreſſing pirates in thoſe parts. But after theſe ſhips had continued a long time there, to the great expence of the public, and captain Warren dying there, they returned under the command of captain James Littleton, who had the good fortune to burn or deſtroy ſome of the ſhips belonging to theſe pirates, in their lurking holes.

WILL'III. AN' 1700.

Another ſmall ſquadron was ſent before Sallee, in the kingdom of Fez, under the command of captain John Munden, to cruiſe againſt the pirates of Barbary, eſpecially thoſe of that port.

But the moſt material maritime tranſactions of this year was ſir George Rooke's expedition to the Baltick, to reconcile the Kings of Sweden and Denmark.

Sir George Rooke's expedition to the Baltick.

The differences which ſubſiſted, at this time, between the two Northern crowns, being likely to prove of very ill conſequence to the affairs of Europe, ſir George Rooke, admiral of the fleet, received orders, in the month of November, of the foregoing year, to take upon him the command of a ſquadron of his Majeſty's ſhips, which were to be joined by ſeveral Dutch ſhips, and afterwards by the Swediſh fleet, in the Baltick, in order to compoſe theſe differences. Admiral Allemonde joined ſir George Rooke, the 24th of May, off of Scheveling, with five ſhips of the line, a frigat, a fire-ſhip, and two bomb-veſſels, and ſoon after rear-admiral Vanderduſſen came to the fleet, with the reſt of the Dutch ſhips; upon which, the united fleet ſailed for Gottenburg, off of which place they arrived the 8th of June. Here it was determined in a council of war, to advance towards the Sound, tho' they were informed the Daniſh fleet was ſo ſtationed, that they might be able to make ſome oppoſition, and ſo indeed they found them, at their arrival there (2).

Not long after, a ſignal was made, as was agreed, from Helſingburg, that the Daniſh fleet were under ſail: whereupon our admiral weighed, and advanced into the Sound, to prevent any miſchief, which might otherwiſe happen to the Swedes: but the Daniſh ſhips anchored again, on this ſide of the Grounds, not only to guard the paſſage, but to prevent our joining with the Swediſh ſquadron, which was now come down to the South-ſide of that channel.

The fleets continued in this poſture for ſome time, and ſir George Rooke expected the Swedes would have puſhed thro'; but they having miſſed an opportunity which offered, he got under ſail, and came near to the iſland of Ween, while the Danes plied towards him, in a line of battle; but about noon, they anchored about three leagues off, at the entrance of the channel, which leads to Copenhagen, and the Swedes were on the other ſide of the Grounds, at about the ſame diſtance. The Swediſh fleet having paſſed the channel of Flinterrena, the 3d of July, he got under ſail the next day, and anchoring off of Landſcron, he joined them the 6th; upon which the Danes retreated into their harbor.

The admiral, as ſoon as he got into Copenhagen-road, took a view of the Daniſh fleet, but found it ſo ſecured, that it was judged impracticable to attempt them with the frigats and fire-ſhips; it was

(1) His ſickneſs was in great meaſure occaſion'd by the ſolemnizing the anniverſary of his nativity, on Wedneſday the 24th of July. After the ceremony was over, his Highneſs found himſelf fatigued and indiſpoſed, and the next day he was very bad, and complained of his throat. All Friday he was hot and feveriſh. Saturday morning, after taking away a little blood, he thought himſelf better: but in the evening, his fever appearing more violent, a bliſter was applied to him, and other proper remedies adminiſtred; the ſame day a raſh appeared on his ſkin, which increaſing, on Sunday, more bliſters were laid on. In the afternoon the feaver growing ſtronger, he went into a delirium, which laſted with his life. He paſs'd the night as he did the preceeding, in ſhort broken ſleep, and incoherent talk. On Monday, the bliſters having taken effect, and the pulſe mending, the phyſicians who attended him, thought it not improbable but he might recover; but about eleven at night, he was ſuddenly ſeized with a difficult breathing, and could ſwallow nothing, inſomuch that he expired before midnight; being ten years and five days old. Hiſt. of K. Will. III. vol. 3. p. 457.

(2) He found them to be twenty-eight ſail proper for the line of battle, and that they were ranged athwart the narrow paſſage under the guns of their caſtle of Cronenburg, oppoſite to Helſingburg. Lediard's naval hiſtory, Vol. II. p. 731.

therefore therefore reſolved, in a council of war, to bombard them. Accordingly four bomb-veſſels were ſent in, and the ſame night they threw in about an hundred and forty ſhells, but with little ſucceſs: Three Engliſh, ſix Swediſh, and three Dutch ſhips, were, for that reaſon, ordered into the South channel, going into Copenhagen, with the bomb-veſſels, from whence they bombarded the Daniſh fleet for ſome hours; but no great damage was either done or received.

Preparations were now making to beſiege the city in form, and the young King of Sweden landed, about the latter end of July, with a body of troops, for that purpoſe; but all differences were ſoon after happily adjuſted, and the ſeveral ſquadrons thereupon retired to their reſpective coaſts (1).

The King returns to England.

The King having diſpatched ſeveral important affairs in Holland, imbarked on his return to England, the 17th of October, O. S. landed the next day ſafe at Harwich, and came the 20th to Hampton-court.

Conſequences of the ſecond treaty of partition.

I have already mentioned the concluſion of a ſecond treaty of partition, which according to agreement, was propoſed, by the contracting powers, to other Princes and States, for their acceptance and guaranty: but it appeared ſo ſtrange and unprecedented to them, that I do not find, any one Prince accepted of it. The Emperor thought himſelf aggrieved by it, becauſe he pretended a right to the whole Spaniſh Monarchy. The Engliſh and Dutch certainly had no other view in it, but to eſtabliſh the peace and tranquility of Europe, and to form a barrier in the Netherlands, for the ſecurity of the latter: but the French had very different and underhand views, and accordingly made quite another uſe of this treaty: for under pretenſe of preſerving the Spaniſh Monarchy intire (a very prevalent argument with the haughty Spaniards) they procured a will from the craſy and half-dead King, which was ſigned the 2d of October, N. S. By this will, he conſtituted the duke d'Anjou, his univerſal heir, upon default of iſſue; he was, in default of iſſue on his ſide, to be ſucceeded by the duke of Berry, the duke by arch-duke Charles, and the arch-duke, by the duke of Savoy and his family: provided, however, that none of the crown-lands and ſeigneuries ſhould be alien'd or divided, by any of his ſaid ſucceſſors. This memorable will, which proved afterwards the occaſion of ſo much blood-ſhed, was a contrivance of cardinal Portocarrero, and the marquis de Harcourt, and the King ſurvived it but barely a month, dying the 1ſt of November, N. S.

The King of Spain's laſt will.

The duke d' Anjou declared King of Spain.

A copy of this will being ſent to the court of France, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſeemed to be in ſuſpenſe, at firſt, whether he ſhould accept the will, or obſerve the treaty of partition. But he did not long waver in his reſolution; for, on the 16th of November, N. S. the duke d'Anjou was declared King of Spain, in the court of France, and was proclaimed King, at Madrid, by the direction of his grandfather, Lewis XIV, the 24th of the ſame month; againſt which both the new-elected Pope (Clement XI) and the Emperor proteſted. The Engliſh and Dutch miniſters, likewiſe, repreſented, that this ſtep was not agreeable to the treaty of partition, ſo lately ſigned: but the moſt Chriſtian King anſwered; that the principal deſign of that treaty being to prevent the union of the kingdoms of France and Spain under one ſoverein, this was effectually provided for by the will; the heirs of the duke d'Anjou being rendered incapable of the crown of Spain, if they ſucceeded to that of France (2): ſo that the ſpirit and intention of the partition treaty was ſtill complied with, tho' it might be contrary to the letter of it; adding, that his grandſon's title by the will, accruing ſince that treaty, could not be affected by it.

Will' III. An' 1700.

The Dutch acknowlege him.

The duke of Bavaria, governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, yielding up at the ſame time all the towns and fortreſſes in that country, to the French, with their gariſons, which were partly compoſed of Dutch troops, the States-general, who were unprovided for a war, were under a neceſſity of acknowleging the duke d'Anjou's title to the crown of Spain, that they might get their ſoldiers again, who were thereupon ſuffered to return home.

Theſe proceedings of the French court could not but ſenſibly affect King William: however, he concealed his reſentment, for the preſent, knowing himſelf not to be in a condition to ſhew it in a proper manner: for when count Tallard came to wait on his Majeſty, at Kenſington, the King, who was then looking out of the window, contented himſelf with ſayinig, "Monſieur, le tems eſt bien changé," (ſir, the times are altered, or the weather is altered, for the French word tems ſignifies either.)

The parliament diſſolved;

The King's parting with the parliament, at the end of the laſt ſeſſion, without ſpeaking to them, was a plain indication of his diſpleaſure, and as he now looked upon a war with France unavoidable, he was apprehenſive he could not rely upon effectual aſſiſtance from a houſe of commons, which had already ſhewn how much they were piqued againſt the court. He therefore thought fit, the 19th of December, to diſſolve the preſent parliament, which he had before prorogued ſoon after his arrival, and to call another to meet the 6th of February next inſuing.

And another called.

Promotions at court.

In the mean time, to beſpeak the affection of the oppoſite party, his Majeſty was pleaſed to make ſome removes in imployments of the greateſt truſt. He appointed the earl of Rocheſter to be governor-general of Ireland; the lord Godolphin to be firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, in the room of Charles Mountague, eſq; whom he had before made auditor of the exchequer, and created lord Halifax; the lord Tankerville he made privy-ſeal, in the room of the lord Lonſdale deceaſed; and ſir Charles Hedges, one of the judges of the admiralty, he made one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, in the room of the earl of Jerſey.

An' 1701. The parliament meets.

The parliament met, according to the writs of ſummons, on the 6th of February, but were prorogued to the 10th, when the commons being directed to chuſe a ſpeaker, and having made choice of Robert Harley, eſq; a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed parts, and manly eloquence, they returned to the houſe of lords, the next day, when the King made a ſpeech to both houſes, the ſubſtance of which was;

The King's ſpeech to both houſes.

"That the death of the duke of Glouceſter "having made it abſolutely neceſſary, there ſhould "be a farther proviſion for the ſucceſſion in the "Proteſtant line, on which the happineſs of the "nation, and the ſecurity of its religion ſo much "depended, he could not but recommend it to "their early and effectual conſideration: that the "death of the King of Spain, with the declaration "of his ſucceſſor, had made ſo great an alteration "in affairs abroad, that it required their particular

(1) The King's conduct (ſays biſhop Burnet) in this whole matter was highly applauded, he effectually protected the Swedes, and yet obliged them to accept of reaſonable terms of peace.

(2) At the ſame time, that the French King was gloſſing over his treachery, in this manner, two remarkable inſtruments were drawing up at Paris, contrary to the meaning of the will, to preſerve the duke d'Anjou's title to the crown of France, in caſe his elder brother died without inheritable iſſue: which plainly ſhewed, that the houſe of Bourbon aimed at the union of the two crowns, as a greater ſtep to univerſal monarchy.

"conſideration;

WILL' III. AN' 1701.

" conſideration ; and he did not doubt, but their " reſolutions thereupon, would be ſuch as ſhould " moſt conduce to the intereſt and ſafety of Eng- " land, the preſervation of the Proteſtant religion, " and the peace of Europe.

" He deſired ſupplies for the current year, and " put them in mind of the deficiencies and public " debts, which were yet unprovided for ; and re- " commended to them the puting the royal navy in " a good condition, and of fortifying the harbors " for its ſecurity.

" He recommended the improvement of trade, " and making proviſion for the poor, and con- " cluded with an exhortation to a union among " themſelves, as moſt conducive to their ſafety at " home, and rendering them conſiderable abroad."

Bribery inquired into.

The firſt thing the commons inquired into was bribery in elections, which they did ſo thoroughly that they at length proceeded to purge their houſe of ſeveral members, who appeared to be come into it by undue meaſures, and not content with this, they called likewiſe their agents and bribed electors to an account, and returned their thanks to ſir Edward Seymor, for acting ſo vigorouſly againſt them:

Addreſs of the commons.

(1) The report of the King's ſpeech being made by the ſpeaker, on the 14th, the conſideration of it was adjourned to the next day : however to give his Majeſty immediate aſſurance of their loyalty and affection, they preſently came to this unanimous reſolution ; " that they would ſtand by and ſupport " his Majeſty and his government, and take ſuch " effectual meaſures as might beſt conduce to the in- " tereſt and ſafety of England, preſervation of the " Proteſtant religion, and the peace of Europe :"

The King's anſwer.

The ſubſtance of this reſolution being brought into an addreſs, and preſented to the King, by the whole houſe, his Majeſty was pleaſed to anſwer : " that he thanked them for their addreſs, and " ready concurence with thoſe great ends therein " mentioned, which he took to be extreamly im- " portant to the honor and ſafety of England." He alſo aſſured them ; " that he would never propoſe " any thing, but what was for their common ad- " vantage and ſecurity :" he farther told them ; " that having this opportunity, he thought proper " to acquaint them, that he had, the day before, " received a memorial from the envoy extraordi- " nary of the States-General, a tranſlation whereof " he left them : and as to the former part of it, he " thought it neceſſary to aſk their advice, as to " the latter he deſired their aſſiſtance."

Two more addreſſes of the commons.

The commons, hereupon, addreſſed the King ; " that his Majeſty would pleaſe to cauſe the treaty " between England and the States General, of the " 3d of March 1677, together with all the re- " newals from that time to be laid before them :" to which the King having readily complied, the commons after maturely conſidering the dangerous ſtate of Europe, on account of the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, made another unanimous addreſs to his Majeſty ; " that he would be pleaſed to enter " into ſuch negociations, in concert with the States- " General, and other potentates, as might moſt " effectually conduce to the national ſafety of theſe " kingdoms, and the United-provinces, as like- " wiſe to the preſervation of the peace of Europe ;" they alſo gave his Majeſty aſſurance " of ſupporting " and aſſiſting him to perform the treaty made with " the States-General, March 3, 1677."

The King's anſwer.

To this his Majeſty anſwered, " that he thanked " them heartily for their addreſs, and promiſed to " inable him to make good his treaty : that he " would immediately order his miniſters abroad, to " enter into ſuch negociations as ſhould be condu- " cive to thoſe great ends they deſired : that no- " thing could more effectually eſtabliſh their ſecu- " rity, than the unanimity and vigor they had " ſhewn upon this occaſion ; and that he ſhould al- " ways indeavor, on his part, to preſerve and in- " creaſe all mutual love and confidence betwixt " him and them (2)."

WILL' III. AN' 1701.

The earl of Melford's letter.

The 17th of February, mr. ſecretary Vernon produced a letter, in the houſe of commons, which had been intercepted, from the earl of Melfort, to his brother the earl of Perth, who was at that time governor to the ſuppoſed Prince of Wales. This letter ſuggeſted, in general, that there were men and arms provided by the Papiſts and Jacobites to aſſiſt the French King, if he would make a deſcent in England, in favor of King James : but no particular perſons being named, as concerned in any ſuch conſpiracy, the houſe, looking upon it as a rude and undigeſted ſcheme, only read it, and then laid it aſide, without taking any reſolution thereupon. It was likewiſe communicated to the houſe of lords ; but was as little regarded there : however, their lordſhips preſented an addreſs to the King, the next day, in anſwer to his Majeſty's ſpeech, in which,

Addreſs of the houſe of lords.

" They returned their thanks and acknowlege- " ments to his Majeſty, for his concern, expreſſed " in his ſpeech, for the Proteſtant religion, and his " care for its preſervation, by recommending to " their conſideration a farther proviſion for the ſuc- " ceſſion to the crown, in the Proteſtant line." They added : " That being deeply ſenſible of the " weight of what his Majeſty had farther recom- " mended to them, they could not but deſire he " ſhould be pleaſed to order all treaties made by " him, ſince the late war, to be laid before them, " that they might thereby, be better inabled to " give their advice. They withal requeſted his " Majeſty to ingage in ſuch alliances abroad, as he " would think proper for preſerving the ballance of " Europe, aſſuring him they would readily concur " with whatever ſhould be conducive to the honor " and ſafety of England, the preſervation of the Pro- " teſtant religion, and the peace of Europe. They " next humbly thanked his Majeſty for communica- " ting the afore-mentioned letter to them, and de- " ſired he would be pleaſed to order the ſeizing of all " horſes and arms of Papiſts, and other diſaffected " perſons, and have thoſe ill men removed from " London, according to law : but eſpecially deſired " he would be pleaſed to give directions for a ſearch " to be made after arms and proviſions for war, " mentioned in the ſaid letter ; Laſtly, they re- " queſted, that ſuch a fleet might ſpeedily be fited " out, as his Majeſty, in his great wiſdom, ſhould " think neceſſary for the defenſe of himſelf and " kingdoms."

The King's anſwer.

His Majeſty, in anſwer, " thanked their lord- " ſhips for this addreſs, and aſſured them, he would " take care, to perform all that they had deſired of " him."

Alliance between the Emperor, England and Holland.

King William having now the aſſurances of his parliament to aid and ſupport him in what alliances he ſhould find neceſſary to enter into, for the public good, concluded one, in particular, between the Emperor, England and Holland, to maintain the pretenſions of the former to the Spaniſh Monarchy, which was the baſis of the grand alliance that

(1) By theſe proceedings, which were chiefly levelled at the court-intereſt, it plainly appeared, that the country-party had again the majority in the houſe of commons.

(2) Hitherto the begining of this ſeſſion was very promiſing : but we ſhall find, that the attention of the commons to public affairs was ſoon after taken off by private differences between the two houſes.

infued, tho' it met with ſome interruption for the preſent.

The commons declare for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion;

His Majeſty had, as we have ſeen above, recommended to both houſes, from the throne, to provide for the ſucceſſion of the crown, after his and the Princeſs of Denmark's demiſe: but not contented with having declared his mind only, he even urged it (1): the commons therefore, took that part of his ſpeech into their early conſideration, and came, on the 3d of March, to the reſolution; that for "preſerving the peace and happineſs of this kingdom, and the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion, "by law eſtabliſhed, it was abſolutely neceſſary, that "a farther proviſion ſhould be made, for the limitation and ſucceſſion of the crown, in the Proteſtant "line, after his Majeſty, and the Princeſs, and "the heirs of their bodies reſpectively, and that a "farther proviſion ſhould be firſt made, for the "rights and liberties of the people.

Under ſome limitations.

A committee being appointed for that purpoſe, ſome reſolutions were therein taken, and reported, on the 12th, to the houſe, who thereupon agreed and reſolved:

1. "That all things relating to the well-governing of this kingdom, which are properly cognizable in the privy-council, ſhall be tranſacted there; and all reſolutions taken thereupon ſhall be ſigned by the privy-council.

2. "That no perſon whomſoever, who is not a native of England, Scotland or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, or who is not born of Engliſh parents beyond the ſeas (altho' ſuch perſon be naturalized or made a deniſon) ſhall be capable of any grant of lands, tenements or hereditaments from the crown to himſelf, or any other in truſt for him.

3. "That upon the farther limitation of the crown, in caſe the ſame ſhall hereafter come to any perſon not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to ingage in any war for the defenſe of any dominions or territories, not belonging to the crown of England, without the conſent of parliament.

4. "That whoſoever ſhall hereafter come to the poſſeſſion of this crown, ſhall join in the communion with the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.

5. "That no pardon be pleadable to any impeachment in parliament.

6. "That no perſon who ſhall hereafter come to the poſſeſſion of this crown, ſhall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland or Ireland, without conſent of parliament.

7. "That no perſon who has any office under the King, or receives a penſion from the crown, ſhall be capable of ſerving as a member of the houſe of commons.

8. "That farther proviſion be made for the confirming of all laws and ſtatutes, for the ſecuring our religion, and the rights and liberties of the people.

9. "That judges commiſſions be made "quam diu ſe bene geſſerint," and their ſalaries aſcertained and eſtabliſhed; but, upon the addreſs of either houſe of parliament, it may be lawful to remove them.

The houſe of Hanover agreed to be next in ſucceſſion.

10. "That the Princeſs Sophia, ducheſs Dowager of Hanover, be declared the next in ſucceſſion to the crown of England, in the Proteſtant line, after his Majeſty and the Princeſs, and the heirs of their bodies, reſpectively; and that the farther limitation of the crown be to the ſaid "Princeſs Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being "Proteſtants." Will' III. An' 1701.

11. "That a bill be brought in upon the ſaid "reſolutions."

Theſe reſolutions being ſoon known abroad, many of the blood-royal, who were nearer related to King James I and King Charles I, than any of the Proteſtant line, except the King and Princeſs, thought theſe ſteps a great infringement of their rights: eſpecially the ducheſs of Savoy, daughter to the late ducheſs of Orleans, and grand-daughter to King Charles I, who was neareſt in blood to the crown, after the Princeſs of Denmark and King William. She, therefore, ordered count Maſſy, embaſſador of Savoy, to make a proteſtation, or rather repreſentation, in her behalf, containing in ſubſtance:

The ducheſs of Savoy's proteſt:
